To Our Producer and Writer-Friends Throughout United States and Foreign Countries

NEW YORK CITY negotiates by far the majority of all stories utilized in Talking Pictures today, and our new department thus enables adequate representation in this field.

We maintain a staff of experts who are second to none. Whether it be work of synopses, technical working continuity, criticism, revision or typing, you may rely upon work of integrity at all times.

The necessity for legal protection through copyright is very evident. Proof of this is demonstrated almost daily in newspapers throughout the country. The Library of Congress at Washington is maintained for that purpose. Reliance upon the common law is unwise. No honorable author or producer desires to become involved in burdensome litigation, and copyright protection is protective insurance, by registration, against that substantial expense. The producer is thus protected against any unfounded claims of authorship, as well as the author himself.

TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE reaches only the producers and our clients. It is not on public sale. No advertisements are accepted, it being our purpose to keep it a strictly professional magazine.

Our offices are available to those producers who do not depend upon staff continuity writers. Our rates for this work are reasonable and are subject to contract.

In addition to synopses herein printed, complete script is submitted to suitable producers where, in our judgment, such submission is advisable.

Free copy of publication is sent to each author whose story appears herein.

Producers will find it extremely useful to retain TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE in their files for a future emergency, in the event that their present needs are supplied.

Talking Picture Magazine is not available to the general public. DANIEL O'MALLEY CO., INC., 1776 Broadway, New York, Publishers; Daniel S. Margolies, General Manager; Associate Editors, Edith Bersin, Margot Hoff. The entire contents of this magazine are protected by copyright and must not be utilized without permission.

THE GIFT OF EMPTY HANDS

Grace W. Pugh File No. 7962

SUPPORTING herself on her crutches, little Margaret Jordan gallantly braved the disappointed expressions of all Cedar Creek, gathered to welcome its new school teacher, and in response to Bull Weston's belligerent statement that she wouldn't do, informed him stoutly that she had been hired to teach the children and she was fully qualified. Admiring the girl's pluck, Cedar Creek swallowed its first impression and holding back her tears Margaret gratefully accepted Mrs. Hillman's invitation to board at her home. Always her deformed body had handicapped her, and were it not for her music and that superb spirit, she should long ago have given up trying to fit herself into normal living. From Mrs. Hillman's prattling boy, Margaret learned that one Jack Ryle had laid bets that he'd be the first to date the new school marm, and he was fightin' mad; and from Jack's nephew, Tommy, Margaret realized that all the youngsters were expecting to have a great time bedeviling her.

Indeed with Tommy dipping Mabel's prized curls in the inkwells, and inventing all manner of annoyances with a remarkable fertility of imagination, Margaret almost felt beaten. But it was Jack, coming to intimidate her, who remained to promise to beat Tommy into submission. Margaret protested at that and a curious friendship was born there under a great tree, with Margaret's crutch lying unseen in the tall grass. Only when Jack suddenly realized that dusk was falling and in his solicitude Margaret read pity, did she become formal. But Margaret had her violin, and Jack together with everyone else in Cedar Creek found a poignant happiness in listening to the now tender, now merry tunes that the little cripple stroked from her fine old instrument. Margaret dared not question Jack's tenderness, but the broad shouldered sawyer drew himself up one morning as he realized that little Tommy had tacitly accepted his uncle Jack's love for the deformed little school mistress. How could he, who had always wanted a fine healthy mate believe he would be satisfied with such a wife? That day, Jack drove into town and called on blonde Mamie who greeted him with squeals of joy. Comparing her coquetry with Margaret's candor, Jack felt annoyed at his own thoughts and brusquely invited Mamie to come to camp for the day. He knew the sensation he was creating as he introduced Mamie to Margaret and defensively he poured his attentions on Mamie until Tommy, eyes glittering, presented Mamie with a gift—a water-snake, which sent Mamie into prolonged hysterics. That night before Mamie had been returned home, Jack took down a strap he had never before used, and thrashed Tommy soundly. When he returned Tommy was gone. Assured by Margaret that running away was any boy's trick, Jack finally went home, but the next day Tommy did not return, nor the next. And in the agony of his remorse while Jack led searching parties vainly in search of Tommy, he found that surcease came only in Margaret's soothing presence. Then Margaret, whom crutches had kept from joining the hunt, wandered off alone, and stood transfixed as she saw the grimy Tommy creep from a cave and believing that his uncle Jack no longer wanted him, stand directly in the path of a train. Disregarding her crutches, Margaret flung herself at Tommy, threw him from the dread path, and lost consciousness as the glancing wheels caught her. She regained consciousness to find Jack whispering his desperate need of her, and the doctor, smiling encouragement, softly shut the door and left these two who had so much to say to each other—together. And Tommy, certain now that his uncle Jack was a "regular guy" again, picked up Margaret's violin and tweaked out, boy fashion, a discordant but well intended Lohengrin.

PLATINUM GIRL

Frank Miros File No. 8090

DANCING in a night club with the not too sober Jacob Riggs, lovely Jean Holman, notices the admiring glance of Tom Costello. Jacob catches her half-smile and jealously remonstrates but Jean only shakes her platinum head and laughs. Eluding Jacob's clinging hands, Jean locks her door and thinks long of Tom, without knowing who he is.

The next morning Jean eludes the caresses of Dr. Olsen for whom she works as private secretary and the entrance of Betty Ryan, a pretty patient who has wrenched her ankle saves Jean from a further demonstration. The doctor, going out to lunch offers to take Betty home, and there meets her brother Johnny who is explaining the workings of his radio to his friend, Tom Costello.

A few days later, Tom offers his car to assist a child run over by a hit-and-run driver, and the policeman directs him to the famous Dr. Olsen. Tom rejoices over the opportunity of meeting Jean again and asks if he may call. After he has gone and the office is free of patients, Dr. Olsen tries to take Jean in his arms and when she refuses even his offer of marriage, he turns upon her calling her a good time girl. Angered she leaves her position, and when Jacob calls her that night, because she is so upset, she promises to go with him. Betty, Dr. Olsen's patient, is there with her brother and Tom, and Jean introduces them all to Jacob whose face she later slaps for his familiarity. In tears, Jean prepares to go home alone, but Tom catches up with her and asks if he may escort her home. That night Tom confesses he has fallen in love at first sight and asks Jean, who has thought of no one else for days, to marry him.

Olsen, sullen at the news of Jean's marriage tries to find consolation with Betty, whose brother teases her about the handsome doctor. However, the doctor cannot get Jean out of his mind any more than can Riggs who refuses to accept Jean's claim that she loves her husband; and when Tom is out, Riggs forces his way into Jean's room and tries to make love to her. Tom, coming in, turns the drunken playboy out, but irresponsible and chronically drunk, Riggs picks up a glass and throws it at Tom. The glass smashes and as Tom cries out he cannot see, Jean's screams bring the police. Philosophically accepting his blindness, Tom holds the weeping Jean close and refuses to let her blame herself. Even when he loses his position he claims that his savings are sufficient, that he will not let Jean support him. Frantically Jean begs Dr. Olsen in whose skill she has confidence, to save her husband, but when he offers his aid on the condition that she divorce Tom and marry him after Tom is cured, Jean turns on her heel and walks out contemptuously.

The police search in vain for Riggs who has bribed the frightened night club owner to shelter him in a back room. However, Tom suspects where Riggs is hiding and attempts to take justice in his own hands, refusing to explain, later, that it was Riggs who beat him and threw him out. Knowing that he is no longer safe, Riggs makes a last desperate move, intending to take Betty with him. However, the very night that Olsen, letting humanity overcome his own desires, agrees to operate on Tom, Riggs lurches in to Betty's home with gun in his hand to force Betty to come with him. Johnny, coming in upon them is shot full in the stomach and before dying writes Riggs name. The police pursue the murderer relentlessly and he overturns his car, dying instantly while Betty is thrown clear. Tom regains his sight and goes on a second honeymoon with Jean while Dr. Olsen gently asks Betty to marry him.

CHANGED STANDARDS

Jack C. McLean File No. 8003

LOOKING dazedly about the very feminine tiny bedroom with its scattering of intimate apparel, Charles Charters groaned at the throbbing in his head and blushed at the confused memory of last night's debauch. There had been a party of fellow engineers, then a show—Mermaids and Mor-Maidens, and finally a taxi ride to a "hot-joint" with a by no means chilly Mermaid. For the life of him he couldn't remember more now, but his groans came thick and fast as he painfully got himself into his clothes, and then found he hadn't been left with a nickel. But the biggest surprise of all, considering that his watch, his ring, and his wallet had been taken by his companion of the night—was a photograph of a lovely young person, demurely stuck in the mirror and signed: "Yours sincerely, Mary Mason." Reeling slightly, Charles Charters struggled home holding fast to the picture.

The maid gasped at the sight of the young master, much disheveled, delivering the milk. And splashing noisily in his shower, Charles decided that his first over-the-head splosh had left very vague memories. Snatching breakfast he hurried to his desk as newly promoted junior partner of his father's firm of mining engineers. Grimacing at the pile of correspondence, Charles consigned five of the six applicants for the secretarial vacancy to a fitting place then stared popeyed at the pert letter which was signed, "Yours sincerely, Mary Mason." Ten minutes of idle thought and then Charles slipped the photo he had salvaged this morning in with the application. His father's choice was chuckly. He'd try Mary Mason. Liked the girl's spirit.

Peter Charters liked the girl. He beamed when she admitted crestfallenly she'd never been a secretary before, and Charles almost exploded, in the next room. At home Mary examined the hat her caller had left and mused about his stealthy disappearance.

Monday morning Charles noted with some satisfaction the blush that indicated Mary Mason recognized him, but she effectively discouraged reference. She proved an apt pupil, but Charles spent most of his time in unproductive speculation and as he complimented her she retorted she had a memory sharpened at a night school. But though he asked for this and that obsolete folder to create an opening to take her to lunch, Mary Mason was unapproachable.

Weeks went by and Peter commending his secretary's new filing system to his son, jovially exclaimed "Pull this tag and XY4 slips out like a thief in the night." Mary Mason dropped a box of pins and Peter watching the pair pick up stray pins from extreme corners of the floor while a big pile lay in the middle untouched, wondered what mystery he had touched.

Accordingly, Peter with twinkling eyes sent his son to get some important work his secretary was doing at home. Charles gulped, Mary typed loudly, and both commented despairingly about Mary's all too familiar room. A clatter at the door informed Charles that Patrolman Flynn had a ticket for speeding for him and recognizing him, the big Irishman explained that Charles had been found soused one night. Mary, staying with a sick friend, had insisted that the boy be sheltered in her room rather than the jail, and for thanks. Charles had slipped out like a thief in the night! Charles found Mary, Mary blushed, and Peter, informed, commented that his son was certainly slow.

PURPLE SHADOWS

Florence MacCreadie File No. 8026

IT was useless trying to get the consent of his tiny little strong-minded grandmother to his marrying Margit. She had chosen cousin Elizabeth for him and only by his marrying cousin Elizabeth could he avoid Pokey Cane's prophesied fate that he'd be killed by lightning before he was of age—if he were still heir to the estate. Moreover, Terry's scornful statement that Pokey Cane was just an ignorant old gypsy met with a furious reminder that Pokey Cane had the Blessed Touch, hadn't she "perdicted" the death of his own mother and father? Of course, if Terry would marry his cousin, his grandmother would deed over her estate to her until his twenty-first birthday. But under no circumstances would Granny O Farrel hear of Margit as Terry's bride.

And in the moonlight, when Terry held Margit close, he heard her wistful explanation that her father had forbidden the match, too, learning of Granny O'Farrel's objections to his wee Margit. And so Terry convinced Margit who loved him with all her heart to elope with him and be married by the clerk in Dublin. That night Terry and Margit were united by a night-capped Justice and with shaking fingers they signed the blotted page.

In Sicily the year rolled by. Terry wrote placating letters to his granny asking for forgiveness, adding cautiously that only rarely was there a thunderstorm in Sicily. But still no word came from her. Then one sunny morning, Terry was suddenly panic-stricken at the realization that they knew practically nothing about the Sicilian doctors and Margit should have old Ellen for her nurse. Besides there was a south bedroom where the O'Farrels had been born for generations on end. Terry wrote to Granny saying Margit needed her and he knew her big heart would not turn Margit down. A few mornings later, pushing Terry back from the closed bed room door, Margit insisted on entering alone. The frail form on the bed moved restlessly, and as Margit half whispered "Granny," the eyes of the little old lady pierced her and "Lord lov' you, colleen," she said, "Where's the lad?" They all wept a little and Terry answered queries. Margit's time was early in May and Terry would be twenty-one two weeks before then.

Although the days were sunny, the shadow of Pokey Cane hung over them until at last Terry's birthday dawned without a cloud overhead to darken one little hope. Terry grinned but his grandmother had seen other days dawn with the sun ridin' high that ended in disaster and sure enough later distant rumblings gave unmistakable storm warnings. Terry promised he'd take refuge in the cave in which he always took shelter against Pokey Cane's prophecy, but before night, white faced and tense, he came out of Margit's room and frantically tried to get hold of the doctor. At length the hospital told him to bring Margit there and though his granny begged him not to go out in that storm, Terry lifted Margit into the car and hushed her fears. The storm broke and as they approached the cave and the lightning seemed to be striking at him, Margit begged him to stop. On and on they drove, dodging falling trees and rattling over weakening bridges. At last the hospital received them.

At dawn Terry burst into his Granny's room joyously telling of the tiny Terence O'Farrel the Fifth, and awesomely whispering that the cave in which he had always taken shelter had been completely demolished by lightning. Overcome with amazement, Terry accepted the reproof of the little old lady who said she deeded over the entire fortune to his son last night, and that's how Terry was saved.

THE DEVIL'S JOKE

Robert L. Russel File No. 8021

FOR years the weazened spinster plans her revenge against Norman H. Widlow, the only man who has worsted her in a business transaction and although she employs him as president of her huge textile firm, claiming that he has proven himself invaluable, Ethel Wiggam now hires Natalie Reynolds to ruin him.

At dinner, Norman casually mentions he is getting a new secretary and instantly repents for his son, Anthony, twenty-two, playfully warns his mother against his father's pretty secretary and the joke gets out of bounds. To his own surprise Norman finds the beautiful secretary who demurely hands him a letter of recommendation from Miss Wiggam, stirs him by her admiration. Self-consciously he invites her to lunch and frowns at the interest of the office force. The unwonted visit of his wife to his office distresses him and when she nags him for his new attention to his clothes he rebels and there is a nasty and unnecessary fuss at the table. Only Helen, his daughter, sympathizes and Wally Richardson, an admirer, calms her fears.

Meanwhile Norman finds Natalie understanding and comforting and when she places her hand on his shoulder for support while she fixes her slipper heel, Norman clumsily seizes her in his arms and is astonished that not only does she not slap him but she responds. Widlow holds out against her invitation to her apartment, then goes, and drunk, signs his name to a check which Natalie fills out for fifty thousand dollars. Remorseful at waking in Natalie's room, Widlow keeps on drinking while the papers headline his disappearance and the cashier, remembering the check he cashed, furnishes the clue. A reporter, finding Widlow, promises to hush the case, but Miss Wiggam, part owner of the paper insists on the printing of the whole story. The directors of Miss Wiggam's company call for Widlow's resignation, his wife publicly states she is getting a divorce, and Miss Wiggam, flanked by a committee, relentlessly calls on Widlow to force him to leave town. Stunned by the swift disaster, Widlow realizes the spinster's culpability and in a rage hurls a decanter, killing her instantly. Like a man hypnotized, he is taken to jail. Helen comes to see him, but shamed, he cannot endure speaking to her through a screen, and refuses to come out.

At the trial the defense brings in a life-sized portrait of the deceased and his plea to the jury to look upon the cruel face during the evidence has the desired effect. Widlow sits dazedly but his attorney convinces the jury that the cruel spinster had railroaded a tramp to prison where he died, and now had taken advantage of his client's blameless existence to make him a more susceptible victim to an adventuress' wiles. Describing the hounding of the defendant, the attorney stirs the jury which brings in a verdict freeing the unbelieving Widlow.

However, his wife learning that her brother is holding a position open for him in California, relents, and phones a message to his hotel instructing him to call her. The telephone operator, carrying on a flirtation, forgets Widlow, who, frustrated in his suicide attempt by a defective cartridge is about to pull the trigger again, when he finally receives his wife's message. And, on the train, having given his consent to his daughter's marriage and heard his son's jocular advice that their first born be named Norman or Norma, Widlow looks at the cartridge his wife is inquiring about and murmurs, "Oh that? That's the Devil's joke on Miss Wiggam."

ELI'S LICENSE

Elizabeth V. Gotto File No. 8045

BELIEVING the lie of a rival that Mary Cameron, pretty young teacher in a Jewish section of the city, is engaged, John McIntosh, rising young lawyer, disappears without a word. Later, he returns, drawn there despite his belief that Mary is married. Mary, meanwhile, is distracted by John's inexplicable departure, and refusing her other admirers settles down to a life of teaching. Longing for a home of her own, Mary spends lonely years devoting all her time to her little foreign pupils. Endearing herself to them, she even devotes her free time to visiting them in their homes and her greatest struggle is to get them to speak English correctly—a task of no slight proportions.

Among Miss Cameron's pupils are Eli Schlaefstein, son of a jeweler, a bright, ingenious, lovable young chap whose English is deplorable; Rosie Rosenbloom, his devoted little friend, and Nathan Saltpetre, his enemy, more proficient in English. One day Miss Cameron keeps Eli after school, ostensihly to help him with his painting, hut really to get an extra opportunity to instruct him in oral English. She happens to mention that the city will soon be off daylight saving time and Eli runs to his father to advise him to make clocks that tell one time in front and another in back. One is sold to Nathan's father, a chicken dealer, who soon realizes that it doesn't run. Moreover when Mr. Saltpetre learns that he may not get his money back because Mr. Schlaefstein is in the hospital about to have his appendix removed—against his will, the chicken dealer dashes excitedly to the spot to get his money for a chicken Schlaefstein took on credit. However Eli's father shrewdly points out that the chicken caused his pain and agrees not to sue only on condition that his enemy take his place on the operating table.

Thereafter Nathan taunts Eli unbearably but through the aid of little Rosie dressed as the spirit of Drake, Eli wins a theater amateur contest that his rival was carrying off by dint of superior voice qualities and a hired claque. Miss Cameron, in school, has a difficult time keeping Nathan and Eli from rushing at each other. and Eli is desperate because his rival excels in English. However, ingeniously he determines to get a license at City Hall—such a poetic license as Miss Cameron explained that Byron had, permitting him to say "was broke". The alderman has a difficult time of it understanding the type of license desired, but a broad grin overspreads his face as he understands, and Eli rushes off clutching his precious license.

Meanwhile the teachers are flurried hy the report that the new alderman is coming to inspect the schools, and Miss Cameron is shown Eli's license. She pales at the signature attached to the whimsical note, "John Stevenson McIntosh," and just then the alderman walks in and before the eyes of the delighted class calls, "Mary!" while Eli having excitedly announced the license man triumphantly takes credit for bringing teacher and the license man together.

THE GREATEST OF THESE

Ellison Laverne Trent File No. 7990

SLIPPING into the great cathedral, the little peasant lad loses all sense of the present as the harmonies of the mighty organ flood his being. Suddenly he is firmly grasped and shaken violently by the sexton. Sobbing that he was only listening to the music, the lad attracts the attention of Rudolph Gonsalus, the organist, who impressed by the boy's sincerity, accompanies him home. Rudolph listens to the lad playing on his violin and overwhelms both little Tony and his widowed mother, Margaret, by offering to give the child musical instructions. Tony proves an apt pupil and finding a great peace in the tiny home, Rudolph realizes he loves the child's mother. That spring, Rudolph and Margaret are married and Tony realizes his great ambition of being able to study at a University.

In Vienna Tony meets a fellow student, Selma Harrington, an American heiress, and in the easy comaradie of the University walls, they become great friends. However, Selma soon discovers Tony's peasant origin and fearful that she is falling in love with him, she soon arranges to return to the United States without saying goodbye to Tony. Broken hearted, Tony continues his studies and although his mother and step-father rejoice in the honors that come to the boy upon graduation, Tony remains largely indifferent until he is offered a concert tour of the United States. He accepts upon learning that his itinerary includes Selma's city.

Tony is a great success wherever he plays and Selma, engaged to a wealthy American remembers the happy moments with him with a rush of emotion. In receipt of Tony's fervent letter, Selma cruelly decides to forever break off the disquieting romance, and she induces Meredith to get up a party to hear the violinist sensation. Meredith demurs hut upon Selma's persuasion arranges for a box. Great applause greets Tony's appearance but throughout his performance the violinist is disturbed by the heckling of a party of half-sober box-holders. Looking up he sees Selma among them and realizes that she is publicly expressing her indifference to him. As a result, Tony plays so badly that the papers headline the concert fiaseo of the supposedly great violinist. Selma's words, "You are only a peasant after all," come back to him with startling force and dispiritedly he accepts the abuse of the press and of his sponsors.

Sobbing at her responsibility for Tony's disgrace, Selma tries to persuade herself that Tony is after all just a person of low birth and not worth thinking about, and drying her tears, Selma plunges herself into the false gaiety of her party, and that night consents to marry Meredith, born into a socially prominent family. However, almost immediately Selma realizes the farce of her marriage. Her husband proves, for all his fine family, a worthless profligate whose constant drinking reduces Selma to despair. And when one day he tells her he wants a divorce to marry a night club hostess, Selma soon finds herself free again.

Swallowing her pride, Selma goes to Vienna where Tony turns from her and tells her to go back to her aristocrats, he is a peasant without even his musie any more. But Selma, anxious to repair the injury she has done him, persuades him to play again and Tony, who has not touched his beloved instrument since the concert, plays haltingly then with greater power until his song speaks of the greatness of love and filled with a new humility Selma knows that Tony's music speaks of his forgiveness.

THE CALL OF THE SEA

Michelle Marchand File No. 8058

FROM the first trip over with his wealthy family, Jimmie felt the irresistible call of the sea. For weeks he plagued his worried father and at length, appealing to a family friend, the consent of his father was finally won for—one trip. Happily the boy climbed the gang plank, but as he was shown to the Glory Hole, a sickening feeling overwhelmed him. Below was a mess of dirty bunks, soiled linen and dice rolling sailors. For an instant the lad felt as if he would dash up the plank and into the arms of his family, but swallowing hard, he climbed to his bunk.

Jimmie found a staunch friend in Jack, a demoted officer and when, one day, in a terrific storm, Jimmie and another sailor rushed across the wave swept decks to repair a broken porthole, and a mountainous wave swept the other sailor overboard, Jack hanging on to a rope, leaped to Jimmie's rescue and personally resuscitated the spent lad. The other sailor was never found! It was Jack who constantly reiterated the truism that women and the sea were irreconcilable. On shore leave, Jimmie introduced his pal at home, and his sister Ruth, three years' Jimmie's junior clung to her brother and tried to introduce him to her friends. She would have liked to see Jimmie settle down and get married, but Jimmie, mindful of Jack's advice, though he worshipped Ruth and to oblige her went to parties with her friends, remained cool and impersonal.

Then, on one of his trips a great storm blew up. Jack, grown leaner and suddenly white haired, swayed in the storm, but in response to Jimmie's comments remained inscrutable and silent until at length he confessed this was his last trip. He was going back to England to die. Jimmie felt a great ache in his heart. Just five more days with Jack. But even in this he was doomed to disappointment for a notice came of his transfer to another ship. Sullenly he saw about his command and even the news that the transfer was a promotion and that he was now the possessor of two stripes, hardly compensated for a curtailed visit with his beloved sister and a shortened last meeting with Jack. It was Ruth who persuaded them both to attend a party that last night. Jimmie prepared to go in civilian clothes but Ruth cajoled him into wearing his officer's uniform to please her friend Eleanor. And when Jimmie met Eleanor that night, all thoughts of eschewing women fled. Eleanor was a little Goddess. She was the cynosure of all eyes that night, but Eleanor had eyes only for Jimmie, and Jimmie taking her in his arms in the moon drenched garden whispered, "I love you."

Never had it been so hard to go off to sea, but leaving the waving Jack and Ruth, and Eleanor behind, Jimmie sailed. Jimmie received cheering letters from Eleanor whose picture he had always before him. Then came a terrific hlow. Jack died in England and a last letter warning him not to let any woman keep him from the sea was forwarded. Crushed by his friend's death, Jimmie came home only to find the even greater tragedy—Ruth also had been taken. The sea, his beloved sea had kept him from the two people he loved best. Thereafter Jimmie took to drink to forget and only a near tragedy saved him. When he came back he married Eleanor and promised to give up the sea. But it couldn't last. He pined for the salty spray until the understanding Eleanor released him of his promise and with a mighty jubilation, he sailed again. However, one trip didn't hold him. Thereafter he couldn't settle down and Eleanor finally pleaded with him to stay until her baby was born. Ungentle for the first time, Jimmie refused. He had signed as mate. They needed him. He stuffed a telegram into his pocket unread and the ship was pulling out before he read that Eleanor was dying. Like one berserk he sped back to her but she was barely living. Through anxious hours he waited for the crisis and at length, seeing Jimmie beside her, Eleanor lived. Her baby was born and never again did Jimmie answer the call that came from the sea. Love was a mightier tie.

GLASS HOUSES

Sue Frances Gallagher File No. 8068

NERVOUSLY turning the wedding ring placed on her finger a few minutes before, little Iris confided her fears to Jane. It had all been so sudden. Her beloved stepbrother, Dan, and Jane were to be married and it had seemed such a bright idea for her to accept Stewart Calman's plea that they be married before he had to leave for the front. Only sixteen, Iris had dazedly consented, thinking only how handsome Stewart looked in his captain's uniform. But seeking out Stewart, Iris grew deathly pale as she overheard him harshly laughing at the sobbing Clare, telling her he couldn't marry her, could he? He had just married little Iris McLean. Trembling, Iris consoled the hysterical betrayed Clare and promised to help. But the reaction to the nervous strain attending Stewart's sullen acceptance of the annulment, and her feeling of guilt in connection with her father's death induced not so much by Iris' action as by her stepmother's storming about it, brought on a severe breakdown. For weeks the sensitive, pitifully broken child hovered between life and death. With hair turned white from the succession of shoeks, the little sixteen year old lost all interest in living until, learning that the unfortunate Clare had died, giving birth to twins, Iris begged to be allowed to bring up the babies. It was her stepbrother Dan, finally, who, worshipping his little Iris, to give her a new interest in life, adopted Iris and the twins. Iris took the name Mrs. Grey and with the suggestion of an unfortunate war tragedy, at sixteen was accepted as the mother of the babies. Then, realizing that Dan, attending her so minutely, was endangering his happiness with Jane, Iris begged to be allowed to take the twins and live on Dan's ranch near Hollywood.

The lovely Iris with her white hair and wistful little face, was a nine days' wonder, particularly beeause of the twins she claimed were her own and the startling impression of virginity about her person. In fact, so terribly hurt was she by her experience, that toward men she could feel only a sexless regard. Tragedy almost arose when one Jerry, invited to a party in honor of a visit from Dan and Jane, fell in love with her. Physically unable to return his feeling, though she liked him almost as much as Dan, Iris finally convinced Jerry of the hopelessness of his passion, and after a terrific struggle, Jerry accepted the warm friendship she offered. That friendship lasted all their lives and Jerry took almost as great an interest in the twins as Iris. Dee Dee, the hoy, from the first was Iris' very life, and only Dee Dee could manage his beautiful but obstinate twin Clare.

Then, one day a moving picture company secured permission to shoot some exteriors on a lovely section of the ranch. It was a fateful arrangement for the director of the company was Ronny Spencer who fell in love with Iris, and the leading man was an English actor, Rance Linwood, once Stewart Calman. Still strikingly handsome, Stewart had built up a reputation for himself out of whole cloth and bid fair to become one of the leading screen idols. Iris thought she must surely hate the man who had blighted her life, but seeing the marks of dissipation and a sincere remorse in his face as he pleaded for her friendship, only pity filled her heart. But at the base of that pity was a fear that should Ranee discover the twins were his children, Iris would lose them. Once when Rance wistfully told how he had been married three times, had two divorces and an annulment, yet had never had a child, Iris felt dizzy. And between Clare and Rance a fond friendship sprang which led a jealous actress working in the company to proclaim loudly there was something screwy about the ranch. Iris with her men didn't seem quite the angel she was supposed to be, besides anyone could see the resemblance between Clare and Rance. It was screwy! Swaying slightly under the venom of the attack, Iris felt Ronny steadying her. There was something fine in his loyalty despite her circumstantial guilt. Even before he learned the truth of the matter, Ronny felt that whatever Iris did was right. Rance was grateful for Clare's acceptance of her relationship to her screen idol, but Dee Dee remained unwavering in his love for Iris.

Ronny would have gone on feeling that he had no place in Iris' life if it were not for Jerry who explained that he felt almost more like Iris' mother than brother, and that he felt that with Ronny Iris might be happy. There was, however, Iris' curious sexlessness to be combatted. Reverently Ronny promised understanding, and when Iris was married with the men she loved best at her side, Dan, Dee Dee and Jerry, it was a strange honeymoon she left for. Ronny kept from his adored Iris the torture he was enduring, and tried to console himself with the realization that gradually Iris was awakening to love. The shock of Jerry's illness almost sent Iris into the dreaded breakdown, but Ronny pulled her through and when, one day. Ronny was hurt in a polo game, Iris realized how dear he was to her, and as soon as Ronny was able, they left for the deferred honeymoon.

LOVE CHILD

Mrs. Alice P. Hall File No. 7999

STUNNED by the report that her fiance, David Saunders, is reported missing with his scientific expedition to Norway, Isabel Herrick, facing disgrace, throws herself into the sea. Although she struggles desperately against her rescuer, she is saved by a friend of her fiance, John Edgerton, who, having seen her from his home nearby, considerately pretends to believe that she has fallen in by accident. Cared for and calmed at John's home, Isabel breaks down and confesses her difficulty and John, immersed in scientific studies, induces her to remain on at his home and be cared for by his housekeeper.

However, when John drives Isabel to a hospital, both are recognized by Cecil Dean, a dissolute fellow-student of Isabel's who is a reporter through the grace of a rich aunt rapidly losing patience with him. Desperately in need of a redeeming story, Cecil doggedly questions John, at present in the limelight because of a governmental trip he is to make. At length, dismayed by the personal nature of the questions, John states Isabel is his wife. After the child is born, expecting to be away on a scientific expedition for several years, John offers out of pity and a desire to help his friend, David, to marry Isabel and thus give his friend's child a name. But not until Isabel is certain that John understands she still loves only David, does she accept his name.

In the ensuing 20 years, John spends most of his time in the tropics while Isabel busies herself in philanthropic and social work that does credit to her famous husband. However the relationship between the pair remains entirely impersonal and it is Joy, Isabel's daughter, who misses John most when he is away. Grown older, Joy overhears a conversation between John and a snivelling visitor and learns that Cecil, disowned by his aunt, had become a dope fiend and on the strength of his discovery of Isabel's delayed marriage has been blackmailing the scientist for years. To this John submits knowing that Cecil has not much longer to live. In response to her inquiry, John explains to the curious Joy what Cecil had meant by "love child" and to his astonishment, the girl is not shocked or horrified but delighted at the knowledge that John is not her father. Strangely moved by Joy's impulsive kiss, John feels a new reluctance about leaving as scheduled for Africa. Looking into Joy's glowing eyes, he promises to write to her regularly.

Meanwhile, David, the lone survivor of a shipwreck off Norway, has been saved by crude fisherfolk who utilize his loss of memory to make of him a worker. Years later, he attracts the attention of a surgeon who, accompanied by a friend has come to Norway on a vacation trip. One day, David, taking them across to another island, is hurt by the rudder of his boat. The doctor examines him and finding an old injury has caused a piece of bone to press against David's brain, lifts it and restores the scientist's memory.

On returning home, David finds Isabel the wife of his former associate. John, however, encourages Isabel to divorce him and leaves for Africa to pursue his investigations. From the papers, Joy, who has been desperately trying to assuage her longing for him by a reckless succession of lovers, learns of his falling a victim to a tropical fever and is wild with grief. She induces a passionate admirer to fly her across the continent, and persuades a distinguished physician to accompany her into the interior of Africa to aid John. Chastened by her intense concern for the man she loves, Joy aids selflessly and not until John is convalescing does she permit him to learn that she has been his saviour. Maintaining his fatherly attitude with difficulty, John inquires about an admirer, but Joy tells him there is but one man for her. Then only does John discard the pose he has fought to maintain and with a happy cry, take Joy into his arms. A missionary marries them, and the unselfish lover takes them back to civilization.

BLONDE MENACE

Minnie McManus File No. 7982

JIM heard about Gay first from his mother, the town gossip, but he didn't pay any attention to the excited jabbering about the platinum blonde divorcee who had set all Berwyn agog. His mother was never without a juicy bit of talk. But when, the next day, he came down from his law office to find that the huge cream colored roadster had put accordion pleats in his fender in order that a suitable parking space should be created, Jim's eyes flashed. Furiously he strode over to the driver, but his angry tirade was somewhat mitigated by the amused expression in the blue eyes that regarded him tolerantly, and to his own amazement he found his argument spluttering to a weak conclusion. That started it. Jim couldn't use his car without considerable repairs, and Gay offered to drive him to his destination. It was really remarkable that with all her snooping, Mrs. Grebb never discovered that her own son had fallen in love with Gay.

Then Jim began hearing over the dinner table about Gay's latest exploits. It was impossible to still his mother, and Jim's shoulders sagged perceptibly as the highly colored accounts rolled on. It seemed to Jim that Gay was serious when she said she loved him, but he slowly began to feel that he had been duped, and since he wouldn't take her to the Amalphi Gardens, Gay found others who would. Every belle in town reseuted Gay's appropriation of her attendants, but Gay got them all, and each one took her to the gay Amalphi Gardens. Then Jim heard that Gay had been seen with Mayor Green. Jim had his private opinion about His Honor, and he thought that Gay should be warned. Gay listened attentively, then tried at one and the same time to justify her seeing the Mayor and assure Jim she loved him. But she failed, and when Jim left her, he had lost all faith in her. Perhaps she had loved gaiety too much to be content with a struggling lawyer's salary, but if she insisted on mixing herself up with Green and his kind, Jim was through. A grimmer gaiety was exhibited by Gay, thereafter, and Mayor Green lost his head. The Amalphi Gardens fascinated Gay, did it? He had other surprises for her. Gay's eyes opened at the champagne the Mayor served her, and when he showed her the secret passage that led from the Gardens to his own home, Gay was overcome with admiration. Ingenuity! Four days later there was a federal investigation and before Mayor Green knew what it was all about, he was lodged behind bars as the owner of the liquor-dispensing Amalphi Gardens. Berwyn was in an uproar —particularly over the discovery of the Mayor's secret passage. And Mayor Green pondered over how anyone could have known about that. The only one he had ever shown it to was that blonde.....

Jim wondered how Gay would feel when she learned about the Mayor and suddenly he realized his mother was telling her neighbor about Gay's disappearance. Jim dashed out. Hours later he found her bound and gagged. It was a lucky hunch. Green's henchmen were striking back at Gay. In the security of Jim's arms, Gay confessed that she had been working for the government to catch Green. She couldn't blame Jim for not trusting her entirely, but she couldn't have explained then, or given up the pursuit. Now, however, as Jim's wife, she would turn her blonde head toward more housewifely pursuits!

DISPUTED BRIDES

Josephine Sterben File No. 8008

WORKING as a law clerk in the offices of Garvin and Son, Alvin Brand scarcely believed that not only did Judy Bosworth admit she loved him, but her father, the banker, raised no objections to his daughter's humble admirer. And marvelling as he did, Alvin never for a moment suspected that Mr. Bosworth had fallen in love with his widowed mother and had even engineered the meeting of Judy and Alvin in the hope that Alvin, in love, would lose some of his frequently reiterated assurance that his mother would remain faithful to the memory of his beloved father. Mr. Bosworth was psychologist enough to know that youth is selfish only because of its lack of experience, and he had a sublime faith that through his own love for Judy, Alvin would be able to understand that his mother was still young enough to find happiness in remarriage. Looking up into Mrs. Brand's fine eyes, the banker assured her the youngsters were progressing admirably, he had overheard them sitting together in a restaurant, and she wouldn't have to lose her son's love as she feared.

But fate is resentful of well-laid plans and mischievously contrived to bring Hugh Garvin, dissolute son of Alvin's employer on the scene. Hugh imperiously surveyed the local scene, and arrived at two conclusions simultaneously. First, he resented the fact that Alvin, whom he had always disliked, should be employed by his father; and his other conclusion that Judy, Alvin's fiancee, was the most attractive girl in town, seemed to tie up neatly. Accordingly, Hugh tried to sweep Judy off her feet and to his own not inconsiderable surprise, discovered that Judy would have none of him. Undaunted, Hugh continued to extend invitations and at last, infuriated, proceeded to manage to tie Alvin up at the office with unexpected work. Distressed by the necessity of remaining late, Alvin tried desperately to call Judy, but the operator's response, "nobody answers," was unvarying. Thus Hugh, having bribed the susceptible operator to help, called Judy at the moment when she was feeling most abused. But Judy remained confident in Alvin and Hugh growing more annoyed, forced her to believe in the possibility that Alvin was having a sordid affair with the promiscuous telephone operator. Moreover, in proof, Judy saw with her own eyes Nan driving in Alvin's car although she didn't know that Nan had begged Alvin to take her home since she had injured her ankle. And since Judy, hurt, refused to see Alvin he had no chance to explain. From then on Judy, in an attempt to retaliate, accepted all Hugh's invitations and while Mr. Bosworth admitted his dismay to Alvin's mother, Alvin became more and more morose, and finally attributing Judy's change of mind to his own limited resources, desperately accepted a proposition to make money by bootlegging. Thereafter, Judy and Alvin continued irrationally to hurt each other, and Judy seen every where with Hugh, cried in secret, because Alvin, suddenly and inexplicably affluent, was squandering his money on the cheap Nan. Then, one night, after Judy had swallowed her pride in a disreputable roadhouse to ask Alvin to stop all this, and Alvin bitterly had told her Hugh was waiting, the place was raided. Hugh deserted Judy in an attempt to escape, and Alvin managed to get Judy out safely along with Nan who, touched, explained she had been well paid by Hugh. But Hugh was not through. He had Alvin apprehended for bootlegging. A month in jail helped the youngsters to realize how foolish they had been and, chastened, they sympathised with their romantic elders. Thus happily the two Brands and the two Bosworths left on a honeymoon for four.

BELOVED FIREBRAND

Rose Anderson File No. 7994

THERE was a set look on Larry's face that memorable evening that troubled his older brother Don. When, therefore, later Don found Larry had slipped out of the house, he hurriedly followed him into the woods. For hours he beat futile paths then, in horror found Larry's body beside that of Herman. Almost imperceptible was Larry's breathing and struggling through the thick undergrowth, Don carried his brother home, called the doctor, and seeing the look of hate on his mother's face vanished into the night.

For two years Don remained with the Tamarack Indians, guided there by the note slipped into his hand by the Indian servant. Then, one day, Rogers, trusted North West Mounted Policeman came. Don blessed the brave, Yellow Buck, for denying that he was hiding here, and a grim look crossed his face as Rogers mentioned that Don's mother had sent him. Taking a soft parting from Yellow Buck, Don dipped the paddle of his canoe into the still waters. Days later, he let himself into Larry's room, pity rising within him at sight of the pain-wracked body of Larry. "Firebrand!" Larry called in unbelief, then wept as Don held him in a protective embrace. Sobbing the while he spoke, Larry explained that they had found Herman's body where Larry had killed him after learning that he had ruined Sally Lane. Sally had died a few days later and everyone believed that Don had been guilty—of both. Don stared into the darkness. That was why Ruth had turned from him, told him she was no Sally Lane! Larry shouted for everyone to come in, then, and before Don could stop him told his mother and Dr. Hedericks that the guilt was his, not Don's. He and Herman had fought and they both had rolled into the ravine. But Larry was beyond the reach of the law. Even Rogers, the Mounted, agreed that it had been an accident not murder. Then Don learned that Ruth, had, believing the Sally Lane story and pitying Larry, become his fiancee. If Don were to take her now, Larry might not survive. And because Don was Don, he left, for anywhere, for Medical School.

Mrs. Bryan hovered over Larry constantly and enraged because Don had caused Larry's relapse, she disclosed spitefully that Don had gone because he wanted Ruth. Cursing his blindness, Larry sent for his fiancee and from her halting answers learned it was true. Ruth and Don loved each other, but he, Larry, was keeping them apart. He wrote to Don after releasing Ruth of the engagement, but gave the note to his mother to mail. Reading it, a look of hate crossed the woman's face and she hid it deep among her effects, while Larry sank lower and lower waiting for Don to come. At length Dr. Hedericks called Don but though Firebrand comforted his weaker brother at the end, Mrs. Bryan could restrain her hatred no longer and shrieked that he was no son of hers, he was the child of her husband and an Indian, a half-breed, whom she had had to raise. Don reeled. He could never ask Ruth to marry him now. Fleeing from the house of hate, he stood poised at the water's edge. There Dr. Hedericks found him, and putting his arm around Don, led him to his home—Don wasn't a quitter, was he? And a few days later, Ruth's letter came, telling him Yellow Buck had come to her with proofs that Bryan stopping with the friendly Tamarack Indians had married the white daughter of a trapper, adopted child of the tribe. At her death Bryan had married Larry's mother who hated Don because he was the heir of the Bryan fortune.

Rejoicing, Don squared his shoulders and came to claim Ruth.

THE GREATER CAREER

Agnes Morahan File No. 8083

DANCING at the ultra-fashionable yacht club, lovely Patricia Brent held all eyes. Then a telegram arrived from her step-brother, Jim, asking her to come to New York for an important case. Thrilled, Pat failed to respond to Jerry's questions and at length she informed him she was leaving to-morrow for a short trip. Hurt, Jerry questioned her, and when Pat begged him to drop his queries he grew bitter. Before they were engaged, he told her, he had resented her frequent dangerous trips doing secret service work, now he had a right to know where she was going. Pat tried to reason with him, tell him it was in her blood. Her father had been one of the most famous operatives in the country. Disappointed because his second child had been a girl, he had brought her up as he would have the boy he wanted. She and Jim had been of invaluable service to the country. Pleading with Jerry to have faith in her, Pat wavered before the stormy look with which he received her explanations. She knew that Jim had lost Jean, the girl he wanted because he refused to give up the secret service work. And now Jerry was acting the same way.

But Pat, being Pat, went on to New York, met Jim's suspected counterfeiter, Joe Malten, and managed to catch Malten paying for their theater tickets with a counterfeit bill. It was up to Jim to get the counterfeiting stamp. But search Malten's rooms as he would, he couldn't locate the stamp. Then, hearing footsteps he dodged behind a davenport, and watched in amazement as a familiar looking girl opened a hidden wall safe. "Hands up!" he cried, and then she explained that years ago her mother had been won by Malten's love-making. She had gone away with him but after one day had returned to her husband explaining she had been visiting friends. Now Malten was threatening blackmail on the strength of the agonized letter Leila's mother had written begging him not to disclose her guilt. Knowing her mother would commit suicide rather than lose her husband now, Leila had taken the desperate chance of trying to steal the letter and after missing capture by Malten in his rooms, had returned and now, the letter in her possession, she was caught by Jim, whom she had once met briefly at a formal dinner. The result of the evening was that Malten was arrested and Jim, taking Leila home, fell in love. Happy in the successful completion of her mission, Pat returned home only to find that Jerry had sailed for Europe. Bewildered Pat realized for the first time how much she really loved him. The joy of her brother as preparations toward his marriage to the girl he had met while in the service, only made Pat's loss the more edged. To cover her sorrow, she began a giddy round of activities which served only to exhaust and not at all to assuage. Accordingly when she was offered an opening to try to fix the guilt of a suspected smuggler, she eagerly accepted.

On board the Ile de France, Pat's work was facilitated by the susceptibility of Carlos Di Rocci to her charms. After a frenzied search of her smooth admirer's cabin, Pat finally discovered a cache of diamonds hidden in a set of false teeth. Elated, she turned only to discover Di Rocci glaring at her. His gun spoke, and Pat fell, managing to grit out an "Arrest that man!" before she lost consciousness.

The front page exploitation of her bravery served one purpose. It brought Jerry, whose pride had kept him from flying back home, to Pat. Holding her tightly, he stopped her promise that she'd be satisfied with love as her career, with a tender kiss.

THE BATTALION OF DEATH

Biagio Cartelli File No. 8054

DEJECTED by the refusal of Helen's father to permit their marriage because he has still to serve in the army according to the custom of Italy, Gino's love is fed by seeing her. However, when the notice is tacked up that war has been declared with Austria, Gino loses his care-free confidence in his ability to persuade Signor Angelo and as he holds Helen close they try to hide their fears from each other. There is a steady trek of men from the village and the heartbreaking partings only make the lovers feel the more close. But at length Signor Angelo, feeling that the little town is not safe enough for his family, tries to bring them across the border into neutral territory. Gino tries to persuade them that their own little village is safer than the roads, but Helen's father is obstinate and contemptuously reminding Gino that he is too young to be called for army duty and certainly too young to advise him, Angelo, the little company prepares to leave. Clinging tearfully to her Gino, Helen promises to communicate with him, but weary weeks pass and no word comes from the wanderers.

At length, crazed with anxiety, Gino attempts to follow them and as he passes the charred remains of once happy farms and realizes that the Austrians have swept over the roads pillaging and destroying, he is stricken with a great sorrow which culminates in the incoherent tale of one of the victims that he remembers Angelo and his family passing about the same time as the Austrians. Gino might well give up hope.

Stricken, Gino lies about his age and joins the Battalion of Death, feeling that life without Helen is not worth living. This is the famous battalion that carries through to victory or death, and as Tony, one of Gino's buddies exclaims, every man in it has some sorrow in his past. Marching over broken roads with a grim cheerfulness, the buddies are temporarily comforted by the biting wit of Tony who sardonically refers to his friend Sam as "the brains of the army." In a wineshop Tony orders drinks gaily assuring Gino that Sam will pay, but when the bartender learns that his customers are of the Battalion of Death, he insists the drinks are on the house. Such is the feeling toward the doomed soldiers, and before they leave for the front each is given as much to drink as he wants. As the battalion takes its place in the front lines the discouraged regular troups visibly take heart for the fearless youths of the Battalion of Death always accomplish what others fail to do.

Inching their way across the sodden ground while shrieking shells and moaning comrades create an inferno, Gino sees Tony fall. With a cry he buries his dagger in the enemy's heart and frantically drags the dying Tony until he realizes his comrade is no more. Flinging himself into the fray he plunges on until the Austrians fall back. Only a handful of bloody soldiers remain of the famous Battalion of Death. Victory, but at what a cost. Tony and Sam dead. Everything gone. Wearily Gino returns to the barracks and finds Helen's young brother has been sent on. Startled, he questions him and learns that Helen still lives. With a mighty cry, Gino embraces the lad then shakes his head. But war is death. Then, at last, comes the news of Armistice, and with a singing heart Gino and Johnny march back, the survivors of the Battalion of Death.

PILOT

Pete Buck File No. 8041

BEWILDERED, Eugene Holmes returned from lunch to find that his smooth-talking partner had bolted with their entire savings. Nothing was left to Eugene except his airplane. It was lucky for him the fellow who had talked Eugene into financing an airplane course, couldn't pilot the ship. Disconsolately, Eugene climbed into the cockpit and rode until the tank registered no gasoline. Making a landing, he was soon surrounded by a group of curious rustics. Hungry, penniless, Eugene tried to sell them on taking an airplane ride but sceptically they asked for a demonstration. Looking fearfully at his empty tank, Eugene, in desperation, hoped the ship would start so that with his fee from the first passenger he could buy gasoline. However, after taxiing unsteadily, the motor coughed and stopped and the jeering crowd losing interest decamped.

Twenty miles away Stanley Hodson, son of the financier, exasperates his father by his absorption in the new planes the senior Hodson is experimenting with. Although he recognizes the financial value of an airplane service, the wily business man has no intention of letting his son fool around with the dangerous machines and clearly says so. Disgusted because they continue to treat him like a child at home, the rich man's son decides to leave. His sister, Alice, tries to dissuade him and failing gives him all the money she has saved up. Reckless and very young, Stanley drives his car until he crashes into a fence near where Eugene is sleeping in his useless plane. Eugene dashes to the scene, finds the lad unhurt although his car is badly battered, and ruefully offers the youngster the shelter of his plane. Excitedly Stanley questions Eugene and offers his new friend money to buy gasoline. Taking Stanley into silent partnership, Eugene ballyhoos his airplane service and finally manages to get a passenger. After that everyone in town wants a ride and business is good. However, although he teaches Stanley who adopts an assumed name lest his own warn his friend that he is wealthy, Eugene refuses to let the anxious lad go up solo. Once Eugene sees a picture of Alice, but Stanley hastily conceals it, fearing that Eugene may find out who he is. The first opportunity Stanley gets, he tries to solo and when Eugene comes back with supplies he sees his plane crashed and finds Stanley in a hospital. Broke, Eugene dares not confide his state to his pal who doesn't understand, never having been in need of money himself.

At length, though, Eugene gets a position as pilot for Stanley's father, not knowing of course, that Hodson is his friend's real name. He falls in love with Alice but believing her to be Stanley's fiance, doesn't reveal his feelings. One night, inaugurating a night service before facilities are adequate, in order to fulfill Hodson's contract, Eugene crashes in a storm. Alice, weeping, reveals her love, but Eugene, still faithful to his pal, remains apparently unmoved until Alice, sadly leaving, meets her brother in the hospital and discovers the reason for Eugene's indifference. The delighted Hodsons' embrace their straying son, and Eugene and Alice are left alone together.

DESPITE the pleas of his fiancee, William Glyn, district attorney, mercilessly prosecutes her brother and obtains a conviction. Whereupon Dora, despite the fact that she is about to become the mother of Glyn's child, leaves him and takes up her residence in Los Angeles where she gives birth to a son whom she names Stephen Seabrook.

Twenty-five years later, District Attorney Glyn prosecutes Stephen Seabrook whom he does not suspect is his own son. The testimony discloses that Stephen, an unsuccessful playwright, had come to New York and desiring to write a play on the city's vice conditions had applied to the "Companionate Club" which supplies "girl friends" for the evening. However, he is introduced to Martha Dale, a seventeen year old girl who had been driven to desperation in her attempts to support Paul Dale, her blind father. They fall in love with each other, and Stephen calling at the Dale home, is approved of by Paul, who had once been a fine dramatic actor. Having an idea for a play, Paul offers it to Stephen who grows enthusiastic, and is told to rewrite it and try to sell it as his own. Rising fervently to his old heights, Paul attempts to enact the powerful climax in which a daughter hesitating to inform her blind old father that he is to be sent to a Home for the Blind by his other children, stands by while her father falls to his death. But, carried away by his performance, Paul stumbles and before Stephen can catch him, falls through the open window. In the subsequent investigation, Martha's delinquency as a registered member of the "Companionate Club" is discovered and being a minor she is sentenced to the reformatory.

Stephen's play is accepted by a movie company and Martha seeing the film, concludes that Stephen has killed her father to be sole owner of his play. Planning revenge, Martha, who had agreed to marry Stephen on her release, when asked if she takes Stephen for her lawfully wedded husband, answers, "No!" and accuses him of the murder of her father and the theft of the play. Stephen tries to explain, but Martha brings him to trial. Learning that Glynn is to prosecute, Stephen's mother hurries to New York and tells Glyn that Stephen is his son. Glyn sees the crash of the reputation he has built for himself through all these years in throwing the case, believing as he does in the facts of Stephen's guilt. The court room is crowded with the sensation seekers who know that Glyn can be depended upon for a good show, but looking over at Dora, whom he still loves and at Stephen, his son, he scarcely tries the case and to the astonishment of the court declares, "The people rest." Dissatisfying by the conduct of the case, Glyn is exposed to public fire, but he faces it, secure in Dora's love. And it is Martha's discovery of her father's statement that he has given the play to Stephen that causes her to plead for forgiveness and causes the papers to headline the humanity of the District Attorney in not prosecuting the innocent. Vindicated, Glyn marries Dora, and Stephen, Martha.

WOMEN WHO SIN

A. M. Jordan File No. 8062

MANY people had told Ruth she was too beautiful to waste her life in a small town. When her brother Tony left for New York, Ruth felt a great loneliness come over her and she longed more than ever for an opportunity to escape from the restrictions of farm life. Then, one day, a beautiful limousine pulled up and a Mrs. James stopped for dinner at the Gary farm. Impressed, in spite of herself, by the modish clothes of the society woman, Ruth served the dinner she had cooked and her face lit with pleasure as Mrs. James graciously commented upon the excellent quality of the food. However, when Mrs. James offered to employ Ruth as cook for her Fifth Avenue home, Ruth was beside herself with joy. At last she could live in the great metropolis, which although not very distant opened a new world for Ruth. Convincing her family through the intensity of her longing, Ruth set out.

Awed by the great James house, Ruth was fascinated by the management of the menage. There were four servants and the others warned her against Jack, the chauffeur, who had cost the last cook her job. But although Jack's eyes seemed to be upon her wherever she turned, Ruth saw no reason to doubt him. He seemed always the perfect gentleman. More than that the girl from the country seemed to be strangely drawn to the fascinating chauffeur. Then, one day, Mrs. James wanted Ruth to buy a special delicacy for a party and sent her to a distant farm, ordering Jack to drive her there. Thrilling to Jack's nearness, on the way back dusk began to fall and suddenly Ruth realized that Jack had parked the car in a tree lined lane. Heedless of her struggles, he seized her in his arms.

Eyes red with weeping, Ruth realized that Jack was deliberately trying to avoid her and although he promised to marry her, she felt the insincerity behind his words. Growing desperate, Ruth threatened to kill herself, and Jack, as if capitulating told her to pack. He would marry her. Feeling unutterably cheapened, Ruth sat stiffly at his side as they went to a cheap hotel and registered while Jack went out for the marriage license. Waiting for hours, Ruth paced up and down and at length grew frantic at the knowledge that he had deserted her. His promise was just a ruse to prevent her betraying his guilt in the James' home.

Hopelessly Ruth wandered toward the river and turned as Tony cried out at seeing her. Never suspecting her intention, he took her to his home, fussed over her, and introduced her to his friend Robert, several years older than Ruth. Not wishing to disclose to Ruth that he and Robert were mixed up in a racket, the reason why Ruth had not known Tony's whereabouts sooner, Tony made Robert promise to cut out the racket lest Ruth find out. However, when they discovered her disgrace, Robert turned upon Ruth, sneered at the saint they had reformed for, and was the more bitter because he knew he loved her notwithstanding her guilt. That night Robert went out on a house breaking job. It was Ruth who saved him and prevented his being double-crossed by Jack, who was in the same gang and was going to incriminate Robert to save himself. Holding Ruth tightly in his arms, Robert told her whatever her sins had been, he loved her, and no one would ever know that Ruth's child was not Robert's, for he would love her son as his own.

THE TURNING WHEEL

WHEN Lynn Jackman's beloved twin brother was killed jumping his pony over a hurdle in response to a challenge, Guy Fanton, who had tried to stop the tragic leap, succeeded in filling the empty spot in Lynn's life. As the years passed, however, and Guy realized he loved Lynn, her chatty letters telling him of her romances and enthusiasms hurt him more than she could guess. Then came the letter in which she said she was in love—with Lewis Andree, a French artist. Urged by Lynn's uncle, Guy wrote begging her to be sure before she proceeded rashly, and Lynn's response, telling him she would never marry Andree because there would always be other women in his life, upset Guy strangely.

A few weeks later, Lynn came home, moody and restless. She had run away from Andree, fearing her own feelings. Guy tried to tell her of his love, but winced as he realized that to Lynn he was still the brother. There were signs of activity on the next estate, and the color drained from Lynn's face when she discovered Andree, piqued by her running off after having confessed she loved him only a few weeks before, had bought the estate. Andree was like that. Besides he wanted Lynn as he had never wanted another woman and when she refused to see him, he arranged to be presented to her, as if for the first time, at a dinner party. Lynn knowing that he saw through her refusal to be alone with him, grew fearful. That night she responded for the first time to Guy's love and their engagement was announced at a party. Lynn felt Andree's eyes burning into hers but she never dreamed he would have the daring to actually kidnap her and set his yacht toward—Africa. Bowing deeply before her cries that she hated him, Andree knew that it would just be a matter of time. And Lynn not knowing that Andree had forged a note purporting to explain to Guy that she had eloped with Andree, felt it more and more difficult to maintain her attitude of hate, the while she throbbed to the Frenchman's nearness. He swore that he would never look at another woman, and Lynn, wanting to believe, felt herself weaken. Then the storm broke. Stout as the yacht was, it struck a reef near shore. Together through the icy waters

Andree and Lynn swam and reaching shore found themselves the captives of a savage tribe. With desperate inventiveness, Lynn averted their destruction by the abandon of her dance and while Andree quaked, Lynn fascinated the savages, who sought ingenuously to emulate.

The ship of a pair of recently lost aviators gave eloquent evidence of their own narrowly averted fate and with Lynn at the controls, they landed in Paris. Lynn, hurt by Guy's failure to respond to her telegram, would have married Andree, had not her fiance, drunk, told of his forged letter to a friend of Guy's. Only at Lynn's plea as she leaned her head upon his shoulder, did Guy agree to forego the pleasure of seeing Andree get his just deserts, and Andree, at first dismayed by the announcement of his fiancee's marriage to Guy, caught a whiff of perfume, and straightening his tie, set off in pursuit.

HEARTBREAKER

Helen Hudak File No. 8055

FOR one glorious night, Frances Waincourt was feted by the sponsors of a contest she had won. Contrasting the open admiration of Broadway playboys with her minor triumphs at a small college, Frances decided then to risk all on the Main Stem. She had heard of other butterflies broken on the glamorous wheel of fortune, but she would be different. Didn't men everywhere capitulate before her beauty, her vivacity? There was nothing to lose, nothing! But arriving, eyes shining, in New York, Frances realized she had burned her bridges behind her. True, she had promised to write home, but she knew that unless she could tell them of success, she wouldn't communicate with the scoffers at home.

It wasn't until she had made the rounds of all the theatrical producers several times and noted their amused indifference to her qualifications, that Frances realized that beauty alone was insufficient. She needed a backer. The thought frightened her, but counting her dwindling resources, Frances decided there was only one thing to do. That night, dressed in clothes bought with the last of her funds, she stepped out of a taxi and, alone, approached the Hot Slipper night club. To her dismay, however, she was informed that unescorted ladies were not admitted. Turning from the door, she felt her elbow grasped and she was deftly propelled inside. As she was led to a ring side table, Frances surveyed her Samaritan and when he introduced himself as Ed Morris she gasped. The famous racketeer smiled at her crookedly and soon Frances was telling him about herself. Before she knew what was happening he had called the manager, and Frances had a place in the show. From then on it was a case af avoiding paying the piper for his tune. Ed wanted her, and Frances, utilizing the art that had gained her the epithet, "heartbreaker," sent him off time and again with only promises.

At the Hot Slipper, dancing in the briefest of costumes Frances was a sensation. Once she saw a man darkly handsome in the uniform of a ship captain look long at her, but he was forgotten in the excitement of Richard Aston's presence. Richard was one of the wealthiest men-about-town, and Richard had "the torch lit for" Frances. Showering her with orchids, he tried to win her from the others, but Frances remained elusive and desirable. Meanwhile Ed Morris was becoming more importunate and Frances, caught in an equivocal position won her freedom by promising to help extort a hundred thousand dollars from Aston. Ed's cupidity triumphed over his lust and reluctantly he let Frances go. However, to her own amazement Frances found Richard offering to marry her, telling her nothing else mattered. Like one in a dream, Frances saw her name blazoned over the front page as the fiancee of the wealthy Richard Aston and Ed congratulated her on her good work. Dazed, Frances realized she couldn't do this to a man who loved her, and tired of it all she hurried aboard an outgoing steamer and stowed away. The captain gasped as she threw herself on his mercy. "You're Frances Waincourt!" he stammered looking up from her picture in the paper he had been reading. He wanted to send her back but at length; because he had been a little in love since the night at the Hot Slipper, and because there was a softness in Frances' eyes that spoke of first love, he took her in his arms and Heartbreaker found peace.

THE WAIF PAID

Suzanne Wood File No. 8057

A CONSUMING passion for fame made Griselda Palmer reckless. The spoiled daughter of wealthy and socially prominent parents, Griselda fixed her eye upon the goal of literary eminence. Daring everything she tried to crash literary circles and won a precarious hold as the guest of this or that coming young author; but the crumbs of the feast failed to satisfy. She wanted to center attention not by her beauty so much as by her achievement. Once she met Reginald Hold, promising young publisher. Across the crowded room their eyes held in a mutual attraction, and he invited her to theater, to dine, to dance. But when she confided her literary aspirations she bored him. Maintaining his polite attitude, he consigned her to the legion of hopefuls. He resented her cordiality, feeling intuitively that she wanted to use him for her own interests. Diffidently he agreed to look over her work, then returned it to her without comment. Griselda saw him turn his favors toward Alicia Graham, author of the best seller, and drew the conclusion that Hold was interested only in people who had arrived. Indignation swelled within her. Never once did she attribute Hold's indifference to her own conduct. She determined to show him. She felt that within her was the power to create.

In her efforts to find the elusive source of her great novel, she began startling the social world by the daring of her escapades. Determined to find inspiration in her own experience, Griselda, always fascinating men by her beauty and wit, now flung herself into an amazing program. All glitter, none in the coterie of admirers always in her wake thought of probing beneath her assumption of hardness to find that cry for literary success that motivated her escapades in disreputable road houses or her startling exhibitions of horsemanship. Hypnotising countless men, Griselda found none whom she loved. Then, one day she read of the engagement of Reginald Hold and Patricia Elton, one of her school mates, a girl whose exquisite loveliness held no slightest alliance with things literary. Reginald had met her and charmed by her tranquility and lack of that artistic restlessness with which he had lived for so many years, fell in love.

Roused by what she irrationally considered to be Hold's betrayal, Griselda renewed her acquaintanceship with Patricia and felt in Hold's start at seeing her, that she still had some attraction for him. Ruthlessly she determined to win him from Patricia until, one day, she overheard him tell his fiancee that Griselda made him uneasy. There was no softness, nothing human in her make-up. She was all creative impulse. His words awoke in Griselda the realization she had been struggling against, she loved Hold. With her characteristic impulsiveness, Griselda booked passage on the next boat for the continent, and for several months reports seeped home about Griselda's adventures at Biarritz, Paris, and the Riviera. At the same time Reginald was sent by his firm to manage some translation interests for his firm.

Tiring of the giddy activities with which she occupied herself, Griselda brooded over Hold's summation. Perhaps it was true. No softness! She tried to write but always his pronouncement presented a psychological barrier. And then, bored with high stakes, she walked out upon the balcony of one of the gambling casinos. A gust of wind wrapped a newspaper ludierously about her legs and as she kicked to free herself, she picked up the paper and began reading. Absorbed in a story, she suddenly felt a dizziness as she felt the surging power of the anonymous tale. If she could write like that, she thought. All the way home, the magic power of the story held her enthralled until, sleepless, her tired mind conceived an appalling thought. If she could translate the story, claim it as her own, she might yet be admitted to the esoteric circle. Realizing fully the deadliness of her crime, she hastily set about her work of murder and in a white heat sent it to Hold's firm. That would show them, she thought. It did. Excitedly Hold's associates telegraphed him to find Griselda Palmer, she was a marvel. And with some slight misgivings Hold found Griselda. Spurred by the glowing reports and by the attraction Griselda had always exerted over him. Hold found in Griselda now that softness—a result of her being, for the first time, in love, and forgetting even Patricia he found himself absorbed in her. Then, at length, he read her story. It was the tender, glowing story of a millionaire, betrayed by a deceptive mistress, who is about to kill himself when he steals a gold piece from the cap of a sleeping waif, wins back a fortune at the gambling tables and finds that the waif, a kidnapped child, has died. Remorseful, he marries the waif's mother, but always his guilt weighs heavily. Looking up from the story, Reginald cast a look of unutterable contempt upon Griselda. He had, by chance, read the story in the original! Eyes opened to Griselda's guilt, he felt a wave of repulsion, and leaving her abruptly, he went back to the States.

Torn by the pangs of a hopeless love, Griselda assumed a new name and for the first time wrote from her heart. Eschewing the fame attending her success, brokenly she returned to the United States, and as the strains of Lohengrin drifted from the Church in which Reginald Hold and Patricia were being joined in the bonds of holy matrimony, the author of a best seller, whose greatest ambition had been realized at last, passed forlornly outside. Now she could write. Pain had given her a tremendous sensitivity, but the cost of losing Hold was excessive.

THE MAN WHO DISAPPEARED

Elizabeth Bukas File No. 8075

RAISING her head, Rose Neil looked into the bluest eyes she had ever seen. Smiling faintly into her widened eyes, he inquired after her employer and she pulled herself together. That started their friendship. Over lunch John Miller asked her about herself, fascinated her by the tales of his adventures, and proved that they both enjoyed the same authors, the same plays. For two mad weeks, they forgot everything but each other. There was no talk of the past, nothing but their make-believe world. They were like children. John gave Rose money to buy the furniture for their "castle" and in a dream world, she went out to make her purchases. It didn't seem possible that such a romance could arise in a workaday world. But here they were. Sitting alone in the apartment in which they were going to live, Rose happily waited for John to come back with the marriage license. For one moment as the clock chimed later than she expected, a shadow of doubt crossed her face. Had she been imprudent? After all she knew nothing about John. But stilling her anxiety she waited, and as the hours drew on her shoulders hunched and the gallant expression she had been maintaining broke down. She had been deceived. He had been playing with her and she had believed.

The passing months crystallized her fears, and selling the furniture, she realized enough money to tide her over the few torturous months of shame. Embittered by her betrayal Rose sought ceaselessly for the man she had loved, the man who disappeared. One day, through a taxi window, she thought she saw him and with a fast beating heart she hailed a taxi to follow. She pursued him to a luxurious apartment and her face hardened as she heard him greet a blonde woman in a voice strangely unfamiliar in its harshness. Bewildered she stumbled out into the street, walked for hours and with a new determination came back to John's apartment. The woman looked at her curiously, and sobbingly Rose warned "Mrs. Manton" that Manton was the father of her child, that he wasn't to be trusted. Wincing at the strident laughter that greeted her story, Rose wished she had never come. A key grated in the lock and there before her was the man Rose had thought was John Miller. While the woman shook with laughter at Rose's story, Rose wondered how she had ever mistaken this gross person for John. Taunted by the shrill laughter as she made her apologetic escape, she walked into the park. "Rose," she turned in unbelief. She wouldn't be fooled twice. It was the man who disappeared. Grasping her arm, he talked rapidly the while she sought dazedly to escape, and at length as she tried to free herself from his grasp he explained that he had always wanted to marry her. He had gone out that day, two years ago, to get the marriage license, when a blow on the head robbed him of consciousness. Later he learned that he had been mistaken for a notorious gangster and had been shanghaied aboard a boat which sank in a storm and John, swimming to safety had been captured by a savage tribe and had, only after the most gruelling experiences escaped. His first thought had been for Rose, but she had gone. He had searched for her ever since. Now, taking him home to see their child, Rose felt recompensed for the months of suffering as John put his arms around her and told her they were going right down to get married. This time nothing would stop them. The fact that John was the son of a millionaire was the very least of Rose's excited discoveries about her adored husband.

THE MYSTERY ROOM

Helen E. Reid File No. 7941

WHEN the relatives of the eccentric recluse, Henry Parker, learn that he has disappeared from his island mystery castle years ago, they swoop down in search of the treasure they are certain the wealthy eccentric left behind. Months of examination of every nook and corner follow, but finally they are forced to give up the search. Disheartened, they plan a farewell party preparatory to closing up the mystery castle. At least, they feel, they'll have a novel party within the grim walls. Janet alone feels that her uncle would not have wanted such gaiety in his place of voluntary seclusion.

However, cards are sent out and bediamonded guests make merry within the castle on the island. Little do they suspect that one of the detectives hired to protect the place is leader of a gang. That this Dick Thayer was waiting for just such an occasion to make duplicate cards of admittance for his gang, and that the very yacht which has carried them to the island has been manned not by hired help, but by the gangsters who have by force overcome the crew and taken their places. Nor does young Dick Thayer know until later that his gangsters, distrusting him have decided to kill him—just in case he chooses to disclose to the police their activities. The unsuspecting guests meet in the banquet room, a heavily draped old fashioned room with a table running its length. But Janet, filled with a presentiment of disaster, has confided her fears to Dick, whom as a hired detective she feels she can trust. Unsteadily he reassures her, but when the guests have all been seated a sudden summons comes "Hands Up!" Janet sees Dick among the hold-up men and her heart sinks. She had fancied herself in love, and now this! The guests are quickly stripped of jewelry, but as Dick nears Janet, he presses a button he has previously discovered and the girl drops through the drapes to a lower room, unsuspected by the other gangsters. Terrified, she explores the room, and when a few minutes later Dick appears, she cries out in terror. He begs her to trust him, but she suspects him and tries to get out. Dick, meanwhile, having sunk the yacht so his gang cannot escape, phones the police, but still Janet refuses to place any faith in him. He tells her the guests are perfectly safe upstairs, but when his gang finally find them, one of them takes a fancy to Janet and pulls her to him. Dick leaps to her protection and knocks the man down. Meanwhile, the police arrive, and Dick faces the whole of his erstwhile gang who come to finish him. Shot, he is left for dead with Janet despairingly seeking to render first aid, but the gangsters walk into the hands of the police. Dick recovers and Janet abashed by her show of affection moves backward, and accidentally presses against a desk, which opens and reveals a trap door. Within is the body of Henry Parker, trapped by the accidental release of the spring, and about him are his treasure and a will leaving most of his wealth to Janet. Dick, at the trial of the gangsters reveals that he was a secret service agent working to trap a mighty organization, and promoted to a high office by his success, he wins Janet as his adoring bride.

BLACK ROCK

Franklin D. Crane File No. 7955

WORKING at menial jobs the while he completed an Engineering course, Waldo walked out of the Prexy's office commended as one of the most brilliant students graduated from the famous school. He saw the years of struggle culminating in success and he drew his breath in sharply.

But once he had to apply his splendid resources to actual work, he discovered that merit plays a small part in achieving what the world calls success. Firm after firm received his applications with an indifference that awoke first a feeling of disillusionment, then impotence, and finally anger. He had no opportunity of proving his worth. Men who had completed the course by a narrow margin filled the coveted positions. He had no influence, no power behind him to compel dependent executives to create positions for him. He was out. Hungry days followed, and swallowing that pride that had been so characteristic of him, Waldo went after one contract he knew he could handle as no other. Exhausted by his efforts to convince Gaxton that he was the man for the job, he went home with an anticipatory exultation, a feeling that he had won. But a curt call followed telling him that Stover, a fellow with little ability but with that precious "influence" had filled the berth. Dazed, Waldo hung up, smiled sardonically as he caught his reflection in a mirror, clad in the suit he had spent his last cent to get in order to make an impression. Hope was extinguished. He began walking. Hours later he was still straining forward, without a destination, without thought. It had been hours since he ate, perhaps days. He didn't know. He had long since left the city, and at last he came to a stop as the uphill road suddenly terminated. He looked down at the jagged rocks, and decided to end it. Nobody would miss him. It was a great joke. He prepared to plunge and suddenly the edge crumbled and with an instinctive movement his fingers clutched the rocks. Straining, he knew suddenly he didn't want to die. It was cowardly. He was young, personable, he'd find something if he could only live. He called lustily for help and winced as the echoes mocked him. Suddenly there was a girl, coolly throwing a rope, steadying him with her reassuring suggestions. Gritting his teeth at the agony of his wrenched arms, he hauled himself over the rock, and sank at the girl's feet, "Lucky for you, I saw you making for the cliff," she said, and helped him to her cave. Curiously he obeyed as she ordered him to give her his clothes so she could mend them. A need to unburden his thoughts came over him, and he felt her sympathetic understanding as he explained his extremity. Suddenly another girl entered and Bertha Nelson winced as she realized the other's summation of the compromising situation. Later, Bertha explained she and her friend had vacationed together, but had had an unfortunate quarrel. Selma had returned for a forgotten coat.

Filled with a new energy, Waldo returned to the city only to find Gaxton had been trying to communicate with him. Stover, receiving a more lucrative offer had left the job open. Rejoicing, Waldo determined to stay his confidence to Bertha until he was established. But when weeks later, he called, he found she had left her boarding house leaving no forwarding address. Stunned, Waldo realized how much his happiness depended on her, but suddenly he saw her hurrying along the street. Capturing her arm, he propelled her to a restaurant and stammered his good fortune. Seeing her shabbiness, he intuitively grasped that Bertha's friend had spread an ugly rumor that day at the cave and had lost the girl her job. But Waldo proposed a new position for Bertha Nelson—on condition that she change her surname, and she happily accepted.

THE RECKONING

Rudolph Jeffers File No. 7910

AROUSED by the insult offered Molly Hearst, the girl he loves, by a drunken man, Mont Reynolds knocks him backward over a bench. The man draws a gun, and in self defense, Mont shoots. Thinking he has killed the other, Mont determines to leave town. In the confusion, Mont directs the sheriff to the scene and escapes begging Molly to meet him at St. Joseph. At this point the sheriff and a group of men rush from the dance hall looking for Mont, who leaps upon his horse telling Molly he will wait for her.

Riding into St. Joseph, Mont sees men watching a fight in which a tall Easterner is holding his own against a husky trail driver until he is tripped up by a bystander. At that the trail driver rushes at the fallen man, and Mont, interfering, cries for fair play. The Easterner regains his feet, and the fight continues. Finishing his opponent, Bob Coster thanks Mont, and thereafter becomes his best friend. However, Bob's pretty wife becomes infatuated with Mont and when Molly arrives and is introduced as Mont's fiancee, she jealously determines to break off their romance. Mrs. Coster's hint to Molly that Mont is the father of her unborn child, sends Molly preparing to leave on the next stage. And Mont, puzzled by Molly's inexplicable refusal to see him next morning hunts up Bob, who, in turn, is puzzled over a letter telling him that his old sweetheart is at Bently Station, about five miles away and that she must see him at once. They discuss the situation and Bob decides to ride over to avoid any possible complications, but Mont, thinking over the situation realizes there is a possibility of foul play, and promptly follows. People notice the young stranger riding at break-neck speed and wonder what is wrong. Hearing a shot, Mont spurs his horse and finds Bob dead from a bullet-wound. Grief-stricken, Mont places the body on a horse and rides back to town where the citizens, congregated suddenly, demand an explanation. At this moment, Bill Doane, the ruffian with whom Bob had fought, rides up and claims he saw Mont shoot Bob. Protesting his innocence, Mont is led to jail, and the incensed townspeople, roused by mob spirit, storm the jail, taking Mont out with a rope around his neck.

Mrs. Coster, realizing that they are going to hang Mont, becomes desperate and running to Molly, she confesses that she wrote the letter to Bob and hired Bill Doane to kill her husband. She didn't realize though that Bill would protect himself by accusing Mont. Leaping on Mont's horse, which had been tied to a rail, Molly wildly rides to the outlying clump of trees, where Mont is being strung up, and finally succeeds in staying the hanging. Exhausted, she sinks into Mont's arms, while the townspeople slowly file back to their homes.

LOVE MUST CHOOSE

Bessie S. Sigafoos File No. 8002

STRETCHING her arms luxuriously over her head, Sonia looked down at Jasper pottering about in the garden of her estate and her wilful little face softened. Ever since the death of her mother, old Jasper had been taking care of her. Now as she dashed out of the house and into the long red roadster Jasper had polished for her, she scolded him fondly for doing so much himself. What did he suppose she had Henry for? But seeing the look of pride in his eyes, she knew she could never stop his little kindnesses. Ruefully she considered that sometimes he was more of a hindrance than a help, with his doddering, then put the thought out of her mind. As he almost fell, she caught him and urged him to get glasses, but Jasper insisted his eyes were as good as new.

Racing her roadster down the long paths of her estate, Sonia cleared the corner on two wheels and speeding out on the highway stepped on the accelerator. As she caught sight of a motorcycle cop in the mirror, she stepped down harder and the race was on. Rounding a curve at tremendous speed, her car lurched sickeningly, and rolled over. She came to as the policeman drew her from the wreckage and realizing at the same moment that he was very handsome and that she was unhurt save for bruises, she smiled at him bewitchingly. To her surprise he scowled at her and as she laughed at the ticket he was writing for her, he slammed his book and told her what he thought of her type. Sonia hailed a taxi, and warned him that he might be endangering his position. But at home, she threw her arms about Jasper and told him about Wayne Crawford.

From then on Sonia would speed on purpose so the exasperated officer would catch her. And because he was angry at himself for giving her a second thought, he was the more impatient with her. Shouting a song to the winds, Sonia knew she was getting him. Then, bumping along the dirt path of her estate, she saw Jasper kneeling. Approaching she realized to her horror that he had shot a trespassing child. With tears in his dimming eyes he explained he thought it was a marauding dog, and white-faced as she realized the gravity of the injury, Sonia begged him not to say anything to anybody, and setting the child gently in her car she raced madly to the hospital. Wayne, teeth set, ordered her to stop, but ignoring him she kept on. She flew into the hospital with the crumpled heap in her arms and as she waited in the outer room for hours, the doctors tried to save the child's life—and failed. Sonia swayed as they questioned her, but claimed she had killed the boy for trespassing. The papers denounced her, and Sonia prayed that Jasper, failing in health, would not give himself away. Remembering the words of his mistress, Jasper steadfastly claimed he knew nothing, but it was Wayne Crawford, finally, who investigated. Suffering as he heard the shrill comments of the townspeople about Sonia, he conducted his own inquiry and learned the truth. He tried to take Sonia in his arms, tell her he knew she wasn't guilty, but she could only think of Jasper and the effect upon him. But as they drew up to the estate together, they learned that Jasper had died of a heart attack. He never knew he was a murderer. And losing one man she loved, Sonia found another, a younger, Wayne Crawford.

LOVERS' GOLD

Mary Clouse File No. 8101

WEARYING of the love of Adeline, Claude makes his way through the crowd of dancers and walks toward the balcony. Seeing a girl there, he apologizes for disturbing her, but remains to speak to her wondering why so lovely a girl should be at Adeline's party. However, that night when he returns home he finds to his great grief that his father has been murdered for the money which he had withdrawn from the bank that day. Headlines carry the story the next day, and Adeline's response is characteristic. Now that Claude is penniless, he may consider their engagement broken. The murderer, a discharged servant is found, having squandered the whole fortune in a gambling house, and infinitely sickened by the whole matter, Claude leaves for an extended trip. The thought of Rosemary, the girl he had met that fatal night, however, is always with him, and when restlessly, he returns home, it is with the subconscious desire of renewing her acquaintance.

Meanwhile, he has been writing, and receiving a call from a publisher, he calls with a fast beating heart. To his great joy, the publisher's secretary is Rosemary, who smiles in recognition. Blissful in the acceptance of his novel, Claude persuades Rosemary to have lunch with him. Thus starts their romance, and when Claude is visited by Adeline who learning of his success, wishes to renew their affair, he tells her they are through and despite her subtle threats, he marries Rosemary and takes her for a honeymoon abroad. Ecstatically happy together as they drift through Venetian canals and dine in tiny old world restaurants, Rosemary tells Claude she doesn't want to hear about his past.

However, when finally they return to Claude's home and begin a happy life together, Adeline visits Claude and after failing in her attempts to arouse his love, she changes her tactics and asks how his wife would like to know about Claude's child. Stunned he listens while she tells him about their daughter, and because he doesn't want to destroy his own happiness, Claude gives Adeline the thousand dollars hush money she requires. From then on Adeline blackmails him regularly, and Claude grows desperate at the deep inroads made in their fortunes. Insisting that money is of no consequence, Rosemary does her own work and Claude's heart aches for her. But as he holds her and his little ones close, he feels that he dare not tell Rosemary of Adeline. Then, one day, Adeline makes an excessive demand and Claude helplessly refuses. Rosemary comes in, hears her story, and brokenly packs her things and takes her two children to her mother's home. Smiling bitterly at Claude's distress, Adeline seeks to comfort him but he pushes her from him.

However, when Adeline heartlessly leaves her husband when he loses his money, and the suicide note of her secret husband reveals that the child she claims was Claude's was really her unfortunate husband's, Claude takes heart and writing to Rosemary receives her permission to visit the children for Christmas. And as they look upon each other, the love that both feel overwhelms them and Rosemary rushes into Claude's arms and together they start a new life.

LAWYER'S WIFE

Nellie Holloway File No. 7965

PROSPERING in his legal practice, George adores his young wife, Sylvia and daughter, Betty. On a visit to her husband's office, Sylvia finds him congratulating a client on how easily Joe escaped the consequences of a breach of promise suit. Sylvia apologizes for intruding, but George tells her he is through and the three leave the building together. Not until Slyvia comes in slightly intoxicated one night, does George realize that while he has been working late upon his briefs, his wife has been escorted about town by his client, Joe, whose distinguished foreign appearance has appealed to the neglected wife. Moreover, his valet, heretofore discreet, informs his master of the gossip in circulation, and frightened by George's menacing mien, assures the young attorney he can back up his accusations.

When George mentions the gossip to Sylvia, instead of appearing abashed, she defies him, pities herself, and locks herself in her room. A call from his valet the next day, brings George home to find Sylvia has packed and left for Europe taking her daughter with her. Hurrying down to the steamer, George finds Sylvia with Joe, and goaded to fury, he seizes his child, and leaves. Brokenly, he gives up his practice, sells his home, and retires to an island off the coast; while Sylvia becomes a sullen companion to the disgusted Joe who cannot make her forget her child and all that she has left behind. At length Sylvia finds temporary respite from remorse in drink and drugs, and Joe's interest is captured until a younger woman takes his fancy. One night, Sylvia finds Joe has left a message at his chateau that she is no longer to be admitted. Wearily, she registers at a tiny inn and sends for her clothes and jewels. With these she realizes a sufficient sum to take her back to the United States. However, dissipation has wrecked Sylvia's health, and she is further discouraged at finding George's home sold and no clue to his whereabouts. Becoming a habitue of the night clubs, she manages to eke out a faded butterfly's existence, until one night, taken to a night club, she sees Joe, for whom she has been searching since she learned he left for New York again. Thereafter, heavily veiled, she dogs his footsteps, and the superstitious Frenchman trembles whenever he sees the woman in black. When, however, he leaves town, he finds that she has followed. Were it not for the loveliness of a young girl he has seen, he should have fled, but all his instincts are aroused at sight of her untouched beauty and he contrives a meeting. Secretly cursing the woman in black who vindictively shadows him, he turns the girl's head with his foreign talk, and Sylvia realizing he is using the same bait for which she gave up all, prepares to strike.

Meanwhile Joe's traveling companion urges him to leave town and Joe promises but plans to take the girl with him. However, Sylvia follows him to the water's edge, and as he helps the girl into his boat, she kills him. The girl's screams bring her father to the scene and the veiled woman is brought, unconscious, into the girl's home. Suddenly, Sylvia, whom the doctor has given up, opens her eyes and recognizes George. She knows then she has saved her own daughter and dies happily with Betty's arms about her. George decides to re-establish his legal practice, and Betty no longer refuses the proposals of the young bank teller whose life had seemed lacking in glamor before.

TEXAS FLASH

W. F. Walbridge File No. 7960

OUT of the windstorm came a man on a black stallion, and tying his horse outside the saloon, he entered and asked for a glass of water. A loud laugh came from the back of the saloon where Ed Preston, owner of the Slash-R ranch sat safely surrounded by his men. The stranger refused to be brow-beaten, and in the hush he realized that Preston was looking for a fight. Holding his temper, the stranger sounded his warning and then in a flash, drew two guns catching the others by a split second. Snarling, Preston accepted the opportunity to clear out, while the Texas Flash accepted the amazed congratulations of Morgan, owner of Diamond A ranch. Shaking hands, The Flash thanked Morgan for having saved his life in El Paso, and accepted the invitation to join up with his outfit. On the way Morgan explained how he and his neighbor, Lowry, had been so friendly they had dispensed with fences. Then, one night, Lowry was shot in the back, Preston took over the Slash-R ranch, and having accused Morgan of claiming too much land, on the strength of a fraudulent document, had thereafter earned Morgan's suspicions in connection with the rustling of the Diamond A cattle. As they near the ranch, moreover, they hear the barking of six shooters, and leaving Morgan behind, The Flash plunges into the marauders and killing two, he warns the others to stay clear of Diamond A. The reputation of the Texas Flash is well known to Morgan's cowboys and to his daughter, Alice, who drops startled eyes before the intensity of Flash's greeting.

The next few days, Preston "not scared but laying plans" is quiet, and Flash secretly investigates and learns that Preston has been hiring Mexican killers for a big job. Morgan grows excited but Flash advises caution. However, Flash discovers that Alice has been spirited away by Preston's men, and disregarding his own advice, he recklessly snatches her singlehanded from Preston's guards. As they ride, Alice kisses Flash, who gravely informs her that he is a killer and has no right to love, and tries to hide his feelings. But Alice is woman enough to know that Flash loves her and she knows that soon he will tell her so.

Flash and Alice find the ranch in a state of anxiety and over the supper table reveal what they know of Preston's plans. Flash also tells how his father, a sheriff, had been killed the night he warned Preston that he suspected the source of his income. Preston had disappeared and Flash, then a youngster, had trained Preston's abandoned, untamed stallion, Cyclone. Ever since then the horse, with his panther ery, had carried him through battle. Preston's approach is heralded. Flash gently puts off the weeping Alice who refuses, however, to take shelter.

Cyclone leaps into the melee with his panther-like scream and death comes to each of Flash opponents until last of all, Preston, failing to escape with Alice, goes down, crooked to the last. But Flash, smiling at the congratulations, sinks from the saddle and wakes days later in bed. Weeping, Alice smooths his hair, and Morgan offers Flash his ranch, having decided to retire. And Flash, with Alice's head very close, promises to give up the gun trail.

STAGE STRUCK

Jennie A. Shearer File No. 7975

FORCED to retire from stage life because of an injury to his ankle, Bob accepts a menial position as station master in a small town. The first time he sees Jeanne, however, he realizes that providence has sent him here. But lovely and vivacious as the girl is, he is unable to meet her because of the strictness of her surveillance. Then, one day, a Ford is stalled on the railroad track, and its driver is injured. Jeanne, passing, rushes to the scene and while the townsfolk wring their hands helplessly, she and Bob administer the first aid that saves the man's life. From that moment begins the friendship of Bob and Jeanne. When, moreover, Bob learns that Jeanne has always been ambitious to go on the stage, he offers to teach her dance routines. The happiness of their hours together, however, is rudely shattered when Jeanne's grandfather learns what has been going on. His granddaughter a dancer! After a stormy scene, he forces her to leave town without seeing Bob, and places her in a girl's school which resembles nothing so much as a drab prison. Unhappily Jeanne tries to communicate with Bob, and finally learns that unable to communicate with her, he had left for New York. Thereafter Jeanne renews her efforts to escape, and finally one night, lowers herself from the school window and heads for New York. However, her entire funds are a check from home and being unable to cash this without having it certified, she suffers terribly and arrives spent, in New York.

Bob greets her joyfully, but he is grave when he learns she has run away. However, yielding to Jeanne's pleas, he continues to teach her all he knows about dancing and finally manages to secure her a slight part in a musical show. When he asks her to marry him, Jeanne looks at him with shining eyes and says that she is too near to success now to throw everything away. Hurt, Bob does not remind her that her rise is entirely due to him. From then on, Jeanne mounts rapidly, having caught the eye of the stage manager. The other chorus girls laugh in secret at the little girl from the country, but Jeanne's eye is fixed on stardom. She finds less and less time for Bob, and when he warns her that Winters is not helping her for nothing, she turns upon him and tells him he is nasty-minded and jealous.

Success rapidly goes to Jeanne's head and when her grandfather, having located her, makes a scene from the audience, she shows complete indifference when the poor old fellow is locked up for disturbing the peace. It is Bob who bails the well-meaning old man from the humiliation of prison. But that night Winter asks Jeanne to pay the piper, and when she struggles to free herself, he laughs at her and tells her she is fired. Brokenly Jeanne returns home and finding the faithful Bob waiting for her, she turns away shamefacedly. But Bob forgives and even her irascible grandfather is reconciled when she promises, head snuggled on Bob's shoulder, to devote her talents to loving, honoring, and obeying Bob.

THREE ROGUES FROM PARADISE

Pressley B. Johnson File No. 7948

TELLING him that he will meet him in Paradise, Edmond Twinkle humorously parts from his brother, Amos, to make his fortune in Australia. On his arrival from Alaska where he has become a millionaire from his work in the goldfields, Amos, hoping to amuse and delight his brother when he returns, builds a magnificent representation of Paradise near his palatial residence in California. Soon the fame of the place has spread far and wide, and although Amos' fortune continues to increase from the large number of admission tickets sold, he is unhappy because he has read in a newspaper of Edmond's death. One day, Amos, who has been writing many letters to the King of Paradise, in response to Edmond's parting jest that he could reach him there, is surprised, after many years of having his letters returned by puzzled letter-carriers, to receive an answer from a supposed King of Paradise, saying that he is sending his three aids, The Prince of Mystery, Mephisto, and Princess Paloma to add reality to the artificial Paradise.

Amos, thinking that his three friends, Bill, Hiram, and Tom, who taunt him for his intense interest in the Paradise, are playing a trick on him, determines to play a counter-trick on them, and hires three actors to play the parts of the mysterious strangers; but is surprised at the innocent, nonplussed attitude of his guests. When the actors have gone the next morning, however, three other Princes arrive; and in fear and bewilderment, Amos has three detectives, posing as gods of Paradise, brought to the house to solve the mystery. Astonished by the Prince of Mystery's knowledge of the past of himself and his brother, and overcome by the information that Edmond is soon to arrive, Amos and the detectives try to rid the house of the supposed maniacs by manipulating from downstairs, skeletons situated in their bedrooms. No sooner has Millie Fenwick, who is married to Edmond, appeared on the scene, when Edmond himself, as if produced from nowhere by the miracle-performing Prince, appears to embrace his brother Amos.

One night, Edmund and his brother are kidnapped by a band of Chinese scoundrels who, demanding ransom, threaten to kill them if the huge sum is not forthcoming. Only the brave aid of the Princes and their sister Princess save their lives. Edmond, finding Amos making love to Arabella, Millie's sister, in an effort to get the information about the identity of his visitors from her, breaks into laughter and confesses the truth. Jim Harmon, a friend, whom he had sent to California to get news of his brother, Amos, had turned traitor when he had discovered the latter's great wealth, and had joined a band of Chinese thieves and drug smugglers, in their attempts to strip the trusting Amos of his fortune; and it is as his disguised Chinese domestic that Jim has taken many valuable possessions from his safe, without the knowledge of Amos. When his three children, visiting the Paradise Amos, in disguise, had told Edmond of the peculiar letters he had sent, Edmond had sent them out to protect Amos until he could leave his business in Australia. Amos embraces Arabella, and invites them all to live with him and share his fortune, since they have been so kind.

THE PIONEER

Velva Bearden Dobbins File No. 7992

FUMBLING for papers he knew he didn't have, Bill McBride held back the line of men waiting to settle the cherokee strip of Oklahoma. The impatient clerk, letting him through, Bill rode happily on and looked up to see the smiling eyes of a fine looking woman upon him. "Didn't have your card, did you?" she asked. Ruefully he shook his head then added brightly, "But it worked." Thus the friendship of Rose and Bill started and having staked adjoining claims, they soon realized that they loved each other. Rose knew that a life of heavy responsibilities would be hers as a pioneer wife, and besides Bill had three kiddies, but her love only burned with a more steady flame.

It was Bill's idea to open a saloon, but unused to the business he soon failed, and to pay his obligations gave his house as security. Poorer than when they had started out, Rose and Bill held each other tight and after grave deliberation decided to brave the attendant dangers of settling the Indian Territory. They well knew the land was the refuge of all manner of cut-throats, cattle rustlers, and desperate fugitives from justice, but there alone lay hope for the future. The journey was perilous and trying, but at length they reached their destination. Moreover, Bill found it necessary to make frequent trips of indeterminate duration to buy cattle and supplies and Rose's loneliness was poignant. At length Rose, from whom the Indians and negroes had frequently borrowed supplies, suggested that they outfit a trading post. A year passed. The store was a great success and Bill was widely known as an intrepid and fearless upholder of justice.

One day a stranger with a Mexican accent came into the store and buying ten cents worth of tobacco, handed Rose a twenty dollar bill. Fearful of withdrawing the change from a sugar box, Rose assured him that he could have the tobacco on the house. Over-excited by his reiterated gratitude, she sank weakly into Bill's arms when he returned, and Bill chided himself for permitting her to work so hard. Humor was added to the scene by the hiring of Hilda, a shy German girl, upon whom the cowhands delighted to play harmless jokes. But in time Hilda lost her shyness so far as to accept the proposal of the foreman and leaving, she suggested that Rose hire Sue, an Indian girl who, with the customary intensity of feeling, worshipped Rose. However, all the McBrides' dealings with Indians were not so pleasant and Bill, discovering that Indian Joe had stolen some cattle, tried to bring him to the sheriff. However, Indian Joe escaped and threatened to take his revenge upon Bill.

On one of Bill's longer absences, Rose was persuaded to attend a dance in town and there she met a familiar seeming courteous foreigner who reminded her that he was Phillip Tierras, the man to whom she had once given tobacco "on the house." Thereafter to her own as well as the dismay of various jealous girls, Phillip plagued Rose with this unwelcome attentions, frequenting her store and maintaining always a politeness which she could not resent. However, one day, after he had tried to persuade her to elope with him and Rose had answered that she loved her husband, the woman felt an unspoken terror which culminated in Sue's warning that she had heard Phillip Tierras heap scorn upon Indian Joe because, drunk, he was unable to kill Bill as he had promised. Rose was almost hysterical when Bill came home safe, telling of an encounter with a Mexican. Knowing that Phillip remained a constant menace, Rose, learning that he was wanted by the police, told Phillip she would elope with him and then led him into the arms of the police. Breaking under the nervous tension, she refused the reward and hurried back to her beloved husband and with Bill's lips against her hair, Rose didn't mind the pain in the arm which the infuriated Phillip had wounded with his stiletto.

ONE MAD NIGHT

Willie Mae Henry File No. 7985

LEAVING home in the hope that her stepfather would cease tormenting her beloved mother about her, Sylvia boarded a train for California. But in the weeks that followed, Sylvia's funds grew slimmer and slimmer, and unable to find work she dreaded the sarcastic queries of her landlady for back rent. Sylvia forgot how many days had gone by since she had last had something hot in her aching stomach and threatened with arrest she spent the last few cents she had to buy a paper. Desperately threading her way among the crowds, Sylvia walked weary miles until at last she stood before the address listed in the ad. Never having worked before, there were few enough tasks for which experience was not necessary and now as she followed the haughty butler up the polished staircase, she wondered what qualifications were required. Her heart sank as a hard faced woman eyed her minutely. Finally the woman questioned her with a minuteness that caused Sylvia to shrivel within herself. At length, "You'll do," the woman said. But when Sylvia learned that her work consisted in pretending to be a multi-millionaire in order to justify Mrs. Whitney's suspicions that the boy her niece, Patricia loved, was a mere fortune hunter, Sylvia was tempted to refuse the position. Only the thought of the money she owed her landlady, made her remain. Dressing in the shimmering gowns bought for her, Sylvia loathed the pretender's role she would play, but when she saw Patricia and realized how much she loved John Holland, Sylvia felt worse than ever. Facing each other sharply, Sylvia broke down and quietly taking off the clothes offered her, said she was leaving. But Patricia, throwing her arms about her begged her not to, she wanted this opportunity to prove to her aunt that John really loved her, then ruefully added that any man would fall in love with Sylvia's beauty.

That night a party was given in honor of Patricia's fabulously wealthy cousin from Michigan. Sylvia was a sensation. Every man there vied for her attentions—except John Holland who remained polite but obviously in love with Patricia. Sylvia wondered why Mrs. Whitney didn't realize the boy wasn't a fortune hunter, but unsatisfied, the dowager continued to throw Sylvia at the poor lad's head. Then one of the men danced Sylvia toward the balcony and madly tried to kiss her. Sylvia struggled violently and suddenly a tall young man came to her rescue, swung her into a dance, and introduced himself as Paul Van Phillips. Resisting all the would-be cut-ins, Paul held Sylvia tight. Later, with Patricia happily dancing about her, Sylvia's heart sank as she learned that Paul's fiancee, Norma, was returning from Europe. Hopes dashed, Sylvia realized in what a fool's paradise she had been dreaming. Paul had probably fallen into the trap set for John. It was her supposed money he wanted. And she thought he loved her. But in the next few days Norma too thought Paul loved Sylvia and at a party—Sylvia's last for tomorrow Cinderella was through, doped Sylvia hoping to disgust Paul, who, however, realized what had happened and took Sylvia for a long ride to revive her. Drunk, realizing that she would never see Paul again, Sylvia gave herself wildly to him in the mad thought of having at least the memory of one night of happiness.

However, sobered the next morning, Sylvia awoke to the full realization of her actions. Shamed she ran from the house and when Paul looked for her, she was gone. Desperately he read the note in which she explained she was a fraud, and rushing to Patricia, he found the girl knew nothing of Sylvia's whereabouts. Meanwhile Sylvia joined her mother who had left her stepfather, and facing the consequences of her madness, Sylvia found only one guiding hand—her mother's. Only when she read of Patricia's happy marriage to John, did Sylvia send a little note of congratulation, and through the post mark, Patricia, John, and Paul, who had never forgiven himself, found Sylvia. Held tightly in Paul's arms, Sylvia looked down at the shiny wedding band just placed there and together they taught little Paul, Junior, how to say, "Daddy."

BASHFUL FELLER

Merril Kohan File No. 7958

PAINFULLY trying to teach himself to dance, Chuck Monroe throws agonized glances at the party invitation he has propped on the mantel. The door bell rings, and stopping the wheezing of his victrola, Chuck answers it and his face turns a beet red as Alice introduces herself as his new neighbor and asks if she may borrow an egg. Embarrassed, Chuck grandly carries an arm full of eggs but before he can reach her, he stumbles and presents a woeful spectacle as he picks himself up from the debris.

The night of the party, Chuck sees Alice across the street and she waves to him. But before he can cross, a car comes between them, and Alice's husky escort throws a fierce look over his shoulder at the trembling Chuck. Arrived at the party, bashful Chuck as usual finds he is the cynosure of all jokes. Swallowing his timidity, he asks a girl to dance, but in the middle of the floor she leaves him with a disgusted look, and eyes filled with tears at the laughter that greets his embarrassment, Chuck walks blindly to his table, bunking into Alice's escort. The bully begins shaking the little fellow, and goaded to fury at the thought that Alice has witnessed his humiliation, Chuck begins fighting. A trio of huge waiters, thereupon forcibly eject Chuck who is picked up from the gutter by a flivver full of sailors. Grateful, Chuck throws away his goggles, and straightening his shoulders enlists, staggering under the congratulatory pats on his shoulders. On shipboard, Chuck has an amusing time acclimating himself, and in Hawaii he is taught to drink and like it by a hula girl. Just as he warms up to a sailor's life, however, he is called away to join the Americans fighting in China. On the boat, Chuck has kitchen duty, and with his customary muddling, serves the sailors glue instead of honey. He escapes the consequences, moreover, because the cook wants all the credit for everything—and gets it! On shipboard also, Chuck tries to light a cigarette, and match after match goes out until he is given a lighter, whereupon he discovers a wave has drenched his cigarettes!

In China, Chuck learns to suppress his fear of the pig-tailed little men, and in a gambling resort, startles everyone by breaking the bank. However, his phenomenal luck brings the vengeful chinks out after him, and as he runs from them, he discovers the whole Chinese army is pursuing him. Whereupon, he leads the whole army into the hands of the American marines, who thus end the war by capturing the whole crew.

At home, Alice, having heen ejected from her own apartment, has gone to live in Chuck's house and has daily arguments with her big bully who, waving his arms, threatens the absent Chuck with utter annihilation, until, opening the door he is petrified at the discovery that Chuck, who waits fiercely without, is the great American hero. Whereupon, the no longer shy Chuck makes short work of his cowering rival and folds the yielding Alice in his famous arms.

FLAMES OF WISDOM

Valentine W. Drake File No. 7983

STRAIGHTENING up from the weeding of his garden, retired detective Ben Donovan, put his weeder in his pocket and examining himself in the cracked little mirror, washed his face and set out jovially for the barn dance. Once renowned as one of the bravest detectives in the game, Ben went about his retirement with the same thoroughness that marked his man-hunting, and he was as hearty a lover of fun as any of his farmer neighbors. As he strolled down the dark road, he fancied he heard Clem Watkins behind him. Dodging suddenly into a clump of bushes, Ben waited until the farmer was abreast of him, then with a sudden leap he shouted in Clem's ear. At the frightened screech that greeted his jest, Ben felt a silliness that made him come forward earnestly and explain that he really believed his victim was his neighbor. But the stranger was in no mood to accept the apology, and growled an ominous warning to Ben to pick his jokes better. "Forget it," admonished Ben good naturedly, and suddenly the stranger clipped the unsuspecting Ben under the chin. As Ben fell backward the stranger leaped at his throat. In an instant, angered, Ben delivered a terrific right to his opponent's jaw then ruefully tried to restore the red head to consciousness. Suddenly a muzzle dug in his back and looking up Ben heard a sinister voice call him by name. Startled, Ben realized he was up against it, and bluffing, withdrew. An instant later a high powered motor threw its light upon him and as he tried to escape, a wrench thrown by one of his assailants, caught him behind the ear.

When Ben came to, he was bound in a tiny hut. An agonizing ache made him blink. Then suddenly he was looking into the leering face of Lemazol, a killer, whom Ben had sent up to Sing Sing years ago. Lemazol amused himself by pouring out his hatred on the helpless man, until Red, the fellow Ben had knocked out, protested against torturing a hick. Lemazol growled. Hick? Ben Donovan. That was good! He laughed demoniacally, and quit the room. Minutes later Red crept over to Ben and whispered that he was through with the ghastly business, he was going to cut Ben's bonds and give him an even chance. Gratitude welled in Ben's throat but suddenly there was a crash of breaking glass, and Lemazol's mad laugh sent terror into the hearts of the two men as he shouted he knew Red was yellow, was just testing him, and an instant later Ben saw his would-be saviour sink to the ground a bullet through his head. A mighty rage shook the helpless man and as Lemazol poured gasoline around the hut, the mad man explained that he was going to Italy to-morrow, Ben would find a hot death! Backing toward the table, Lemazol touched a burning lamp to the pool of gasoline and fled into the night, shaking with laughter at Ben's terror.

Assuming a false bravado, Lemazol tried to down his fears about the man who was following him, but a moment later the man snapped handcuffs on Lemazol's wrists and as the quaking fellow whined, "You ain't got nothing on me," he was led down the gang plank and informed that in Ben's struggles he had cut himself on his forgotten sharp weeder, and having sawed his bonds had escaped from the roaring inferno and been found outside the blazing pyre unconscious. Moreover, Ben returned Lemazol's compliments, and said it was Lemazol's turn to burn alive now—in the electric chair!

SHATTERED DREAMS

Florence Tibbitts File No. 7993

WRITING an enthusiastic note of thanks to his father for his increased allowance, Jerry looks up as the door of his room bursts open and Alice, Patricia and Bob rush in. Jerry points helplessly to the books he has piled up to study for tomorrow's quiz, but the others hoot the idea of study on a night like this and carry him half-protesting to a roadhouse. As they ride along, Alice leans her head on Jerry's shoulder and when, carried away, he asks her to marry him, Alice is disappointed that he does not rise to her suggestion that they elope immediately. In the rumble seat his room mate, Bob, and Patricia, the Governor's daughter, are happily wrapped up in each other. Not infrequently does Jerry suspect that Alice is more interested in his money than his love, but when she is near he forgets his doubts.

Later that week there is a ball at the Governor's mansion and Jerry, looking for Patricia since Bob is dancing with his fiancee, is startled to discover that she is accepting a glass of water into which the Chinese servant, Wong Lee, has dropped a powder. However, his speculations are interrupted by a telegram informing him that his father had committed suicide over the shock of losing his entire fortune.

Suspicions confirmed by Alice's dazed acceptance of his father's death and ruin, Jerry gives her no chance to tell him that she really loves him, now, and as his castles tumble all about him, Jerry rushes to a disreputable speakeasy and forgets everything in drink. However, when the bill is presented Jerry cheerfully admits that he has only a pearl-handled revolver salvaged from all his father's effects, and drunk as he is, he is upset by the storm of abuse that greets his inability to pay the bill. Fong Ling, the Chinese head of the dope ring with which the Governor's butler is connected is present, and recognizing Jerry decides he can use him. Accordingly he pays Jerry's bill and takes the intoxicated young blue blood to his quarters. Not realizing exactly what work is being proposed for him, Jerry listlessly allows himself to be led into the Chinese section of the city but as he is distastefully mounting the steps in the luxurious dope den of Fong Ling, Jerry catches sight of Patricia sprawled upon a couch and being doped by her father's trusted butler. Sobered by the realization that Wong Lee has gotten Patricia into his power by feeding her bits of doped candy and finally reducing her to a dope victim, Jerry swing out and in a desperate struggle with the den full of Chinamen, kills Wong Lee and Fong Ling. He manages to get Patricia safely into a taxi and is arrested on a charge of double murder.

Without incriminating Patricia, Jerry manages to break up the dope ring, but it is Alice, finally who persuades Patricia to confess her own part in the affair to her father and the Governor pardons Jerry who in spite of his service had been convicted for manslaughter. Released, Jerry finds Alice, eyes wet with remorseful tears, waiting for him, and together they plan for the future.

HOT BULLETS

POLITELY Ted Astrid, newly admitted attorney, surveys the shuffling old woman who is his first client. But as she inquires in a voice husky with emotion if he is indeed Ted, son of Jacob Astrid, Ted begins to doubt that she has come on business and his face falls. He has depended so upon his practice to support his adored young wife Helena. However, the woman holds him by her strange story as she explains in a dead voice that she was once housekeeper for his father. Then John Maurie, a crooked politician and gang leader had defrauded Jacob of his home, of his honor, and finally the old man had died of grief. Ted had been sent off to be educated and Maurie had taken over the Astrid home, retaining Lena whose solemnity Maurie never guessed cloaked a burning resentment through many years. In all this time, Lena had proven a perfect and discreet housekeeper but there was not one detail of Maurie's life with which she was unfamiliar, and with Ted's help, she wished to strike at him now.

Ted's wife Helena begged her husband not to involve himself with the desperadoes of Maurie's gang, but Ted had started. Already he had offered his legal services to Bennie Finerra, a youth formerly connected with Maurie's gang now railroaded to the pen because he had become dangerous. However, Bennie, telling what he knew about Maurie to Ted, fell in love with Helena and incurred the jealousy of Ted. When Ted imparted his suspicions to Helena, she became furious and threatened to leave whereupon Ted turned her over his knee and administered the spanking he thought would bring her to her senses. That night Helena left refusing Ted's apologies, and Ted, penitent, became frenzied when he read that Bennie had been put on the spot. He knew Maurie had struck again, and rushing to Helena, he took her in his arms, begged for forgiveness and told her he would never doubt her again. The more he thought how closely he had come to losing her, the more tightly he held her. A letter from Bennie, suspecting his own end, gave sufficient evidence to convict Maurie, but when Ted went down to act upon it, Maurie, by a faked call, kidnapped Helena to prevent Ted from disclosing what he knew. Aroused, Ted tore his way into Maurie's home, found Helena, moaning crazily trying to beat off the effects of the liquor with which they had plied her. Taking her tenderly in his arms, Ted rushed her down to his car, but as it started off, Maurie, seeing them, opened fire. Ted was caught in the shoulder as he threw Helena and himself to the floor of the car, and Helena sobering, cried out to him to speak.

With his evidence, Ted secured Maurie's conviction, broke up the liquor ring and Maurie's gang, and secured his own appointment as Assistant District Attorney on the strength of his work. And Lena offering her services understood Helena's shy assertion that they could use a maid now, but it took Ted several minutes before he grasped what Helena was telling him. Then, with a cry of happiness, he folded her tenderly in his arms.

WAR DEVILS

PLOUGHING his father's fields, James White hears the whirring motors of a plane overhead. A moment later the steady throbbing is broken by the ominous sounds of the motor coughing and the plane drops rapidly. Just before it reaches the ground, however, the pilot gains control and makes a safe landing in the White field. Congratulating themselves, the occupants of the plane get out and at James' eager invitation stay for dinner at his home. Noticing her son's eager attention to the accounts of the great war overseas, Mrs. White shakes her head despairingly. She knows how James has longed to take up arms for his country, and slowly she realizes that her son is no longer a child. The next day James enlists.

However, if James expected to thrill to the fire of battle immediately, he was greatly mistaken. Weeks of waiting in the army camp for directions to continue follow, and James is detailed to kitchen duty for daring to grumble about the inactivity. Then, one day, he hears a girl cry out in French. Rushing to the spot he sees a lovely little French girl struggling with an army captain. Throwing himself upon Captain Maitin, James pummels him soundly and orders him to keep his hands off. For the insurrection, James wins the enmity of the Captain who sees to it that James gets the most arduous tasks to perform. But little Musette is grateful and in the days that follow while James is off duty, instead of taking Paris leave, he spends his time with Musette teaching her English and learning French from her. Far off the rumble of battle sounds ominously, but James and Musette are in love.

At length orders come to push on to the front, and Musette weeps at the parting, but James tells her to he brave. Amid the shrieking shells and the death-dealing bullets, James covers himself with glory. Rushing into the thickest of the battle he plows through the enemy until turning he sees Captain Maitin, wounded, fall to the ground. A German stands over him with bayonette descending and with a mighty cry, James leaps at the German's throat, saving the captain but gaining a bullet through his shoulder. Later the captain and James have adjoining beds in the hospital, and when Musette, who has been aiding as a nurse finds them, it is the captain who tells her of James' bravery. From then on the three are fast friends and in the next battle James and the captain fight side by side. Just before the big attack, news comes of the armistice, and James and Maitin solemnly wring each other's hands.

Late one night the Whites are awakened from sleep by a loud knocking at the door. To their utter joy there stands James. He embraces them and assures them he is unhurt, then brings forward his surprise—his wife, Musette and after the first shock, the little French girl quite wins the hearts of her husband's family. And as for Maitin, isn't the first born of his friends named after him?

BEYOND SIN

FRIGHTENED by her father's threats to beat her if she does not reveal the whereabouts of Jose Durous, a disappointed village suitor who has run away from home, and hurt by the town's incredulity at her ignorance, Dido Valdos leaves home. In the evening she awakes to find herself in the home of the elderly and wealthy Englishman, Girard Stanley whose car had almost run her over when she had fallen on the road. In spite of the fact that Girard, as a member of a bachelor club, has pledged himself against the entertainment of women, he asks her to remain his guest until the wrath has died down. While she is there, Alicia, the heroine of a past unhappy love affair, and the cause of his affiliation with the woman-hating club, visits him; and although she is already engaged to Girard's friend, Steven Willisby, she again tries to entice him. Thereupon Dido, resenting his attention to this woman of whom he had previously spoken so scornfully, leaves the house for her home.

However, only unhappiness greets her there; for not only is her father dead, but the people threaten to stone her for her ill treatment of both him and Jose; and she is saved only by the timely intervention of Steve Willisby who has come to the small Spanish town for a rest cure. When he offers his protection in a proposal of marriage, Dido, fearing the wrath of the passionate Jose when he hears the people calling her harlot, and to appease the town for her abrupt departure from her father, consents. Learning from the town gossip, Maria, that Steve is only posing as her husband, Jose stabs him. The sick Steve, realizing that Dido does not return his love, visits the home of Girard for advice and care, while Jose, desperate because of Dido's same coldness to his suit, commits suicide. Questioned about the cause of his shoulder wound, Steve lies about it, and Girard answers with a lie about Alicia—that he has not seen her—that she is still in Paris. While Alicia is passing the parlor door in hurried departure from the house, she hears Steve playing one of Dido's often sung songs, and Girard, suddenly reminded of Dido, asks to be introduced to Steve's girl.

While they are both sadly watching the festive flower show from the window the next day, Steve becomes seriously ill from his infected wound which he had summarily dismissed as unimportant; and it is only when the delirious Steve calls for Dido, that Girard untangles the situation in his mind. Happy that he has not lost her forever, Girard is openly affectionate to Dido when she arrives to accompany Steve's mother and Alicia, at the dying man's bedside. In spite of the mother's cold treatment of Dido to whom Steve has left the bulk of his fortune, the generous girl bequeaths half of it to her; and although Girard pleads with her that she remain, Dido decides to return to the town abbey where she has found comfort and refuge; for she still remembers his past attention to the faithless Alicia. However, when Girard, following her, declares his never-dying love and his desire to marry her, Dido, realizing her love for him, consents on condition that he allow her to now obtain the education she had never had, so that she may become the woman of the world he should have as his companion. During the years that follow, their love is fostered by letters and visits; but Girard, whose past life with women and drink are now telling on him in a fast approaching age, realizes more and more how distant Dido's youth and the exuberance of her sportful living, are from him; so that when she returns at last to marry him as they had planned, he absolves her from her promise to him. Protesting that disparity of age is of no consequence, and thinking that he is trying to cover up his lost love for her, the unhappy girl flees to the convent, there to become a nun.

Girard, alarmed by her decision, follows quickly in his car, but the people of the town, remembering Dido's suspicious past, and convinced of his wicked intentions, stone his car so that he is thrown unconscious at the wheel. Maria, a witness at the scene, hurriedly notifies the sorrowing Dido, who finds herself in danger as well, when she arrives. Crying in vain for help, Dido protects the prostrate man with her body, and it is only when the brave Maria, who has climbed with much difficulty into the nearby church, opens its doors, that the two find safety from the mob. Fearing for her safety, Girard begs Dido to return to the abbey; but when she refuses, the dying man extracts a promise from the village priest that he protect her from the cares of the world in the abbey. After his death, the forlorn girl and the aged priest return through the quiet streets to the abbey. Resigned and peaceful at last, Dido takes the veil; and when at the dedication of her church to the town in Girard's memory, she suddenly is brought face to face with the penitent Alicia, now also a nun, she greets her with full forgiveness and hopes for their future redemption. Matured and undaunted by their renunciation of their past lives in the world, the two return to the abbey hand in hand.

LOVE FOUND

Thelma L. Akers File No. 7986

TRAVELLING with her wealthy father upon the continent, Edith McKee, a sophisticated and beautiful young sportswoman, tiring of the languid armours of the fashionable set, seizes the opportunity presented when her father learns that his plantation interests in Guayaquil are being mismanaged, to accompany him to South America.

Arrived in the bizarre port, the McKees are met by their foreman, David Clayton, a handsome young giant who points out the places of local interest as they proceed to the plantation. Chatting gaily, David rapidly sums up the whole situation for the McKees who, while interested, are rather fatigued from their long journey. Edith finds Guayaquil a place of endless fascination but she is warned against straying beyond the boundaries of her father's possessions by Clayton. Resenting somewhat the limitations he imposes upon her, and the intimacy of his attitude as he suggests possible dangers, Edith learns of the gala horse races and insists upon going. Her father, taking time off from his thus far ineffectual investigations accompanies her as does Clayton, but absorbed by the color and strangeness of the festivities, Edith wanders off from her party and suddenly realizes she is lost. Her indifference turns to alarm, however, as she is rudely jostled, and terrified she is beating a path for herself when a young man, obviously Oxford bred, seizes her arm and propels the fainting girl beyond the crowds. Looking down at her with keen interest he tells her he is Donald Rivers, owner of the neighboring estate. She gratefully accepts his offer to be driven home but when she introduces him to her father, Clayton scowls, and warns her against Rivers. Drawing herself up, Edith shows she resents Clayton's pronouncements but her father urges her to give some consideration to Clayton's advice. Moreover, when Clayton discovers Edith in the garden with Rivers, he feels called upon, he says, to confide his suspicions that Rivers is responsible for McKees' recent losses. Rivers, continues Clayton, has been employing native servants to cut into the McKee proceeds. When, therefore, Donald makes some inquiries of a rather personal nature about the estate, some slight suspicion attaches itself to Edith's mind. This is not wholly dispelled when after starting to say something, he suddenly changes the subject.

Two days later Donald Rivers seeks Edith and with the greatest hesitation explains that her father's body had been found upon his estate. Edith sways, unable to grasp the fact that her father has been killed, and when Clayton comes in, insinuating that Rivers is guilty, Edith feels her head whirl. Rivers wavers, uncertain whether to go or stay, and Edith begs him to leave her alone to think. Crimsoning, Donald leaves and as she sits alone in her darkened room, Edith feels the door open and Clayton enters. After brief preliminaries in which she recoils from the irreverence of his proposal, Clayton seizes Edith in his arms, and she realizes the bestiality that has been latent beneath his superficial manners. Crying out she struggles against his stifling embrace. Then Donald breaks in. The two men close in on each other and palely Edith watches them rain blows upon each other. It is Donald finally who conquers and showing a fragment of Clayton's coat he has taken from the death grip of Robert McKee, Donald explains that he had long suspected Clayton's perfidy.

Wearily Edith sinks into a chair and when Donald asks her to marry him, she thinks it is pity for her that prompts him. But when he takes her gently into his arms, in the protection of his embrace, she realizes she has found love.

FALSE MONEY

George Peterson File No. 7995

A VICTIM of the depression, in desperation because he cannot otherwise provide for his family, Bill Stewart opens a speakeasy in his home. One day his wife Anna, while serving drinks, resents the liberties attempted by Curley, a customer, who laughs at her threats to tell her husband. Uproariously drunk. Curley does not realize he is being closely watched by another customer, but suddenly the lights are extinguished, pandemonium reigns, a riot call is sent for the police, and Curley goes down, his head cracked by a bottle.

Meanwhile, Bill, returning through a rear door, sees police breaking in, and thinking it is a raid, flees. Three cops pursue, and Bill caught, is accused of having killed Curley. His explanation that he ran because he dared not face arrest is not acceptable and he is indicted for murder. Anna admits that she had before threatened to expose Curley's unwelcome attentions, but although she swears she never told her husband, Bill is convicted on circumstantial evidence. In disgrace and sorrow, Anna closes up her home and while packing, her son Robert finds a heart-shaped cuff button initialed S. M. Giving it no further thought, Anna puts it in her hand bag. The boy Robert leaves school and starts working, thereby meeting Frances Madden whom he sees with great regularity despite social differences. While delivering a package, one day, Robert is kept waiting and his attention is caught by a heart shaped cuff button in a bowl. Comparison proves it is the mate to the one found after the murder, and Anna, informed, excitedly offers this new evidence to the District Attorney who promises to aid.

Meanwhile, Bill Stewart, resigned to his fate, has become a model prisoner and is now a trusty. The warden shares Bill's hope at the encouraging note received from Anna about the new evidence. Then, hearing a cackling noise, Bill, on duty in the corridor, rushes into the warden's room and saves him from being electrocuted by a defective wire. Prompt attention saves the grateful warden's life. Meanwhile, in the city, detectives have followed a Frank Norton into a jewelry store, and by attention to the reflecting inner cover of the watch he is supposed to be buying, a detective discovers that the suspect has left the heart shaped cuff button to be mated. Moreover, trailed, Norton proceeds to a shack and reveals that he is implicated in a great counterfeiting plot. By marked bills, the jeweler helps the detectives to capture Norton on a charge of passing counterfeit money and suspicion of collusion in the Curley murder. Terrified Norton swears that he is innocent of the murder charge, but in his fear, he gives away the real murderer, Spike Madden, Frances' father, who has been leading an unsuspected double life and is arrested in the apartment of his paramour. Bill is freed and through his friend, the warden, is given a fine position. But Robert and Frances, having almost come to grief through the realization that Frances' worthless father has caused the Stewarts so much anguish, finally are persuaded by Bill and Anna, that love is all-important, and, ignoring the heretofore troublesome social differences, now given a new significance, Frances and Robert find happiness together.

THREE WHO SINNED

Helen Bohack File No. 7933

GASPING for breath, the dying woman pleads with the doctor and the sympathetic Indian missionary to hear her story. Mrs. Parkhurst tells how in fancied duty to her stern parents she gave up the man she loved and married another. Her marital existence was made endurable by the birth of a lovely child and when her husband, years older than she, died, Marion could not pretend grief. But when, some time later, she chanced to meet George again, they could only look upon each other in anguish, for George, in the first moment of disillusionment at Marion's marriage, had married another woman.

Strive as they could, Fate seemed to throw Marion and George together until, unable to struggle longer against their overwhelming love, they seized that happiness which had been so long denied them. For twenty years no shadow of unhappiness marred their existence, and Margaret grew up to regard her Uncle George's presence as a matter of course. George no less than Margaret inculcated those fine ideals in the sensitive girl which eventually led them to grief. Realizing the equivocality of their lives, the two whom the world might call sinners sought some way out, but at last it was Margaret, flying in with a fierce hurt in her eyes, who came back from a fashionable house party to fling at her mother and her mother's lover the terrible things that others were saying. Stunned by the denunciation, Marion sat in a dazed silence until the slamming of the door through which Margaret has rushed caused her to break down in a paroxysm of sobs. Helplessly George stood by, afraid to offer comfort lest Margaret's return find them together. At last he determined to follow Margaret and bring her back to her mother. Hours of anguish too terrible for words followed and at each call from George telling of his lack of success and hoping that in the interim Margaret might have returned, Marion urged him on.

As the dying woman pauses the Missionary's face is a study of emotions, but continuing the woman explains that as a result of her mental agony she suffered brain fever. George put Scotland Yard on the trail and Marion refused to see him until he could bring Margaret back. Each day the man she loved came, but Marion reiterated her condition and at length he wrote that he was going to India to follow a clue furnished by the detectives. Before he went, Marion rushed to see him and they parted friends. On the way his plane was wrecked and George was killed. Distractedly Marion rushed to the comfort of George's wife, gave her own meager funds to put his children through the best schools and at length, unable to live on, came to India to be near the spot where he had died. She continued the vain search for her daughter, but now, at the point of death, she knew they had failed.

The dying woman pauses in wonderment at the sobbing of the Missionary and turning her eyes upon the younger woman she cries, "Margaret!" Softly the doctor tip-toes out and leaves the two people who had so much to forgive each other alone.

THE NIGHT RIDERS

Charles MacDaniel File No. 7951

BITTERLY finishing his prison term for a crime he never committed, Dick Bailey walks slowly toward the park wondering how he, a convicted man, can get a position. He finds himself in conversation with William Jennings who sympathizes with him and finally offers Dick a place in his band. Fascinated Dick listens to the account of this modern Robin Hood's band which, itself a victim of society, has been formed to protect the oppressed. However, realizing that such an organization might be dangerous, Dick refuses to join until he is assured that nothing unlawful is ever done. He goes with his friend, and is startled by the completeness of the organization of seven Night Riders. Black costumes, outlying cabins, and a workable division of labor are features. The activities of the band are exciting. The first night, one of the members comes in with a report of a man who will not provide for his family although he is financially able. A note is delivered secretly ordering him to help his dependents, and seven nights later, since nothing has been done, the Night Riders swoop down upon him, and force him to comply. The town grows excited at the reports of outrages, but soon some of the more discerning citizens realize that the activities of the band are confined exclusively to such men as the owner of a gambling house, sneak thieves, and swindlers. And the public is secretly grateful to the protective organization.

One day, at the post office, Dick, who has recently been elected leader although he is the youngest of the Night Riders, falls in love with Helen Barkley, and learns she is the banker's daughter. A few days later, when her horse is frightened, he stops the runaway, and they become friends. Dick continues to see Helen and soon he notices that she is worried about something. She confides that her father, the banker, has received a note threatening his life unless he leaves twenty-five thousand dollars in a certain hollow. Even the sheriff has advised the banker to accede. Begging her to trust him, Dick tells her to ignore the note and at the specified time the Night Riders, in full panoply capture the guilty men, and deliver them to the unwilling sheriff, who has been in league with them. Dick realizes that now Helen will know he is one of the Night Riders and although she is grateful, he doesn't come to see her that night.

A few days later, the unscrupulous sheriff, worried by the curtailing influence of the Night Riders, determines to stake all by directing the hold-up of the mail coach, but the Night Riders are at hand having anticipated the move. They shoot it out, and Captain Bill, the former leader is gravely wounded. Dick carries him home, stunned by the first serious set back. Meanwhile a group of citizens headed by Helen's father ride out to the cabins of the Riders, and offer Dick the sheriff's post, and his men deputy positions on condition that they disband their Night Rider band and join forces with the law. And Dick, rejoicing, finds that his Helen has contrived the offer. Honored, respected, Dick asks Helen to marry him, and lifting her face for his kiss, she accepts.

LOVE TO GIVE

SLIPPING away from her pathetically ignorant father's surveillance, Mona Grey goes to her first party. But her father catches her and after a terrific scene he is finally made to realize that Mona is no longer a child. However, his new realization only culminates in his choosing a prospective husband for his daughter, and miserably Mona receives Cyrus Brown, an uneducated rustic. Despairingly, Mona tries various ways, suggested by her sympathetic mother, of ridding herself of her well-meaning suitor. And one night, when he comes in and finds Mona settling a checker dispute between her two brothers, Cyrus becomes involved and finally plays with Mr. Grey to settle his point. Wearily Mona watches her father's pleased expression as he wins from Cyrus. And the next night Cyrus and Mr. Grey again play for ten dollars which, to Mona's dismay, her father pockets. Relieved that Cyrus is being distracted from his thoughts of marriage by the nightly checker games, Mona does not suspect that the two men have taken the game so seriously that after a session played in the town's saloon, Mr. Grey comes home maudlinly drunk with the news that he had bet everything he owned and had lost to Cyrus. It takes a few moments for Mona and her mother to realize that through a game of checkers, Mr. Grey has signed away their farm, their home, and everything they own. Expressionless as ever, Cyrus comes over the next night and tells Mona that if she marries him he will return everything to her parents. Aghast, Mona looks up to see if he is in jest, but she knows only too well that he means it. That night, seeing her mother's misery and realizing that her father, in despair has taken to drink, Mona makes the supreme sacrifice and becomes Cyrus' bride. Her mother faints when she learns what her daughter has done, but her father gratefully gives up drinking and without comprehending exactly what he has done becomes more human.

Years pass, and Mona lives only for her daughter Mary. Cultivating a distant toleration for the dull Cyrus who has lately taken to drinking, Mona brings up her daughter to have all the advantages she never had. Her home becomes a meeting place of the town's young people and one day Bob comes. Young in spirit, he is the same age as Mona, and for a long time neither of them realize that they enjoy each other's company apart from the young people. Mary is friendly with Bob, but hers is much too free a spirit to appreciate the less violent enjoyments that satisfy Bob. A picnic is to be given and Mona is asked to chaperon. Left alone, Bob and Mona realize that their love for each other is growing too strong for further concealment, and without dramatizing, without emotionalizing, Bob tells Mona he is leaving. Nodding simply, she extends her hand.

But life goes on, and one day Cyrus, drunk, is hurt by his machinery. Terribly crushed he is brought home to Mona who nurses him through his pain-filled weeks. Before he dies, in his inarticulate fashion, he thanks her for being a good wife. Tears come into Mona's eyes. Months later, Bob learns that Mona is at last free and he comes back. Mona is watering her flowers. "Mona!" he says. But these two know that years of peace and happiness stretch before them. And when Mary comes in chattering excitedly about the new lad who came to town, Bob reaches over to gently press Mona's fingers.

DRIFTWOOD

Grace Brenning and Molly Williams File No. 8003

IT is only when Rose Courtland, her husband's mistress, visits her one day to tell her of his desire for a divorce, that Beth realizes that the conversations she has been hearing about her husband's activities with women, at parties and from friends, have had a more serious foundation that she thought; and when, after telling Everett about what transpired during the woman's visit, Everett pleads his love for her, recalls past happy times of picnics and parties together, and begs her forgiveness, Beth turns him from the house. With Rose's description of her as Everett's "poorly-dressed slave" still rankling in her—and she still remembers Everett's distasteful glances at her shabby, inartistically home-made clothes—the sick-hearted Beth sets out to look for work. After much futile trudging about, she finally is employed as a check girl at a theater managed by Marshall Jensen who immediately offers his sympathy and love to the forlorn girl, but is repulsed by her when he attempts to overstep the bounds in his apartment where she has trustingly accompanied him. At his suggestion, she buys some new clothes and has herself beautified, so that Jensen, delighted at her new worldliness, offers her his genuine love; but overcome by the memories of Everett called up by his denunciation of him as a worthless cad, Beth refuses him and leaves for the West. In the meantime, Everett, angrily and mistakenly accusing his secretary mistress, Lillie, of having broken up his home, and having received a farewell letter from Beth, Everett departs for Denver, where the sick Beth has been brought by Mae Stone, a train friend. After her hospital visit, Beth lives with Mae, who has come here to forget her love for her fiance whose previous marriage she has discovered. Continually longing for Everett, Betb is cheered by the wholesome affection of Donald Colman, a young engineer who frequents the Royal Palace Hotel restaurant where she is a waitress. It is also at this restaurant that Betb is shocked to see Everett escorting Mae to a seat, and the latter telling her this is the boy-friend she has been speaking so much of, introduces her by the assumed name she has adopted. Everett, who has come here to look for his wife, finding a marked resemblance to the latter in the waitress, tries in vain to discover her history from Mae,—for he does not recognize the much matured Beth as his wife. With his detectives searching for Beth, Everett begins a reckless round of parties, petting and picnics, while Beth writhes as she hears about this from Mae, who, wishing his money, encourages him; and when she and Colman meet him and Mae at a picnic one day, the jealousy of the two men, and Mae's suspicious hints of Beth's past, causes an unhappy constraint; and when on the way home, Beth again refuses Don's offer of marriage,—for she still loves Everett,—he is both puzzled and enraged. Faithful to Mae, who tells her of ber growing love for Evcrett, Beth continues to conceal her identity from him. But Everett soon diseards Mae for Norma Bruce, a beautiful and wealthy heiress, who cunningly leads him to propose. Jensen, a friend of Norma's, realizing Everett's identity, and loving Beth so much that he wishes to leave her busband free for her to marry again, warns Norma of Everett's previous marriage; but Norma, believing him, as a former lover of hers, jealous, laughs mockingly. Heartbroken by news of their marriage and by the constant sight of them at the Royal Palace hotel where they live, Beth is forced to confess her story to Don whom she knows suspects her of having been intimate with Everett; but she not only refuses him when he proposes marriage in spite of this, but she does the same hurt to Jensen when he asks the question; for she has pledged them to secrecy and does not wish to mar Everett's marriage to Norma, whom she thinks he loves. However, she realizes her error when Everett, always remembering his lost wife, makes love to Beth one evening at a gala hotel party. Accusing him of infidelity, and surprised that he does not recognize the ring he had once given her, Beth is just about to leave him when the irate Norma arrives on the scene. Overcome by her utter loneliness, Beth attempts to shoot herself, and is found by Norma who has been rowing on the waters below the embankment, with Everett; and when she confesses her past, Everett weeps with happiness, while Norma slowly departs. At a wild party which Norma gives the next night, she attempts unsuccessfully to make Everett jealous by flirting with Jensen and other men; but her drunkenness and indecent dancing only succeed in furthering his hatred for her, especially since the contrast between her and the mild Beth is so marked. Finally, dragging her to his car, they ride and ride to cool off, but Norma's anguish and bitterness, as the driver, leads them into a collision; and when the occupants of the other car, Don and Jensen, arrive, she is dead and Everett, seriously wounded. Told the news by Don, Beth arrives at the hospital to nurse him back to health; and while they are being reconciled, Don and Jensen depart on a tour of the United States.

JUNE ROSES

Bertha Ranck Shepard File No. 8037

WALKING, arms linked, in a fragrant and lovely rose garden a maid and a youth discuss the changing phases of the rose through the centuries. As they begin the scene dissolves and the pair are the protagonists in a changing drama. Costumed, and moving against luxuriantly colored settings, always the two young lovers assume the leading roles.

Far off in Turkey the two meet to love and as the girl grows sad over the transitory existence of the roses whose perfume is the very essence of their romance, the youth takes her on a tour of the bizarre shops in which the priceless attar is distilled. The perfumer, catching the poignance of their longing, reaches across and presses a tiny vial into the pale hands of the girl and as she tenderly lifts the precious distillation, the call comes for her lover to leave for the wars. Years later, all is desolation. Defeat has darkened the land but still in a dimly lit room, a tiny little lady sits, eyes far off as she recalls her last meeting with her lover, and as she holds the vial gently, the attar recalls youth and love, and she lives the past again.

The scene shifts and with a clicking of castanets, the gaiety of Castile is caught in the dance of a dainty senorita who unfastens the rose tucked in her ebony hair and roguishly tosses it to a passing soldier. With a shout he leaps from his horse and joins her in her dance as the scene changes to Syria, "Land of Roses" where grows the rare rose of Jericho, which sprang from the desert soil wherever Mary, fleeing from Egypt with Jesus, trod.

The ineffable glory of the scene gives way to the austerity of the Roman scene where grim warriors, meeting in private under the rose, "sub rosa" suspended from the vaulted ceiling demanded secrecy in honor of the rose sacred to Harpocrates, God of Silence, whom even Cupid had respected by shooting roses from his famous how. In great solemnity the assemblage vows the pillage of a whole town to win for their chief the fair lady of his choice held in loathesome bondage.

Music, drums, and the days of chivalry, all color and dash is recreated as the lover, plumed and armored, rides into the tournament and vanquishing all comers bows in deep respect as his lovely lady tosses him the rose of victory and love.

At length the girl recalls the tragic War of the Roses which raged for thirty years. Margaret of Lancaster and Edward of York fought for supremacy, and neither yielding, both met their deaths on the field. With a gay ery the girl calls to her lover to repeat the battle and both pelt each other with red roses and white until at length exhausted she orders him to choose one, and one only—either the red rose of passion or the white rose of love, but with the wisdom of the ages he seizes her in his arms and asking if she thinks he'd be satisfied with either, covers her face with kisses and exclaims that he will have both!

THE AGE OF LIES

Marie L. Theodore File No. 7989

SIGHING as she burned the tell tale foreign postcards, and autograph albums with all her old friends' signatures, Helen grew wistful over the necessary destruction of dates when one is thirty-one and trying to pass as twenty-one. Slim, blond, and very pretty, she looked no older than she elaimed, but it were best not to leave proofs to the contrary about. That night sitting with Harry in the swing she questioned gravely if he were very certain he loved her and at his emphatic assurance she ventured the opinion that sometimes she felt much older. But man-fashion, Harry laughed and reminded her that women mature earlier, and anyway, since they were both twenty-one now, even if the old folks continued objeeting, they could slip away and be married without requiring anyone's consent.

And so they were married and the old folks forgave them. In the bungalow of their dreams, however, Helen found it difficult always acting and looking twenty-one. She loved Harry dearly, but at times his young friends were annoying with their talk of football and tennis when she wanted to talk bridge and recipes. Then, one Saturday, Harry came home radiant with the news that his boss had decided to send him to Paris to attend to some business there. All his expenses would be paid, and by going second class and stopping at smaller hotels, he was certain they could manage to cover Helen's expenses too. Excitedly Helen pelted him with questions and with a laugh he calmed her, telling her there were all of five weeks before they left and before thinking of clothes and renting the bungalow and how long they were going to stay, they ought to arrange about passports.

Joyfully communicating the good news to her mother that night, Helen was stunned by her mother's sober query about what she was going to do about her passport age. Helen's heart sank as she recalled her mother's advice not to start their marriage with the lie of her age. Now, if she told, she would forfeit Harry's trust. He loved her too much to let their difference in ages bother him, but the thought that she had lied to him might disgust him with her forever. Sleeplessly, Helen tossed all night and over breakfast the next morning told him that it wouldn't be practicable for her to go. After all there was still the house and the car to pay for and besides, shyly, she had been withholding from him the fact that there would soon be a small visitor. And that required money too. Everything was forgotten in Harry's joy over the prospect of a child and as he held Helen close, he promised to be back as soon as possible. The continent held no thrills for him beside his wife and baby.

So Harry went to Paris and Helen stayed home with her lie, vowing never to tell another. There were times she was tempted to tell Harry it was love for him that prompted her to do it but she would change her mind again and decide it was better to give up trips forever that required passports than to lose her husband's respect and possibly his love.

RIDIN' MAN

William R. Neunsinger File No. 8053

GAILY riding back from a profitable sale of his cattle, Jim Barr stopped in bewilderment before the charred ruins of what had once been his ranch. But it wasn't until, amidst the debris, he found the hanged bodies of his mother and father that his grief overcame him. Stunned, he tried to realize that the depravity of man could take so horrible a form of revenge. Spurring his horse, he madly dashed into town and pressed his inquiries. As he suspected, Dahlgren, his father's enemy, had been seen riding out of town like a demon. Face grimly set, Jim Barr swore a solemn oath to make Dahlgren pay for his crime though it cost his own life.

Ruthlessly, vindictively, Jim Barr followed every possible clue to the whereabouts of his enemy, but the man seemed to have disappeared. At length, following a vague rumor, Jim rode to Wichita Falls. It was dusk when he arrived, and seeing a cabin in the woods, he stopped. He was about to knock when he caught the drift of the conversation and realized that the two men within were planning the rustling of some cattle. Listening, he leaped to his horse and made off not a moment too soon, for the crack of bullets told him his presence had been suspected. Riding hard, he came to the town dance hall and sat alone at a table. A girl approached, Jim paid scant attention to her until she begged him to dance with a whispered intensity that surprised him. As they neared the stairs, she shoved him up, and protecting him with her own body against flying bullets, she urged him into her room. Astonished he questioned, but she begged him to escape. Jim's answer was a long hard kiss. Then he went. A moment later the door was forced in and she lied about Jim.

Taking refuge that night in the home of the sheriff, Jim learned that the girl who had saved him at the dance hall was Maizie Dahlgren! That her brother was Jim's sworn quarry. A helplessness came over Jim. He was in love with the last person on earth he would knowingly have chosen. Jim heard more before he left the next morning, but as he rode from the sheriff's home, he passed a clump of bushes. A noose hissed through the air. Jim dodged too late, and an instant later he found himself the prisoner of Brent Westwood and Lige Holcomb, the men whose conversation he had overheard. Jim wondered why they were so anxious to get him, before a blow on the head robbed him of consciousness. When he came to there was an excruciating pain in his bound legs and his head. The door of the closet into which he had been unceremoniously thrust opened, and Jim was dragged out and his blindfold removed. Helplessly he looked up into the sneering face of Dahlgren, the boss of the rustler outfit. No wonder they had tracked him down. To Dahlgren he was an unmitigated menace. Jim longed for the freedom of his hands, the ungagging of his mouth as he had never longed for anything before, but Dahlgren was screaming his hatred in an inhuman voice. Felling the powerless victim, with a blow of his fist, Dahlgren looked up in a fury as his sister sprang at him. Pitifully she begged him to stop, but cursing her, Dahlgren pushed her out, and returned to Jim. Listing his imaginary grievances against the family of Barr, Dahlgren concluded with a death sentence for Jim. None of his men dared disobey. Dahlgren waited only for his victim to regain consciousness before killing him. But suddenly there was a shooting without. Amazed the outlaws drew their guns. The sheriff had suspected trouble and had been near when Maizie went for help. The outlaws ran for cover and the forces of law and order set fire to the cabin to smoke them out. Jim, however, claimed single, unarmed combat with Dahlgren. Fist against fist they fought, silently, fiercely, backing each other toward the brow of the cliff. Time and again Dahlgren resorted to treachery and at length drawing his knife sprang. Jim, warned by Maizie's scream sidestepped, and Dahlgren fell horribly down the steep cliff. Then, and not until then, Jim Barr sank to the ground, pierced by the three bullets Dahlgren had shot into him. When he came to, there was Maizie nursing him. Jim grasped her hand gratefully, and smiled. Maizie knew soon she would change the hated Dahlgren name to Barr.

THE GYRENES

Leo Chaney File No. 8045

WITHIN Marine headquarters in Nicaragua speculation was rife about the sudden outbreak of hostilities. For a year since Major "Nuts" Hughes had driven Balgado, self-made general of the insurgent forces, to Mexico in hiding, the Marines had settled down to enjoy the tropical country. Major Hughes, himself, was making considerable progress with Alice Payson, the reckless and charming sister of Ted Payson, one of the marines. When Ted enlisted, Alice determinedly moved her possessions to the immediate vicinity and now in Nicaragua was having a great time of it wooed by the Major and Lieutenant Barnes. But dashing as Alice was there was an undercurrent of seriousness in her nature disclosed only to her intimates, and though her mad following of her brother might cause speculation, she knew what she was about.

Now Alice sits on the Major's desk and swinging her legs, inquires about the current unrest. Worried, the Major informs her that headquarters suspects a new rebel leader, but thus far they have been unable to fix his identity. Barnes scowls when he sees Alice talking to his superior officer. Later, when she has left, Hughes orders his lieutenant to send five privates to report to Lieutenant Jatz in El Rico. Wonder over-spreads the Lieutenant's face as he remonstrates feebly. It would be murder. The men could never get there. It was inevitable that they either be captured by the bandits or die of starvation. But acting on Hughes' orders, the Lieutenant sends five privates,—and among them is Ted Payson.

Anxiously listening to the radio wires from El Rico, the telegraph wires having all been cut down, Hughes hears the accounts of increasing hostilities, while Barnes finds Alice and tells her that the Major has sent her brother and four other men out to their deaths. White-lipped, Alice tries to concentrate on other things, but Barnes' words that it is murder beat upon her mind. Unable to stand the suspense longer, she goes to the Major's headquarters and there she learns that the five marines had been captured. Barnes adds that no sane man would have risked the lives of his men so needlessly.

Later the Major comes to keep an appointment with Alice and when she sees the lack of concern upon his face, she turns upon him and denounces him as inhuman. Surprised, he listens to her denunciation and learning that Ted has been one of the five, he keeps silent. Once he tries to cut in on her imprecations, but she gives him no opportunity and finally he leaves, after admitting that he didn't expect the men to reach El Rico.

The next morning the five marines and a native ride into headquarters. The Major grins when they are announced and orders the General to be brought in. Questioning the native, Hughes forces the frail looking General Ortez to confess that he is the son of Balgado, who, holding his father responsible for his mother's death had taken over the command Balgado had relinquished and sought the wholesale destructions of the Americans as well as revenge upon Balgado.

Meanwhile, Barnes has brought about an investigation of the sanity of his superior officer, and Hughes surveys the group sardonically as he explains that he had suspected Ortez and sent five men out knowing they would be captured. However, natives faithful to Hughes because of his protection, had enlisted with Ortez and under instructions had brought the five prisoners and the General to Marine headquarters! Barnes, abashed retreats, and Alice finds Hughes ready, in fact willing, to forgive her outburst.

BROADWAY CHANCES

Madelyn Albrecht File No. 7981

RUNNING away from her intolerable step-father, Jeanette Mortimer arrives in New York and terrifiedly cowers before the threats of a gyp taxi driver who demands an excessive fare. A crowd begins to collect about the frightened young girl and Alfred Manning, handsome young scion, seeing her distress pays the fare and disperses the mob. Gratefully Jeanette goes and to her astonishment finds her benefactor has pressed a twenty-five dollar bill into her hand. With the money she is able to rent a room and applying to James Butterworth, famous dancing instructor, is accepted as a young dancing prodigy.

At home Alfred swears softly because he has no way of finding the girl he had fallen in love with, and over the breakfast table he finds his mother sympathetic with his problem since she herself had been a girl without social standing and had married Alfred's father without realizing he was an heir to millions. The happiness of his parents' marriage had long ago convinced Alfred that social standing was not necessarily a requisite for a wife. Meanwhile Jeanette rehearsing constantly, thinks as much of Alfred as he of her, and the night she learns that she is to make her debut at a society benefit, she offers up a silent prayer that Alfred may be among "everybody who is anybody". And when the great night arrives, Alfred is there having been persuaded against his will to complete a foursome. Indifferently he has been sitting back in his box when Gloria, his companion remarks about the dancer on the stage, and to be polite Alfred looks, stares, and with a sudden movement fixes Gloria's opera glasses upon the pirouetting figure. Gloria's peeved demonstration of annoyance as she leaves, annoyed at her escort's lack of attention, attracts Jeanette's attention and a glow of happiness overspreads her lovely face as she recognizes Alfred.

Later Alfred comes backstage, and thus begins a happy friendship whose culmination in marriage is delayed because Jeanette does not wish to leave James Butterworth without having made some return for his kindness in instructing her. Therefore, she accepts the engagement he has arranged abroad, and Jeanette promises Alfred she will marry him upon her return if he still wants her. However, Gloria, in a desperate effort to win Alfred from the dancer invests her fortune in Jeanette's show and so learns when Jeanette is expected back. She contrives to be in Alfred's unwilling arms when Jeanette bounds in, and misunderstanding Jeanette leaves Alfred's ring with the butler and vanishes. Heart sick, she continues on the stage and has difficulty with her stepfather who tries to force her to return to his guardianship, and finally Gloria, the "angel" of the show, threatens to withdraw her financial support unless Jeanette is dropped from the show.

Blinded by tears, Jeanette steps in the way of an automobile and is carried to a hospital where Alfred, at last acquainted with Gloria's perfidy, finds her, and gathering her in his arms, makes her promise to marry him—immediately.

SILENT MOTHER

Nancy Mallatt File No. 8022

NORA MALLAY, her mother's petted young daughter, is carefully shielded from the knowledge of the comforts her mother foregoes so that she may have every luxury in clothes, education, and home. However, one night, after she has overheard her mother's anxious talk with the bank about the mortgage which would soon be due, Nora, realizing that her mother has mortgaged their ancestral home to provide her with her European trip and education, decides to burden the responsibility. When she arrives in the city to look for work, a young man, David, who lives in the boarding house where she obtains a room, recommends her as a secretary to the executive of the company for which he works. She sends most of her money to her mother, and, overwhelmed by her poverty, refuses to accept the many offers of meals and clothes offered her by David who earns a little more than she does as a salesman. As time passes, Nora's friendship with Ella, a typist in the office, grows, and they finally take a room together. Ella, noticing Nora's coldness to David, tries to persuade her to use him for her financial betterment. Nora refuses to consider such a sordid idea until frantic letters from her mother urge her to it. However, in spite of David's pleas, she cannot accept money or gifts from him for she loves him too sincerely. Thereupon, Ella, who has just lost another boy-friend, excreises her blonde wiles on David whenever he comes to the office or to their apartment. Thinking he can make her jealous, David pretends an interest in Ella, and Nora, always loyal to her friend, and unhappy because of David's fickleness, manages to be absent every time he visits them. When Ella, telling her she has been a fool, shows her the gifts he has given her, Nora decides to obtain work in her home town and live with her mother, and so forget David and the cares he had brought her.

She is just about to write a note to her employer resigning her position when she is called to his office and informed that her salary is to be raised. Thanking the old gentleman, Nora writes her mother that she will continue her stay; but when, as time goes on, and her work, instead of becoming better because of this, becomes worse, because of her growing longing for David, and when, in spite of this, her salary is again raised, Nora begins to be suspicious. The girls in the office abruptly stop their whispering whenever she passes by; and overhearing talk about "her pull", she stops them one day and demands an explanation. "Think we don't know about you and the old man's son," sneers one of them. When she finally discovers that this is David, and that he has been telling his father that she is in trouble because of him, infuriated, Nora rushes to the old man's office to denounce him; throwing the money she had saved for the mortgage on his desk, she tells him to take back the sordid money he is offering in assistance. David, arriving on the scene as she is leaving, is met by her angry stare, as she rushes past him to pack her things and return home. Dreading the thought of meeting her mother without the mortgage money which is due a week from that time, Nora arrives at her train seat in a tearful state. Suddenly someone grabs her bag, and there stands David. He had tried every method of keeping her in the city so that he could be near her. He was a liar and a scoundrel, but would she forgive him; and he holds out the mortgage money to her. She snuggles up to him as he murmurs, "I'd like to speak to your mother about something." They both smile happily.

THE LOCKED TRUNK

Alice Reinecke File No. 8028

STIRRING his sleeping friend John, Harry breathlessly told him of the scream he had heard. Only half satisfied with the assurance that he had been dreaming, Harry went back to bed and the next afternoon excitedly told John that he had caused an investigation and that the sheriff had discovered in the old house on the hill a scrawly note telling them it was useless to search for Mrs. Rosling. (Signed: The Locked Trunk).

Some months later when no sign of Mrs. Rosling had been discovered, her will was probated and her heirs, a Mrs. Boren and a niece and nephew, at the point of destitution, took possession. People called the old house haunted, but the newcomers rejoiced in having a roof over their heads. Harry was one of the first to visit them and introducing his friend John, he explained that John and he, parted since childhood, had decided to vacation together this summer. On the way home, John amused himself by observing that Harry had seemed much interested in the girl Joan, and Harry returned by remarking that John seemed not unsmitten by the charms of Marie Tyler, one of the town girls. Within the "haunted house" meanwhile, things were happening. George Fran, a second cousin arrived to dispute the claim of the Borens, asserting that he had been the young and mysterious Mrs. Rosling's intended heir, and if they didn't leave the house to him they'd regret it. However, Mrs. Boren remained unintimidated. Then Virginia Dare, Marie Tyler's friend, paid a visit to the house, and soon disclosed that her business was to warn Joan that Harry was engaged to Virginia. Infuriated by Joan's attitude, Virginia left.

Then a package came for Mrs. Boren who fainted at its gruesome contents—the head of Mrs. Rosling with a warning to the newcomers. Determining to remain, to unearth the mystery, Mrs. Boren had herself constantly guarded until a month of security made her over-confident. A party was being given in the village and she insisted that her niece and nephew attend. That night Harry proposed to Joan and when they came home they discovered Mrs. Boren had disappeared. Grief-stricken they huddled together and waited for the gruesome package which arrived with the same locked trunk letter. Harry longed for John who had, a few days before the party been called home to his sick mother, but finding a fragment of a notation, he set a trap for the murderer. Joan insisted she'd help them. That night Harry slipped secretly into the house, and Joan placed a dummy in the arm chair. The clock struck ten and suddenly a hammer hanging over the fireplace descended with crushing force on the dummy. Joan screamed and some minutes later a man came into the house. Caught, he proved to be John Day or as it later developed, the husband of Mrs. Rosling. His wife had left him, given reason to suspect his latent madness, and Rosling, stopping at the home of John Day, decided to pose as John Day and accept Harry's intercepted invitation for a reunion vacation. He had set up the hammer apparatus in his wife's home, and successful, had intended killing all her relations. Joan's brother, locked up on suspicion because of the testimony of a maid intimidated by the madman, is freed and Harry marries Joan who gladly leaves the house of horror to her cousin George Fran, having discovered that the locked trunk was the madman's reference to a window seat into which he had placed the beheaded bodies of his victims.

SATAN OFFERS GOLD

Ted Fritsche File No. 8039

PROCEEDING directly from the Thanksgiving dinner of the firm which continues to employ him only because of his family of dependents, to a speakeasy, George Mills spends his share of the co-operative earnings on liquor, and reeling home drunk is arrested for disorderly conduct. In court his bail is paid by a stranger who invites the wondering George to his home and explains that he is anxious to hire men for a money-making proposition. George's eyes widen when he hears it is a bootlegging project but he is easily persuaded.

Jack Smith, the stranger, is anxious to gain the support of the local workers and urges George to attract his former associates to his proposition, but George is scorned until he invites the bewildered employees of the small factory to his new home and astonishes them with his incredible affluence. Among those who take the easy way are Fred Dailey and John Carson, brother and fiance of Clara Dailey, one of the factory girls. Soon Clara realizes what her friends are doing, and she tries desperately to shake the determination of those she loves. Within a few months the town is a center for liquor production, and the Federal government sends representatives to quell the lawlessness. Among the prohibition agents is Arthur Johnson, who is driving toward the town when he hears a girl cry out. Stopping his car, he finds Clara struggling against the unwelcome embraces of John, with whom she has broken her engagement. Hesitatingly, Clara accepts the proffered invitation to be driven home by Arthur, who has knocked John down. Thus starts the friendship of Clara and Arthur, but when the girl learns that her new friend is a Federal agent, her fears are renewed since her brother together with many hitherto respectable citizens is firmly converted to the large profits of the illegal traffic. At Clara's home, Arthur receives a cold reception and he is warned to keep his curiosity out of affairs which do not concern him. Holding his temper in check, Artbur tries guardedly to warn Fred, but he is ordered out of the house.

Meanwhile the liquor ring is growing more powerful. The police break up one center of activity only to see the mushroom growth of distilleries. A reign of terror settles down in Severn and industry totters. The factory is held to be a desirable acquisition and without warning the Smith interests take over the plant, terrorizing its owner. George Mills swaggers in as superintendent of operations and when he discharges the former foreman for threatening his authority, there is a general walk-out. Realizing at length the web in which he has become involved, Fred tries to withdraw only to find that he cannot extricate himself. John, one of the more ardent workers for Smith is anxious to keep his hold on Clara's brother; and the police net tightens.

Meanwhile George, superintending the reconstruction of the factory, inadvertently throws aside a lighted cigarette and causes a fire which is extinguished after he has leapt to his death. While at Smith's quarters the bootleggers and Federal agents shoot it out. The liquor ring is broken up and Fred is wounded, having been shot at by John Carson who accuses him of having inspired the raid. Order again reigns in Severn, and Art marries Clara who has aided him throughout.

SINFUL LOVE

David Abraham File No. 7799

WHEN Evelyn interrupted Stephen's impassioned reading of a poem to ask a trivial question, Steven stormed from the house shouting that she was too young to have any appreciation of his genius. But as he waited for days for Evelyn to send for him and tell him once again how much she loved him, wounded by her apparent indifference to him, Steven fled from the city and wandered from town to town. The memory of Evelyn continued to disturb him, however, until the day when he passed a garden in which a beautiful woman was cutting roses. A flush of embarrassment colored his face as she smiled at the intensity of his stare. Stopping at the hotel in town, Steven made inquiries and learned that she was Irene Kenneddy. When finally he contrived to meet her, she recognized him as the very young vagabond who had stared at her. When Steven read his poetry to Irene, she didn't laugh as Evelyn had, but growing very thoughtful she told him he reminded her of someone she had once known very well. Once Steven lit a cigarette for Irene and as she slowly blew out the match, he leaned over and kissed her passionately. Shaken, he begged her to marry him. Gravely Irene explained that she was years older than he, that he knew nothing of her past, but it was just that maturity that appealed to Steven. He had never known a woman like Irene before. In her face was the timeless wisdom of a woman who had lived fully—and loved deeply and her tender understanding, her soothing presence were just what Stephen felt he needed to bring out his creative talent. Once Irene started telling Steven about her past, but he cut short her confession with a long kiss and they were married.

As Steven showed his wife about his home, she regarded the youthful enthusiasms of her bridegroom indulgently until he stopped before the picture of a man. Irene gasped and Steven, unaware of her agitation explained bitterly that the picture was of his father who had abandoned his mother and him to live with another woman. As his voice rose in memory of his mother's suffering, Irene pleaded a headache and retired to her room.

In the months that followed, Irene's love for her husband grew, but always between them was a dark shadow which Steven felt but could not pierce. Then he met Evelyn again and Irene looking on, sensed the love of the two youngsters. She saw too how loyalty to his wife made Steven avoid Evelyn though his eyes followed her unconsciously, and in her room Irene laughed hysterically at the irony of Fate. Once Irene entered a room to hear Evelyn ask Steven how he could have forgotten how much they loved each other and as Steven cried out not to torture him with memories, Irene slipped from the room.

When Irene's baby was born, Steven was told there was a possibility of saving either the mother or the child and struggling against his realization that with Irene out of the way he could marry Evelyn, he told the doctor to save the mother. However, Irene was too weak to live and calling Steven into her room, she showed him a picture, a duplicate of the one he had of his father. She had been the woman who had taken Steven's father from his mother.

Months later, Steven found Evelyn, matured by love of him, waiting for him, and Steven found that at last he could write poetry again.

LIFE'S CHANGES

Myra Dunavant File No. 8051

JEALOUS of Jerry Judson's love for Crystal Rush, Rose Garner takes advantage of Jerry's sojourn at their boarding house to steal his mail from her, and to bring him false gossip of Crystal's engagement to Bud Long. Learning from a friend that the land Crystal has won in a contest, contains oil, and knowing that Crystal is ignorant of this, Bud Long visits the Rush home both to buy the land cheaply, and to offer Mr. Rush the five thousand dollars he needs for payments on his farm, if he will give him Crystal for his wife. As Crystal hates Bud more and more for forcing his attentions on her, Rose tries again and again at town parties and picnics, to belittle her before Jerry by sneering at her old fashioned shabby clothes and country mannerisms. Happy to learn from Bud whom she meets at the post-office, that Crystal is his girl, Rose not only steals the ring and pictures sent by Jerry, from Crystal's letterbox, but informs Jerry of Crystal's supposed engagement. However, Jerry manages to convey his genuine feelings to Crystal in their many secret meetings—for Mr. Rush has forbidden her to see him—but Rose, having told Bud about this, the latter threatens Rush with the withholding of the needed money if the meetings continue. Therefore, having thrown Jerry from the house one night, Rush keeps Crystal a prisoner in the house, until, becoming suddenly ill,—and since the mother is an invalid—Crystal is allowed to go to the town for medicine. Visiting Jerry at the bank where he works, Crystal is happy to accede to his plans for marriage; but Jerry, thinking her father has taken the ring, hesitates to say anything about it for fear of hurting her. So that when Rose displays it to Crystal as Jerry's engagement ring to her, Crystal is heart-broken; but Jerry's frequent secret visits nightly, and his sincere vows of love, dispel the gloom. Planning to elope after a dance given by one of her friends, Jerry and Crystal on their way to the minister, are both seriously injured in a collision,—their car having been tampered with by Bud and Rose who had jealously watched the two dancing and conversing.

Warning the doctor that Crystal's presence will make Jerry worse, Rose nurses him at the hospital, throws away his letters to Crystal, while the latter is constantly turned away. Well again, Jerry communicates with Crystal via letters placed in a tree near her home; but Crystal is again a prisoner when Bud finds the hiding place, and especially after she has been discovered by her father trying to escape from the window. Finally, having sneaked out of the house to give Helen Bates, a friend, a note for Jerry, Crystal is kidnapped by Bud, Sid Carson and Captain Barnes, the two men whose chauffeur he is. After many adventures—almost being burnt alive in the house they had stopped for rest, being hurt when their car breaks through a bridge and being caught in a terrible storm—the travelers arrive at Captain Barnes' home in Arizona; and Crystal, having found an opening in the stone wall around the house, goes through the mountain tunnel to the shack where Bud keeps his wife and children. Recovered from her illness, she steals some money the drunken Bud has been counting, and taking a horse, rides home, where she finds that Jerry, broken-hearted by her supposed infidelity, has gone to another city where he is engaged to a girl he does not love. While Bud is being arrested for a bank robbery—which explain his long absences from the Barnes house. Jerry, on a visit to the town, meets and marries Crystal. Before Rose leaves for her marriage to a drunken millionaire, she tells Crystal of the value of her land; and when old and ill, she returns years later, she finds Crystal and Jerry happy and prosperous.

THE HAUNTED HOUSE

Grace Baird File No. 8015

BOARDED up, dark, sinister, the old haunted house stood at the end of the crooked lane that passed outside the cottage of the two twins. Nan and Mary, as alike as two peas lived with their brother, Ken in the ramshackle but neat little cottage. The twins wrote for a livelihood, and well they might for there was nothing too minute or unexciting to capture their attention. And once the twins got interested in something, stirring events followed as a natural sequence.

At dinner, one night, Mary mentioned that a tall skulking figure had gone past the house. Why anyone would want to go on toward the haunted house was a mystery. Ken scoffed. There they were discussing mysteries again. It was a wonder anyone found their stories interesting. And as for getting money for them! Then, going back to his pipe, Ken relaxed in a bored silence, but as he dimly realized the girls were still discussing the stranger and the haunted house, he shot out a warning to them not to go meddling in other people's affairs. Ken sighed lugubriously at the thought of his responsibilities as the brother of Nan and Mary. But the twins had decided to see if there wasn't a story in the haunted house. That night when Pat came to see Mary they told him about the mysterious man. He shook his head ruefully, but when he realized they were serious, he insisted on coming along—for protection.

Accordingly, when they saw a man walking down the lane, they followed at a safe distance. Fear clutched their hearts as the tall man felt along the side of the house with his hands, but to the astonishment of the trio, before their very eyes, he disappeared. Approaching stealthily they saw that the haunted house was still as carefully boarded up. But through a knot hole they saw a gleam of light and to their amazement within were three men discussing the division of spoils. The tall man wanted the girl. His claims were disputed by the others who also wrangled about some gold. Suddenly Mary slipped and at the noise the three figures ran to investigate. In her terror, Mary leaned against the building and suddenly a part of the wall swung open. That was how the bandits had entered. A secret door! Creeping inside, the twins and Pat jumped as the door swung closed behind them. Now they couldn't escape! Suddenly dimly they heard the scream of a girl. Pat leaped forward and the three ran along the hollow halls feeling at any minute their footsteps would bring disaster upon them. At length in one of the lower cellars, they found Sally Bland, the wealthiest heiress in the city. They were releasing her when a sinister laugh sounded behind them and they turned to find themselves looking into a shiny automatic. The tall man told them what he thought of meddlers and marched them outside to the orchard when suddenly Ken, who had suspected the absence of the twins, ordered the captor to "Stick 'em up!" Ken collected the bandit's gun and felt better. Rounding up the other two and freeing Sally, Ken, the twins, Pat and Sally marched the men to headquarters where they learned that the criminals had murdered a miser and were planning to leave town with his wealth and the proceeds from Sally's kidnapping. There was a considerable reward for the capture, a good story for Nan, Pat for Mary, and Ken, well Ken won the love of the kidnapped heiress.

THE EVERLASTING FAITH

Lula D. Trautman File No. 8032

LESS than a year after she had waved a gallant goodbye to her handsome young husband marching away to the great war with the other men of the village, Meta, grown increasingly anxious at the grim reports from the front, fell to the ground in a dead faint as she read, high up in the list of casualties, the name of her Rene Pierre.

Meta's tired little hand caught the arm of her nurse and with eyes great with tragic pain, pleaded to know how her baby was. Reassured by the kind woman's soft answer, Meta dropped off to a troubled sleep while the nurse hurried away afraid that in a moment she would have disclosed to the child-mother that her little one, injured by the fall and born prematurely, was unable to move its tiny little legs. Rene's son would never walk again. Meta swayed in terrible grief when at length she lifted the tender little mite. For days she prayed to a God she had been taught was merciful, but at length, because baby must have food and shelter, she found employment at the little Inn. Summer passed, and autumn and as the first snow brought the children shouting merrily in the streets, Meta watched from her window and her dark eyes grew heavy with unshed tears as she whispered to herself, "My child will never run and play like other children, never." Her reverie was interrupted by a curious, silent old man in the smock and coat of a peasant. Apathetically Meta served him but as the baby cried, she moved to its tiny crib and a great wave of tenderness and love overspread her face as she tenderly raised the little one. The stranger was moved and hesitatingly he questioned her, then with blazing eyes told her of a little Church where every Noel miracles were performed. Leaving her in wonder before his impassioned words he quietly vanished into the night urging her to have faith.

Staring after him, Meta felt the impatient tap of Madam who called her attention to the disordered room and the table that had yet to be cleared, but Meta, as one in a trance, explained that she must go to the little Church. She must start immediately, there were only five days in which to travel. Undaunted by the dissuading arguments of Madam, Meta carefully bundled the little one against the storm and started forth eagerly. All night she travelled and at dawn found a curious housewife ready to give her bread and milk. Many were those who gave a hand to the little mother and all wondered at the intensity of her faith. At length, having weathered a great storm, the woman who was in years but a child, approached the Church. All was dark within and she tried door after door until at length seeing a room piled high with straw, she kneeled at the manger and eyes shining with an inner fire, held forth the babe as a priest lifts up an offering to the Most High.

That night the sexton agitatedly called the Priest and together they stared dumbly at the stable which seemed radiant with a great golden light. On a bed of hay a little baby lay gurgling and laughing up at the light, his tiny feet kicking in the air while beside him lay a girl with a smile like the Glory of Heaven upon her sweet, contented face. Reverently the Holy Father and the sexton whispered of a blessed Miracle while the girl mother smiled tenderly upon her precious baby, whole and well again—like other children.

HEART TROUBLE

Leonard F. Weber File No. 8082

BRIEF CASE under his arm, Donald Wayne walked briskly down the main thoroughfare. Galvanized into action by the sight of a girl walking heedlessly into the path of a truck, the young lawyer flung himself violently upon her, thrust her rudely to safety, then ruefully apologized for having knocked her down. For a moment she looked stunned, then a sense of the ridiculousness of the situation struck her and accepting his help to her feet, she thanked him for saving her life. As he looked after her, hat still tipped reflectively, the pounding of his heart made him wince. For several hours he tried to attend his business, but at length determined to see a doctor.

Taken off guard by the fact that the nurse who ushered him into the doctor's office was the girl of the midday encounter, he felt curiously exhilarated by her smile of recognition. As he waited his turn, Donald wondered how he might arrange to see more of her, but when the very young doctor pronounced without emotion that Donald had heart trouble, everything but the fact that he was doomed was forgotten. Through a haze, Donald heard the doctor state that he might live to a ripe old age, if he were careful, and as he stumbled into the air that no longer seemed bright, Donald had a vague impression of the girl smiling sympathetically.

As his patient walked out the young doctor saw the concerned look on his nurse's face and cajoling her for taking her work so seriously, he put his arm familiarly about her waist and kissed her. Furiously she detached herself and slapping his face, told him she was through.

An hour later, Donald met Mae in the park and losing his preoccupation for a moment, inquired what she was doing here at this hour. Mae flippantly remarked she had just lost a good position, and as they kept step together, Donald suggested that dinner and a show might help them both. For months thereafter they continued to see each other. It was love for both of them, a poignant sweet love, but Donald could not ask her to marry a man who might die at any moment. At length one night as they rode together on a road that stretched like a silver ribbon before them, Mae asked him gently why he didn't ask her to marry him. Holding her off, he said, "You know . . . " She nodded, and before her reasoning, he broke down. Never had moment been so sweet as the instant at the altar when Mae had gazed up shyly, adoringly at her handsome, tall Donald. Romance never faded from their marriage. In their little bungalow, Mae would nestle in the arms of her husband as they sat before the radio and their joy was complete until Mae had suddenly taken ill with appendicitis. She had rallied nicely from the operation until six days later, a sudden turn for the worse, and Donald dashed madly from the office only to have her die in his arms. As he clung there, the doctor kneeled apprehensively. "Dead. Heart failure induced by over-excitement." But he was only partially correct, Donald Wayne had died of heart trouble,—a broken heart.

AMBITION

ALL through primary and high school, George Kane adored little Barbara Blake, the adopted daughter of his neighbors. It was agony for him to see another boy put his arm familiarly around the girl's waist to dance with her, and before he left for college he warned her fiercely not to think of any one but him. Smiling at his jealousy, little Barbara promised. There wasn't any reason why she shouldn't for didn't she love her George as much as he did her?

Impatient until the train pulled into his station, George waited restlessly on the train platform and as he caught sight of Barbara waiting at the station for his homecoming, a shout of pure joy escaped him. Whirling her around, he exclaimed that she was more beautiful even than he had dreamed her. The Kanes had prepared a surprise reception for their son, but George could think of nothing except Barbara. As quickly as possible the pair escaped from the party and wandering together down the lanes, George asked Barbara to marry him. In the excess of their youth and love, they felt themselves drawn by the strongest of ties. In three days they would be married.

But going skating with the crowd the day before the wedding, George fell into the water and before his frightened friends managed to form a human chain to get him out, the boy was unconscious. Two days after the still figure was carried home, he drew his last breath and Barbara threw herself upon his beloved body.

As the weeks passed, Barbara was gnawed by the terrible certainty that she was soon to have a child. Selling the beloved home the Blakes had left her, Barbara went on to the welcome oblivion of New York and with the proceeds of the sale, was able to support herself through the trying months. Well again, Barbara determined to try to make the grade on Broadway but her money soon began to give out and the booking agents seemed indifferent to her talents. Then, one day, stepping in front of an automobile she was carried unconscious to the home of Stanley Thompson who sent his valet for the best doctors for the girl. Falling in love with the lovely young girl, Stanley discovered her ambition and wielding his influence as a backer of shows got her an opening. Once placed, Barbara headed straight for the top, but to Stanley as to all other men, Barbara remained friendly but aloof.

Meanwhile Stanley, despairing of being able to win Barbara's love, went to the continent to forget. Through the years rumors of the perennial fame enjoyed by Barbara seeped through to him, and tiring of all else he returned to her at the time when her son, grown now, fell in love with a society girl. The boy was desperate when he learned he had no name to offer his wife, and Barbara welcoming Stanley to her apartment tried to hide her distraction from him. At last she confessed why she had never encouraged him, and drawing her into his arms he told her that belonged to the past. Through tear-dimmed eyes Barbara accepted Stanley's name in marriage and her youngster found happiness with the girl he loved.

HEARING cries, Jack Cushing rescues his neighbor's daughter from drowning when the bank of the creek caves in with her horse. As they ride home together he tells Nan that he has never realized how much he loved her until that terrible moment when he saw her caught in the swirling waters, and they plan to be married as soon as they come of age.

However, two years later their fathers are both killed fighting a range fire and Nan goes to live with a maiden aunt in Wisconsin while Jack tries to build up his ranch which has been ravaged by the flames. Although he will not permit her to share his years of hardship, Jack gives Nan a pin bearing the figures 73, the brand of his father's ranch, as a token of his love.

Sent to a fashionable school by her aunt, Nan's fresh young beauty attracts the attention of Blackie Orde, a gangster, whose advances she repulses. Ruthlessly Blackie trumps up a charge so Nan will be expelled from school, and her aunt immediately turns her out. Penniless and dazed by the injustice, Nan attempts to communicate with Jack but learns only that he is not at home. Hungry and desperate, the girl tries to find work but in vain and at length as she is turning brokenly away from the last available position, another rejected applicant begins talking to her and suggests that she knows of a night club that needs some help. Gratefully Nan accompanies her new friend but not until Blackie enters the room does Nan realize she has been betrayed into his hands by one of his tools. Fighting off his embraces, Nan is finally left alone, told that she'll be starved into submission. She tries desperately to escape and finally enlists the aid of Nell, the girl who betrayed her, to send the 73 pin to Jack for help. Remorseful for her own part in the affair, Nell promises to help but realizing that Blackie will kill her if he ever finds out, she conquers her charitable impulse and decides to get rid of the pin as soon as possible.

Meanwhile Jack has decided to ask Nan to marry him but to his horror, when he arrives at her aunt's house, the spinster slams the door in his face and tells him of Nan's disgrace. Refusing to believe it, Jack searches desperately for the girl he loves and then breaking under the strain accepts the invitation of a business acquaintance of his, a habitue of Blackie's night club to drown his sorrows in drink. As Jack is miserably wondering where Nan can be Nell, sitting at the next table drops her purse and Jack's eyes rivet on the 73 pin. Jack pleads with Nell to tell him where Nan is and fearing for her own life, Nan directs him to the back room. He finds Nan struggling in Blackie's embrace and with a cry throws himself upon the gangster, disarms him, and after a desperate battle leaves him outstretched on the floor. Kissing her tears away, Jack takes Nan to his home on the 73, where they are married to live in happiness.

THE GLEAM

WITH furniture and family piled high in his battered automobile, Jim Walters took possession of the little home in Sunset Valley, the goal of all his years of struggle. Holding his beloved wife close, Jim smiled at the cries of joy of his son and daughter as they realized the potentialities of their new home. Feeling that every one around must share their joy in the ownership of a home of their own, the Walters sent out invitations to the countryside for a house-warming, but as the hours passed and the guests failed to arrive, they realized for the first time that the society of Sunset Valley considered them intruders. Only Tom Smith, one of the wealthiest and most eligible young men in all Sunset Valley came, after telling his mother, Jean, that he considered her and all her friends snobs to refuse the well meant overtures of the Walters. That night the Walters and their friend Tom pretended that nobody else had been invited and as they sat around the great festive board Tom's eyes held Clare Walters' across the table in a glance that spoke clearly of love at first sight.

When Jean Smith learned that her child was planning to marry Clare Walters, her fury was boundless, but Tom told her clearly that although he had always loved her he wasn't going to sacrifice his happiness to her snobbery and despite all Jean's raging, he married Clare in a quiet ceremony at the Walter home. Adoring his bride as he did, however, Tom felt keenly Jean's resentment and Clare often found her beloved young husband brooding over his enmity with his mother. Many times she tried to placate Jean but the proud Mrs. Smith was implacable in her hatred of "that upstart" as she called Clare.

Then an epidemic of influenza hit Sunset Valley and among the first to come down with it was Jean. Although she was soon to have a baby, Clare went to the aid of her husband's mother, and Tom blessed her. But the moment Jean realized who was nursing her, she ordered Clare from her house. Brokenly Clare returned home and stabbed by Tom's misery, she cooked delicacies for the sick woman and sent them over secretly. However, when her own mother caught the "Flu", Clare was too worn to help her and breaking under the strain was ordered to bed by the doctor. A nurse, Marjorie Snow, was procured for Mrs. Walters, but despite valiant efforts to pull her through, Clare's mother quietly died. Grief and excitement almost cost Clare her life when her baby was born, but through the tenderness of Tom, the efforts of Marjorie, who in love with Clare's brother Bob, felt like one of the family, and the change of heart of Jean, who upon her recovery was bitterly assailed by her son, Tom and shown that largely through her own irrational snobbery Clare had been brought to the threshold of death, Clare pulled through. Tom wept tears of happiness at Clare's recovery, and Mrs. Smith, seeing how dearly they loved each other, planned a great christening party for her grandchild and commended to the inhabitants of Sunset Valley the gallant spirit of the Walters. While Bob and Marjorie slipped off, Tom happily put one arm about his mother, rejoicing in the end of a long feud, and the other about his adored wife and baby.

LOVE FORSAKEN

Lena V. Walker File No. 8149

ONE of a large family, Marion had been starved for love throughout her childhood, until, on a visit to her recently married Aunt Mary, she met Rollin Abbot. Only sixteen, Marion felt the first pangs of love as she shyly dropped her eyes to hide her feelings. At home she could think only of Rollin and a great joy surged within her at the thought that soon she could see him again. But when she went to her aunt's house again, Marion trembled in his presence so that she felt everyone must notice it. At length, fearing ridicule, the reserved child returned home and made excuses to her aunt so that she might not again endure the torture of being with Rollin.

Then she met Jack Stewart, who showered upon her the affection for which she hungered. He worshipped her with a kindness not unmixed with a fierce jealousy that made the girl for brief moments forget her hopeless love. And when Jack begged her to marry him, Marion turned her eyes away and thought of Rollin and how he must surely have written if he cared at all. When she did accept, she was frightened by the intensity with which Jack clasped her and murmured if she ever broke her promise he would kill himself. Two weeks before her wedding, Marion was stunned to receive a long letter from Rollin telling her that he loved her, always had but, that she was so young he dared not tell her. Staring dumbly at the news she would have given anything to receive earlier, Marion was wracked by dry sobs. She tried to tell Jack she couldn't marry him, but as she felt the wild beating of his heart and heard him whisper hoarsely that she was the only thing in the world he had ever loved, ever had faith in, she knew she couldn't do it. Out of a mistaken sense of honor and pity, Marion went to the altar with Jack and wrote a short little note to Rollin telling him of her marriage.

Congratulated by all her friends on having won an ideal husband, Marion smiled brightly and gave herself over to her child born a year after the marriage. But when the baby was six weeks old, Jack stayed out all night for the first time. Anxiously, feverishly, Marion worried about him until just before morning he came in blindly drunk. Swaying he tried to explain, but although from then on he made promises regularly, and no one suspected it, he came back more and more frequently completely intoxicated. For years, Marion struggled on alone and the world didn't suspect and then one day on a visit to her aunt she met Rollin again. Taking her home, he looked at her two children who adored their new friend and very slowly he said, "If those two babies were mine I'd be the happiest man in the world." Then gently promised never to speak of his love again.

Driven to an attempt to drown herself because of Jack's drunken assumption of an affair with Rollin, Marion went on living for her children's sake and Jack grovelled for forgiveness. A letter from the quietly understanding Aunt Mary informed Marion of Rollin's death after a trip abroad to forget her, and as year after year passed, and in spite of the advice of her doctor after she had had a breakdown because of Jack, Marion felt in her children's love and the respect of Jack who made an honest effort to reform, that the struggle had been worth while.

SUCCESS TALE

ASSURING John that they didn't need money to be happy, that she would marry him as soon as he was graduated from college, Marion whispered good night and let herself into her house. Surprised to find her mother and father still awake, she questioned them anxiously and learned that Sidney Morgan, the banker, was going to prosecute Marion's father for theft. Stunned, she listened to the broken explanations of her father that he needed money for food and had borrowed the money with the expectation of returning it. All this he had explained to the ruthless banker, but Morgan was determined to make an example of him. With a pitiful expression in his eyes, Marion's father begged her to use her influence, she knew how Morgan had always liked her.

The next day Marion went to plead with Morgan for clemency and as the banker looked at her through narrowed eyes, Marion shuddered. At length, crossing over to her he said he would drop the case, and as she brightened added, if she would marry him. Holding back the tears of dismay, Marion asked for time to consider and returned home. But the misery of her parents as they inquired how she made out, broke her heart and putting the thought of John and all their dreams of happiness from her mind, Marion was quietly wedded to the banker whose son was as old as she. Marion knew that John would be hurt, but the violenee of his denunciation of her for having, as he put it, married for money, left her gasping. Before she could explain he was gone, and because he was John and impulsive, he enlisted in the army. Trying to keep up appearances as the wife of a man she detested, Marion knew how her friends were gossiping about her "marriage for money", but in the gratitude of her parents she found consolation. Meanwhile the embers of war flamed and the government began drafting older men. At length Sidney Morgan was called and despite all his efforts to evade the draft he was forced to leave. Pressing a kiss upon Marion's unwilling lips, he took his place in line. That was the last Marion saw of him but news from the front told how Sidney had been sent to John's regiment and how John had been seriously wounded in a vain attempt to save the life of the husband of the woman he loved.

Nerves shattered, John returned home and because he had no one with whom to stay he remained at the Veterans' Hospital. Softly Marion called him, but as he identified his visitor he turned from her with a groan. She shouldn't have come to torture him, he cried. Marion wept, pleaded with him to accept her help but it wasn't until she explained that she had married only to save her father, that he listened to her. Patiently, lovingly, Marion nursed John back to health, and at length, grown infinitely wiser, more mature through their bitter experiences, these two who had loved each other so long, were married.

LOVE FOR TWO

Florence Shmidt File No. 8193

SOLE heiress to the Morgan millions, Jo Ann took one look at Jerry and decided to remain on at the hotel. Coming down for a swimming lesson from the handsome young life-guard, Jo Ann saw his interest quicken and for once forgot her resentment of men who trailed her in the hope of marrying her money. When Jerry held her close, some days later, and told her how much he loved her, Jo Ann sighed dreamily they wouldn't have anything to worry about ever, she had money enough for two. Jerry let her go then, suddenly, and gradually it dawned upon him that Jo Ann was the famous Morgan heiress.

And thinking of the law practice he was going to set up when the summer ended, Jerry shivered and suggested that they go back to the hotel. Jo Ann noticed how Jerry tried to avoid her, thereafter, and after days of misery, she asked him to take her to a party to be given in town. Swallowing hard, Jerry accepted because he couldn't refuse Jo Ann anything. It would be the last time anyway, he was going home this week. But on the way as Jo Ann stopped the car and her lovely face shone with the moon streaming down on it, Jerry grasped her in his arms and despite all his theories rained kisses on her eager young lips. It was Jo Ann who pointed out how foolish he was to let anything stand in the way of love. It all seemed so right then, the dash to a Justice of the Peace, the marriage ceremony in the little bare living room, and then the announcement at the party that Jerry and Jo Ann were married. For one bitter instant, Jerry caught the sneer of some of the guests who congratulated Jerry on his great match, but as he saw the pain in Jo Ann's eyes, he pretended he hadn't heard and the young bridal pair left with the well wishes of the crowd.

In the months that followed Jerry tried valiantly to practice law while his wife continued her extravagances on her income. Many times Jerry cursed that fortune, but he dared not deprive Jo Ann of the luxuries he thought she needed. Tired from long nights of dancing and drinking, Jerry found it increasingly difficult to keep up his practice and his pride began to fail. Too late Jo Ann realized Jerry had gotten the "What's the use?" attitude. He began needing money for speculations so he'd be able to support them on his income and Jo Ann wept. Then, one day, when Jerry had spent the whole day watching the ticker tape, Jo Ann took matters into her own hands. That day when Jerry came home, Jo Ann told him they couldn't touch her money—she had put it all in a trust fund for Junior. Dazed for a moment, Jerry realized the full import and taking Jo Ann in his arms said from now on he'd support them. They might have to struggle for a while, but he'd make good and Jo Ann smiled happily.

THE RESTLESS TRAIL

Leon T. Decelles File No. 8139

BUMPING into eaeh other as they both jump from the freight train on which they have stolen rides, Dorsey and Davlin, postponing their fight, discover suddenly they have no quarrel with each other and together apply for a job requiring men who will do anything!

Chosen from a line of applicants which is being watched by Mulligan, a Federal agent, and Anne Lee, a newspaper reporter who hopes to get a story by following Mulligan's activities, Dorsey and Davlin are given a shooting test and told to report at a certain address. Both Anne Lee and Mulligan follow them and on the train the young reporter meets them by the old handkerchief trick. They realize Mulligan is following them and believing "the government" for which they have heen hired is the United States, they try to elude Mulligan and in a pawn shop on a whim Davlin buys a small silver horse shoe for luck and both buy badges. While killing a few hours they enter a night club where they meet Gloria, employed by the Department of Justice to get acquainted with Dolores Castro, the go-between of men who have stolen treasury plates and substituted counterfeits. However, although up to the point where Gloria's chief, Kelly, has captured the Big Shot and is himself to receive the plates from the two who are to deliver them, the Government plans succeed, at this point Dolores plans to double-cross her Big Shot and she induces his two tools to benefit by the direet use of the precious plates. Aecordingly she tells Gloria that Dorsey and Davlin are the men who are to deliver the plates while she escapes with the real tools, has them chloroformed by a fake motor cycle cop, and proceeds on her way.

Meanwhile at the party, Dorsey and Davlin troubled by the surveillance of the impatient Kelly, find all the exits guarded and make their escape via the cellar by rolling out ash barrels.

Instructed to proceed to New Orleans and book passage on the Stella Maria, they find that Mulligan followed by Anne is on their trail as is Gloria, who has since discovered that the rest of the Big Shot's gang are following her two friends thinking that the box containing Davlin's silver horse shoe contains the precious plates. Anne and Gloria are introduced by the men and when Gloria sees Dolores book passage on the Stella Maria, she induces Anne, who loves Dorsey, to join her in signing up in men's clothes as ship helpers. The two are never apart for a moment for safety and when Gloria sees Dolores show the treasury plates to the Captain she gets Dorsey and Davlin to send a code message for help. While fighting their way out, Dorsey is pursued in another direction and finds refuge in a munition case and is thus able to make his appearance when the adventurers are sentenced to the firing squad through Dolores who turns out to be daughter of a rebel who is financing a South American revolution by the money made with the American plates. By the pawn shop badges they get the aid of other Americans and escape through the jungle. The marines summoned by the wireless message sent from the ship arrive to break up the revolution while the adventurers discover a hoarde of treasure in a temple in which they have taken refuge. Thus enriched, they return to the States for a double wedding, while Mulligan remains to see that the guilty are given their just desserts.

CYCLE OF LIFE

Mable Blue File No. 8243

BECAUSE she would not hurt her mother, Helen Bruce held her temper even when the beautiful home that had housed Bruces for generations was sold to pay her stepfather's drinking debts. But as the frail little woman grew more and more pale and her husband became the town disgrace, Helen's resentment of her stepfather mounted. At length, faced with the necessity of raising money immediately to procure medical attention for her mother, Helen who had never worked before in her life, left college and made a futile round of the village to procure work. Driven to desperation, Helen accepted the only offer available, that of cigarette girl in a roadhouse.

Mack tried to kiss Helen one day as she was filling her tray with the cigarettes, but she turned from him abruptly and because he knew that she was drawing patrons by her fresh young beauty and her charming though uncultivated voice, Mack accepted the rebuff. Wearily returning home that night, feeling unclean from the contaminating nearness of Mack, Helen sensed an ominous stillness in her mother's room and with a cry of grief threw herself upon the still form of her mother. Hours later her stepfather staggered home and Helen, who had made him promise to stay with her mother, turned from the man who had let his wife die alone and unattended, in loathing. Brokenly she returned to Mack's roadhouse for her effects, but Mack seized her in his repulsive grip and when she struggled informed her that her stepfather had been obtaining liquor for months on the promise that Helen would make it all good. Frantically Helen beat him with her small fists and begged for release promising that she would somehow get the money to pay him, but Mack grinned and replied money wasn't what he wanted. Suddenly the door burst open and a party of plain clothes men who were raiding the roadhouse seized Helen and Mack. With a crimson face Helen realized what these men must be thinking about her, catehing her here in Mack's embrace and as one of them ordered her gruffly to come on, the girl slumped suddenly and fell to the floor unconscious. She awoke to find a man holding her and smoothing her hair and as remembrance came back to her she turned her head away and moaned. The man was directing the other police to keep on, he'd take care of the girl. Gently he asked her if she were all right now and before she could help herself she was sobbing the entire story to him.

Scarcely expecting that he would believe her story, Helen was astounded when he offered her a position as social secretary to his mother, but Richard, drawn to the girl, was testing her. Thrown together under sueh strange circumstances, the romance of Helen and Richard developed and some weeks later, they were married, to find years of happiness together.

HAT FUN

Bertha Heath File No. 8205

AS the doors of Stacy's department store open, a crowd of women surge into the store pushing and trampling the unhappy door-guard. In ever-increasing numbers they mill toward the hat counter knocking over show cases and causing terrified salesgirls to flee to safety. Within a few moments the gay sign announcing, "Sale today. Hats half price," is in tatters among the struggling women.

Angry murmurs and grumbles are heard as Mrs. Jones, fervent bargain shopper, snatches at hat after hat knocking over any woman in her way. As somebody pushes her, her voiee rises angrily and amidst the pushing women, the indomitable Mrs. Jones tries hat after hat on to determine size and suitability. Poking at the harassed saleslady patiently trying to fill orders, Mrs. Jones hooks the girl's arm with her umbrella and announces stridently that she wants a blue hat to match her suit. A detailed description of her wants follow and the saleslady sighs as she reminds her that this is self-service. Scorning each hat she holds, Mrs. Brown loudly condemns the women who push up against her and turns a deaf ear to the advice that she get a store of her own. Grabbing at a distant hat, Mrs. Brown crushes a number of smart new chapeaux and calls down the reproof of the saleslady. Then as she sees her friend Mrs. Smith arrive, she calls loudly across the annoyed bargain hunters who look as if they may kill her any minute now. Brightly she inquires about Mrs. Smith's baby, about whether her sister is engaged yet, meanwhile frantically raking the counter for a hat, and her conversation is curtailed only when a very large hat comes down over her face. Disgustedly she tears it off and finally selects a blue hat with cherries on top which looks hideous. Calling to Mrs. Smith who is departing with her purchase to wait for her, she has something to tell her, Mrs. Brown orders the saleslady to wrap it up quickly, and as she finally clears the mob she takes one look at her hat and almost faints as she realizes she has gotten the wrong one. Back she goes to complain and informed that the blue hat is more expensive, she searches desperately for her purse and with a wail of despair cries out her purse has been lost. On hands and knees she creeps among the disgruntled shoppers and after tossing all the hats aside, she escapes weeping. A thorough search of the Lost and Found is unavailing although the Stacy officials tear their hair at the trouble the woman causes. At length she borrows money from Mrs. Smith and tattered and torn emerges triumphant.

Her tired husband groans as she comes in smudged and needing an entire new outfit. But she gleefully overwhelms him with the news that she has saved two dollars on her hat although—guardedly—she lost her purse containing twenty-five dollars. The next day Mrs. Brown proudly wears her new hat to the horse races and as she smirks haughtily an overenthusiastic rooter brings his hands down on her head, utterly ruining her prize. The scene dissolves as Mrs. Brown is angrily choking the poor fellow and the crowd gaily cheers.

REVENGE

Constantine Cornaros File No. 8106

EVERY part of the island of Crete was under Turkish rule save the small town of Critsia which had valiantly resisted attack and was thought too unimportant to warrant the strong forces necessary for conquest. The only privilege the Turks enjoyed was that they were assured of hospitality in Critsia if they came upon a peaceful mission. One day the Turkish Governor, Pasha passed through the town and since there were no available accommodations, the vicar offered the hospitality of his home. However, Pasha, seeing the vicar's lovely daughter, Rothanth, determined to add her to his harem and when he arrived home, he dispatched six of his men to bring him Rothanth at any hazard.

At the vicar's house, Rothanth's mother struggled valiantly to protect her daughter, but fearing lest the vicar arrive, the Turks killed her and kidnapped the beautiful young girl. The vicar was distrait at the discovery of the tragedy, but the five hundred men in the village would be powerless to attack the Turks, and gathering ammunition of every kind the stricken people prepared to attack in secret while the vicar took a mighty oath of revenge.

Meanwhile Rothanth in desperation over the preparations for her wedding, roused herself from her apathetic state and pretended that she had become resigned to her fate and welcomed her bridegroom. When Pasha let himself into the bridal chamber, he was utterly disarmed by her meekness but Rothanth waited her opportunity and burying the hilt of the Governor's dagger in his heart, she dressed herself in his clothes and passed through the palace gates disguised as the Governor. Escaping through the forest she was stopped by a band of outlaws and the leader, Peter, accepted her story that she was a Christian fleeing because she had killed a Turk. Joining their band she was known as Beardless Nick.

Meanwhile, no one dared interrupt the bridal pair until one of the guards snickered about the Governor's having gone out last night. Breaking into the room, the Turks found their Governor dead in a pool of his blood and fiercely mobilized troops to ravage the bride's people. Five thousand strong the Turks marched upon Critsia, but the valiant little town held out. Just as they were breaking, moreover, the outlaw band, learning of Critsia's danger, brought reinforcements and picking off the Turks from the rear, caused them to be utterly routed. Rothanth, herself, killed the man who had murdered her mother, and as a Turk struck her father she killed him, falling wounded herself. When the Turks had gone, Peter came to the aid of his wounded recruit and as he washed her wounds he discovered what he had begun to suspect that Nick was a woman, and a very lovely one. The vicar recovered from his wounds and Rothanth held tightly in Peter's arms, confessed she had loved him from the moment she saw him.

SECOND WIFE

W. C. Groth File No. 8086

HIRED out to a farmer when he was sixteen, there was little of softness and comfort in David's life until he met Joan. It was while he was chopping corn near the fence line, that he saw Joan for the first time. She dropped her eyes before his unmistakable admiration, but David knew then he was in love. In town he managed to meet Joan's brother and happy in the invitation to visit, he came over. The sweetness of their romance was unmarred by any slightest taint, and with Joan as his bride, David brought her to the little home he had bought with his savings.

From the first Joan helped David, cheered him in his moments of depression, and set him ever on the right path. The little home was bright with the love of David and Joan and when Joan told him she was going to have a baby, David's heart filled to overflowing. Each trip from town he brought her some little keepsake in expression of his love, and as Joan's time grew near, they clung together, drawn by indissoluble ties. But at length the baby was born, and with a mighty cry David learned that his Joan had died to give him a daughter. So terrible was David's grief that the neighbors shook their heads and feared that he would lose his reason. It didn't seem fair that Death should strike so great a love, hut David was of the gallant. Burying within his huge chest his great grief, he went about the chores silently, bravely, and poured upon his little Jeanette the love he had felt for her mother. Nothing was too good for the child and when he realized he was incapable of giving her all a baby needed, he went to the village and brought Mary home to care for the child. Watching Mary's deft fingers making his little Jeanette comfortable, David felt a deep gratitude. While Mary, seeing David's love for his little one, used the child to get a hold upon David and saw success crown her efforts when David asked her simply if she'd become his wife, Jeanette's mother. Suppressing a little smile of triumph, Mary hastened the marriage. But from the first David realized that Mary no longer was as kind, as considerate. She had only simulated tenderness to marry David. Now she relaxed. Where before everything had been shiny, polished, clean, now Mary sat back. And little Jeanette was taught to clean with the tiny fingers that could scarcely hold a dust cloth. David's heart broke, but Mary was cold. It would do the child good, she said. Jealous even of Jeanette's rite of running to greet David as he came home each day, Mary put a stop to it and alone in her room the little one wept. Even when David sent Jeanette to school, Mary's nagging continued, for she missed the help Jeanette used to contribute, the help she wouldn't have her own children stoop to.

At length, however, Mary took ill. Ineffectually everyone bustled about, but it was Jeanette, voluntarily giving up a semester's work to aid at home, who pulled Mary through. Recovered, Mary tried weakly to show her gratitude, but Jeanette minimized her own efforts and with a softness in her eyes told them soon she must leave them—to be married to the one man in the world for her. David's pride knew no bounds, and Mary, humanized by her nearness to death, sought to make up to David for the pain she had caused him.

URGENT MOMENT

Charles M. Lichtman File No. 8202

JEALOUS of his wife's friendship with Jimmy Fane, Charles Johnson finds consolation in New York night life and neglects Amy more than ever. When the stock market crashes and he is unable to complete the building of a huge tower, symbol of his success, however, he tries futilely to borrow at the various banks and then determines to kill his wife and use her insurance money. At the same time he arranges to establish Jimmy's guilt by having him found at the scene immediately after the murder.

When Charles discovers that his daughter has fallen in love with Fane's motherless son, Jude, while at college, he immediately sets himself against the romance and Julia, realizing that her father is trying to marry her off to a former school mate of his and live in Chicago (so she won't be at hand when Fane comes to trial for her mother's murder) rebels and to show her faith in Jimmy's innocence, she marries his penniless son, Jude. Shortly after the marriage, Jude is hurt in an industrial accident and the doctor says a famous physician in Vienna is the only one who can help him. Desperate because she hasn't enough money, Julia sends Jude on to Europe while she pleads with her father to lend her the required sum. When he promises only on the condition that she divorce Jude, she turns away without another word and as a last resort appeals to the man her father wanted her to marry. She doesn't suspect what he expects in return but as a despairing letter comes from Jude, she finds out. Finally she gets a position, but even there her employer expects her to be a "good little girl" and since that is the only way Julia can get the money she needs, she decides to get as much money as she can. Accordingly she goes to a beauty parlor, has her hair dyed, her face considerably changed and thus prepared informs a night club owner that she is from Paris and induces him to take her on as an entertainer. She becomes a sensation and one day sees her father come. Her eyes narrow, but he is not quite sober and fortified by her reputation tries to make love to her. Julia holds him off and when he suggests his apartment offering her a thousand dollars to come, she assents. In her father's apartment, Julia continues to ply him with drink until he is so befuddled that he boasts about the fact that he made his fortune from his wife's insurance money and wants to have a good time now. Horrified, Julia leads him on until he has confessed how he implicated Jimmy Fane and why he didn't want his daughter to marry Jimmy's son. Turning from her inhuman father, Julia secures her father-in-law's release but being unwilling to reveal who the guilty person really is, she is herself held for implication in the crime. However, her father commits suicide when he learns of Julia's imprisonment and the note he leaves behind frees Julia to join her husband and his father in Vienna, where she is forgiven and Jude is cured.

THE GREATER LOVE

Grace Spenceley File No. 8117

IN order to accommodate more guests for his daughter's society debut at eighteen, Sir John Bolton, plans to have his beautiful home, Fairlawns, enlarged. Having lived a secluded life there, except for the occasional visits of Joshua, a son of her father's best friend, Elizabeth is elated by the bustle of dressmakers, merchants, and stone masons in and about the house. When not trying on clothes and sniffing in the kitchen the girl is perched on the stone wall watching the masons at work; and she would have fallen one day as she bends over to catch her hat if David, the son of one of the masons, hadn't saved her. Hearing David's father scolding him for neglecting his work in his gazing at the eager wall spectator, Elizabeth plans instead to see him in the evenings; and their walks and talks around the shady grounds are many in the evenings that follow. But when the guests arrive, and the stone masons have finished their work, David and Elizabeth plan their meetings more secretly; for Joshua, encouraged by Sir Bolton and his father, bestows his entire attention upon Elizabeth. Told that Elizabeth has gone to the garden, Joshua, planning to propose, leaves the dance, and follows her; and finding her in the arms of David, immediately reports this to Sir Bolton. When the latter furiously forbids Elizabeth to see David again, and threatens to imprison and disown her if she does, Elizabeth elopes with David that night.

Happy in their Canadian home, the couple rejoice a year later over a prospective arrival in the family; but in the hospital, Elizabeth, longing for a girl who will resemble Verna, (the little sister who had been killed when thrown from her horse over a hurdle which David had urged her to take), is heartbroken when she is presented with a boy. Learning that Mrs. Golding, the woman next to her, has just given birth to a girl, Elizabeth exchanges the children; and after being transferred, at her request to a private room, thus prevents the authorities from discovering the error. Always thinking of her son, Elizabeth discovers Mrs. Golding's address at the hospital, and after persuading David to rent an apartment near them, sees her son, Victor and the girl, Verna, grow up together. In the meantime, David, appeased for his implication in his sister's death by her seeming resurrection in his daughter, dies without ever knowing the truth. The Goldings, delighted by Elizabeth's attention to Victor,—for she takes him, together with Verna, to theaters, ball games, and parties, and brings him gifts,—beg her to care for him before they die in the terrible influenza epidemic.

Sitting in her armchair reminiscing about these things, Elizabeth is surprised by a kiss from Victor who has just been graduated from college. After telling him the entire story, Elizabeth is assured of his thanks and forgiveness; and just as Elizabeth remembers that Verna is coming that day for her vacation from college, Victor tells her of his approaching marriage. At the house later, Elizabeth kisses Verna, and looks around for Victor's fiancee, only to find Victor laughingly pointing at Verna; and Elizabeth's bewildered look changes to a beaming one as Verna and Victor embrace, and as she informs the two of Victor's heirdom to Sir John's estate. Victor and Verna both kiss Elizabeth, their common mother now.

RENUNCIATION

Julia E. Trouper File No. 8035

MARGARET, the older of the two rigidly reared Lucas girls, fearing her mother's displeasure, plans to meet John Spencer, her most beloved friend, secretly. Discovering her daughter's exceeding popularity with young men at parties and dances, anxious lest the vanities of the world entirely corrupt them, and knowing of John's extreme poverty and irreligious streak, Mrs. Lucas sends the two girls to complete their education at the convent school where her sister is the Mother Superior. Arrived there, the girls are completely subdued by the stringent discipline, and although they suffer homesickness and repression of their sentimentalities, meekly consent to become nuns when their aunt suggests it to them; for they have also been delighted with the soft lights, soft music, and awe-inspiring processions of priests and white-robed nuns in their daily chapel visits. Granted the robes of novices, the two girls willingly undertake the fasting, humble charitable works, and constant life of prayer which leads to the nun's life; but when Margaret, always remembering John and the gay world of which he is a part, attempting to keep up her connection with it, and thus with him, is discovered in the act of plucking her eyebrows she is sternly reprimanded by the Mother Superior, and is placed on a diet of bread and water. No one is allowed to talk to her; and when Margaret, in an effort to entertain herself and so give vent to her unrepressible sense of mischief and gaiety, is discovered playing jazz pieces on the church organ when she should have been practising hymns, she is temporarily expelled. Accompanied by the reproving and yet friendly stares of her nun teachers and priests, Margaret sadly takes her departure. However, when instead of being received with open arms by her folks, as she had expected, her mother subjects her, as punishment to a daily round of housework and chores, Margaret, resenting this and the fact that her letters to John are intercepted, is glad to return to the school; but unknown to her mother, she has secretly met John at a restaurant in town, and having learned that he is not in love with Mary Arden, a friend of hers, as had been rumored, makes him promise to correspond with her until she could concoct a definite plan of escape, upon his graduation from college.

Although she and her sister now attend more studiously to their educational and religious duties, and become more friendly with Sister Mercedes, the most coveted teacher-friend of the girls, their life is rendered irksome by news of the outside world—parties, dances, theaters—which they receive from John and his friend, Davis, the younger sister's friend. Finally at a party given in honor of some important eccelesiastical visitors, Margaret, highly praised for her work in the musical recital, becomes boisterous when the girls are granted a rare party by themselves in an adjoining room, and reads the amorous letters of the boys, to the crowd; and just as the pictures, which she had taken of their wild times together, are being eagerly gazed at by the girls, the Mother Superior and her guests, aroused by the noise, enter the room. Whereupon, the two girls, discovered as the culprits, by the confession of Lola, one of their enemies, are offered either a discarding of the robe or penance as their punishments. When they return home, Mrs. Lucas is relieved when they accept John's and Davis' offers of marriage; and their choice school friends are happy bridesmaids at the double wedding.

DOCTORS' PROBLEMS

George Pavlick File No. 8128

HAVING always envied his brother for the favoritism shown him both at school and home, Morton Jordan was glad to see Dick depart for medical school. On his way home with Kay, Dick's fiancee, Morton formulated his plan of revenge to involve her; for he was determined to thwart Dick's plan to marry her upon his graduation when he would set up his practise in his home town. As the years passed, Dick's correspondence with Kay fostered their friendship, but in the last year of his schooling the letters suddenly ceased; for Morton, who had been circulating gossip about Dick's living with other women, and of his expulsion from school for this reason, had influenced both her and the town against him. So that when Dick arrived for a visit, Kay not only refused to see him, but boasted of her engagement to Morton. However, when later, Kay discovered that Morton had made himself sole heir to his mother's property, although Dick was named as the other heir in the will, and that Morton had kept from her Dick's letters explaining the situation concocted by Morton, Kay went in search of Dick. In the meantime, Dick, in need of money, to set up practise, was not only refused aid by his brother, but was advised to invest the little money he had in some worthless stocks. While he was struggling along in town, inquiring in vain for Kay's whereabouts, his practice dwindled; for Morton had persuaded an older, more experienced doctor friend of his to set up a rival practise in the town. Finally, having lost every cent in the stocks, Dick wandered to another town to try his luck; but the information of his failure in his own town was published in the newspaper by the editor, a friend of Morton's, and Dick gave up in despair. When Kay returned to town, Morton, who had married a childhood sweetheart, failed to deliver the message of forgiveness and address which Dick had left with him. In the meantime, Dick, wandering dismally along the docks, met Mr. Pendleton, a former patient of his, who told him of a daughter of a friend of his, who although an incurable cripple, was still optimistic. Touched by the story, Dick resolved to cure her, and returned to his home to get his invention for this purpose, only to find that Morton, having realized its financial possibilities, had hidden it. But Kay, to whom he had explained matters satisfactorily, could learn nothing from either Morton or his wife.

Wishing to expose Diek's ignorance as a doctor to Kay and to the authorities at the hospital where Dick was working, Morton made plans to pretend to be seriously ill; and on his way to the hospital, was terribly crippled in an aceident. Only his wife's plcading forced him to reveal the hiding plaee of the invention, but he died before he could be assisted by its use. In the city with Kay, Dick not only effected the cure of the girl, but beeame famous and wealthy through his invention, and discovered through the girl, a dear friend of Morton's wife, of Morton's usurpation of his share of the family property. However, Dick generously forgave his brother by allowing his wife to keep the money; and was married to Kay as the cornerstone was being laid for the hospital erected in his name.

TOO MANY JOKERS

Ada Putnam Lanham File No. 8059

COMPLETELY nonplussed by the constant mischief of her two young daughters, Meta and Reta Moore. Mrs. Moore was relieved when the two boys whom the girls had met at their gala eighteenth birthday party, became serious in their intentions. Since the two girls looked exactly alike, and since the two boys were also identical twins, not only were other people constantly mistaking one for the other, but even the brides and grooms fell into this error. So that it was indeed disconcerting when Ted, who had come with his fiancee, Reta, to the fashionable dress establishment where Mrs. Moore and Meta were trying on trousseau clothes, found that his wife had been hurried away to a nearby dressing booth and forced out of her clothes before she could explain the mistake. Nor did the trouble abate when Meta kissed her sister's fiance in error, and when Mr. Kaller, thinking he was Ted, who had not come back to work after his lunch with Reta, had scolded Fred whom he had met in the street. So that they were all glad to follow Mrs. Moore's suggestion that they give each other some jewelry by which they might recognize each other. Thereupon, the girls' two lockets with their respective initials of M and R inscribed on them, were given as watch fobs to the young men in exchange for the latter's rings, a ruby for Reta and a sapphire for Meta. The showers and parties given in honor of their engagements were therefore distinguished by a procession of people pushing Meta or Reta aside, according to the one they had wished to speak with after looking at their rings, saying disgustedly "No, you're the other one." The confusion was eomplete when Fred, seeing one of the girls struggling to escape from the amorous attentions of Tom, a former beau, and thinking it his beloved Meta, immediately knocked the young man down.

Regaining their deviltry after their marriage, the girls decided to again befuddle their husbands by exehanging rings; but the girls trembled, overcome by the enormity of their deed, as the now exchanged husbands hustled them into their luxurious honeymoon suite prepared for them at a downtown hotel. Horrified, Reta stared at Fred as he prepared to undress, and sighing with relief as he trudged to the bathroom, she crossed to the door, to exchange places with Meta before the joke was carried too far, and before Fred came back. But the door flew open to admit a breathless Meta followed by a shoeless, exclamatory husband; noticing their husbands' skeptical nonchalance in spite of their babbling efforts to explain the situation, the girls began to sob in petulant frustration. The girls stared as the two boys embraced each other, as they laughed wildly; and finally, it was Ted who explained their joke on the girls; for, having overheard the girls planning the trick, they, in turn, had arranged to remain with their own wives; so that Reta, having discovered that she had been with her husband instead of Fred, had been embracing him at Meta's door, while Meta, thinking the man with Reta was her husband, according to their exchange, had also tried to embrace him. And so the joke ended in laughter and kisses generously given.

THE UNKNOWN SISTER

Reathes Straughter File No. 8094

DAVID and Ruth had met while playing tennis. It had been one of those whirlwind affairs. Dinner, the theater, and as their eyes met over the table in the night club later, David told Ruth of his love. He had a promising future, David informed her, was employed by an older woman who seemed to recognize his abilities and was helping him take his place as one of the leading figures in the field of advertising. "A woman?" Ruth had asked wistfully, and as David kissed away her misgivings she felt a great love well within her.

Shortly afterwards they were married. Ruth adored the strong handsome man who was her husband but as he called more and more frequently to tell her business was keeping him, vague, formless fears began to trouble Ruth. David had said his employer was a woman. Was it only business that kept them working overtime? David was shocked one night to find Ruth sobbing when he arrived. Holding her tightly he begged her to tell him what was wrong, and when he learned that his wife was jealous of Helen Walker, he laughed. If she ever met Helen, she'd understand how foolish she was, but when Ruth agreed finally to have Helen Walker and a eollege friend of David's over for bridge one night, she was not so satisfied that Helen was harmless. Some years older than Ruth, Helen had a mature fascination and an active intelleet which eommanded the dinner talk. Ruth noticed how Helen had started at secing her and attributing that to jealousy of David's wife, the young bride felt that she couldn't bear to watch David make a fool of himself over that woman, and she turned to James, David's fraternity brother, who was more than willing to hold her attention. Once Ruth looked over at David and Helen discussing some business problem and dancing with James she looked up with pretended interest while James whispered she was very beautiful.

Turning unhappily from the telephone over which David had just explained that he had to see an executive about a big contract, Ruth didn't believe his statement that Helen wouldn't be thcre. When the telephone rang and it was James, she accepted his invitation. All through the evening while James' eyes bored into hers, Ruth thought miserably about David probably out with Helen and scareely noticed that James was bringing her to a private dining room in a night club. But Helen, there with another friend, saw Ruth enter and when a few moments later she saw David enter with the executive who insisted that they close the contract in the gaiety of the night club opening, Helen broke in on Ruth and James in time to get the thoroughly frightened Ruth out of the plaee and claim it was she who had killed James to save her honor. Helen was freed by thc jury after a long legal battle and Ruth was the first to grasp the hand of the woman who had saved her marriage if not her life. Later alone with Ruth, Helen confessed that she was Ruth's sister who feared Ruth's hatred because she had left her mother to die unattended while she made her career in New York. And David who had always respected Helen as a good business woman put one arm about his wife and the other about his wife's sister, happy that there would be no more jealousy.

THE STIGMA

Leslie Miner File No. 8099

WHEN Stella Blake, daughter of one of Kentucky's most respected and feared farmers, appealed to Jess Preston, the sheriff of the town, to marry her, now that his treachery was revealed, he scorned her request. Fearing her husband's wrath, Mrs. Blake dispatched her daughter to a sister in Cincinnati. Even the ordeal of being a maid of all work in the home of her stern aunt, and her extreme poverty, could not comfort Stella for the loss of her child whom her aunt, in conspiracy with Jess, had sent to a Detroit home. Forced to give all her earnings to her aunt, Stella secretly saved her tips, received as a waitress in a fashionable restaurant, until she had the necessary carfare. Arrived at Detroit, Stella spent her time and money visiting homes and hospitals, without success. Lacking funds for food or rent, she walked the streets disconsolate, until the sight of a young man giving food to the birds in a park, concentrated her attention on her own hunger; and it was not long before the man and the staring girl became acquainted. After offering generous alms to a tramp who accosted him, Clayton, the young man, deplored the poverty of the world; so that in answer to his request that he accompany her home, the weeping Stella confessed her entire story, omitting the details of the child.

At the home of Mrs. Marlow, an old lady in whose boarding house Clayton had once lived, and now a self-constituted fostermother to Stella, Clayton's friendship with the latter flourished; and it was not long before the two were married. Happy in her marriage, Stella sensed frustration, however, in the sudden appearance of Jess at her home demanding acquiescence to his dishonorable wishes, and revelation of her past to Clayton should she refuse. Jess, whose many and often unwarranted killing of Kentucky farmers and their wives, as moonshiners, had earned a bad name for him, had fled to Detroit to find Stella and his son. Planting all the evidence which he, in his position of detective, had obtained against a notorious gang of bank thieves, upon the innocent Clayton, Jess brought the case against the latter to a speedy conviction of seven years imprisonment.

Although Stella continually corresponded with Clayton, her extreme loneliness,—now that she was cut off from her family—and the difficulty of obtaining a position because of her child, with its resulting lack of funds, forced her to regard Jess in a more favorable light when he visited her; and he was eager to take advantage of her reluctant consent when he offered himself in marriage. Hoping to glean some news of her other child's whereabouts from him, Stella patiently bore the brunt of Jess' drunkenness, his taunts against Clayton, and his beating of the boy. Discovering her writing letters to the governor, pleading for Clayton's pardon, the infuriated Jess beat her into insensibility one day. Overcome by her unhappiness, Stella, after informing him of her marriage with an explanation therefore, begged Clayton to make an attempt to escape from prison and save her. Overcome by her disloyalty, Clayton neglected to answer; and after his release, started for her home, seething with thoughts of revenge. Recognizing his son, however, at the schoolhouse, Clayton's bitterness turned to the idea of winning the boy over from his mother, whose conspiracy with Jess against him in the trial, he firmly believed in. Noticing her son's frequent absences from home, and his exhilaration when he returned, Stella followed him to his play haunts one day, only to be shocked by the sight of her strangely haggard husband. As young Clayton continued to bring home toys and whistles which his "new friend" made for his delight, Stella began to understand his plan, especially as the child's waning interest in her became more evident. In the midst of her carefully made plans to run away with the ehild, Jess, having learned through the child of the identity of his friend. threatened Clayton with death if she ever befriended him.

Her love for her former husband again coming to the fore, Stella decided to stay and warn Clayton; but Clayton, coming in the silence of the night to burn a brand of disgraee into Stella's face as his symbol of revenge, overheard the screams of young Clayton as he was being beaten by Jess, for seeing his "new friend"; and forgetting his mission, rushed to the room and beat Jess into uneonsciousness. Informing her that her treaehery and dishonor eried renunciation to her motherhood, Clayton fled with the child. Knowing of her parents' forgiveness, Stella returned to her Kentucky home a broken woman. But her love for Clayton was greater than ever when he appeared there one day with his son, who, in his terrible illness, had been erying eonstantly for his mother. Their reconciliation came immediately after the killing of Jess, who, having arrived in the town to find Stella, had been shot by a man he had once imprisoned. Mr. Blake, present at the seene, had learned from the dying man the whereabouts of Stella's first child, and of Jess' other wife and ehildren; so that his marriage to Stella was null. Her happiness was complete when at her wedding to Clayton, her long lost child presented himself as ring-bearer.

LONE BUTTE

Martin O. Luther File No. 8024

IT was there that the camping party found him—Joseph Malheur, who had fled from his poverty and continual business failures, to begin his life anew in the fertile Oregon land towards which thousands were flocking. Their entire supply of food having been stolen, the travelers, stopped in their march across the wilderness, to beg for sustenance. When other people in the caravan procession complained to him about similar treatment at the hands of some unknown thief, Joe, constituting himself road agent, set out to investigate. It was Clara, one of the pioneers, who pointed out the faint footsteps which led from Snake River at the embankments of which the caravans were stationed; and noticing Dan Olds, an old native, stealing by in his boat one evening on the river which he had rarely visited before, Joe quickly followed him to his eabin. Observing that Dan wore moccasins, Joe recalled Clara's opinion that the footprints were light enough to have been made by such shoes; and when he arrived at the cabin, his suspicions were fully realized by the old man's footgear and his evasions of his questions, and by a false wall at the side whieh carefully covered the stolen supplies. Accusing the protesting old man of thievery and eowardice, Joe forced him to load on a quickly improvised wagon the saddles, flour and other supplies he had stolen, and seated behind him thereon, prodded him to drive the contrivance to the camping place. When once during this fatal drive, the old man, after futile pleas, attempted to throw himself from the wagon, Joe, contemptuous of his treachery, would have shot him, had not his hand been stayed by a sudden thought of Clara's disapproval; for the girl's kindness in preparing his food and cleaning his shack daily while he searched the land, had somewhat softened the bitterness in him; in fact, at times, he had to turn his back and speak harshly to her in order to conceal the passion of his devotion; for he considered himself too old and uncouth for her pleasure.

So that, when, imbued with such thoughts, his ride was interrupted by another troupe of pioneers who had also been robbed by the old man, and now demanded his immediate hanging, Joe spoke up in fierce defense both for Dan's life as well as his own; for the men had taken him to be Dan's partner in crime. And when the old man, rudely kicked for verification of Joe's statements, confessed his own implication in the crime and exonerated Joe, the latter, at the point of guns, compelled the angry men, to leave the punishment of Dan in his hands since it was he who had discovered him and the supplies. When they returned to the cabin where the faithful Clara waited, Joe earned her everlasting love by magnanimously granting Dan his freedom, first extracting a promise from him that he would follow a straight path henceforth. As Joe gazed after the retreating back of the girl on her return to the camp, the tears came to his eyes as he realized his utter loneliness; for now that they had their supplies, her troupe would be leaving. Afraid that he might not be able to restrain himself from following her and shamelessly declaring his love, Joe decided to pack his things and leave the next morning; and it was in the act of stepping across his threshold for the last time that Clara came upon him. Asked from how many people he was running away, and replying "one", Clara accused him of cowardice in love, and embraced him. Delighted that his love had been returned, Joe asked her to marry him, and the answer was lost in a kiss.

THE GREAT YAWN

Fred Connor File No. 7991

STRAIGHTENING up from his still, young, lanky, shaggy-haired Sidney Sideburns looks down at his faithful hound dog, Tramp, and a slow lassitude seizes him as his mouth falls open into a prodigious yawn. Talking in a drawling voice to Tramp, Sidney manages to get out between yawns that they have just time enough to deliver a five gallon jug of fiery liquid for the party of Frances Faraday, the richest girl in Shanksville. The veteran Tramp prepares to nose his way through the quarter of a mile of swamp while Sidney, jug strapped to his back, follows on all fours, yawning pitifully.

An hour later, they make the clearing, climb into a ludicrous contraption, once a model T Ford, and chug into town. It is dark before they arrive and the Ford smacks into a long, highly polished limousine, grunts and comes to a halt. Just then Frances Faraday, arms loaded with packages, sees the damage done to her car, dashes up to the Ford and soundly berates Sidney who struggles unsuccessfully to keep back a yawn half out. He admits that he has done the damage then innocuously runs his words together as he explains that he is looking for one Frances Faraday. She looks puzzled until he explains he is delivering some "beverage", whereupon, hastily glancing around, she orders him to follow her, for Sidney's liquor, once tasted at a party, is sumpin' grand, and the success of her party depends upon it. Since it is already quite late, she dashes off, while Sidney, stopping to yawn finds he has a considerable handicap. Jerking Lizzie he is off and in a fury of motion he passes periously close to the feet of the village cop, runs down the traffic signal and yawns maddeningly. The furious cop is only pacified when Sidney points to the huge car ahead and explains between yawns that he is Miss Faraday's fiance. Before the startled officer ean do more, Sidney is off again, and not until he has driven his car into the driveway and smack into Frances' car, does he stop.

Inside the party has started and Frances motions for him to bring in the jug, but the door slams in Sidney's face as he stops to yawn and a grandly uniformed army officer takes his breath away until he announces he is the butler. Shoving the jug into the majordomo's arms and almost knocking the portly fellow over, Sidney starts walking toward the ballroom, and yawns in amazement as Miss Faraday thrusts him out advising him sympathetically to get some sleep. Murmuring that it does him no good, Sidney curls up in the limousine since his own car looks like a folded accordion and some hours later awakes with a yawn and staggers up the stairs followed by Tramp.

Wandering across the polished floor followed by Tramp, Sidney causes a sensation among the scandalized and tipsy dowagers and fossils, and walking up to Frances Sidney demands payment for the liquor. Instantly there is a mad outcry and five and ten dollar bills are waved at the man of the hour for the liquor has been generally pronounced the best yet. The yawning bootlegger is hoisted to the shoulders of the crowd and Frances, seeing a grand opportunity to create a sensation, announces Sidney as her fiance. Caught off-guard, he yawns eloquently and Tramp rests one paw at the side of the jug and opens his mouth in a passable imitation of his master's most common expression.

TOO MANY WIVES

Lottie Watkins File No. 7980

BIDDING his wife goodbye, Joseph Lindsay loads his truck with farm products and goes to town to sell his produce. At the back door of a wealthy home, Joseph interferes with the love making of the master and an unwilling new maid, and ruefully feels himself responsible when the girl is fired. Waiting for the pretty Catherine, Joseph discovers that she is entirely friendless, and touched, he procures a room for her and presses a large part of his proceeds into her hand. Overwhelmed with gratitude, Catherine throws her arms about Joseph who wavers for a moment, then presses a kiss upon her waiting lips.

When, a few months later, Catherine confesses she is soon to be a mother, Joseph is distressed. Knowing that Joseph has a wife, Catherine takes the name of Mrs. Burke, finds a new apartment for which Joseph pays, and successfully convinces her neighbors that she is a young widow. Joseph still calls occasionally to give Catherine money, and the girl still adores him. However, she tells her child, Rudolph, that his father was a very brave aviator killed on duty. And little Rudolph naively prattles to Joseph that his father must have been much the same sort of person as he.

Catherine is killed saving Joseph's child, Rose, from the path of a truck, and Mrs. Lindsay, weeping at the tragedy insists upon adopting Catherine's child. Dismayed by the new turn of events, Joseph, who has always been fond of the little serving girl who loved him so greatly, tries to make other arrangements and almost quarrels with his wife for the first time since they have been married over little Rudolph, finally agreeing to send the child to a fashionable school. However, when Rudolph comes home for a few weeks before going on to college, he feels a great affection for Rose. Joseph, feeling a premonitory uneasiness, advises Rose that Rudolph is not her type, but, when the girl falls in love with the son of the man whose attentions forced on his serving girl had precipitated the affair of Joseph and Catherine, she, in turn, is considered inferior. Broken by the disastrous outcome of her love, Rose writes to Rudolph who comforts her and when he tells her of his love, she feels that she ought to devote her life to making Rudolph happy since happiness is not for her without Harvey.

Meanwhile, however, Harvey turns from his father and declares that he will marry Rose because he loves her. However, when he arrives at the Lindsay home he discovers that Rose has eloped. Joseph, discovering Rose's note almost faints and together with Harvey rushes out to try to stop the marriage of his two children. Rose has been regretting her action, exceedingly, but is too proud to say anything, and the hope which has risen as clergyman after clergyman refuses to marry the eloping youngsters, perishes when a shifty-eyed fellow unites them in marriage. Minutes later Joseph arrives and agonizedly informs the youngsters of their relationship. However, Harvey recognizes the clergyman as an old associate of his father and forces him to confess that he is not really a minister of the Gospel but a fraud, racketeering in quick marriages. Joseph has been punished sufficiently by his mental anguish, and Rudolph manfully conquers his own feelings and wishes Rose and Harvey every happiness.

BOY OF MINE

WORKING desperately hard to support her aged mother, Jenny Lee is utterly discouraged and the proposal of her employer, an eminent attorney, years older than she, that she marry him and cease worrying about finances comes as a distinct surprise. Although she is frank in her admission that she does not love him, Edward is certain that he can teach her to love him through the intensity of his own feelings. Married, Jenny finds that here is nothing Edward considers too good for her. The first year is spent in an orgy of shopping, of theaters, of the realization of all those dreams which had always seemed unattainable, and blossoming into a new loveliness, Jenny finds admiration is her portion from her husband's associates.

The comfort and peace of their home is further increased by the birth of a son, Tommy, whose dimpled chubbiness brings a new happiness to them. But, flattered by the idlers she meets, Jenny's head is turned and when Edward whose practice has grown in proportion to his ability is forced to spend longer hours at the office, Jenny feels neglected. She accepts Edward's suggestions that she go out with her friends and that he will join her later, and when Edward arrives, tired from the strain of his legal work, Jenny mentally compares him to the more youthful Walter, her latest admirer and is susceptible to Walter's unspoken insinuations that Jenny has wasted her youth on a man already old. However, she cannot fail to be conscious of Edward's constant consideration and when the war breaks out, Walter leaves for the front and Edward is exempted because of his family and his age. Two years pass and when Walter comes back handsome in his uniform, Jenny feels a reawakening of all her little doubts. Flattered by Walter's continued regard, she succumbs to his half-drunken suggestion that she leave her husband.

When Jenny tells Edward she is through, he looks at her gravely, then hiding his hurt, tells her that he promised her when she married him that if at any time she wanted to terminate their marriage he would not interfere. Touched in spite of herself, Jenny almost changes her mind but the thought of Walter, handsome and young, makes her go through with the divorce and she even gives up Tommy to Edward.

However, her first shock comes when she learns that Walter has never intended to marry her. Bitterly Jenny surveys her burned bridges and Walter, at first attentive, grows annoyed at her constant longing for her child. One day Jenny discovers letters written to Walter by another woman and he tells her she has no right to object—she is not his wife.

Brokenly Jenny leaves and engages an apartment close to her former home so that she may catch glimpses of her boy. She hears Tommy ask his father why his mother doesn't come home, and as Edward musingly plays their favorite song, Jenny sings it. Rushing out to her, Edward and Tommy pull her into the house and with eyes glistening with unshed tears Jenny promises that this time she is here to stay.

THE LIMITED SCHEDULE

THE aristocratic Berkeleys from Chicago, arriving for their vacation at the famous 5-S ranch resort are overwhelmed by the garrulity of Bill Stewart, the manager, who welcomes them at the station. When the dandified Berkeley Jr. informs him that he knows nothing of horses or "bronco-busting," Bill, joining his cowboys in laughter, tells them the story of Percival, as they sit around the dinner table that evening. The boys had immediately disliked Percival Jerold MacLoid, who lung-sick, had come for a rest; for his affected English accent and fastidious ways jarred on them. So that when he attempted to tell stories of his prowess as a business man in the city, or gave advice to the boys, they drowned him out in loud speaking or whistling; but he accepted their tricks of putting a calf in his bed at night, or their wetting his clothes in the morning, good-naturedly, a fact which branded him as a coward to the men who were trying to pick a fight with him. Finally, when Percival began his horseback trips from the ranch with Claire Waller, a visitor with whom he was in love, everyone at the ranch was glad to be rid of the nuisance.

At last, after even Buck Austin's attempt to arouse Percival's ire by making love to Claire, had failed, the rodeo came to the ranch. Dressed in their best, cowboys from this and neighboring ranches came to participate in the play with calves, bulls, and wild horses, dangerous as these were to handle. Accepting the razzing which greeted him when he arrived in his gaudily expensive, too large cowboy outfit which one of the cowboys had urged him to buy, Percival took his seat next to Claire; and cheered lustily with the others as he coughed his way through a black cigar which Tom, Buck's friend, had handed him. However, the attention of the audience turned from him to Buck in the ring, where, having roped one of the wildest of the horses, he was trying in vain to ride him. Knowing Buck's prowess as a rider, and knowing nothing of Percival's past, everyone ignored and then jeered when Percival excitedly asked to be allowed to ride the horse; but finally, screaming that he would bet a hundred dollars that he could, he forced them to listen to him. Remembering Buck's insult to Claire, to whom he had been secretly married at the time, Percival announced that he would outstay Buck's ride in the saddle by twelve jumps; and only Bill, not wishing to have his visitor deprived of his money, when everyone had placed their bets on Buck, protested. But although Percival had turned white at the last minute, this pity, and a kiss from Claire, urged him into the ring. After his remarkable twelve jump ride, Percival had to fight Tom who angrily accused him of having planned the whole thing, and so get their money. Everyone cheered as Percival, quick and well aimed in his boxing, soon overcame his lumbering opponent.

Then Percival told his story,—of his boyhood ranch training, and of his plan to break down the contempt of cowboys for the accomplishments of city men, by pretending to be the worst of their type; and after Tom and the others had shaken his hand, Percival announced his marriage, to the accompaniment of cheers and happy laughter.

LOVE ETERNAL

Celsa Martinez File No. 8073

WIDELY noted among her people for her goodness and piety, Helga is one of the women carried off in a Pagan raid. Huddled desperately together in the fort, the captive women await their fate and only the calmness and faith of the lovely Helga keeps them from shrieking ineffectually against the cruelty of their lot. At length the day comes when the Christian women are sold at auction to the highest bidder. Ribaldry and jest rule among the Pagans as each of the captives is forced upon the auction block but when Helga, glorious in her statuelike tranquility mounts the platform, a sudden hush comes over the mob. Even the raucous tones of the auctioneer take on a softer note and instead of blatantly listing the girl's charms, he quietly starts the bidding. Rangil, an overlord, with a gloating look bids, "Twenty thousand rupees!" Dead silence follows the incredible bid and all those men who were silently estimating how much they dared bid waited in aggrieved respect. Suddenly a voice raised the bid to "Fifty thousand rupees!" Rangil glared, raised it to "Sixty!" "Seventy-five," said the voice. "Eighty!" The incredible bid slashed the air, but the voice inexorably answered, "One hundred." Rangil fell back, and as the crowd parted, Hector, a Pagan captain, took his prize.

Where before, Helga had been beaten, now Hector looked upon her and suddenly his hands fell to his sides. He couldn't harm her. The Christian girl was given the freedom of Hector's castle, but daily she wandered to a little altar she had made in the woods. Once Hector found her kneeling there and he begged her to give up her God, embrace the Pagan faith, and then he could make her his bride. Then would his people accept her. But although love for her gentle captor throbbed in Helga's heart, she would not renounce her God. Many times Hector tried to persuade her until at length, seeing her again before her altar, he kissed her gently and as she explained that love such as theirs could only be made by God, he believed. Kissing away her tears, Hector vowed to love Helga eternally and embrace the Christian God of Love.

But when the Pagans learned of Hector's conversion and his wish to marry Helga, they grew terrible in their anger, and accusing her of being a witch, they took her to a dungeon and told Hector that Helga had run off with an accursed Christian. At first Hector was like one possessed but at length he kneeled before Helga's altar and prayed that some day she might return so he could make her his wife.

In her dungeon, Helga was cruelly beaten by the woman who brought her bread and water and as she fell, a bright light glowed about her. Frightened, the woman summoned help and in response to her screams, a great crowd came running, and among them—Hector. As they stopped in wonder before the beautiful splendor around the kneeling girl, one by one the Pagans fell to their knees. Hector was the first to speak. "Her God is near," he said. "He has protected his child from the harm that you would do her." So saying he kneeled beside Helga, and the crowd, bowing their heads murmured, "God is good."

THE LOVE CYNIC

Frank Lebron File No. 8157

VERY much in love with Helen Morton, Mark Leland rebukes his friend, Hale Woodley for hinting at her gold-digging proclivities. However, as the years of his married life go on, and as Helen continues to demand automobiles, jewels, expensive clothes, and finally ten thousand dollars which she says she needs to cover her stock, Mark is overwhelmed at Hale's intuition, not knowing that in the past, Helen had once spurned Hale's love because he was a poor man. When at last, Mark finds himself penniless and is compelled to auction off all his possessions, Helen not only refuses her sympathy, but leaves him in spite of his pleas. Paid by Helen the ten thousand dollars for not publishing abroad the story of her notorious past, Hale hands it on to Mark who comes to him for advice on his emotional and financial difficulties. Leaving the house, Mark sees Helen entering the cab with another man, and realizing that he still loves her and will be too lonely without her, Mark tries to commit suicide, but is prevented by Hale who comes rushing down.

Fearful lest his friend become a complete cynic, and noticing how women shy away from the caustic Mark at parties, Hale suggests that he take a short vacation away from the city. While he is supervising the packing, Hale in his anxiety to destroy everything that has belonged to Helen, does not see Mark hide a picture of her in his valise. Arrived in San Francisco, Mark squanders his money and time away in the many cafes, and soon becomes known for his hatred of women and his distrust of their motives. Meeting Helen at one of the cafes where she is an entertainer, Mark's love again flares up, but when he is repulsed in his efforts to make love to her, he tries to shoot her; and when the proprietor of the place, her husband, threatens Mark with hurt, the latter tells him of her past. So that her second husband, having found her constant demands for money a burden, is relieved at his freedom and spurns her in spite of her pleas.

Learning from a frequenter of the cafe that Mark is again a rich man, Helen again turns her wiles upon him, and consents to live with him; but soon leaves him for wealthier prey when his funds are exhausted. Ill and disillusioned, Mark is just about to follow her, when Hale, arriving with his new wife and her friend, Evelyn, to search for his friend, discovers him in this state. In conversation with her second husband, Hale discovers Helen's scheme of relieving many wealthy married men of their money by compromising them and then demanding blackmail money. Just as Hale arrives at the cafe to inform Mark of this, he hears screams from a private room, and discovers Mark trying to force himself upon Evelyn in spite of the fact that she has confessed her genuine love for him, regardless of his pecuniary failure. Mark laughs wildly as Hale rescues the girl and declares his intention of serving all women in this way. Discovering Helen's past from Hale, and a letter from her telling him that his wealth is based on her money. Therefore, disgusted both with Helen and Hale, Mark secretly leaves the train one night; but finds renewed hope in Evelyn who follows him and finally shares his poverty with him as his wife. When their first child is born, Mark sends a forgiving letter to Hale inviting him to the home.

THE KING FORGIVES

Constantine Cornaros File No. 8168

SEEING the Princess Ideal as she reviewed the army of which he was an officer, Harold felt his love for her was hopeless for he was but the son of the King's gardener. Despairingly he sang a song of love beneath the Princess' window and the King, angered by the dreamy expression in his daughter's eyes, determined to seize the mysterious singer. Vain, however, were the guards he stationed in the garden and vain was his ruse to capture the culprit by offering prizes to the best voice during a great festival.

While Harold was at camp with his troops, his father became ill and the King wishing to show his democratic attitude toward his faithful gardener pompously visited with his daughter, seeing to it that his whole kingdom learned of his graciousness. However, the Princess, genuinely concerned, accidentally found some verses and a painting Harold had made of her and realized she had found her night singer. When Harold, urged by the Princess who contrived to send for him, openly sued for her hand, however, he was immediately exiled. Before he left the country he won a tournament to the further fury of the King and had one last meeting with the Princess who gave him her ring as a token of love.

With Harold out of the way, the King attempted to marry off his daughter to Herbert, a neighboring Prince and discovering the indomitability of his daughter's will, the King had her confined to a dungeon while Herbert, unable to get her any other way, treacherously joined forces with a warring Emperor. Battle after battle raged and the manhood of the country fell before the hewing swords of the enemy. Meanwhile Harold, from his place of exile learned of the plight of his country and obtaining two liquids, one to dye his face black and another to restore his color, came to the aid of his King who had been deserted by his followers when too hard pressed. Mowing down the enemy, Harold struck terror in the hearts of the superstitious who felt that the slaughter was the work of a black demon. At length the Black Knight himself answered the challenge issued by the over-confident Herbert, and in single combat the two warriors fought all day and at sunset both fell from their horses; but only the Black Knight lived. For his reward, the Black Knight requested the Princess Ideal and when the King admitted him to the girl's dungeon, Harold showed her the ring and told her he had taken it from a man he killed and as the girl despairingly longed for death, Harold applied his restoring fluid and stood before her as her own beloved.

Proceeding with the ceremony as the Black Knight, Harold watched the anguish of the King at the thought of marrying his daughter to a negro, but just before the ceremony was completed, Harold again applied his restorer and before the astonished guests stood revealed as the handsome Harold and with the happy pardon of the King, pressed his lips to his fair bride.

THE MAN WITH THE SQUEAKY VOICE

T. L. Friar File No. 8044

FOR the first time in months, Thomas Gordon finds himself a free man on a Monday afternoon; for the hardware store where he had clerked, having gone bankrupt, he is now sans a job and money on his way to his boarding-house. Knowing that he is longing for his mother who had died recently, and brooding over the mysterious absence of his step-father, Mr. Wilson, and the disappearance of the money his mother had left him in her will, Mrs. Muller, owner of the boarding house, to cheer the boy, urges him to lunch with her daughter, Marian, in their spacious kitchen. When Marian, whom Thomas loves, tells him of the sudden glimpse she had had of Mr. Wilson near the restaurant of Antonio, Thomas's friend, the latter understands the cringing look in the girl's eye,—for Wilson had tried again and again to force his attentions on the girl (since he knows of the handsome gift of money which goes with her marriage). Remembering that Antonio owes him ten dollars Thomas, refusing the pecuniary aid offered him by Mrs. Muller, departs to collect and conduct his own investigation.

Entering the restaurant, Thomas, still engrossed in reading the news of the bank robbery wherein the two bandits, one squeaky-voiced, the other, tall, had escaped with much money after killing the cashier, Thomas collides with someone; and glancing up to apologize, finds himself face to face with his dismayed step-father, who hastily turns away. Noticing his entrance at Antonio's restaurant, Thomas waits outside. Just as Thomas reaches the dark alley where Mr. Wilson lives, screams are heard from a nearby house; and as the high-pitched voice of a raging man is heard, Mr. Wilson, after looking furtively around, rushes upstairs where the woman's cries of "to think my own husband would bring such a brute here," are heard. Climbing up to the nearest window, Thomas, overhearing the conversation of two men who are planning to divide some spoils when Mr. Wilson leaves, is about to call the police when a woman's shoe, thrown at him from above, attracts his attention thence.

Seeing Marian at the window, Thomas begins his upward climb at her pantomimed suggestion. Entering the room just as Mrs. Wilson,—for that is the woman—is bringing some food to the girl whose identity she knows nothing of, Thomas easily wins her over when he tells her of Mr. Wilson's attentions to Marian. Realizing that this is the reason for her husband's attempt to coerce her into granting him a divorce, Mrs. Wilson hides Thomas as Wilson enters the room. Telling the girl to get her things, Wilson leaves to get a taxi, but overhearing the conspiracy of his fellow bandits against him, stays to hold them up and so obtain the entire loot. However, while Mrs. Wilson has gone to call the police, Thomas, followed by Marian, with the revolver they have taken from the squeaky-voiced man whom they have overpowered in his position as guard outside Marian's door, overpower the entire group. When the police arrive, their capture is complete, and while Mrs. Wilson is assured of half of the reward offered for the taking of the bandits, Thomas offers his love and his share of the reward to Marian, which she accepts with a kiss.

TIES THAT BIND

AT last free of the orphanage where she has spent her hard-working childhood as a dish-washer, cook, and nurse, Jane Moran gazes happily out of the train window wondering what awaits her at her aunt's home in Chicago. When a man stumbling along the aisle, takes her purse from the seat Jane, running after him, is pushed roughly aside; but regaining it through the timely intervention of a young man who had seen the deed, Jane turns to thank her benefactor, and is delighted to see John Danielson, an inmate of the same orphan asylum where she had been reared. One of the trustees Mr. Donald, a detective by profession, having offered John a position with a friend of his, Paul Andrews, as bookkeeper, John is on his way to accept it; the two therefore decide to see each other often. When Mina obtains a position as salesgirl in a nearby department store, the friendship flourishes over lunch tables, at theaters, and visits at her aunt's home. Remembering that Mina's unmarried mother, before she died, had revealed the identity and high standing of the man, Mrs. Moran visits the orphanage to discover further information from their records; and her conversation with Mr. Donald prompts him to leave for Chicago on an investigating trip of his own. Arrived there, Paul informs him that he suspects John of taking money from the firm by changing the books, and hires Donald as detective. Lunching one day with John, Donald notices the frown which passes across his face as Paul and Jane pass by; and later in the office, overhears the quarrel wherein John warns Paul to leave Jane alone. At a party given the next evening, so incensed is John at Paul's attentions to Jane that in the heated argument that ensues, Paul leaves the house in a huff, and Jane, throwing her engagement ring at him, follows him. Regretting his action, John is just about to telephone for her forgiveness the next day, but is dissuaded by Paul's secretary, Mina, who is in love with John. Anxious to bring about a reconciliation for she still loves John, Jane goes to his home for this purpose, but finding Mina, who has dropped in for a moment's visit there, stalks out angrily. In the meantime, Paul, informing Donald that John is planning to escape, urges the former to stop him from leaving with the stolen money.

At Jane's house, where he has been told John is visiting, Donald asks for him; and while waiting for him in the anteroom, sees the pictures and documents which the aunt has received from the orphan asylum and realizes that he is the boy's father, the girl having been born in her mother's first marriage. When John, who has just been definitely refused by Jane, despondently leaves the room, he finds Donald strangely agitated; and just as Donald is about to tell him the news of his brotherhood relationship to Jane, Mina bursts in with the information that Paul has been robbing his own firm to get John into prison and thus prejudice Jane against him. As Jane weepingly runs to him, Paul, waiting downstairs with policemen, confesses and begs for another chance. Loving Mina for her loyalty, John tells her of his love after he embraces Jane, his sister; and the two couples are happily married after Paul's return from his short prison term.

RIGHTFUL PROPERTY

HUDDLED together in the house wherein they had been so happy, mother and son look at each other with tear-dimmed eyes. The sudden death of her husband has left Mrs. Tetley, a carefree young woman with the responsibility of keeping up the family home and supporting little Jimmy. Having no conception of money values, Mrs. Tetley readily mortgages her home to Mr. Reid, one of the townspeople who pretends to be her friend in her time of distress. She makes some futile atempts to earn money, but having always had everything she wanted, she is totally unfitted for business and soon, Reid's demand that she pay interest on the money loaned her or forfeit her home, drive her to desperation. Jimmy is too young to be helpful, but in her extremity, Mrs. Tetley confides her worries to the little fellow. She makes desperate attempts to locate her brother whom she has not seen for fifteen years, but has no idea where to turn. Meanwhile, Reid cruelly presses her, realizing that by foreclosing he can get possession of the house which has increased in value. In a last attempt to raise the necessary money, the delicate Mrs. Tetley overworks in a factory and sews through the night. A few weeks of this breaks down her health and after a brief spell of pneumonia she goes to join her husband. Grief-stricken little Jimmy watches Mr. Reid figuratively swoop down on his house, and young as he is he realizes that Reid has taken advantage of them and sent his mother to an early grave. The child is sent to an orphan asylum and grows up nursing his grievance. Some years later, Ken Matthews, attorney at law, comes to town in search of his sister. After a long search he learns that she and her husband have died and their son is in an orphan asylum. Shocked, he comes to adopt his nephew and an immediate liking is kindled between Jimmy and his uncle who has led an adventurous existence before settling down to the practice of law. Ken sends Jimmy through college and later, in response to Jimmy's keen interest in law, through legal studies. Although he has long since found out that according to law, Mr. Reid can not be forced to give back the property he has practically taken from the widow, Jimmy discovers that his uncle's secretary is the daughter of Charles Reid. In his desire to hurt the man he holds accountable for his mother's death, Jimmy decides to strike through his daughter. Thereupon he begins evincing a great interest in Lila Reid. Taking her to dinners and shows he succeeds in making her fall in love with him although at the same time he does not realize that he is falling in love, himself. Many times he tries to get her to talk about her father but she refuses. And then, one day, he discovers the legal loophole he has been waiting for. In drawing up the foreclosure, Reid had slipped up, and Jimmy reopens the case and in a brilliant forensic proceeding, wins back his house, interest thereon, and by so doing, he takes every penny Reid has left. Triumphantly he marches out of the courtroom aware of Lila's hurt reproach. But his uncle points out to him what a fool he has been, and humbly he goes back to Lila, tells her he loves her and restores everything save the house itself to her father, suddenly realizing as he holds Lila close, that hate vanishes before love.

SMALL PRICE

CELEBRATING his recent inheritance of a sizable fortune, detective Bob Reynolds leans back in his seat at the Frailty night club and covertly admires the beauty of Nell Waters as she indifferently receives the adulation of Joe Powell, a power in the underworld. A few nights later he hears a noise in his room, and switching on the light, is astonished to find the same girl rifling his safe. Covering her with his gun, he is puzzled by her resigned waiting to be turned over to the police. In conversation with her Bob's interest mounts, and he tries to persuade her to give up her lawless existence. He sees that he has convinced her, and he releases her excited over her promise to meet him the next day. However, Nell, thinking it over, has too much regard for Bob to involve him with Joe Powell, as she surely must if she allows him to suspect she loves Bob, and she fails to keep the appointment.

Bob waits for hours before he finally convinces himself that Nell has played him for a sap, and his friend Frank More tries to console him. Meanwhile the police have been trying unsuccessfully to pin something on Joe Powell, but although they know he is the brains behind the rackets, they cannot find sufficient evidence to convict him. Bob, in love with Nell, spends his evenings at the Frailty club in the hope of seeing Nell again, and one night his patience is rewarded. She is with Joe Powell, however, and when he greets her, fearful of consequences, she snubs him. Later, making her excuses, she starts home, alone. Bob follows and when she refuses to speak to him, he flashes his badge and tells her she is under arrest. Joe Powell comes out belligerently, but Bob explains he is arresting the young lady for a robbery and if Mr. Powell has any argument, Bob would be happy to bring him before a judge. Powell disappears, and Nell, believing that Bob no longer loves her, and being perfectly well able to understand why, accompanies him silently and is put behind bars.

However, she learns that Bob is going to guard the mail train from Washington, and knowing that Joe's gang is planning a hold-up, she cries out in warning. Begging him not to go she refuses to divulge her reasons, but Bob can guess. Knowing, moreover, that if Powell's gang finds out that Nell has given them away, she will be killed even in prison, he preserves his hard attitude toward her although he longs to take her in his arms. Powell comes to see Nell but leaves convinced that she is not on the side of the police.

The night of the train robbery, Powell, deciding the country is getting too hot for him, decides to escape with the loot, double crossing his gang. Accordingly, for the first time he takes a hand, and boarding the train, he mows down the resisting engineer with a machine gun, and escapes in his car to a shack. However, a few minutes later the door bursts open and in walks Bob Reynolds who makes his capture. When Powell has been convicted of robbery and murder, Bob pays Nell's fine, explains that he had to put her in jail to insure her safety, and then asks her to become his wife. A day later, Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds leave for an extended honeymoon in Hawaii.

LILLY WELCH

W. S. Wallen File No. 7977

KNOCKING at the door of John Welch's cabin, Everett Carlisle introduced himself as the foreman of the company that had taken over the timber concession. Graciously, Uncle John ushered the man in, offered him the hospitality his home afforded and introduced him to his wife and his Lilly. John Welch had never yet denied his board to a stranger, but intercepting the electric current that spanned the distance between Lilly and Everett, he grew thoughtful. Strange that he had never thought of Lilly growing up. He had scarcely given any consideration to that maturing young beauty of hers which the stranger found so compelling. But if Everett loved his Lilly, John found himself thinking as the two young people began seeing each other, walking alone through the fragrant forests, he guessed it would be all right. Everett seemed to be a fine young man, courteous and wholesome. Uncle John Welch was a good judge of men.

Then Uncle John learned that Everett was the son of the owner of the timber interests. It had never before occurred to him that Everett might think himself too good for Lilly. Now like a bombshell the thought struck him. That night when Everett came, Uncle John called him aside and warned him that he was turning Lilly's head, that it wasn't fair, and Everett who had been troubled by the thought of his family's reception of Lilly, gripped Uncle John's hand. No heroics, no dramatics, just a simple statement!

And then Everett's friends came, in long roadsters. It was a great lark. A lumber camp! What an idea for a party! For days Everett had scarcely time to see Lilly, caught up in the gay whirl. Flasks were brought out, high heels twinkled fantastically over gnarled tree trunks. Alone Everett wondered if he had been captivated by the novelty of backwood's life, only. That Saturday, the city folk gave a dance. It was an inspiration, they proclaimed—a backwood's dance. At home, Uncle John and Aunt Lindy watched Lilly miserably going about her duties. She had seen Madge Craydon, one of Everett's friends place her hand possessively on Everett's arm. But the night of the dance Everett stood it as long as he could, watched his friends burlesque the doings in the timber camp. Clever, yes, but unkind. But it wasn't until Madge drew a checked table cloth about her and folded her hands angelically, that Everett realized they were roaring at Madge's imitation of Lilly. Rushing away, he ran to Lilly's home and asked her to marry him. Lilly drew away a little, asked him what of his parents, but Everett said it didn't matter. He loved her and he had been fool enough to risk losing her.

Uncle John gripped Everett's hand hard when Everett took Lilly, his wife, to meet his parents, and when they refused to welcome her, Everett's face went white and without a word he left the house of his parents and took Lilly back to the lumber camp. There, together they would find happiness. And they did.

EMPLOYMENT BUREAU

Evelyn Armour File No. 8016

"I Was employed as a personal maid, not as a dish washer, cook, and errand girl," Mrs. Morton, kindly owner of the employment bureau is thus greeted one morning by Florence who wants another position; so that when Mr. Bunty, a prosperous, elderly gentleman, enters, asking for a companion for his nervous wife, Florence is glad to accept. At the house, he warns her to keep his wife from speaking of, or visiting Genevieve, his young ward who lives with them, and whose welfare causes her undue worry. Fearing her husband's designs upon the girl's fortune, Mrs. Bunty sends Florence to the ageney to obtain a personal maid for Genevieve, so that through her she may know of Mr. Bunty's behavior towards the girl. At the agency, Florence meets her friend, Violet, who is happy to get the position; and it is only she who, like Genevieve, too, notices the peculiar ticking in her room at night. Julian Davey, a young man who is applying for a position as chemist at a nearby hospital, discovering that Mrs. Morton knows Genevieve through the many positions she has furnished her, discusses his fiancee with her, only to learn that all of her employers, though satisfied with her work, have privately complained to Mrs. Morton about the girl's queer fear of persecution, and her excessively timid, almost sneaky ways in the office; and when Diana, Julian's sister enters to thank Mrs. Morton for the position of secretary to a lawyer Bronson, she tells them of a conversation on the same theme she had overheard between Clarice, through Mrs. Morton's grace, now a maid in the home of Major Jennings, and the chauffeur, when Genevieve and she had visited Mr. Bunty's best friend, the Major, one evening. Questioned by Julian, Genevieve confesses that she is afraid to commit herself, for he too may think her queer since the noises are never present during the day. Promising to assist her, in spite of his work at the hospital, Julian, through Mrs. Morton, hires a Mr. Dennis to investigate matters for him at the house. When Violet, in love with him, confides her suspicions to him, he telephones Mrs. Morton to send him a young lawyer; and Charles Waring, the young man sent, upon reading over the papers which Diana has discovered in the office of her employer, Mr. Bunty's lawyer, discovers that Mr. Bunty is to be the heir of Genevieve's fortune in the event of her death or her insanity, but that all of it is Genevieve's in case she marries.

Jack Monte, a young restaurant owner, visiting his fiancee, Margaret, whom Mrs. Morton has just placed at Mr. Bunty's home as a governess to his young niece, learns of the sudden disappearance of Violet and promises to notify Mrs. Morton of this. While he is calling her, Charles Waring, coming to have a talk with Genevieve, discovers that Kitty, Violet's substitute, is his long lost wife who, in an attack of amnesia, had left home; and they embrace when she recognizes him again. Kitty tells him of Mr. Bunty's unusual hostility to Julian, and suggests that Mr. Bunty be gotten out of the house before any investigation is made, especially since Genevieve becomes so weepingly ill when she sees him. Thereupon, they call Mrs. Morton who sends a Mr. Koler, who, pretending to represent Lawyer Bronson, is to take him away on business. By this time, Genevieve is very ill, and hearing constantly the ticking in her brain, weeps inconsolably. At Julian's suggestion, Mrs. Morton sends a doctor who has called the office for a technician, to Genevieve; and no sooner is she told of her sanity, and no sooner is the ticking machine discovered which Mr. Bunty placed there for the night only, in one of the panels in her room, then she becomes well. Florence, who has been discharged because she is to become the mother of Mr. Bunty's child, and who fears his knowledge of her prison past, is discovered by Violet, who threatened with death by Mr. Bunty for her knowledge of the will, had fled one night. Their testimony convicts Mr. Bunty; and Mrs. Morton arrives to congratulate Julian and Genevieve on their approaching marriage, and to inquire if they would want a maid.

THE RIGHT LETTER

Mae McNally File No. 8025

NAN MORAN climbed easily up the hill which led to the boarding house where she and her mother had lived so happily ever since her father had been killed in the mine two years before. Miners on their way home from work hailed her jovially, several miner's wives nodded pleasantly to her, and two children waved to her as she passed; but Jack Ralston, her companion in age and in play, she greeted with most affectionate effusion when she met him on the steps of her home. However, she was in tears when he returned after supper, for Mrs. Moran had told her that she was to leave immediately for a boarding school in Denver, since she was fast outgrowing the very simple education which she could obtain in the town. Comforted by Jack that he would love her the more for her bettered education, and that they would write to each other often, Nan boarded the train with her mother in happier spirits. At the school, her quiet beauty, conscientious work, and good sportsmanship soon won her many friends; and when she returned home for the Christmas holidays, her happiness was complete when Jack met her at the train. At the party given in her honor, she proudly displayed the engagement ring which Jack had given her with promises of love and loyalty everlasting, in spite of time and distance.

After the rush of shopping for new frocks and accessories, Nan, accompanied by Jack, returned to Denver. When Jack arrived home late that night, he found a telegram informing him of his father's serious illness. At his arrival, the old man began to slowly recuperate, and in a last minute assertion of his will power, before he died, forced a promise from Jack that he would marry Estelle Mortimer, a daughter of a life-long friend. Overcome by this promise and by the pleadings of his mother in favor of this profitable marriage with a girl of his own set, Jack sent his cousin, Brian, to take his place at the mine which he had been supervising, and to give his letter of explanation to Nan. Accusing his cousin of cowardice, Brian left on his mission, but it was a long time before he had the courage to give Nan the letter; and she was inconsolable when she received it, refusing to return to school or see anyone. In the meantime, trouble was brewing at the mine, for the company which owned it was going out of business, and many men would be unemployed. Nan brought two friends from school to visit her, at her mother's request, and Brian was delighted at her knowledge of the mine and its business when she showed the girls through the mine; after he had entertained them and fallen more in love with Nan than ever, Brian left for New York to attempt to bid for the mine. Successful in buying it, he returned to open the mine, to the joy of the now employed miners; and when after Nan's graduation, he offered her a position as bookkeeper in the mine, she readily accepted, not only because she wished to be near her mother in her mountain home but because she was herself in love with Brian. After their marriage several months later, Brian, noticing her look of regret as she read Jack's letter of congratulation, asked her if she still loved him, only to be answered by, "No, he said he married the girl of his choice." Horrified at her misconception of the true situation, Brian asked to see the letter Jack had written her in explanation; but it was only after Estelle's death not long afterwards that her duplicity in exchanging her harsh letter of explanation for Jack's kinder one, was discovered. Nan immediately sent the long suffering Jack a letter of forgiveness and condolence, and turned to Brian with her greatest love.

MISSING LETTERS

PROUD of her position as maid of honor at the coming wedding of her friend, Mina, Mabel looks anxiously at the clock as she awaits her fiance, Tom Blaine. She is just about to rebuke him for his late arrival when Bob, her brother and Mina's future husband, arrives to inform them of the postponement of the wedding due to the senior fellowship he has received at the distant medical school he has been attending. Promising the weeping Mina to marry her a year later after his graduation, Bob departs with his school friends, Tom and John. Several months later, Nora Miller, a school chum whose attentions Bob had repudiated, arriving from New York (where the medical school is situated) tells Mina of Bob's growing friendship with Miss Pellam, a nurse at the hospital where her brother, Ned Miller, was an interne. Realizing the reason for the sudden cessation of Bob's letters to her, Mina extends her coldness of attitude to her best friend, Mabel (Bob's sister) when Nora, who has been a frequent visitor at her brother's hospital, shows her Bob's letter of proposal to her. Disappointed by his treachery, Mina finds a desolate vindication in Ned's eager attentions to her when he returns to set up his practise in the town. Knowing of the latter's notorious past with women, through Bob, Mabel tries to warn her; but when Tom, her week-end visitor, tells her of Bob's grief at the sight of the letter (wherein Mina had accepted Ned's proposal) Ned had shown him, Mabel takes pains to cut her when she sees her in restaurants or parties.

Several months later, when in the midst of one of Nora's parties, Mina retires to the latter's room to adjust her cosmetics,—for a sight of Bob on one of Ned's class pictures, had made her cry,—her dress accidentally drags the book, lying on the bed, to the floor. Picking up the letters which had fallen out, Mina notices several copies of the letter from Bob which Nora had shown her. Realizing that Nora had imitated Bob's handwriting, Mina rushes out of the house to telephone to him. Followed by Ned, Mina slaps his face when he tries to force her to return to the house; and several minutes later, told via telephone by college authorities that Bob and his friends have departed on a Canadian hunting trip in celebration of their graduation, Mina packs her grips and hurries to Mabel's house for advice. After showing her the false letter Mina weeps when Mabel in turn, displays Ned's letter. Immediately telegraphing the boys to come home, the two anxiously await their reply and return.

Just as Tom and John bring in the wounded Bob,—for he had attempted to throw himself from a cliff near the small boarding house where they had been living,—Ned arrives to demand an explanation. Beaten up by Tom, Ned is taken home by the crestfallen Nora after she has confessed their implication in the deed. Mutually forgiving each other, Bob and Mina embrace, and when John tells them of their friend Alice's acceptance of his proposal, the three couples happily plan the triple wedding.

THE WOMAN OF COURAGE

Herbert M. Fitzpatrick File No. 8203

DAUGHTER of a minister, Florence was taught to decry that worldliness which the other young people in town practised. Within the walls of the rectory, unprofaned by sensational modern newspapers, the girl blossomed into an exquisite loveliness that made a visiting aunt, Mrs. Morey gasp appreciatively.

Walking in the rectory garden with her young niece, Mrs. Morey saw the wistful glance of the young girl as the moonlight flooded the narrow paths and a longing to permit the fledgling to try her wings in a social world came over her. Accordingly, masquing her anticipation in a suggestion to Dr. Manning and his wife that their daughter be permitted to visit with her, Mrs. Morey received the promise that the minister and his wife would think it over. The result was that Florence aecompanied Mrs. Morey home.

Fingering the friendly invitation of Mrs. Morey, one of the soeiety leaders, Eugene, long a voluntary exile from society beeause of an unfortunate experience, deeided to attend his old friend's dinner. With Mrs. Morey he was reasonably sure of exemption from the painful questions of the eurious. As Eugene entered the drawing room, a shock went through him. Barely acknowledging his introduetion to various persons, he made his way to Florence. He hadn't believed that there were such women. Her passionless purity appealed to him as no other woman ever had before. All through dinner he raptly watched the delicacy of her features, the exquisite manners, and he knew he was in love.

Dreaming alone in the garden, Florence blushed as Eugene came eagerly forward. For the past few days she had thought of no other. Now seized gently in his arms, she lay quiescent under his kisses, closing her eyes against this new feeling while Mrs. Morey paced her room wondering if she had any right to let this go on. Only when Eugene laughed a little as though he were intoxicated and planned their marriage, did Florence awaken to the strangeness of all this happening to her. Eugene scoffed at her fears that her father might not sanetion marriage on such short acquaintance and within a few weeks the fine looking boy had actually convinced the minister to give his daughter to him. Never was there so magnificent a wedding. The groom feasted the poor of the entire town and the bridal couple left with the blessings of the whole village.

Months of happiness followed for Florence and then one day after an unfortunate refusal to invite a divorcee to her home, Florence received a venomous note indicating her husband's past. Wincing from Eugene's propitiatory touch, Florence felt unclean. To her a man could not be divorced. Deaf to reason, this Florence whom Eugene loved for her purity fled to her parents and wept in self-pity. His letters returned unopened, Eugene tried calling, but the minister barred him, and Florence decided to look up the woman whose rightful place she had taken. In a settlement house, Florence found a broken Alice lashing herself into a fury not over the man who had wronged her, not over the husband she had wronged, but over the woman who had taken the love of Eugene. Gently Florence placated her and called Eugene and it was in his arms that the spent Alice died happy while Florence brokenly erept away. But when, after some months, Eugene came to the rectory garden, Florence ran into the arms for which she had longed so long, the arms of her husband.

YOU NEVER CAN TELL

James H. Waring File No. 8174

BUDDIES since childhood, Bill and Paul had separated when the former took a law course and the latter took up engineering. The last Paul heard of Bill was that he had enlisted in the war. A report had reaehed him that Bill had died a hero, but it had never been substantiated and then on an engineering job, Paul met Bill in the latter's home town. Talking over old times, they failed to capture that openness of spirit that used to reign between them and after several weak jokes about their old misogyny, Bill eonfessed he was married, and invited Paul over to meet his wife about whom he began to rave until Paul elaimed another engagement and hurriedly took his departure.

For several days Paul avoided Bill, largely because he felt reticent about disclosing his own affair. The more he thought of their old eonversations swearing they never would be involved with women, the more Paul dreaded telling Bill about his girl. But as he was entering a restaurant, Bill hailed him, and Paul unwillingly accepted his company. Disgusted by Bill's talking about his jewel of a wife, Paul started in and they both laughed at the similarity between their meetings, under an awning in the rain.

But it exasperated Paul to realize that he had almost let himself in for an evening with Bill and his wife, and he thanked his lucky stars he had a date with his girl to get out of it. However, when she called him and broke the date with him, he morosely suspected her excuse about having to see a friend and agreed to a date the following night. Resignedly, Paul went over to Bill's house; but when Bill's wife greeted him coolly, his hands shook so he could hardly conceal it from his friend. All through the show they saw that night, Paul restlessly stole pitying glarces at his friend and wondered how to tell him about the duplicity of women. The next day at lunch, Bill questioned his friend about his bitterness and Paul told how he had met a girl whom he had been planning to marry until he found out she had neglected to tell him she already had a husband. Sympathizing, Bill insisted that Paul come to his house to-night, he and his wife would introduce the misogynist to a real girl, and when Paul's girl unblushingly called him to say that she unfortunately had another appointment again, burning with resentment, Paul accepted Bill's invitation. As he suspected Bill's wife hadn't invited another girl, that is she said she couldn't imagine why the girl was late and finally they went into supper without her. Scarcely able to swallow a morsel, Paul could contribute nothing intelligible to the stilted conversation, and sitting with his back to the door, he almost choked when Bill said, "Here's your girl." When Paul came to, Bill was saying, "I want you to meet my sister-in-law." And Paul's girl, patting his cheeks to bring back their color said, "I didn't know you knew my brother-in-law and my twin sister." Three weeks later, Paul, forgetting about his pet theories, led a blushing bride to the altar saying, "Women aren't so bad."

HEART VS. HEAD

NEVER forgetting that her impecunious husband had ruined her life, Mrs. Traynor stormed and ranted when her only practieal daughter, Aliee, fell in love with a charming foreign violinist, Guido Giotti. The youngsters, grown desperate over repeated refusals, at length eloped, but Mrs. Traynor vindictively pursued them and urged Alice to leave her worthless husband. Months of rigid eeonomy followed for the newlyweds and when a ehild, Selma, was born, Alice brooded over her mother's insistence that she had no right to bring her child up in poverty when she could have a home for her with her mother. Finally a letter from her husband's family telling him he was needed at home immediately and enelosing passage money for one, served to take the decision out of her hands and she went back to her mother with her baby.

Alice haunted the mail box waiting for news from her husband and when the months drew on and her mother assured her that her husband had forgotten all about her, Alice suceumbed readily to an illness from which she might, under different eircumstances, have recovered. The ehild Selma was given the name Traynor and was brought up by her grandmother. Unusually bright, Selma showed an inherent musieal talent, but when the ehild asked to be permitted to take violin lessons, her grandmother went into a tantrum. At length a compromise was effected and Selma was taught to play the piano, the money coming from a bachelor uncle after whose death, the lessons stopped. When the child grew old enough to wonder about her parentage, however, and long for romance such as other girls enjoyed, Mrs. Traynor hastily completed negotiations to have Selma brought up in a "Retreat" where, under the constant surveillance of stern Sisters. the children were treated almost like prisoners. Once, a child, Mignon, was brought to the Rctreat, and her unele Fernando, coming to visit her, approached via the wood and chanced upon Selma bathing with some of the other children. Fascinated by her beauty, he spoke to the girl, telling her he should like to paint her some day and Mignon, adoring Selma, won the consent of the authorities to have her friend visit over the holidays. The romance between Selma and the artist Fernando grew, and, withheld because of Mrs. Traynor's renewed fury at the thought of an artist loving her granddaughter, Selma soon discovered despairingly that she was to have a child and eloped to the continent with the tender Fernando. There, learning of a eoncert given by one Giotti, which name Selma had learned was her own, Selma discovered her father and learned that her grandmother had kept his letters from her mother and caused her premature death. Fernando, under the patronship of his wife's distinguished father, made his own name in artistic cireles, and together the trio found happiness.

RESENTING the preference shown by her stepmother to her own daughters in household tasks and clothes, Romena Barelay secretly takes the teaeher's examination in her last year of college, in an attempt to get a position away from home. Receiving such a position, Romena waits in vain for the state eertificate she must present to receive her salary. Anxious to educate her growing sister and brother, Alma and Nathan, Romena packs her things to leave for another position, when her brother sends her the eertificate he had seen Mrs. James hiding one day. After buying some new clothes and books, Romena almost forgets her childhood sweetheart, Rubin, an orchestra player in her native town, in her affeetion for John Wilson, brother of the pastor who had invited her to dinner one evening. Before returning home for her vacation, Romena, however, breaks this friendship which had flourished with hunting expeditions, drives into the eountry, and fireside talks, by telling John of her engagement to Rubin.

Wishing to surprise Rubin, Romena fails to inform him of her arrival and attends the annual dance of the town orehestra, alone. Only towards the end of the evening does she discover the reason for Rubin's worried look or the smiles of the people, for Ella, the girl he has brought, now demands that he escort her home. So that when she sees him at the theater with Ella the following night, Romena, realizing that his plea of having to work overtime, is a lie, returns the ring. After his quarrel with Ella, Rubin, heartbroken at Romena's refusal to see him, leaves for New York.

When John, representative of an insurance eompany enters the office where Romena is now a bookkeeper, he is overjoyed; and Romena is happy when a week later, in spite of the foreed attentions of the jealous Ella to him, John proposes to her. Forced to stop work by Mr. Jones and John, and unable because of her lack of funds to set up Nathan in his New York business, or send the wild Alma to a school, Romena writes an explanatory letter to John, and leaves for New York to obtain a better position and independence. Preferring to work in a faetory and retire early rather than partieipate in the drinking and petting orgies at the home of the Greens (her friends) where she is boarding, Romena is laughed at by the men; and when her boss, Mr. Harley, coming to buy liquor one evening from Mrs. Green, finds her there, he believes she is fast and tries to force his attentions on her when she works overtime. Meeting Muriel, a friendly girl from next door, Romena tells her of her job hunting and is not only given a position as maid with the woman for whom she works, but a room with her as well. Bringing a friend, John, home with her one night, Muriel is infuriated at his attentions to Romena; and the latter, angered by his forwardness, leaves the house. Meeting Walter Brown, a young school teaeher, at church where she has gone to weep and pray, Romena gladly accepts the job and friendship he offers her; and when he proposes to her several weeks later, Romena, who has so often dreamed of such a man, readily aeeepts with a kiss. The next week the school miss, Alma, and the now prosperous Nathan, arrive to attend the joyous wedding.

LAND OF PLENTY

FONDLY setting the last eup of barley, used instead of eoffee, before her beloved husband Hendrick, Alvina placed her arms about Hendriek's shoulders and exclaimed she couldn't believe that they were really going to the land of promise at last. It didn't seem possible that soon there would be no more starving, no more back-breaking work in the fields. Watching little Joel playing with his dog, Alvina nestled close in the great arms of her husband and sighed about dreams coming true at last. Then suddenly the door burst open and the community police tramped in, seized Hendrick by the shoulders and ordered him to join them. Protesting futilely that he was leaving the country, that he couldn't join the army now, Hendrick was led away to fight the Russians while Alvina holding little Joel close wept bitterly.

Years later with Joel grown now to a young man, Alvina, now white-haired, rocked monotonously and dreamed about happiness in Ameriea. Hendrick had never returned from the wars and now Joel was almost old enough to fight. But Alvina's Joel had other ideas. Hearing ceaselessly the stories of his father's impressment into the army, Joel determined to go to Ameriea before he should be foreed to serve. Leaving his mother enough money to live on and the promise that he would send for her as soon as he earned enough money, Joel said goodbye to Ingrid and found leaving her was hardest of all. Giving her his ring, he accepted a tiny medallion with her picture and set off.

The streets of America, Joel found, were not lined with gold but there was money to be earned by his rich young voiee and gathering the coins that restaurant patrons tossed to him as he sang his native songs, Joel eagerly economized to be able to send for his mother and Ingrid. At length, one day, opening his frail bank, he counted enough money and with a singing heart he mailed it to his mother making all arrangements for her arrival with Ingrid. Cheerfully he prepared the apartment for them, bought delicacies and confided his joy to all. But when he went to the boat all eame off but Ingrid and his mother. Sadly he returned to his room and wondered why they had not eome. A few days later a letter came from Ingrid explaining that his mother had died.

Dully wandering out into the street, Joel walked for hours not caring who spoke to him or how nearly he was run over. At the restaurant his voice choked so he eouldn't sing and running out into the street he was found murmuring feverishly. Carried to his room, for several days Joel knew nothing. Then one day Ingrid came and bending tenderly over her ill friend, she nursed him back to health and after several weeks, with renewed interest in life, Joel married his faithful Ingrid who had come to join him.

FINGER PRINTS

RUNNING his motor launch down the harbor, Fred Sanford, adopted son of the president of the First National Bank. saw a girl struggling in the water and leaped in after her. Aided in resuscitating her by George Poole, a young artist who had come to the beach resort on a mission of his own to paint portraits, Fred made two firm friends. It wasn't entirely gratitude that made Edna love her reseuer, and Fred who had loved her from the first, found George a sympathetie if somewhat eynical listener. Moreover, in George, Fred found someone who was willing to lend him money to eover his great vice—gambling. Encouraged by infrequent winnings, arranged by professional fleecers, Fred dropped vast sums of money in an effort to reeoup his losses and George, although he tried to discourage Fred from continuing, always advanced the sums Fred needed. One day, riding together on the motor launch, a gift of his foster-father's, Fred saw George's restlessness and finding that George was tired of painting, managed to get an opening for his friend in his father's bank.

Some weeks later Fred's father was astounded at the diseovery that a half million dollars were stolen from the vault. Old Tom, the night watchman stuek to his story that that morning Sanford himself had entered the vault through his private door and after weeks of investigation detectives admitted they were stumped. Every available clue had been followed. However Dctective Lurvey indomitably pursued his investigations troubled by the stealth of his carefully gathered fingerprints upon which he was working. The only clue was the barely traeeable finger print through a worn place in the bank robber's glove, and before he could continue his examination of the variously gotten prints of all the bank employees, the whole set had been stolen.

However, in a drawer in Fred Sanford's desk, Lurvey found a newly made duplicate of the key to his father's library safe where lately, he kept, written on a piece of paper, the combination of his own door to the vault; and on the basis of this evidence both Fred and old Tom, held as an accomplice, because of his wild story about seeing the bank president, enter the vault, were convicted for twenty years a few days before Edna and Fred were to be married.

Edna's family urged her to forget the worthless Fred who had eluded the pursuit of Lurvey one night in the harbor. A few weeks later, George Poole's attention was called to the death of a wealthy relative and George left the bank. Meanwhile Lurvey's finger prints of the bank employees again gathered proved nothing. But in a wig shop he found a picture of Sanford Senior, and through the wig maker and his own remarkable gift of remembering faces, traced the fellow who had ordered such a disguise—George Poole. Poole was arrested through the help of Edna and locked up. But he escaped leaving a note vindicating Tom and Fred and claiming he was taking Lurvey's advice to go straight. Sanford, asking his son's forgiveness for doubting him, made up the deficit from his own pocket and at the wedding of Fred and Edna the first installment came from George making up the money he had spent under the claim of an inheritance.

THESE MODERNS

Dorothy Vanderpool File No. 8244

ALL Toni had to know was that the very rich young Morgan Powell and his friend Berkie were arriving in Agua Caliente that night. Some hours later she was parked in a car with Ted Walling on the dark road leading into the Mexican town. As the distant hum of a motor sounded, Toni suddenly drew her hand back and landed a resounding slap on Ted's astonished face. A moment later she was opening the car door and before the amazed Ted who knew that Toni had never in her life walked home before, could say a word, Toni was resolutely heading toward home afoot. Two minutes later, the young lady was settled between Morgan and Berkie wistfully thanking them for the lift.

The next morning Toni woke up and winked at her room mate Joan. She was, she said, landing the Powell millions. Joan smiled appreciatively and the bellhop delivered the customary order of bromo seltzer which the two girls downed. The next day Toni showed up demurely at Rene's cocktail party and disappointed that Morgan wasn't there, she pretended surprise at seeing Berkie and inquired casually after Morgan. Learning that he was at the Reno Club, Toni gulped suddenly and begging Joan to keep an eye on Berkie, Toni dashed into her roadster and showed up at the Reno Club not a moment too soon to prevent Morgan from learning that the lady with the unsavory reputation who was being discussed was Toni Fenton. With extraordinary consideration, Toni saw that Morgan filled his flask and then pulled him out of the place. Weeping a little over his going to the dogs that way, Toni managed to get them both lit on the contents of Morgan's flask, and when they arrived back at Rene's party, Toni proudly introduced to the astonished guest her reeling but handsome husband—the heir to the Powell millions. Berkie took in the situation at a glance and discovering that Morgan actually claimed he was crazy about his bride, left the place and Joan who had managed quite nicely to keep him occupied, in disgust.

A week later Toni flung herself into her former apartment and ignoring Joan's glumness, announced cheerfully that the great moment was fast arriving. Wynne would be caught in Toni's bedroom with Morgan and Toni'd get her divorce. Joan tried to discourage Toni calling it a dirty trick, but Toni turned away in mock horror of Joan's suddenly acquired morality and welcomed with squeals of joy the arrival of Don Risko, smooth Argentine. Kissing him enthusiastically, Toni told him about her kill while Joan flung out of the apartment. "Oh she," Toni explained, "She thinks she's in love."

Berkie was explaining to Morgan how he'd been roped in when Toni burst in with a crowd of her friends and after pressing a sticky kiss on Morgan discovered to her "dismay" that Wynne was being hidden in her room. Six weeks later Toni had her divorce and airily kissing Joan's cheek in farewell, was leaving to squander her alimony on the contriving gigolo, while Berkie, congratulating Morgan drily on geting off that easily, caught sight of Joan quietly having a cry. He was about to stalk by, when something about her forlornness convinced him of its genuineness, and while Morgan razzed, he gathered Joan in his arms and believed her whispered, sniffly, "I love you." And so did Joan.

THE PIONEERS

Sophia G. Mellor File No. 7847

JOHN'S proposal that the whole family sell their things and join the new trek westward exploded like a bombshell. Everyone talked at once, but finally Mr. Smith silenced them and disposed of the matter by stating that he for one was not wearied of well-being. There was no reason why they should leave comfort behind and risk the dangers of the west. But John's eyes sparkled as he outlined to them the adventure, the chance for fortune, the glory of pioneering, and the seed of restlessness was sown. Then Mr. Smith learned that his lungs were infected, that he needed an outdoor life. The encroachment of machinery on the farm made living conditions more difficult at home, and with a cry of triumph John heard his father decide that they would join those brave pioneers heading westward to a new dominion.

But for all their resolution there were lumps in the throats of the Smiths, as the last of their cherished possessions were sold and they climbed aboard the covered wagons which were to carry them into new danger. Maintaining a steady pace, they crossed fields of waving grain and felt the awful loneliness of the barren prairies. At night the howling of strange animals struck terror into their stout hearts and Lucy clung to her mother. Sudden storms drenching everything made them long for the little home they had sold, and often the food stores ran low. One day John, straining his eyes ahead cried out in joy, and the weary pioneers saw unmistakable signs of humans, the first they had seen for weeks. They found a settlement of families, discouraged by Indian raids and reports of impassable country. The Smiths stared at each other in silence. Should they too give up now, within a few days of their goal? Only Henry Porter, a young lad who from the first had looked upon Lucy Smith with a strange shyness, encouraged them to continue. His friends, he said, were frightened by a few hardships, but an indomitable spirit would lead them to happiness, if they would only keep on. John found the lad earnest and believed him. A long conference with his father resulted in the Smiths' determination to push on, and with them came Henry, who, if not for them, would have been forced to return home with his party. Henry worked hard beside John and Mrs. Smith, and ever his longing look followed Lucy. And it was Henry whose slight knowledge of the Indian language, saved them from the savages. Captured, they were brought before Chief Red Wing, but Henry discovered that he had a very sick daughter, and John got permission from the Indians to apply a home cure. Slowly the girl began to improve and thereafter Red Wing was a staunch friend. Settling close by, Red Wing's protective guidance saved them from fierce attacks from the savages, and the white men taught Red Wing's tribe many useful things and gained much helpful Indian information. Settled, Henry asked Lucy's hand in marriage, and with the adoring eyes of Red Wing's daughter upon him, John built a great home for his parents and started a home of his own . . .

SOUL'S SACRIFICE

Angeles Ordonez File No. 7884

WHEN George Rockingham, wealthy young heir, came to San Joaquin to buy his much wanted farm, he immediately fell in love with Anita de Alcantara, descendent of an ancient Spanish family. No sooner were they married then George persuaded his dearest friend, James Ryan, to build up his fallen fortunes in San Joaquin as his right-hand man on the farm. James, immediately upon his arrival, falls in love with Marion Arellono, Anita's friend. As the years pass, this bond of friendship is strengthened by the ever ardent fellowship of their children, Angela and David in their music lessons together, in their schooling, in their promenades, and in their mutual love for their parents. Therefore, it is a sad time indeed when after ten years of this, David leaves for medical school, and Mr. Rockingham follows him to San Francisco. David's continual preoccupation with his studies, and Mrs. Rockingham's sudden death leave Mr. Rockingham a lonely man; so that it is with even greater sorrow that he rushes to attend the sick bed of his friend and farm overseer, James Ryan, and he grants his death-bed wish that the pure and sheltered Angela be protected against the rapaciousness of the world, by promising to marry her.

Although Angela does not love George, she unhappily promises to marry him, to please her mother and accede to her father's death-bed wish in this respect. No sooner have they arrived at their beautiful city home then Mr. Rickingham becomes immediately engrossed in his business to the utter neglect of his young wife. In David's eyes, Angela finds the reason for her restlessness and longing, and their unhappiness and love flourish as Mr. Rockingham becomes more and more preoccupied with business meetings and trips to Europe, and leaves the entertainment of his wife more and more to his son.

In the meantime, Marie Leavenworth, a young society girl whom David has befriended, taunted by her friends for his coolness to her, determines to make him marry her within the month. When she notices after careful watching, David's affection for Angela, she quickly informs Mr. Rockingham of this. Mr. Rockingham, amazed and shocked at this news, extracts a promise from David to marry Marie as soon as possible, and forbids him to see Angela again. Although Marie tries by building a hospital for him, making him believe she is going to have a child, to win his love, she does not succeed for David still longs for Angela whom he sees occasionally with Mr. Rockingham at night-clubs and theaters. While Mr. Rockingham is away on a European trip, Angela, heartbroken by news of Marie's motherhood and by David's unfaithfulness, decides to affiliate herself wholeheartedly with a fast crowd, whom she knows of in the city. In spite of David's protests, she drinks, swears, gambles, and is promiscuous in her attentions to men, and when Mr. Rockingham returns, he is scandalized by news of her behavior; but when he forbids her to leave the house again, Angela, infuriated, leaves for San Joaquin. However, several weeks later when David comes to talk of divorce and love, she refuses him, for she is going to have a child. Ever the staunch man, David returns to Marie, while Angela returns bravely to live out her destiny with George.

FATAL JUDGMENT

RECOGNIZING in the pedestrian whom he has almost run over, his friend of many years ago, Jack Halliday, Bob Burbeck orders his chauffeur to stop while he apologizes and greets him. Arrived at the Mansion House Club, Jack's destination, Bob, informing him of his ownership of the place, offers him the assistant managership. Just as Jack greets Toby Thompson, the house detective and another old time friend, a Mr. and Mrs. Howard, new arrivals, demand to see the proprietor because their rooms are not yet vacant. Turning pale when he sees her, Bob sends over Jack to promise them the best rooms in the house. Having noticed her husband staring at another woman, Mrs. Howard loudly berates her husband upstairs; and when the tumult reaches the people downstairs, Thompson telephones his friend, Gorham at police headquarters to visit the place with a plain clothes man.

In the dining room awaiting their lunch, Gorham, Bob and Jack gaze anxiously at the doorway; and when the sophisticatedly beautiful woman enters, Bob and Jack stare in consternation at each other while Gorham smiles to himself. While Jack sees in her the girl he had jilted many years before, Bob recognizes her as the wife who had deserted him many years before. Fearing a breach of promise suit, Jack hastily exits from the place, while Bob, wishing to grant her the divorce needed to legalize her marriage to Howard, walks towards her table. In the meantime, a woman registered as Myra Pendleton, rises from her table and overturns several champagne glasses when she suddenly recognizes Mr. Howard. The later gasps, and Mrs. Howard, noticing Myra coming towards them, forces him back into his seat. Hearing her scream of denial when Myra tells her she is his wife, Bob approaches the table. Half-fainting, Lily, (Mrs. Howard) falls into his arms just as Gorham, realizing that she is the bigamist the police had been searching for, arrives to arrest her. Confronted by his first wife and by the scandal of Lily as a bigamist, Mr. Howard puts a revolver to his heart, but dies of a weak heart (the reason for his visiting this resort) before he can shoot. While the sobbing Myra follows the dead body of her husband as it is being carried out, Bob, after confessing that he had secretly met Lily several years before (at the time she had been married to Howard) and arranged the divorce, follows Myra from the room. But since Lily had never appeared at the divorce proceedings, Gorham arrests her for higamy. Realizing that he has always loved her, Jack, an attorney, promises to defend her, and the two walk out together. Comforted by Bob whom she has met on her many week-end visits to the place, Myra accepts his proposal. When Lily is imprisoned, Bob promises to use his money and influence to keep Howard's good business and society name clear of scandal. After forgiving Lily, Bob returns home to arrange for his approaching marriage to Myra and joins the latter in bidding Jack bon voyage for his trip abroad.

JIMMIE groans as his room mate carefully smoothes down a recalcitrant hair and applies meticulous attention to the adjustment of his tie. "Women," he exclaims contemptuously, "Bah!" And as Walter rosily paints the glamor that is woman, Jimmie throws a shoe at him and extinguishes the light.

However, as the boys are engaged in football practice the next day, Walter is carried off the field with a sprained ankle and receiving Jimmie's sympathy in his room later, Walter groans as he reads that his sister is accepting the invitation he once extended to her to come to the commencement dance. Not only does his ankle obviate all possibility of dancing, but even if he could go Walter would have asked Ethel. But Jimmie has lost all interest since the topic has turned on women. It is Ethel who suggests as she consoles Walter on his injuries, that he get Jimmie to take Marion. But it is only with the greatest coaxing, somewhat abetted by a picture of Marion showing her to be not at all the sophisticated type of which Jimmie is in mortal terror, that the young misogynist consents for his room mates' sake to call for Marion at the station. The ride back in a taxi is not wholly satisfactory since Marion, warned of Jimmie's abhorrence of women, receives him with a polite diffidence far different from the adulation which his classic profile and football prowess has hitherto earned for him. But Marion's coolness is exactly the proper stimulus to Jimmie's interest and when he pretends resentment of Marion's intrusion to see her brother, he is really watching her closely. In fact when Walter questions Jimmie's refusal to spend a few days after graduation at the former's ranch, Jimmie carefully studies his nails and says he was thinking he'd like to, after all. That night, Jimmie, for the first time, finds his usually untroubled sleep beset by thoughts of Marion, and he tosses restlessly at the sudden intuition that he, the woman-hater, is falling in love. However, Marion remains cool to Jimmie and only by her enthusiastic cheering from the grandstands during the football game does she betray her deeper interest. Moreover, it is only because she realzies how much Walter wants to take Ethel to the Commencement dance, that Marion consents to go with Jimmie. But from then on there is no mistake about their affection and when in a booth in the varsity ice cream parlor, Jimmie overhears Walter telling Ethel about the change in his room mate, Jimmie motions to Marion to leave, then reaches over, extinguishes the light, and empties a glass of water on Walter's head.

Graduation, and sad farewells, but Jimmie accompanies Walter and incidentally Marion home. Scoffing at Walter's confidence that he will marry Ethel in a year, Jimmie leaves.

However, he has gone only to establish himself in business and from a glove he has retained, he fits an engagement ring which he sends to Marion, and informs Walter that there is an opening for him too in his office, so that Walter can marry Ethel and make it a double ceremony.

THE LONG ROAD

AS the train sharply rounded a curve and pulled to a sudden stop, Howard caught a fleeting glimpse of a lovely woman sitting calmly among the panicky passengers. The moaning reached a hysterical pitch as the conductor mounted a chair and informed them that the river had risen until the bridge was almost washed away and only by the greatest speed and caution could they save their lives. One hysterical fat woman shouted she and her baby would be killed and refused to trust her life to the storm washed bridge. Howard implored the girl to do something and offering to hold the baby for a moment, when all arguments were unavailing, the girl thrust the baby into the outstretched arms of the porter and ordered him to hurry across. The fat woman ran madly after her baby to safety and only Howard and the girl were left. As they made their way across, the bridge with a sickening crash gave way plunging them both into the turbulent waters. Half-dragging her onto a log, Howard encouraged her as darkness settled down with the fierce storm. At length they managed to espy land and as their log crashed hurling them into the icy waters again, Howard managed to get them both ashore. Alone in a dismal wood, they managed at length to espy a shelter and to their astonishment found refuge with a strange brotherhood of men practicing voluntary ascetism. Howard guarded Beatrice unremittingly but when Brother Stephen one of the cassocked men turned repellant attentions to Beatrice, Howard insisted for her own protection that she accept marriage with him. Beatrice, the victim of a ghastly earlier marriage to a man who attempting to murder her had met his own death, had a horror of marriage, but unwillingly conformed to the ceremony imposing the condition that he never attempt to touch her, that she loathed all men. Struggling against his impulse to violate her helpless position, Howard maintained his part of the contract, feeling that eventually she would lose her repugnance, but his heart sank at the discovery that Beatrice was his sister's best friend and that hers was the pitiful case about which he had heard so much. On being pressed, Beatrice even admitted she had hidden on the train when she saw Ethel saying goodbye to her brother to avoid being introduced to him. The days spent at the lodge of the brotherhood were torturous for Beatrice, and Howard realized despairingly that he had not succeeded in changing her feelings. Dismayed he was forced to accede to her desire that he keep from everyone the knowledge that they were married or had even met before.

At the opera one night, Howard saw his wife in the audience and arranged to have his sister introduce him but Beatrice showed no sign that they had met before. Howard would have spoken but the misery in her eyes made him forbear. Then Howard was hurt in an automobile accident as he drove to forget his longings for Beatrice. Ethel hysterically came to her friend for comfort then turned away in disgust from Beatrice's apparent indifference to anything that concerned men. But when Ethel called to inform Beatrice that her brother incredibly was begging for Beatrice, whom he had supposedly met only at the opera, Beatrice agreed to come. The stillness terrified her as she entered the room, and when she murmured broken phrases of love to Howard he suddenly roused himself and kissed her hungrily. Breaking angrily away with the feeling she had been duped, Beatrice ran out. But some weeks later, Howard came to her in her garden and holding her in a firm grip told her not to fight against her feelings any longer, and with a little cry Beatrice admitted her love.

FIRST LOVE

Mrs. Nad Snitkaw File No. 8156

ANXIOUS to assist her father in supporting their large family, and weary of the military regime of the household, which included lessons in archery, shooting, wrestling, fencing and dancing, Della Worth leaves home to find work on a large farm. At the farm, in spite of her father's advice to the contrary, Della continues to see and correspond with George Nelson, a poor boy who was the sole support of his aging parents; for, the fact that she had been beaten because of the gossip her father had heard of her spooning with him nights at the creek—the place where most of the young folk congregated for this purpose—still rankled in her. So that, although Mr. Worth demanded her entire wages, Della secretly saved for a happy future with the one she loved. When Daniel Bronson, her employer's nephew, who was visiting his uncle during his vacation from the agricultural college, made love to her, Della remained cold, (athough she was secrety flattered by his gifts and gentlemanly manners which were so different from George's shy crudities).

Several months later, during the busy threshing season. Della was busily engaged in waiting on the hungry men, when George, who sometimes brought the mail with him, handed her a letter; and all during the meal that followed there was laughter and ribald jesting about "the country bumpkin's" vapid love-making. Opening the letter, Della found George's proposal, and realizing that they had read it, decided to leave the farm, for very shame. Arrived in the city where her sister was employed as a waitress in a hotel, Della soon obtained a similar position there. Forgetting the happy days spent with George in practising military marches, the bugle, archery, and dancing together, Della refused his proposal, and learning later that he had run away to the city, Della's remorse which one night urged her to run out half clad into the cold, made her seriously ill. However, Daniel's appearance at this time and his constant visits pulled her through this period, and illness and George were soon forgotten.

Visiting Daniel at his agricultural statistics office, Della is shocked to meet the now worldly George in his role as manager of this office chain. Still remembering her jilting him George is nevertheless happy to visit her in gratefulness for the financial aid she had offered his parents in the first few months of his absence. After the visit, Della discovers some letters her sister, Mabel, had been about to burn; and since they are ardent love letters of a past date (which had never been sent), Della decides to stifle her own longing for him in loyalty to her sister. However, as Della continues to refuse George's gifts and "dates", she is puzzled by Daniel's growing indifference. When several days later, Della, who has come to discuss things openly with Daniel at his office, finds Mabel in the latter's arms, she stares astonished into the beaming face of George who is just leaving. Having come to warn Daniel to leave Della alone, George has discovered Mabel's recent marriage to Daniel whom she had loved ever since her first meeting him at the hotel. So that after agreeing that the marriage idea might be a happy one for them too, George and Della turn to congratulate the other happy pair.

PERHAPS WOMEN

Etta Elizabeth Berry File No. 8135

FORLORNLY watching the girl he loves drive off in a shower of rice and old shoes with his more successful rival, Bill, Joe ruefully turns his footsteps toward a speakeasy. There he meets Hen, who begins to tell him about his great disappointment in love. Throwing his arms about Hen's shoulder's Joe invites him to have another drink. Two days later, much the worse for continuous drinking, they are joined by Bill who woefully reports that his bride got an annulment discovering that he would be disowned upon marriage. Thereupon the three men make a pact to forswear women.

Taking an apartment together, acting as their own cook, maid, and general housekeeper, for several weeks they have a glorious time but ere long, liquor and cards begin to pall. Hesitating to admit their failure, they quarrel over the food, fuss over each other, and finally, on the verge of a quarrel, shake hands and agree to take their symptoms to a doctor, who hears them out and sagely lectures to them on getting married. Disgusted, the trio leaves the office. Consigning medical men to limbo, Hen mentions vaguely that maybe they ought to try a fortune teller. Joe seizes upon the idea and persuades them to try his Aunt Sophia, reputed to be good at fortune telling. The moment she learns their story, however, the discerning old lady gives the same advice, adding, however, descriptions of the future wife of each, descriptions which exactly fit three young proteges of hers who regularly apply for advice on how to capture a man. Pretending to be unmoved by Aunt Sophia's words, in the next few hours each of them is annoyed by his own recurrent humming of snatches from Aunt Sophia's song, PERHAPS WOMEN.

No sooner are the boys out, moreover, when Aunt Sophia hastily calls the three girls and gains their support of her scheme. Marg is to act as cook, Ann to try her hand as a maid, and Mayme is to await an opening.

Accordingly Aunt Sophia pays a return visit to the boys and throwing up her hands at the food, convinces them that what they are suffering from is the want of properly prepared food. Therefore when Marg calls she is hired as a cook by Hen who pretends that he has no other interest in her. Marg suggests they need a maid and Ann is hired. Meanwhile, Aunt Sophia visits, and looking for an opening for Mayme discovers that Bill is called "Stumbling Bill" because of his propensity for tripping. Putting a stool in his path, she causes him to stumble down a flight of steps. Mayme is ushered into the household by the need for a nurse. The three girls work on their respective victims who unconsciously succumb while clinging to their poses. Learning that the boys are hiding their respective love-making from each other, Aunt Sophia secretly visits armed with a camera.

As a finale, Aunt Sophia shows her pictures to the assemblage and having a picture of Bill kissing his nurse as she led him to a seat under some shrubbery in the garden, a picture of Hen embracing Marg after she has baked his favorite pie, and of Joe picking up Ann who has managed to fall and pretend she has hurt her ankle, Aunt Sophia winks as the three men confess the truth. As she ushers the three couples into the flivver which is to take them to the marriage bureau, she sings PERHAPS WOMEN.

SORROW'S HUSKS

Leatha Atha File No. 8092

RESTLESSLY sitting at the table while her father officiously commanded the destinies of his children, Lill thought constantly of Raymond whom she had met at school. The Christmas vacation dragged by and when eagerly she stepped from the train to find Raymond waiting, a lump of happiness rose in her throat. Walking together down the school street, Raymond told her how much he had missed her and tears came to Lill's eyes because she had never expected so much happiness could ever be hers, and because her father's words about marrying too early rang in her ears. The semester sped by with their lovers' meetings, but when she returned home and her father learned that she thought of marriage, he made a nasty scene. What did she know of love at her age, he demanded. But it hadn't occurred to Lill that he would keep her from returning to school and Raymond, that he insisted that she go to New York with her mother just to separate them. Fearfully she wrote to Raymond who came to plead their case with her family but her father turned him out. Dreading the separation as plans progressed, Lill wrote a pleading letter and Raymond's response was exactly what she had hoped for, arrangements to elope the night before she was to leave for New York.

But Raymond's set white face when they boarded the train and his avoidance of people puzzled her, as did his giving a different name to the minister who married them. And the first few years of marriage with Raymond starting every time the telephone or doorbell rang, set a great fear in Lill's heart. But as his love enveloped her, and he received recognition at the small town factory for his work, Lill forgot her misgivings. And when Donald was born and Raymond refused to sell the little house he had so proudly bought although he was offered a handsome profit, Lill knew it couldn't have been wrong to marry the man she loved. But when Donald took ill, and in her torment Lill realized how her mother must have felt at her own disappearance, Lill for the first time wrote home telling them she was well and hoped they would come to see her. For the first time Lill saw how infuriated Raymond could become when she told him, but then, pressing her close to him, he told her how much he loved her and the little ones again and again,—that night he disappeared. All Lill's fears were realized, and then came a letter from Raymond. He had given himself up to justice now. The night that he had met her he had asked his aunt to lend him money and she had given it. However, when he confided what he wanted it for, she had snatched it back claiming she wouldn't help him take a girl from her unwilling family. In the argument, his aunt had fallen down the cellar steps and Raymond, grief-stricken, found her dead. In a panic, he had gone on with his original plans lest the delay lose Lill for him. Now, innocent, he was giving himself up to the law.

Distraitly, Lill sold her house and moved with the children lest the taint blight their lives and for cheerless years she kept from them what had happened to their father. One by one they married and left her more and more alone, but still she waited, and one day the door of her lonely home pushed open and with a broken cry she rushed into Raymond's arms. He had come home, at last. He had paid the law's price, but now there would be peace and a great love.

PRISON BABY

IN rebellion against the stern vigilance to which her wealthy and straight-laced parents subject her at home, Isabel is considered incorrigible. At length her parents send her to a convent hoping that she will learn to conform but when Isabel plays jazz on the convent organ, the nuns throw up their hands and send her back to her horrified people who engage a companion for Isabel. Jane never leaves her charge for a moment and against this refined torture, Isabel is constantly contriving. Eluding Jane one day, Isabel frees birds in a pet shop, in sympathy, and as the infuriated shop keeper rushes at her, Dick Shaw, an impecunious young medical student laughingly comes to Isabel's aid. They spend a delightful afternoon together and the storming Jane is powerless to complain fearing she will lose a lucrative position by the confession of her failure.

Dick and Isabel, in love, are helpless against the certain antagonism of the Stephines and when Dick is called to South America to work with a medical commission upon the study of an obscure tropical fever, the lovers are distraught. At length, despite Dick's misgivings, Isabel persuades him to marry her in secret before his departure and upon his return they can announce the marriage to the Stephines who might otherwise annul the marriage of their daughter, still a minor. Stemming a flood of bitter tears, Isabel watches the outgoing steamer carrying her bridegroom to the swamp-infested tropics.

Meanwhile Ed Jenkins, a middleaged friend of her father, has been pressing his attentions and when her father tries to force her to marry Jenkins, Isabel climaxes a stormy interview by admitting she is already married and is about to have a baby. The servants cower before the wrangling in the locked room and that night Isabel slips out and goes to New York. However, just as the distressed young girl has finally gotten a position, two detectives walk in and arrest her for the murder of her father.

Stunned, Isabel hears the servants testify against her, weaving a circumstantial chain through the quarrel with her father and her supposed escape from the seene of her horrible crime, and as she is convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment her eyes helplessly travel over the unsympathetic faces in the courtroom. All her efforts to communicate with Dick have been in vain, for through the success of the commission, its members have been sent to different places in the jungle to treat various outbreaks of the dread fever.

Jenkins alone of all those she had known had shown pity for the girl and been relieved that she escaped the death penalty but he had left immediately after the trial for a world cruise.

However, a prey to his conscience, Jenkins falls a victim to the fever, and spends his entire fortune to assure the services of the commission. From his babbling, Dick, attending him, learns for the first time of Isabel's suffering for Jenkin's guilt and arrived in New York finds her ill from worry over her baby who had been taken from her by the prison authorities. Tenderly he cares for her, secures her release through Jenkin's confession and announces to the world their marriage.

MELTING POT

Mrs. Cerrah Heatherly Smith File No. 8105

ENCOURAGED by her wealthy parents to marry the impoverished French Count de Merret, Sally found herself installed in the Count's ancestral castle and at the same time realized her gallant young suitor had dropped every pretense of love now that he had gotten what he wanted—her money. Neglected, abused, Sally found her only consolation wandering off alone in the leaky motor boat her husband's estate boasted of. Even the servants, distrustful of all Americans, hated her and were encouraged by the Count's cruel treatment of his wife.

On one of her lonely explorations of the foliage-surrounded river, Sally was startled at the sight of a dark, handsome young man in a green bathing suit diving into the waters. As she turned to go, he swam up to her boat and expressing considerable astonishment at finding so lovely an American here, he asked if she wouldn't invite him into her boat. Thus started a delightful friendship and Sally learned that he was a Spanish Prince forced to flee his own country because the revolutionists were in control. However, when she realized he was married, a belated sense of her own obligations caused her to leave him, aware that his eyes followed her until she was out of sight. Meanwhile, her husband had met the Spaniard's beautiful young wife, Senora Gomez in the active social life of Vendome, and he determined to have her although her husband and his wife stood in the way.

Keeping spies constantly reporting on his neglected wife's activities, the Count seized Sally in a grip of iron and ouestioned her to what she was doing on the river. Wincing under his grasp, Sally told of her harmless encounter, but the Count cruelly accused her in front of all the servants of having a lover. Knowing well that her husband's life had encompassed dozens of intrigues, Sally began to reply heatedly but a blow across her mouth sent her weeping to her room.

Meanwhile, realizing that the Spaniard stood in the way of his having the beautiful Senora for his own, the Count determined to put the obstacle out of his way and at the same time insure riddance of his wife without losing her fortune. Accordingly, slipping up behind the Spaniard while he was taking his daily swim, he threw a slip-knotted rope around his neck and pushed him into the water certain that the huge stone weighting the other end of the rope would prevent the rescue of his victim. However, Sally, driven to desperation had come to say goodbye to the Senor before returning stealthily to her own people and seeing her husband's crime dived into the water and helped the unfortunate Spaniard escape his watery grave.

Returning home filled with loathing for her husband, Sally found her husband had lined up the servants to testify that Sally was the only one on the river and therefore responsible for the murder, but with a cry, Sally turned upon her inhuman husband and presenting the supposed dead man exposed the Count's culpability. The Spaniard agreed not to press charges and at length to the complete satisfaction of the four, both couples were divorced and while the worthless Count married the Senora, the Spanish Grandee convinced Sally that all noblemen were not alike and led her away as his loved young wife.

LOVE SHINES THROUGH

Mrs. Ralph R. Cooke File No. 8118

BECAUSE she felt she would endanger Doc Stratton's professional career if she accepted his offer of marriage before he had established himself, Marie Churchill decided to leave town and earn money to tide them over their first few years. Confident of her ability as a dancer, Marie met only discouragement at the different producer's offices and as her funds dwindled, she applied for a position as a department store saleslady. Jack Norton, the manager, looked at Marie critically, then ordered her to report to work.

That night dining alone, a tall young man stopped before her table and with an expression of satisfaction asked if he might join her. It was Norton. Discovering she had taken rooms in the same hotel in which he lived, he congratulated himself upon the proximity. Thereafter he hovered about her at all hours. The welcome raise in salary however, somewhat compensated until she should have found the work she wanted. Then Marie learned of a tryout for a new show. Hesitantly she asked Norton for time off and he readily granted it without questioning her purpose. There was an incredible number of applicants and as Marie went through her routine before the cold eyes of Don Mallory, she felt a sinking sensation not relieved by his promise to call her if he had anything.

Meanwhile Norton was growing more importunate in his advances, and it was a great relief when he inquired cynically what she supposed the raise was for, to be able to tell him of her acceptance for the role in Mallory's show. For a moment Marie thought Norton would strike her, but he accepted her resignation and drawing a deep breath she walked out.

However, Mallory had chosen Marie for the part for reasons of his own, and without realizing the knowing sneers of the other show girls, Marie felt herself fascinated by Mallory's glittering personality. He took her to her first night club and managed just the proper possessive admiration coupled with supposed respect for her virtue to win Marie's confidence. When she returned at four in the morning, Norton was waiting up for her in the lobby. Wincing before his nasty conclusions, Marie determined to find a new home the next day. Accordingly, she went in search of a new apartment, and Mallory offered his help. Grateful for his assistance, Marie didn't suspect that he had retained a key himself. That night, however, Mallory let himself into Marie's room, and as she cowered before his ominous advance the door burst open and Norton, mad with jealousy, having followed them, drew a gun and fired at Mallory. Realizing what he had done the wild eyed Norton dropped the gun and escaped and when help came, Marie staring speechlessly at the gun she had picked up, was taken into custody.

No one believed her story, and growing ill from the torturous questioning to which she was put, Marie fainted. For several days she didn't care to live, hut when at last she looked about, there was Doc Stratton at her side, pleading with her to recover. He had found Norton, believing her story and Norton had confessed. Marie sobbed that she had ruined everything with her notoriety, but holding her close Doc convinced her that nothing else mattered but love. And so they were married.

HERITAGE OF LOVE

Elsie C. Standish File No. 8178

IMPLORING Ona Devon not to keep putting him off with the statement that he is too young, Leo Holtham breaks off dazedly as she smiles pityingly at him and tells him she is going to marry the Duke of Conway. Only then does Leo realize that the woman he has loved so passionately has merely been using him to urge on her aged admirer.

In a fury Leo returns home and for a moment forgets his woe as he hears the sweet voice of Rita singing a ballad of love. Left upon the Holtham doorstep sixteen years ago, Rita had been taken in by Leo's people and when after wide advertising no one had claimed the child, the Holthams had adopted her. The night of the ball in honor of Rita's eighteenth birthday, Leo reads of the coming marriage of Ona and the Duke and possessed by a passion to show his unconcern, he determines to marry first. So lovely is Rita as she dances in his arms that he asks her to be his wife. While Rita, who has until very recently been at school and consequently known but few men, asks only if he is not afraid of marrying a girl about whose birth he knows nothing. "No," answers Leo, and the marriage arrangements are hurried so that a few days before Ona's marriage is to take place, Leo triumphantly carries off his bride on their honeymoon. However, a week later, Leo grows frantic as he reads that the aged Duke had died of heart failure, and self pity causes him to blame Rita for not being free now to marry Ona. Hurt by the inexplicable change in her bridegroom, Rita feels she has failed him and heart broken she leaves him to visit a school chum. However, troubled by Rita's dispiritedness, the friend writes in explanation to Mrs. Holtham who promptly visits Rita and induces her to come back home. At length it is the argument that Rita has too much pride to give Ona a chance to exult that wins back Rita's pretended zest in living. A year later, when Leo returns home he finds Rita apparently as happy as ever, and seeing the friends that flock about her, he grows jealous of every man upon whom Rita smiles.

For the first time, at a ball given in the neighborhood, Ona and Rita meet and consternation is widespread when Ona greets Leo's wife with, "You—I thought—I hoped you were dead." Rita can only exclaim dully, "Mother".

Ona is carried home unconscious and to Leo's chagrin Rita tends her unceasingly, while Leo realizes that his love for Ona is turned to hate for hurting Rita. At length Ona tells the pair how working for the father of Dick Lawson, she and Dick were secretly married. Dick was killed in an accident and when Ona told his parents she was going to have a child, they turned her out claiming she had trapped their son, but offering to adopt the baby. Ona, marrying one Devon, whom she learned to hate, had Rita kidnapped by a gypsy who, however, did not put the heautiful child in an asylum but left her to the Holthams.

Upon Ona's death, Leo convinced Rita of his love, and they left for a second honeymoon while Rita's grandparents, learned to love her as they had when she was a baby.

THE power of his father's influence gains a comfortable berth for T. Franklin Jerome at Tetley College, while Jimmie Wheaton, risen from the poorer section of the town has to fight for every atom of honor he wins. Even the football coach, cognizant of Jerome's backing is forced to send the scion into the big game which Tetley loses because Jerome, having broken training to see his mistress, Glenda Sanders, the night before, fumbles the ball. The coach is blamed and Jimmie who has tried valiantly to save the game, goes to Jerome's room to coach him for his exams, the only way Jerome can pass and gain a degree in Construction Engineering.

After graduation, Jimmie, happy over the honors he has received is plunged into despair by a letter from Mary Ellen, the girl he has always loved, telling him her father insists that she encourage Jerome's unwelcome attentions so that Mary Ellen's father can benefit from the Jerome prestige. Desperate, Jimmie submits plans for a railroad, and while the plans accepted are suspiciously like his own, he is grateful enough for the position of third assistant engineer, stilling his resentment of the fact that the incompetent Jerome is Assistant to the Chief. But Jerome, realizing that Mary Ellen is in love with Jimmie tries to get him out of the way by hiring the Slink to prematurely discharge dynamite, and when that fails has Jimmie accused. But because he is so valuable, Jimmie is demoted and not prosecuted and when Jerome learns that Jimmie is in dire need of money for an operation for his mother, he wields his hold on the Slink to force him to rob the payroll and put part of the money in Jimmie's pocket, the rest to go to Jerome's demanding mistress. The shock of the trial costs Jimmie's mother her life, and Jerome discovers that the portion which was to go to his mistress had been stolen by someone who had seen all. Glenda threatens him claiming she will expose him before his engagement, while Mary Ellen pleads in vain with her parents not to sacrifice her to their ambition. Stolen meetings with Jimmie somewhat console her and she makes him promise to come to her party, while Glenda, grown bolder, openly calls Jerome at his home and threatens him unless he meets her. Jerome gets drunk and Glenda steals several dollars and invitations to Mary Ellen's engagement party, also managing to blackmail Jerome's father on the side for stealing Jimmie's plans.

Not suspecting Glenda has already seen his father, Jerome in desperation has the Slink steal the necklace of Mary Ellen's mother when the lights go out, but instead of dropping a paste imitation in Jimmie's pocket, the befuddled Slink incriminates Jerome himself but they discover this is only a paste imitation and the party breaks up. The Slink is caught, however, pawning the necklace, and makes a complete confession ruining Jerome, the lover of his sister, Glenda. Meanwhile, the elder Jerome is killed in an automobile accident the same night that the shanty containing the plans for the construction of the railroad burns to the ground. Jimmie rejects the offer of the railroad to duplicate his plans but through the efforts of Mary Ellen's father, gets another position and happiness with the girl he loves.

THE GLORIOUS MUTINY

John Mangan File No. 7988

UPON her eighteenth birthday, Kathleen, the ward of Sir Peter Lawson, is summoned to India to join her guardian. Not suspecting that her guardian, many years older than she intends to marry her, Kathleen is out riding one day, when Corporal Flane of the Connor Rangers, rescues her from a prowling tiger. Grateful, she accepts his escort back to her home, and a warm friendship springs up between the two young people. Idyllically it flourishes while Flane grows more and more disturbed about rumors from Ireland of the atrocities committed by the Black and Tans. Kathleen does not take the matter as seriously as does Flane, and she smiles sympathetically when he grows fervent in his recitation of his country's grievances. Living in the British quarter as she does, Kathleen gains an entirely different viewpoint of the struggle, but because she is in love with the young Irishman she reserves her own judgment. However, when she hears her guardian grow wroth about the mutiny of the Rangers, she realizes the gravity of the situation. That day she questions Flane and learns that he and his men have, in a gesture of resentment against England, laid down their arms and given themselves up, feeling that they can no longer serve actively the England that is slaying their kin in Ireland. Kathleen pleads with Flane, points out that he is not only endangering his promising career, but his life in a quixotic venture. Even when she indicates that he is choosing his country at the expense of her love, Flane answers simply that he cannot sacrifice his principles. He assures her that his men are not striking against Great Britain, theirs is a passive resistance to a great wrong.

The reaction to the unprecedented conduct of the Rangers is great. The situation is widely discussed and since there is great danger that the justice of the Ranger's stand will be generally recognized, the British forces led by Kathleen's guardian who recognizes in Flane an active obstacle to his own designs, secretly incriminates the Rangers by a series of plots most of which are frustrated. The whole affair is misrepresented, and the brave Rangers are accused of unspeakable actions. Claiming that they are leading the natives to rebel, seize the munitions, and slay every white man in India, the British interests arrange for the court-martial of the Connor Rangers. The Irish lads are imprisoned in rotted prisons and the entire affair is so grossly misrepresented that even Kathleen is led to believe the Ranger's guilt. However, a bribed native comes to her guardian's house and demands the money he has been promised. His excited jabbering unmistakably indicates Sir Peter's incrimination, and with a dull pain in her heart, Kathleen realizes the monstrous injustice that is being done innocent men. Sir Peter threatens her life if she reveals what she knows, but with blazing eyes she points to the account of the court martial of the Rangers. The men allowed no attorney to defend them had been summarily convicted for sentences ranging from prison terms to death. Agonizedly, Kathleen works to right the terrible wrongs committed. It is slow work, however. But at length through her efforts and the reiterated demand of the Provisional Government of the Irish Free State, Great Britain releases the surviving prisoners, and Kathleen and Flane are free to consummate their love in marriage.

SONGS OF LOVE

Mrs. E. E. Brannen File No. 8170

HER hopes for a concert career dashed by Professor Murson's comment that her voice is suited only to singing lullabies, Melanie York impulsively spends most of her last seven dollars and twenty cents buying a perky green hat and a corsage of violets. Dismayed by a sudden shower of dust, Melanie scowls at the young man who has swept so recklessly and when he indicates that he is laughing at the smudge on her chin, she summons what grace she can and accepts his offer of soap and water. However, in the cluttered room, she sees a lovely girl, whose blank face speaks of insanity. A moment later a sinister man enters and after vainly trying to convince Ralph to work in his firm's laboratories, pounces upon Melanie and begs her to help him induce her husband. Seeing the pleading expression on the young man's face, Melanie does not indicate the man's mistake but as she goes with the statement "Mr. Phelps is capable of making his own decisions," Ralph calls after her, "Wait dear, I've decided to meet you at O'Neal's instead of Brady's."

Hunger, curiosity, and something else causes Melanie to keep the appointment at O'Neal's and after a long wait Ralph comes to explain that Dr. Stewart has been bringing pressure to bear to force him to commercialize some of his findings. Unscrupulous enough to use any weapon, Stewart would have used the scandal if not for Melanie's help. So it is that Melanie, against her own judgment, consents to carry out the role in acceptance of the Dr.'s invitation to the Phelps.

Alternately suffering misgivings and tenderness toward the handsome, distressed Ralph, Melanie feels herself falling in love as they play the role of devoted couple and when Ralph whispers he really loves her, she responds to his kisses. But Stewart, suspicious causes the car taking them back to break down and they are forced to spend the night in a farmhouse with limited accommodations. Constrained by the falseness of the situation, Melanie rashly asks for a good-night kiss. The next morning Melanie suggests marriage and miserably Ralph accepts blaming himself for what happened. Wondering why Ralph has never mentioned the insane girl, probably his sister, Melanie keeps her old room while Ralph uses his home for experiments. One night, waiting to tell him she is going to have a child, Melanie is stunned when after hours of waiting Stewart malevolently calls to inform her her husband was arrested for bigamy. Incredulous until Ralph admits before the vulgar, dissipated harridan who is his mother-in-law, that the insane lovely girl is his wife, Melanie turns away. Melanie suffers agonies unable to support her baby and at length welfare workers wrest the child from her. As Ralph enters, Melanie faints and when she recovers he explains that he has been freed by the dying confession of his wife, in a moment of lucidity, that her scheming mother had previously married her to other students similarly caught in equivocal situations. Stewart is dropped, Ralph is discovered by the scientific world, and when Professor Murson exclaims at the depth of Melanie's voice, she tells him she is now satisfied singing lullabies.

DAWNING

Samuel Gordon Welch File No. 8153

FEELING that he has no right to ask Gloria Day, whose father is one of the wealthiest men in town, to marry him, Horace Finch accepts a teaching offer in the west and leaves with the promise that Gloria will write to him. Through the next three years of disillusion and heartbreak Gloria's purity remains to him a symbol together with his father's earnest counsel that he avoid the pitfalls of the world. An idealist of the highest kind, believing in a Dynamic Force which will lead him to a victorious end, Horace soon learns how much hypocracy and evil masquerades under the cover of respectability.

On his trip west, financing himself by selling hosiery, Horace makes a sale to a lovely young woman, Esther Brooks, and for one moment the bright memory of Gloria fades. While he stays over night in the town, he has occasion to deliver a sermon and the lustrous eyes of Esther haunt him as she drinks in his words. Finally, however, he goes on to Danton and there begins a troubling period. Dismayed by the evils practiced by the other educators, Horace estranges himself from them by refusing to join in their malpractices. Small, his superintendent tries desperately to secure Horace's dismissal, and ugly unfounded rumors begin to spread. Horace finds himself accused of stealing the pencils of his poorer students when he confiscates the pencil with which a student is irritatingly drumming on his desk. Finding the children, following the examples of their elders, steal and lie, Horace sets out fervently to curb the misdoings, but at every hand his efforts are misinterpreted and he is even accused of defaming the characters of his girl pupils. At length, driven to despair, Horace feeling that even Gloria must eventually hear of these ugly rumors, wanders to the river and is contemplating ending his life when Zero, a shell-shocked amnesia victim whom Horace has befriended sensing some finer instincts arising from his beclouded past, comes up to Horace, and delivering a letter changes the whole course of both lives. For the letter tells Horace that his patent has been accepted by a large company, and at the same time Zero hearing the name of Horace's legal representatives gasps in the recognition of his own firm,—he is Ernest Brooks. Remembering all now, Ernest eagerly tells Horace about his past and as he mentions his daughter Esther, Horace excitedly promises to help him find his daughter; but unfortunately Esther has been driven from town by malicious gossip. Horace stays just long enough in Danton to vindicate himself, expose Small, and win the acclaim of his former antagonists. At length he returns to Gloria but when he asks for her hand, rich now from the proceeds of his patent, Gloria's father confesses that Gloria is only an adopted daughter, and the trail of her paternity leads to an unmarried mother. Still determined to marry Gloria and take her to India on a fellowship offered him there, Horace receives still another blow when his father painfully confesses that he had been the lover of Gloria's mother.

Stunned by the realization that Gloria is his half-sister, Horace goes on alone to India and there dramatically meets again Esther Brooks, doing missionary work. Horace establishes her reunion with her now recovered father, and when they return home it is as man and wife.

QUEEN OF THE CAMPUS

Henry Finkelpearl File No. 8142

ORDERED to propose to the first co-ed he meets on the campus, as a punishment for wearing the colored socks forbidden by the hazing committee, Dan Goodwin bows low before Florence White, who for a similar violation has been ordered to make the rounds of the campus with her face made up like an Indian. That starts a friendship which lasts through the four years during which with great ceremony Florence is elected, largely through Dan's faithful electioneering, Queen of the Campus. Saddened by the imminence of graduation. Dan sits opposite Florence in the College Inn and almost embraces her before the scandalized dean, when she announces that her application as a social worker in his home town has been accepted.

The first day at the hospital Dan calls for Florence in his red roadster and she warns him not to drive so fast. He is heedless of the warning until, shocked, he discovers that he has run down a child and crushed the youngster's foot. Remorseful, he drives to the hospital and asks that the boy be given the best surgical attention at his expense. Dan spends all his time at the hospital bringing the lad candy and games but when the child's mother sues for $30,000, Mr. Sharp, President of the bank of which Dan has inherited controlling interest, and executor of his father's estate, tells Dan he will not let him draw any more money and hires an unscrupulous attorney who can prove through paid witnesses that the negligence was the child's. Moreover, knowing that Florence's evidence may destroy the trumped up evidence, Sharp calls her to his office and informs her that if she does not testify as she is instructed she will lose her position at the hospital. But although when, furiously, she returns home it is to find a letter from her brother pleading for financial assistance since he has lost his position, and although she knows that Sharp's threat is not an empty one, she testifies the next day entirely truthfully. Dan, indifferent to the legal battle sends her a note inviting her to dinner but she curtly refuses telling him she hates him for trying to cheat the child out of what is justly due him.

To the astonishment of his side, therefore, when Dan is called to the stand he testifies that he was speeding and that only Florence's testimony is true. There is pandemonium in the court but Dan promises to compensate the boy and the case is dismissed. Florence is more amenable to Dan thereafter, but the furious Sharp, refuses to certify Dan's check, and when Dan threatens his bank position, Sharp summons a doctor who even at the threat of having his mortgage foreclosed, refuses to declare Dan insane. However, Sharp stops at nothing and discovers that a Sanitarium for Mental Diseases will hold a patient for observation. Accordingly, Sharp hires Big Jim, a disreputable character to kidnap Dan and bring him to the asylum under the name of Charles Jones. Dan, struggling, is put in a straight jacket, while his valet, worried tells Florence of Dan's disappearance. However, on the strength of the note Florence had written speaking of Hate, she is held as a material witness. Only when Big Jim to alibi himself out of suspicion in connection with a hold-up discloses that he was bringing an insane man to an asylum is the case cleared in time to prevent the unscrupulous Sharp from taking affairs at the bank into his own hands. Dan, with his 60% of the stock and the votes of the other directors is elected President, and dining with Florence in Dan's apartment, Dan happily secures Florence's consent to an immediate marriage.

GIFT OF LOVE

Carrie Elaine Dorset File No. 7950

BREEZING into his grandmother's home, Lance McAllister was certain of his power over all women—not excluding the fussy little dowager who remained for all her sixty-five years an active figure in Gotham's social life. Then he caught sight of the little person his grandmother was telling to come back later. "Hello," he called. She was a pretty thing. Frowning slightly, Mrs. McAllister murmured the girl was her social secretary. The visit was brief. Mrs. McAllister was worldly enough to know that Lance always had an eye for handsome women, but she wished he wouldn't carry his intrigues on under her nose.

But Lance did. Intrigued by the girl's honesty, he learned that she was fresh from a convent. It was too good to be true. He wore her like a jewel, taking her here and there, but it wasn't until he almost killed Ronny for making a slurring remark that he knew the girl had gotten him. Lord it was funny! And Eloise remained largely untouched by the tremendous issues about her. Lance liked her voice, and she sang for him. He liked to dance and so did she. He loved her, she him. But that hadn't been mentioned yet. Then, one day, Eloise wasn't there when Lance came. No note, no word. Just gone. Lance was stunned. Philosophically he tried other women. They were worse than dull. He tried everything, drinking, railing bitterly against Eloise, but it wasn't until he realized that for all his deviltry, his confounded appeal, he was pretty much of a parasite, that he could find any slightest excuse for Eloise's going. But why should she have gone without a word? He tried to find her, of course, but there were no clues. It was while he was on his way to the opening of the Moon Garden Inn, that his car, turning a corner on two wheels, turned over. There followed weeks in a hospital while the bone in his broken leg slowly mended. Restlessly watching dull days slip by while he remained confined within the hospital room, Lance discouraged his friends from calling. And after the first few attempts they accepted his indisposition with a remarkable calmness. Only his little Aunt Melissa persisted. There was Dr. Bogart, the young house doctor, who found Lance's company entertaining and dropped in as frequently as possible, but that was all. And Lance thought more and more of Eloise. All the bitterness had gone now, only his longing for her remained, and his wonder.

Finally the day arrived when the cast was to be removed. Lance was leaving. Dr. Bogart entered, chatted, smoked Lance's cigarettes. He was going to miss Lance. The McAllister laughed shortly. Nobody'd miss him. He'd never done a useful thing in his life. Fine time to start now. But how? There was a call for the house doctor. Later he came back, concerned. There was a charity patient dying in the ward. Somehow the girl had touched him. Had been a singer in the Moon Garden Inn. One of the chorus girls, angered by her apparent aloofness—actually the girl had just been timid, unused to night life, had pushed her maliciously and the girl had fallen from a prop moon. She needed a blood transfusion and they couldn't find the right type. Lance insisted on volunteering. It was against all regulations, but they had to let him try. Qualifying, Lance reassured his frightened Aunt Melissa, who despairing of preventing her nephew, confessed that his grandmother had appealed to her social secretary to leave because she wasn't Lance's equal. The girl had gone. The transfusion went off, and later, the house doctor told Lance the patient was better. Lance saw Bogart's expression and was glad, but when he was allowed to see the girl he threw himself at the girl with a cry of "Eloise!" and the House Doctor walked out shaking his head. That girl wasn't for him, she'd been a cute trick, too.

SINNERS MUST PAY

Anton J. Cennamo File No. 8115

RENOWNED for his prowess in battle, the wealthy and handsome Duke of Duero is a confirmed misogynist through his bitter experience with the fickle Edna, who had led him on only to elude him and marry another. Thereafter he is the more ruthless in the wars, but because he holds his own life so cheaply, his body seems to bear a charmed existence and at each return from battle, he is the more loudly cheered and the more indifferent.

At length, however, at a dinner which he is forced to attend through the command of the viceroy, he meets the lovely Maria. At first regarding her with his accustomed asceticism he is moved by her dainty young beauty and capitulating utterly before the evening has drawn to a conclusion he soon woos her with an ardor the more warm for being so long denied. Seizing her to his breast he tells her of his love and begs her to be his bride, but before she can accept he warns her bitterly that should she ever give him cause to suspect her fidelity he would run her through. Chilled by the gravity of his pronouncement, Maria taunts him gently asking how she, who loves him so dearly, could ever be unfaithful. For months after their marriage, the Duke and his fair Duchess are ecstatically happy, but at length the call to war sounds and the Duke must leave his wife more and more frequently. Then the Duchess is grief-stricken at the report of her beloved consort's death and one Don Cesaro who has always loved Maria but has not dared act hitherto, prepares now to seize the Duchess. Repulsing his advances she tells him he would not dare speak if her husband were living, but the impassioned Don Cesaro is not so easily put off, and one night, after Maria has retired, he breaks into her room and seizes her in a stifling embrace. She struggles desperately and just then there is a terrible cry and the Duke stands in the arras. Maria runs to him but he thrusts her from him and claims he was testing her with the report of his death and so soon has she proved unfaithful. Stunned, Maria cannot defend herself and in a white fury of contempt the enraged Duke, rather than taint himself by drawing the blood of two such people, forces the Don to sign a pledge committing himself to a monastery while he puts Maria in a convent. Helplessly Maria is led away while the cravenly Don Cesaro breaks his vow and hides in a distant city. In a few months the emboldened Don makes love to another woman, but one night he is confronted by a masked figure who orders him to draw. In the darkness of a deserted street, the Duke and the Don duel and at length the Don is outstretched, lifeless. A pickpocket robs the dead body and is caught and sentenced to death.

Meanwhile Maria has made futile efforts to convince her husband of her guiltlessness but he is deaf to her pleas and cut off from all outside communication he does not know that the poor pickpocket is appealing to be saved from the charge of murder. Maria learns of the case and in a last effort to reach her husband attempts suicide telling him of her love and begging him at least to spare the poor vagabond. Moved by this demonstration, the Duke hovers at her bedside and Maria who has missed killing herself, recovers to find renewed happiness at the side of her loved husband.

THE WORD SPREADS

E. C. Stanley File No. 8434

LIKING the work at his father's mill and farm at Honey Creek, Ohio, (threshing, hauling wood and flour, fishing, fruit-picking, honey making) and swimming and hunting with customers' sons, David Stanley, school truant, is brought to school every day by his teacher or mother. However, when his mother marries a preacher after his father's death, he leaves school to visit his brother, Henry, in Indiana for work. Several weeks later, ashamed of his continuous penury and shabbiness, when Maria Evan, daughter of the town's leading citizen confesses her love, David runs away to the home of his brother-in-law to work unmolested on his farm, and then home again to work the mill for his stepfather. Still bashful of girls, he repudiates the attentions of Caroline Milligan, a city girl, and welcomes the friendship of Priscilla Morris, a school chum, at husking bees, sleigh parties and country dances. Their buggy stuck in a mudhole one day while riding home one evening, David suddenly proposes and is quite overcome when Priscilla kisses him. In the years that follow, he earns money for his growing family by selling trees which he plants in orchards for his clients. Farmers along the way feed and shelter him for he gives them spiritual comfort in his preaching and psalm-singing; but when the trade falters, Priscilla and her sons are kept constantly moving from one town to the other in Indiana and Ohio where he sells groceries, dry goods, insurance, collects bills, clerks in offices, and serves on juries. However, always an impassioned preacher, David continues to neglect his work for attendance at revivals all over the country where people are hysterically converted and famous preachers, such as Moody, bring tears to their eyes. Everywhere preachers and friends welcome him to sing and pray with them. Returning home for lightning visits to soothe his family with provisions from his mother's farm,—where many missionaries and ministers are entertained,—to whitewash the house, teach his sons, to borrow money from the neighbors for his family and for alms to the poor, David is soon gone. Priscilla nurses, takes in sewing, and sends her children to school in Dublin, Indiana where they now live; but always defends David when relatives deplore his material failures.

After the excitement of seeing the covered wagon parades march through the town on their westward journey, comes the Civil War; and when Mr. Ellsworth, the hotel keeper is shot by a hidden secessionist while hauling down the rebel flag, and when his (David's) license as local preacher is not renewed (because of his inability to contribute more funds), David follows the Union soldiers to the battlefield where his preaching lifts them to thoughts of victory, both physical and spiritual. When the guerrilla troops of a southern general plunder the town, David's youngest son, John, is trampled to death; and David, arriving to relate the glorious news of Union victories at Bull Run, Vicksburg, and Atlanta, finds her mourning. Comforting her by his prayers, he gets her a position as a nurse in the town hospital, now crowded with wounded, and returns to the battlefield. Realizing that a dying prisoner is the general whose troops have killed his son, David overcomes his fury and prays with him. Returning home penniless, David now moves his family to Richmond, where after failing as an insurance salesman, he becomes a store clerk, while Priscilla sells her preserves and fresh fruits at the stand in charge of her oldest son, Edward. Assisting them here one day, David is horrified to notice his brother, Michael among the prisoners marching through; so that when the latter, escaping in a stolen southern uniform one day, appears at his home, David hides him and spends his last cent to notify his wife, Ruth, whom the rebels have ousted from her native town to Baltimore. No sooner have they departed that night, when David is arrested for harboring a prisoner. Hiding in his wagon which Priscilla drives, the Stanley family soon reaches Dayton. Always involved in political controversies at friends' homes and taverns concerning the election of Buchanan, Grant, and Lincoln, it is David who organizes the torchlight processions and the mourning parade when Lincoln is murdered. When the flood invades Dayton, David leaves Priscilla to get supplies and assist the neighbors with his boat from their inundated homes; and when he borrows money to organize a coal oil company in Kentucky where it has recently been discovered, Priscilla takes charge of the co-operating general store he had started in co-operation with and for, the returned soldiers and their starving families. Disliking the small, dark rooms in back of the store where Priscilla, in order to save large rentals, has moved, David, returning a failure again, rushes away after a word of greeting to her, to Cincinnati, where Michael is dying of the cholora which is raging there. Several months later, learning of Henry's prosperity —for it is with him that Michael had started en route for California,—David, ignoring Priscilla's plea to accept the secure position as preacher-writer offered him by the Ohio State Journal, travels to try his luck there, and to preach to the new settlers there. Aged by care several years later, Priscilla stares reminiscently from the telegram in her hand—(informing her of Edward's arrival with his fiancee from his college town), to the window where her hectic past with David seems to be traced, when she is suddenly amazed to see him (David) the center of a throng cheering for the election of McKinley. Loving him always, she forgives him and kisses his begrimed face as Edward enters with his bride. After the happy wedding, in view of his services to the Union and his people, David is granted a license as preacher of his county; and Priscilla, looking forward to a dubious future still, smiles happily with tears in her eyes as David preaches an eloquent sermon of faith.

LOVE'S KINGDOM

Winona Boissell File No. 8478

INFURIATED because his son refuses to follow in his footsteps as a mill worker and insists upon a college education, Jim Craig orders him from the house in spite of his wife's weeping protests. Discovering that Martha, his wife, is taking in sewing to support Lee, the son, Jim gives her less money every week and watches her closely in her comings and goings. In the years that follow, Martha sells her jewels, valuable clothes, and her books to provide the necessary money for Lee who knows nothing of these sacrifices. She becomes more and more of a recluse, and her only answer to Jim's tirades about her too rigid economy in clothes, food, renting off part of the house to boarders, is a venomous stare. Always during Lee's vacations when he invites her to visit with him in the city, Martha refuses, pleading illness or house duties; and once, informed of his arrival in town, hastily meets him at the station, entertains him in a boarder's room upstairs and hurries him out of the house before Jim returns from work, sulkily demanding his supper. Several months later, receiving a telegram of his graduation from college, Martha importunes Kenneth Tain, Jim's rival for her hand in former days, to grant him a position as beginner—engineer in his company. Meeting him at the station the next day, Martha promises to meet him again there after she has packed her things in preparation for her attendance at his coming wedding. Having found the money she has stored away as a gift for Lee, and having discovered through her letters with her son of her negotiations with Kenneth, Jim angrily arrives home an hour earlier to berate her; and when he finds her leaving, takes the valise from her. However, when she in her first vengeful fury, tells him that Lee is not his son, Jim drops the bag and stares at her horrified.

Refusing the engineering opportunities in South America offered him by Kenneth for a more monotonous but better remunerated position with a rival company, Lee invites his mother to live with them. Noticing his late hours at gambling, his small allowance of money to his wife at the end of the week, and his constant nagging about the food, the child's crying, or her shabby clothes, Mrs. Craig, remembering her own early marital years with Jim, urges his wife, Beatrice, to get a position. Discovering that she is working for one of his woman friends, Lee hurts her in his anger, and when Mrs. Craig intervenes, throws her from the house. At Kenneth's house, whence Mr. Craig has gone to inquire about his wife's whereabouts, Jim noticing Beatrice's friendship with Kenneth, hastens to Lee's house to inform him of such grounds for divorce; and when he finds Martha (his wife) urging him (Lee) to visit Beatrice at the hospital where she is giving birth, Jim tells Lee of his mother's confession about his legitimacy and of Beatrice's course in her footsteps, with Kenneth. Trying to stop her from pushing Lee into a taxi downstairs, Jim is run over, and Martha, trying to save him, is seriously hurt. Pleading forgiveness, Jim dies several hours later, and Martha at the hospital, hears Beatrice tell Lee of his mother's sacrifices and the lie she told in order to go with him. As Kenneth enters to give Lee the position for which Beatrice has asked, Mrs. Craig clasps his hand as her son and daughter-in-law embrace.

THE GODDESS OF PEACE ISLAND

Bruno M. Stracke File No. 8419

REACHING Peace Island after a shipwreck, George Swift, engineer for Henry Pennock & Co., New York, is saved from the cannibalistic fate of his fellow-survivors by Olga Redliff, the white goddess, marooned there six years ago by dissolute young Pennock.

Blistered and aching from his compulsory hunting, fishing and shark-killing expeditions with Mayo, a stalwart cannibal, and with Olga, who has made George her slave, George's entreatics for mercy and rest are ruthlessly and sneeringly ignored.

Months elapse. George is a fullfledged islander, stronger and healthier than ever. One day during the rainy season, George forgetting his hatred of Olga, and his love for his fiancee, Gloria, of whom he had told Olga previously, sneaks up to the sleeping Olga and kisses her. Olga pushing George back, severely reproaches him for his infidelity to Gloria, and for renewing her hatred for men just when she had begun to have some faith in him,—threatens to offer him as a lover to Lora, a robust cannibal girl.

George implores Olga to give him another chance. As this is preemptorily refused, George, in a fit of uncontrollable rage and despair, attempts to kill Olga. He fails. Olga is about to kill George when Mayo rushes into the hut to announce the arrival of a boat.

Olga, concerned about her people, orders George to go with the arrivals, English sailors. George's reluctance effects Olga's threat to kill herself. George, following a sudden impulse, disarms Olga, and, despite her kicking and biting, carries her toward the boat while the sailors check the cannibal's advance. A short distance off the boat, George is nearly killed by Mayo, who, however, is timely disabled by two sailors in the boat.

Refusing at first to wear anything but a loincloth, Olga finally dons a sailor's uniform. She sleeps on deck, dreads the people she had never wanted to see again, and commands George to be near her all the time.

Arriving in Cape Town, Olga at last is persuaded to wear proper clothes, and to reveal her identity to the American consul, who immediately communicates with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Redliff in New York.

Olga's odd behavior furnishes amusement for the Cape Town people and for the passengers on the liner for New York. Meeting Claire Saunders, a wealthy society girl, who asks many questions about Olga's past, and who is infatuated with George, Olga hurls her into a group of passengers when the girl offends her after the sudden death of Bobby Yeomans, Claire's fiance, during an over-stimulating swim in the boat pool.

Claire Saunders, regretting her rashness, jumps overboard, but is saved by Olga. The captain's and the passengers' praise for this heroic deed, and Claire Saunders' apology as well, move Olga to an extent that she admits to be glad to be back to civilization.

Reunited with their relatives, Olga and George learn that Gloria is married. This news at length brings about the secretly and earnestly longed for moment: the apparently insurmountable barrier between Olga and George vanishes. Their hearts speak.

THE MYSTERY LADY

E. Chilson File No. 8154

TROUBLED by the report that strange things have happened in the old Rutledge mansion which her fiance has bought, Janet insists that he uncloak the mystery of its former owners. The house has that disagreeable odor and mildewed appearance of places long boarded up. But more than that Paul begins to feel that perhaps the rumor is true, perhaps there is a body buried somewhere on the premises. At length he discovers he can get a clue from Nina, a gaunt, superstitious Creole woman. But Nina, swaying and chanting monotonously, is uncommunicative until Paul, becoming aware that she is mumbling "If I had only known!" asks—"Would you have done differently, Nina?" Whereupon, she unfolds the story of the Rutledge house:

It was at the Mardi gras that Royal Rutledge, a debonaire young Northerner, first saw Ines Ortega in the gay, whirling throng. Royal was immediately attracted, but Ines scorned the advances of the genial stranger. However, when she left for home, accompanied by Nina, her faithful Creole servant, Royal followed.

Meanwhile, on the road over which she must pass, four roisterers, inflamed with drink, were duelling with the swords that were accessories of their costumes. One of them fancying some intended affront, their sportive jest turned to bitter earnest. At that moment Ines and Nina appearing they were seized by the boisterous, inflamed fellows. It was Royal, who, after a fierce struggle, rescuing the two hysterical women, gave them safe escort home.

A month later, when Royal returned North to the Rutledge home, he brought with him his bride Ines and her idolatrous servant—Nina. Nina grew to hate Rutledge for his ridicule of her superstitious practices, and even more for his neglect in the months that followed of her adored young mistress. For though Ines made no complaint, Nina observed her misery as night after night Royal left her alone while engaged in business dealings with one—Brown. That Brown might be a woman Ines refused to admit, even to herself.

At sunrise, worn from her long and lonely night vigils, Ines was frequently awakened by the report of Royal's gun, shooting at the crows that gathered outside their windows. At such times she screamed in terror, later ascribing these shrieks to fear for the wrens worried by the marauding crows, rather than to the noise made by the gun. One morning, thus awakened, Ines slipped into a garment and went outside, intent upon the welfare of the birds. Discovering that Royal had killed one, fearing lest the flies swarm in ugly feasting over the tiny body, she protected it with a little box, preparatory to burying it later with a simple ceremony of her own.

Returning to her room, she found Royal awake and awaiting her with an enigmatic expression in his eyes. Preparing to dress, Ines saw a white fuzz on his coat. In answer to her unspoken question, Royal explained that Brown had hung his sweater over the coat in a pool room.

Even then Ines refused to believe Brown was a woman. And when Royal seized and held her in a grip so close as to be painful she moaned her love for him. But Royal put her aside in silence, marveling that her love persisted despite his ill treatment, that she could plead to share his troubles. How could he drag her into the web that was ensnaring him? For long, having speculated with funds entrusted to him; enabled heretofore to return them through success or through the aid of the woman Brown, Royal was now faced with the tightening clutches of law and the contempt of business associates. For how could he hope to convince anyone that his relationship with Brown, a night-club operator, had been solely one of business? That now she refused further assistance, attempting instead to use her hold on him to win his love? So, for a last time Royal purposed to try to cancel his obligations, to retrieve his past. If he failed—suicide!

Catching Nina in the act of eavesdropping, with unnecessary roughness Rutledge thrust her into the hall, thereby igniting the fires of her active enmity. The words of a Mexican woman, a peddler of laces, confirming the fact of the accredited intimacy with Brown; her gossip about the report that Rutledge threatened to commit suicide rather than suffer the shame of imprisonment; her coarse speculation as to the use Ines, his widow, would make of his insurance money was addressed to Nina, but was overheard by Ines.

Unaware of this, when Nina suggested a sleeping potion that she might further Rutledge's suicide unhindered by Ines' presence, the consent of Ines was gained with surprisingly little hesitation. Nina, in her anxiety to further Rutledge's act of self-destruction and administer an overdose of a sleeping potion; induced a stupor that she, herself, mistook for the sleep of—death.

As Rutledge was about to release the trigger of the pistol that was to accomplish his purpose, actuated by her vindictive hatred of him Nina stayed the act, desiring to gloat over his anguish at the sight of his dead wife. She accused him of causing that death.

Dawn was breaking when the raucous cawing of the crows penetrated his grief stricken mind. Automatically, desiring to protect Ines from the dreaded sound, he moved to shoot them. Again Nina stayed his intention: "You be det, an' all of trouble dispair. Shoot queck!" But Rutledge's sense of manhood asserting itself, he fired all six chambers of the pistol she offered amongst the crows, vowing that "no crow shall sing my requiem". This fusilade awakened Ines.

Royal moved to fight his cause, unaware that his lawyer had extracted a full confession from Brown. As a result he gained freedom, and happiness with the wife he loved, while Nina was left to lament the result of her greedy hate. Furthermore, this story of the triumph of the Rutledges' love precipitated a happy ending to the romance of Paul and Janet.

GULL HOUSE

Gloria Barton File No. 8136

DISTURBED by the sound of footsteps and over thrown furniture from the attic and basement, the Endicotts, on their first night in their summer home, Gull House, begin their investigation. But this is complicated by the nervousness of Dora, the maid, and her leaving with Bertrand, the chauffeur, by the eavesdropping of Mrs. Wilkins, the cook, who is seen leaving the house on mysterious missions; by Mrs. Underwood, a neighbor, who questions Katherine Endicott closely. These with the frequent visits of Johnson, the new chauffeur, to the Gregg home, where he divulges details of the investigation at Gull House, and his being found prowling about by Mrs. Wilkins, excite the family.

Later on, Jack Merritt, the watchman, and Johnson, the chauffeur, who have been guarding the basement, after seeing a man leaving the garage, rush out to invistigate; and are later found by Larry, the gardener, in a drugged condition after they had finished their midnight snack. Telephoned by Mr. Anderson, another neighbor, the next morning that his jewels had been stolen, Robert and Phil Endicott hurry off. Accompanied by Mr. Shaffer, a closer neighbor, who has been seen, with a stout man, his visitor, staring and prowling around the Endicott house, they arrive home with Bertrand's cap, found on the Anderson premises.

In the meantime, Katherine receives a note of warning in the arbor, where she later meets Janet, a visitor at the Shaffer house. Finding a handkerchief marked "Y" there, Katherine later notices the same letter on Janet's locket when they attend a tennis match together.

The jewels entrusted to her by the panicky Mrs. Underwood, had been stolen, together with those of Robert's wife, Hortense. It develops that the noise in the adjoining room as she had opened the secret drawer to deposit them, had been someone hiding. Katherine then visits Mrs. Underwood to give her the French letter she received for her, as requested.

Informed that Horton, the owner of the house, is to visit them, Mr. Lawton, the agent, has carpenters sent over to open the locked room, and to make repairs at the Gregg and Endicott home. The luxury of the secret room—with its fine pictures, carpets, and vases draws Katherine to revisit it, and noticing the curtains on the walls pushed aside, she investigates. Finding a secret panel, Katherine pushes buttons and discovers a stairway with another room at the foot wherein certain wires have been cut and traces found of a depleted treasury. Fleeing up the staircase in terror, Katherine encounters a frightened Dora. Just then shouts, shots, and the crash of an airplane urge them to hasten outside, where they see Johnson's dead body in the ruins and Mrs. Underwood fleeing. Accompanied by Mr. Shaffer, the stout man, or really, Thomas J. Eveleth, of the Department of Justice, and Geoffrey Arbuthnot Yates, alias Parker, of Scotland Yard, (Janet's father), with other detectives, Phil Endicott follows the fleeing Mr. Gregg, who is finally cornered after much shooting and chasing through underbrush and fields.

Having stolen the sapphire the night Jack and Johnson had been drugged—Johnson had refused to share with Gregg or the gang, who had threatened him with death; but he had found his death in attempting to escape from them in the airplane, which had been followed by the detectives, leaving the whereabouts of the sapphire a mystery.

Shortly afterwards, Katherine mistakes a young visiting stranger with a bag for the tuner, whom she had sent for when the piano had one day produced mysterious noises alone, and invites him to the house; and after she has ordered him to play the piano in attendance to his task, is embarrassed to learn that he is Mr. Horton, owner of Gull House. Their friendship grows with country walks, talks in the arbor, and visits to the cliff; so that when he proposes to her before his departure, she almost knows the answer she will write him.

In the early part of his visit Mr. Horton tells the story of the sapphire, stolen from archeologists of the British Museum, and in turn snatched from them by Boris, a traitor member of Gregg's gang, later reformed and friend of Mr. Horton's uncle, Paul Thatcher, to whom the sapphire was entrusted for safe keeping, accounting for its hiding place in the cellar of Gull House when stolen again by Gregg and Johnson.

After hope of recovering the sapphire is nearly abandoned Katherine and Janet discovering it in the garden fountain, place it in the former hiding place, from a conviction on Katherine's part that Mr. Horton would propose from a sense of obligation to her. But Janet's father overhears and reveals the little scheme.

The next day, after promising to return and announce her engagement to Phil, whom she loves, Janet departs for England with her father, the Eveleths and Mr. Horton. On the ship they recognize Mrs. Underwood, who tells the detectives about her step father, Mr. Gregg, and her brother Jacques, (or Johnson) London gangsters, and of her marriage to Maurice, a Frenchman, to whom she had told nothing of her parentage. Followed by their blackmailing gang, the suspicious Maurice casts her from the house; and pursuing the gang for revenge, she had been forced into implication in their schemes to obtain the sapphire, the location of which they had learned through intercepted letters.

Before leaving for England Mr. Horton asks Katherine to return his love and she promises to write. No sooner has he left, however, than Lady Agnes Dunwiddi, visitor at the neighboring Andersons, pays Katherine a call and gives the impression that Mr. Horton is really attached to her daughter, but feels his deep obligation to Katherine for finding the sapphire. This brings about a letter of refusal from Katherine.

Perplexed as to the cause, Mr. Horton pays a surprise visit, and finding Katherine on the cliff, explains away the false implication, avowing his love for her and her alone.

THE DARK PATH

L. M. Morrison File No. 8014

SHE was too young to stay away from home to attend school, Mr. Morris decided for his daughter Ella whose one ambition always had been to rise above her lowly environment. "She'd show them!" thought Ella; and she did, by marrying Ned, handsome in a blond way, untrustworthy in his wanderlust ways, and always the ladies' man. Ella was puzzled at the grim, unhappy look on her father's face when Ned came to take her away to the farm they had rented in a distant town. And it wasn't long before that look came to rest on Ella's face as well, for as the years passed, and as the children continued to come, they moved from uncomfortable farm to farm; but Ella would not have minded this or the orgy of housework and nursing if Ned hadn't absented himself from home so frequently. Forgiving him always in her love for him, and in her hope for his reform as the children grew, Ella ignored his weak excuses when he returned home late at night, or brought little or no pay at the end of the week. When he arrived home drunk one night, it was Ella who kept the secret of how he had overthrown the lamp in his clumsiness, and so burnt the farm. Homeless, again, Ella and her children lived with her sister-in-law for a time, and it was as a result of nursing her niece when she had pneumonia, that she herself contracted it and almost died while Ned was away as usual. At her mother's house, she heard for the first time from the neighbors who had known Ned from boyhood of his affairs with women and of his gambling habits; but when his letters to her finally ceased, she was heartbroken in spite of this gossip. But there were the children's educations to be thought of; so Ella, worn and worried, worked now as a cotton picker in neighboring fields, now as a clerk, soda-jerker, or nurse in a nearby town; and in spite of the admiring glances of her male associates, she still longed for Ned. Even after learning of Ned's detention in prison for theft, she still left the room when the neighbors or her parents spoke harshly of him, and still refused to encourage Paul, a young farmhand who was very much in love with her.

She continued to write pleading letters to the governor and warden in Ned's behalf after she had moved to another town to accept a position as housekeeper to a cranky, rheumatic old lady. Although the joy of having the children with her encouraged her to go on, the constant drudgery and slight salary almost tempted her to accept Paul's offer of marriage which he made on one of his many visits to her there; but the news of Ned's freedom immediately sent her to his arms again. But Ned was still the same, and he soon gambled away the little money she had saved, and only Ella knew nothing of his brazen affair with Maud, a young village girl. Finally, when Ned disappeared again, for several years this time,—Ella, after obtaining another more profitable position as housekeeper for several motherless children, divorced him; and when their father who was bringing them up, offered to marry her, Ella, tempted by his wealth and the comfort of his home, almost consented, had not Paul again offered marriage to her. Ella was indeed surprised when after several years of happily married life with the kindly Paul, she received a letter from Maud asking her to reveal Ned's (her husband now) whereabouts; for he had forced her to live the same wretched existence as Ella had.

At the time Paul's dead body was brought in from the field, Ella was the owner of their farm and car, and was educating her children in the nearby high schools and colleges; and her greatest pride was her oldest son William for whom his teachers at the conservatory had prophesied a bright future as a singer. When a year later, Ned and his mother suddenly appeared at her home, although Ella had long burnt all relics of him as the dead past, her pity for his weakness, and her hope for his reform, again awoke her love for him; so that when she learned of his divorce from Maud, and when he proposed marriage, she accepted him, as much for the sake of her children who had always loved him, as for her own. However, the next year, when the crops failed, and the children were ill, Ned, true to his nature, left Ella suddenly on the pretext of obtaining a better position in town; so that it was only after Ella had borne the hardships of giving birth to her child and then watching it die a year later, that the bank broke the news to her of her husband's mortgaging the house to get money to get him out of some trouble in town. After paying her debts and Ned's note, Ella found herself penniless again, but his refusal to come to her at the time of her birth-labour, in spite of telephone calls and telegrams sent by her mother, turned her former affection for him into hate, and finally indifference; so that when, after William's successful recital at the city hall, a chance newspaper clipping brought her news of the death by accident of a vagrant, Ned Spears, Ella could only sigh with relief and regret for his wasted life. She looked at herself, an elderly woman in the mirror. Was hers wasted too; but when her smiling, ambitious young children entered, she laughed a happy "no" to herself.

GUNMAN'S MOLL

John Frank Dopak, Jr. File No. 8027

RALPH WARREN, head of the Washington, D. C. secret service bureau stares frowningly at the note from the Chicago police, calling for two experienced secret service men who know Chicago gangsters. His brow clears, however, as he greets Joe Simon and Roy Black, two of his workers who fully answer this description.

At Chicago, as the first step in their round-up of criminals, Alcock, head of the Chicago police, and the two young men visit Paul Simon, a brilliant student of mechanics at the University of Chicago, who has invented an automatic camera which inconspicuously placed in a vault or door, takes pictures of intruders.

Arrived at police headquarters, with the aid of his men, Alcock introduces the visiting detectives to the latest police devices such as the radio car telephone whereby communication is possible between a person in a static place and a moving car; to tear-gas bombs which may be conveniently strapped to the wrist without being detected.

At the house bequeathed to him by his parents, Paul introduces Roy and his brother, Joe, to Jean Smith, his fiancee, and her friend, Betty whom Roy immediately likes. In the evening, to celebrate the beginning of their difficult assignment, and to look around for the gangsters whose pictures Alcock has shown them, they all visit the Cante Ete Night Club; and while they are all dancing, dining, and drinking, the keen eyes of Alice, the moll of one of Chicago's biggest gangsters, follows the figure of Paul for she has often seen his picture in the papers under articles describing inventions to outwit criminals. When she conveys her suspicions to Jack Morgan, the head of the gang, he nods toward the door as a signal of dispersal to his men. Paul notices their hurried exit, but his friends refuse to pursue them, for there is a baffling lack of evidence against them.

In the days that follow, Paul and his men get nowhere in their search, while Morgan's gang gloats daily over the growing dominance of criminals in the city, as indicated by the newspapers' continuous stream of robberies, forgeries, murder, and kidnapping. However, Paul and his men soon obtain a clue from the last minute words of the dying watchman of the United States Bank which had been robbed that night, and from the pictures developed in the vault camera. Nevertheless, the fly paper stuck on the windows to avoid noise when they are broken, puzzles the police, as well as the identity of the chief of the gang.

The next morning, the gangsters, learning through the newspapers of the discovery of the pictures, send Paul a note offering him $5,000.00 if he will deliver them at an appointed place, to them. Provided with hidden tear gas bombs on his wrist and with fake pictures, Paul sets out to meet the gang's representative. Jean, blissfully happy because of the engagement ring Paul has given her the night before, visits him, and is horrified to see the dagger to which the note had been pinned, sticking to the door, suspecting treachery and fearing for Paul's safety, she rushes in to warn him only to find him gone and the note crumpled up on his desk. Forgetting her former mission, she hastily sets out to notify Roy and the other police of Paul's danger. When blinded by the tear gas bomb, Gerry, the gang's representative, gives signal of his hurt to Morgan and the others who are hiding in an automobile nearby, Paul is saved from death at their hands by the timely arrival of the police car which is immediately whisked away in pursuit of the fleeing gangsters. When the police car driver is killed, Paul takes his place, and when he too is wounded, Jean at the radiophone, in communication with police headquarters, asks for relief police squads along the way; so that it is but a short time before they are assisted by motorcycle police and cars on their way towards a distant flying field towards which the gangsters are heading with their wounded and their loot.

At the field, notified that the airplane they have ordered, is being repaired, and that no other can be given them, Morgan assaults the mechanic who has been giving this information, and leaving Alice behind in the car to stall off interference, he and Gerry fly off.

While Paul and his men are investigating the whereabouts of the gang from the wounded mechanic, the latter tells them of his hurt at their hands and of the theft of the plane. Hearing the whir of the plane above them, Joe, Roy, and the other police hoard a plane in pursuit. The machine guns strapped to each airplane are in constant action as the planes follow each other, now in circles now on top of each other.

For a time the gangsters are triumphant, and the police fumble helplessly when their driver is killed; but when Joe quickly takes the wheel, he orders the man in charge of the machine gun to aim at the gasoline tank of their enemies; no sooner said, than done, and in a few minutes, Moran and his men are forced down to receive their handcuffs from the police.

When several days later, Paul and Jean celebrate their wedding. Joe causes general laughter by presenting the bride with a pair of toy handcuffs for good luck. Next day the newspapers feature this affair with the sensational arrest of Morgan's gang, and Paul is the happy recipient of the $500 reward which goes with this feat. Joe and Roy return to Washington for future jobs while Paul and Jean depart on their honeymoon.

HOME WALLS

Mrs. W. A. Rowland File No. 8023

CONVINCING her father that James' wild oats are entirely sown, May kisses away her adoring father's dubious wrinkles and leaves for the honeymoon of her dreams. For a few months James proves an ideal husband, and May's happiness gives her piquant little face a new beauty. Then James, meeting some former associates, gets drunk one night. The next day, suffering a hang-over, he insults his employer who loses patience and fires him saying he knew his reformation was too good to be true.

May's heart sinks within her as she gradually realizes that James is making very small attempts to find a new position and when her father gravely visits her, she brightly covers her own misgivings and claims that she is blissfully happy. She doesn't deceive her worried father, however, and rather than accept the money he offers, May goes back to her old job where she is welcomed. Thereafter James shows less and less of an inclination to find work himself, and in company with his old friends, begins hanging out in a speakeasy. One night May receives a frantic call from the mother of a co-worker who begs her to save her daughter. May goes, and is stunned at finding James there. However, he insists that she has come to spy upon him, and he storms all the way home. Exhausted, May faints, and when James realizes she is going to have a child, he is all tenderness and promises to rent a farm. Loving him as she does, May feels her heart over-flowing with a poignant happiness and for a while all is well. Then the baby dies. James drinks to forget and in a short while his old weakness is apparent.

Again her father offers her a home with him, but May remains faithful to James until the night he is wounded in a speakeasy in a brawl over a woman. That is too much for her. All through James' delirium she nurses him faithfully, and then, when he has recovered and tries to tell her how grateful he is to her, she tells him that she would have done as much for anyone. Now she is going to leave. Stunned by her resolution, James tries to dissuade her, but the memory of her husband fighting over a cheap woman is too much for Mary's pride and although that love for him still burns in her heart, she tells him she is through this time. Seeing that pleas are useless, James asks humbly if he may drive her to her father's home. It is a strange couple who say goodbye outside her father's door and May almost weakens when she sees the slump in James' shoulders as he leaves.

Her father soon realizes that May is in no temper to be told she is lucky to be rid of James. Although he tries every way of interesting her in other things, he realizes that her place is unmistakably at the side of her husband. Meanwhile James, on the little farm, works to keep it up in case May should ever change her mind. And because he puts his daughter's happiness above everything else, May's father invites James to dinner one night. Disconsolately coming downstairs, May catches sight of James embarrassedly fidgeting below, and with a cry she runs into his arms while the father, realizing how they feel, quietly closes the door leaving them together.

FOUR WHEELS

Gad Wilson File No. 8038

DOWN to their last few dollars, George and Norman counted their assets and found one perfectly good moving picture camera and one battered but serviceable car which upon first sight George had christened The Orphan. It was George's idea that they set out on an auto pilgrimage and incidentally get some scenic shots to enter in an amateur contest but his enthusiasm abated somewhat when he learned that Norman's kid sister, fresh from boarding school had written fervently commending the idea and announcing that she was coming too.

Starting out early one morning, they bid their farewell to the trucks of produce lumbering slowly toward the city, and set off. George remained deprecating in his attitude toward Eleanor, whom he called the Pest, and insisted that she remain quiescent while he prepared breakfast. Loudly grateful for the Pest's sudden disappearance, he put up coffee but clumsily upset it. When finally, angry and raging, he admitted his failure; the Pest softly called them to the breakfast she had prepared meanwhile and George kept his eyes averted. So it went, The Orphan purred along smooth roads, and the three adventurers amused themselves with whimsical games and chatter.

Arrived at length at the Grand Canyon, for the first time the trio were awe-stricken with the beauties of the scene. George called to the Pest to take pictures and as they set off again he waxed enthusiastic over their chances in the contest. When, however, they brought the pictures to be developed several hundred miles away, they discovered that the Pest had neglected to remove a blind from the lens and the pictures were blank. George's silence was eloquent! Norman exploded but the Pest was heart-broken. Miserably she crept into a corner of the car. They didn't have enough time left to go back since the closing date of the contest was at hand, and the Pest couldn't be cheered even when George tried.

Then, one night the car broke down and while they sought protection in a ramshackle hut the Pest, rather unnecessarily dragged the camera along. It seemed a case of locking the stable after the horse was stolen, but when, drenched by the heavy rain storm, they knocked at the house door, a rough voice told them to move on. Discouraged they were going when the Pest heard a cry and insisted that they go back to investigate. Again they knocked and while Norman went to the aid of Elaine, an heiress who had been kidnapped, George put up a terrific struggle with the desperate kidnappers. However, seeing they were beaten, the kidnappers fled and taking Elaine back to her frenzied father, Norman fell in love with her. The Pest was forgotten in the excitement of the rescue, but unobstrusively in the background, when the police asked for a description of the bandits, she gave them the movies she had taken of the fight. The kidnappers were caught and a newsreel company paid a huge sum for the roll of film. The pilgrimage broke up when Norman married his heiress, and George, drawing the modest Pest into his arms, told her what she needed was his protection—for life.

THE THREE GUESTS

Mimi Dudek File No. 8084

PASSING her hand wearily before her tired eyes, Mylena determined to take a vacation. It had been years since she had allowed herself any recreation from her design studio, and if she didn't take a much needed rest soon she was in grave danger of a breakdown. Scanning the ads in the papers, she frowned at the garish attractions offered until a tiny advertisement quietly offering a place of seclusion to a very limited number of guests caught her eye. She liked the whimsical tone of the ad and the promise of wild groves and excellent riding horses. Somehow the idea suggested romance. But when Mylena arrived at the small dirty station and was met by a mild-looking man who introduced himself as Gary, the owner of the hotel, all her hopes vanished. Silently she sat beside him in the ancient Ford and answered all his questions laconically.

At the hotel Mylena found two other guests who arrived together a few hours earlier. The sullenness with which they greeted her, renewed her disappointment and the fact that for three days in succession it rained, made the situation almost unbearable. In those three days Mylena was cooler than ever to Gary, holding him accountable for the ruin of her vacation and was secretly gratified by the sudden attentions of Fenton, the handsomer of the two sullen guests. One stormy day Mylena was enjoying herself dancing to the wheezing music of Gary's phonograph, but when the mild, shabby hotel-owner asked Mylena to dance with him, she measured him coldly and replied she was too tired. Then turning to Fenton she chatted animatedly while his friend occasionally joined in the conversation.

The first clear day Mylena took out a horse before breakfast and enjoying the glory of the rain-soaked forest, she was annoyed by the sudden appearance of Gary. Spurring rein, she attempted to jump a high stile to avoid him, but thrown, she lost consciousness, and awakening found Gary holding her tight and murmuring broken phrases of love. Coolly she disengaged herself but her twisted ankle prevented her escaping and protesting she was lifted by Gary as though she were a baby and carried silently back to the hotel. Angrier than ever with him, Mylena limped to her room without thanking him and that day asked Fenton to drive her to another hotel. Eagerly he accepted since he had quarrelled with his friend, and when Gary sought to remonstrate with her she told him he was a meddlesome old lady and she never wanted to see him again. Packing, she furiously threw her board money down and left. But soon she realized that Fenton was virtually kidnapping her, and as Fenton blasphemously announced they had run out of gas somehow, he seized her in his arms. A moment later Gary drove up and at the point of his gun forced the pair into his car, refused the reward offered him by the police to whom he turned over Fenton, one of two notorious murderers who had taken refuge at Gary's hotel, and was driving the chastened Mylena to the station when she meekly admitted she loved him and how could she ever think he was too mild? With a glad cry he folded her in arms grown very dear to one Mylena.

GIGOLETTE

Sue Frances Gallagher File No. 8421

LOUISE'S gratitude to her sister Marion for withdrawing her from the boarding school in which she has spent most of her life and inviting her to live in the luxurious home in which Marion keeps her lazy and selfish husband, Gilbert, soon fades. For, unsophisticated as Louise is, she readily perceives that while her sister is engaged in a succession of more or less innocent flirtations, she is insanely jealous of Gilbert, even suspecting his friendship with his sister-in-law.

Moreover, Marion, carrying on an affair with a married artist, insists that Louise act as chaperone for the sittings, and while the younger girl is left to play piano or read magazines, Marion and Walter carry on their intrigue behind closed doors. Walter's wife, planning a divorce, pounces down upon them, but Marion escapes leaving Louise to bear the brunt of the unpleasant publicity. The case is dropped on the grounds of insufficient evidence to hold Louise for misconduct, but when the girl returns to her sister's home, she hears Marion reporting an unsavory account of the case to Gilbert who suspects the truth but dares not hazard his own comfort to protect Louise. Filled with dismay, Louise finds Marion's home insupportable thereafter, and goes away. However, her inexperience proves an insurmountable barrier to her securing of a badly needed position and at length, driven to despair, she accepts the strange position of companion—even after learning she is to be employed by a young writer, Denton B. Kirkwood, who has been hurt in an accident. Since his convalescence, he has been given to drinking and finding himself frequently involved with unscrupulous persons, and more frequently stranded away from home, he has hired companion after companion only to be disgusted with the type of men he secures. At length he hit upon the idea of hiring a "gigolette".

Accompanying Denton everywhere, Louise finds herself in a strange position. Once she tries to stop Denton from drinking, but he tells her that is not part of her job. Hurt she watches him down glass after glass, and as he becomes too amorous with a night club entertainer, Louise firmly gets him home. Another time, she is exposed to the ridicule of her sister and Gilbert, but Denton protects her from their viciousness and as she drives the car, he begins drinking. When he makes love to her, Louise believes his sincerity, but the next morning when he comes to she realizes he was only drunk. Unable to face him, Louise prepares to leave, but he stops her and asks where she is going. Blindly she informs him she doesn't care, and he lets her go. Denton soon realizes how much he depends upon Louise, and drinking too much he gets into a fight in a speakeasy, and Louise who has despite herself followed him to get him out of trouble, arrives in time to free him from unpleasant consequences. As they drive home, Louise is very firm and unyielding but Denton boyishly promises never to drink again, and then assuring her he is quite sober now, proves to her that he loves her. This time Denton means it.

LONELY ACRES MYSTERY

Wilfred J. Angers File No. 8295

WHEN Peter Randolph Whiting, wealthy society man, visits his friend, Henry Shaw, with his mistress, Helen Leavitt, (whom he had bought from her mother), he is infuriated when the two fall in love; and when he accosts Helen one night, Henry shoots him. Charged with insanity, Henry, now Helen's husband, escapes from the asylum ten years later and retires to Lonely Acres Island with his daughter, Barbara, and his mother, to escape the persecutions of the Whiting family. Many years later, Barbara falls in love with Randolph Whiting, Peter's grandson whose plane crashes on the island. Refusing to depart with his friend, Father Renault, from the island, Randolph, informed that Henry knows of his identity through a newspaper clipping, continues to see Barbara secretly until the former brands him on his yacht on which he had picked him up from the sinking ship (where mysterious captors who had taken him from the sailors sent by his father, forced him to sign for a ransom). Nursed by Father Renault at his home, Randolph breaks his promise not to see Barbara for three years (until she is of age) by spending the night with her at Henry's hunting lodge. Captured by Henry's men, he is placed in a turret prison where he meets Mr. X, whose Indian wife had died bearing Henry's illegitimate child, Oscar. Noticing their signals one day, Barbara and Oscar provide the prisoners with saws to cut the bars and revolvers for protection in their escape. Suddenly shots are heard and screams from Mrs. Shaw who has seen Henry being slain by a black-caped figure. After she has accused Father Renault, who wears such a cloak, of the crime, she and Jacques, the servant who has brought Renault to the scene, are killed. Informed of Randolph's escape, the townspeople and the police seek him for Henry's murder, since the revolver which Oscar has confessed giving him, was found near the dead body; and when he appears to take Barbara, she, having read a book found in his plane, The Secrets of Lonely Acres, flogs him publicly; for she realizes that Henry was her father.

Questioned in court, Randolph, in spite of constant grilling, insists that the revolver was thrown from his hand and that Mr. X, who can corroborate his story, took his boat for Alaska. Accusing Randolph of having killed Henry, Barbara, still in love with the former, later denies this in the lie that she had done it, having previously threatened Henry's life (to Father Renault) for his interference in her love affair. When Renault and Randolph prove her innocence, Randolph is sentenced to thirty-five years imprisonment, but escapes in the plane of William Shaw, Barbara's uncle, when the courthouse is suddenly bombed. Several months later, realizing she is to have a child, Barbara, told of Randolph's whereabouts in Reno by Mrs. Webster, (her mother, Helen Leavitt), Oscar's foster-mother, accosts him the dining room of the hotel where he is known as Dr. Rudyard Southworth. At first refusing to recognize her, Randolph finally confesses his love when Oscar shouts the story of his past to the people. In the meantime, having brought her will to Father Renault, Mr. X's half-brother, Mrs. Webster drowns herself. The will states that when Henry had refused to countenance Barbara's love affair, she had gone with Jacques to free Randolph, who already escaping, had his revolver taken by the former. Furious at Jacques for bringing Father Renault, Helen had killed him after she had disposed of Henry. Knowing of Mr. X's desire to kill Randolph and Barbara as his revenge on the Shaw family, she had killed the aged prisoner. Wiping away a tear, Father Renault turns with William Shaw and Mr. and Mrs. Whiting, who have just arrived in answer to their son's telegram, to greet the couple; and their wedding a week later is a happy one. Their son's arrival several months later is celebrated for future happiness for the two families and for freedom from past tragedy.

LOVERS

Harry M. Englert File No. 8155

UNABLE to stand the loneliness of her room, Dorothy Weaver climbed into her small car and headed recklessly down the street. If only something would happen to her, she thought, and then oblivion settled down upon her as a large roadster crashed head on into her. When she regained consciousness she smiled feebly into the bluest eyes she had ever seen the while Harry thanked Heavens for her recovery. All through her convalescence he remained at her side explaining that he had been almost frantic at having caused the accident, and search as he would, he had found no addresses of relatives or friends to call. Dorothy smiled wistfully as she explained that she had nobody. So they became friends. Knowing that he had to leave for the front, Harry didn't feel it fair to ask Dorothy to marry him, and as they danced at the gayest night cluhs and saw the most fashionable plays, each tried to keep from each other the realization that soon all this would end. And at length Harry left, just one of the soldiers to fight against Germany.

Alone again, Dorothy felt a great ache in her heart and as she read Harry's letters telling her lightly of his adventures in training as an airplane pilot, she could stand it no longer. Rushing out, she joined the Red Cross feeling that at least she wouldn't be staying home eternally waiting. Hearing of Harry's exploits as a famous flyer, Dorothy felt a great fear for his safety and a great pride. On each leave Harry came to visit Dorothy, but their time together seemed to be over before it started. Then, one day Harry brought down three planes and as he turned toward his own lines, another Fokker zoomed down upon him and helplessly he tried to right his plane as it twirled toward the ground. With a sickening thud his plane struck the ground, and some soldiers who had been watching in horror, rushed to his aid and pulled his body from the flames that enveloped his airship. Harry's last conscious thought had been to head toward Dorothy's hospital, and now, he was carried, badly hurt there. Tearful yet thankful for the opportunity of caring for Harry herself, Dorothy watched him night and day. Two soldiers on nearby cots became interested, and Dorothy, not suspecting that they were German spies who had pretended to be injured Americans to facilitate their purposes, shared her happiness with them. Harry recovered and was sent off to the front while the Germans, finishing their business, decided to take Dorothy who had discovered their identity by chance, back with them. One of them, wanted to kill her, but the other finally convinced his friend that she was too pretty, and winked suggestively. Forced into the plane of the Germans on the pretext that Harry needed her, Dorothy saw herself carried over the lines. When Harry discovered what had happened, he didn't care what became of him without Dorothy, and going aloft he brought down plane after plane until he was captured on the German side of the line where Dorothy was being held. Seeing Dorothy protesting against the advances of the German, he struggled out of his captor's grasp and knocked out the German. Courtmartialed he was sentenced to execution and only the Armistice saved him. Oblivious to all else, Harry took Dorothy in his arms and they were married by the army chaplain to the strains of military music. War was over, happiness had come.

NEVER permitted to forget that she had married him to get money enough to save her father from prison, Doris Lanier began to hate her husband Jack as much as those who only knew of his business acumen respected him. Driven to despelation by his brutality and jealousy, Doris felt there was nothing more to live for and as she plunged heedlessly across the icy streets, she paused irresolutely in the path of a roadster. A moment later, Dr. Barrie O'Neil was holding her, carrying her to his hospital and setting her broken legs. The weeks in the hospital were lightened by Barrie's regular visits but when Jack came he raised his voice and shouted, "That doctor is in love with you." Doris pleaded with him not to exhibit his temper before the hospital staff but Jack was maddened with jealousy and at length Doris, who knew his accusation was not unfounded, who knew too that she loved Barrie, insisted on being removed to her own home. Barrie looked long into her eyes and in a low voice Doris explained, "You see I am married."

Once Barrie came to see Doris but found her trembling from one of Jack's rages. It was agony knowing the woman he loved was at the mercy of such a man, but when he pleaded with Jack to divorce Doris, Jack laughed at them and turned Barrie from his house claiming he ought to shoot his wife's lover. Even the news that Barrie too was leaving to fight overseas did not keep Jack from telling Doris she was glad he was going, was hoping he would be killed. He knew it, knew it. That last night Jack fled to the arms of another woman, and Doris, dazed by his outburst walked and walked trying to clear her head. At length she met Barrie and he joined her, comforting her. Seeing that she was at the point of exhaustion, he helped her into his car, the car which had brought them together and as they rode he told her of his hopeless love. For hours they sat there together. The next morning Barrie and Jack sailed away with their regiments and when a woman clung to Jack, Doris held her head high. All the while Jack had been having an affair with another woman! Sympathizing with Aline's distress, Doris astounded her by putting her arm around her and explaining she knew how it was.

Meanwhile, overseas, Barrie and Jack fought desperately and when the latter was wounded at the expense of a grave injury Barrie tended his wounds. When Jack recovered he could only exclaim, "You saved my life although I stood between you and Doris!" and for the first time Jack realized love could be unselfish. A strange friendship grew up between the pair and when the war ended and the two came marching home together, Jack gave Doris her divorce and turned to Aline who had always loved him. Jack took Aline overseas, and Doris and Barrie found the happiness of which they had always dreamed together.

STONE WALLS

Joseph Collins File No. 8198

A MUFFLED cry and convict No. 31074 slumped to the floor of the San Do Penitentiary furniture shop—dead. Shifty-eyed Vic Harmon cried nervously as the body, dagger-pierced, grazed him in falling and his eyes popped as he discovered Bull Georges, swarthy killer, slinking from the machine shop. One other saw Bull leave. That was Jerry Ashley, pal of the murdered George Simms.

Husky guards ran toward the mumbling cons and shoved them back in their cells at the points of their guns while their questionings yielded them no helpful information. Jerry Ashley thrown suddenly against Bull taunted him about leaving the machine shop but a guard hastily interposed before the snarling Bull could carry his threats into effect. In his office Warden Franklyn W. Johnson chewed the end of his cigar fiercely and stormed they had to find the murderer even if they had to kill every last man, but Marty, the Principal Keeper, shrugged his shoulders and said they had 1,974 cons, any one of whom might be guilty and none of whom would talk even if he knew something. At length, however, Vic Harmon, nervous and trembling was brought in and under close questioning admitted he saw Bull act suspicious, but his evidence was almost useless because of its indefiniteness. Vic felt Bull's eyes follow him as he returned to his cell, and he winced as Bull glanced meaningly at the Weasel.

A week later in the yard, Bull brushed up against Stan Burns, a trusty and gave final directions. That night the Weasel, by profession a pick-pocket stole the key to the artillery tower. Stan Burns stole fire arms and Bull got Mike Merkel into his cell to help him get something out of his eye, quietly felled the guard, and bound him up. Passing the guard's keys from cell to cell, each con stealthily unlocked his cell and while they eddied into the corridors, Jerry made his way to the artillery room, found it open, and armed himself with a sub-machine gun. Bull gave his men a grim pep talk and as a suspicious guard knocked at the door, Bull sent a stream of bullets into the man who managed to blow his whistle in falling. While the sirens shrieked, the armed convicts mowed down the guards who came running. Cries, moans, shrieks sounded as the battle raged and the search lights swept the desperate men. Bull sent a bullet through the trembling Vic then sent his men to bring in Mike Merkel. Ungagging him, the leader had the guard call to the warden to open the prison gates or else he would be killed and as the warden refused, Bull pushed the dead body of the guard out. But by this time Jerry was in a cell opposite and playing his machine gun on the cursing cons told them he'd kill the first man to move. Bull fired and an instant later Jerry's gun spattered.

Weeks later, a much bandaged Jerry told his story to the Warden. George Simms, the brother of Jerry's girl friend had been left to take the rap by Bull in a shooting and robbery. Jerry coming to warn George had passed as Bull threw his smoking gun at him, and had been convicted hy a jury for the robbery. Bull, sent up, feared that George would squeal; and killed him. Jerry got his pardon then, and Bull burned on the hot seat.

THE GILDED SNARE

Anthony C. Lee File No. 8194

FLATTERED by the attentions of Marvin Lawson, Jr., whose succession to his father's position as banker was assured, Clara found herself wondering if she weren't perhaps giving up too much in marrying Jerry whose law practice was as yet barely established. Wavering between the two, Clara found herself giving her dates to the wealthier boy because he could take her to the places she had always wanted to visit. But the night Marvin asked her to marry him, Clara drew a deep breath. Wasn't this what she had wanted? Why wasn't she happier? Marvin caught her hesitation and starting his powerful car, he told her to take a day or two to decide if necessary. That night Marvin gave her an opportunity to taste night life, fecling that this would be the most effective argument, but Clara wasn't happy and when Marvin wanted her to go to his fraternity dance Saturday night and give her answer then, Clara informed him that she had already accepted another invitation to the dance.

However, when Jerry came over Saturday afternoon, instead of the tenderness she expected, Jerry offered only a troubled reference to her father's hobby of preparing automobile parts which Jerry held to be dangerously inferior to the standard accessories. Hotly replying that her father's garage had always been run with integrity, Clara lost her temper and informed Jerry she had decided to go to the dance with Marvin, and after a woeful moment considering how foolish she was to quarrel with Jerry, Clara called Marvin and asked if the date were still open.

Although Marvin had, in self-pity, drunk himself into a state bordering intoxication, he managed to hide the fact from Clara even though they were considerably delayed by a flat tire, which was fixed at her father's garage. At length, more than an hour later, they set off, and as Clara remonstrated about their speed she realized for the first time that Marvin was drunk. Pleading with him to consider the dangerous mountain roads leading to the fraternity lodge, Clara shuddered at Marvin's bland reassurance and at length the car skidded suddenly and plunged toward an embankment. Terrified, Marvin stepped on the accelerator instead of the brake and only Clara's presence of mind caused the car to catch precariously over a drop.

Meanwhile Jerry restlessly trying to forget his disappointment found himself driving out "to see if Clara and Marvin had arrived safely". Discovering that they hadn't he worriedly retraced the road until the crashed fence led him to the scene. Distractedly he begged Clara and Marvin to remain quietly while he went for ropes and chains.

Speeding back, Jerry found a belligerant motor cycle cop scoffing at his story and eluding him, Jerry hastily got chains, borrowed a car at the risk of being held for stealing it, and again pursued by the cop, Jerry came to the spot and found the car still hanging. With infinite care, almost set for nought by Marvin's desperate attempt to save himself first, Jerry pulled Clara, Marvin, and himself to safety just before the rope broke. Weeping over Jerry's torn hands, Clara clung to Jerry as he patted Marvin's quaking shoulders and received the admiration of the now chastened policeman. And together they drove slowly home.

CHANGED MAN

Lucian Bednarek File No. 8144

INSPIRED by an illustrated catalog of Hawaiian life (hula-hula girls dancing to guitar music under swaying palms), Big Ben, rises from his dream where he is the guitar-playing, Hawaiian lover, one night, to find a music teacher. Arriving at the address mentioned in the catalog, Big Ben finds the teacher drunkenly acquiescent; but discovering in the midst of the lesson that Ben is half Irish and half Scotch, MacLane, the teacher, recalling his hated Irish rival for musical honors at the town club, tries to throw Ben out. Aroused by the tumult, Marjorie, MacLane's daughter, rushes downstairs, and in an attempt to disentangle the two men, is accidentally slapped by Ben who has immediately fallen in love with her. Telling him not to return until he is wholly Scotch, the two finally push him out. Returning home, Ben wails a song as he abuses the guitar by his playing, and his uncle, rushing down the stairs in his nightshirt, collides with two angry neighbors. Thinking he is the cause of the noise, they hit him on the head with a club and depart. When Ben revives him by overturning the fishbowl on him, he rushes at his nephew, who, in an effort to dodge him, accidentally drops a heavy vase on his uncle's sore toe. Howling with pain, the latter throws a brief case at Ben, who, picking up the catalog which had fallen out, forces his uncle, on whom he is sitting, to look at it. Informed that he must be able to play the guitar before he can be admitted to Hawaii, the uncle is told about the teacher and predeliction for whole Scotchmen.

After such mishaps, as overthrowing a milk wagon, and bouncing in on two petting lovers in the bushes, Ben and his car finally reach the doctor's house. After stating their case, the doctor informs him that his head must be changed, and after an injection, Ben signs a contract to this effect. The next day, while Ben is being operated, the uncle flirts with the pretty nurse in the waiting room; and the doctor, on his way to get his knives, noticing the guitar in the parlor, begins to play. Marjorie and her father, his dear friends who have come to visit him, arriving at this time, give helpful suggestions in between their sighs of delight. Seeing the uncle kissing his nurse, the doctor starts up, and in the joy of Mr. MacLane's reunion with the uncle, a dear friend of his father's, the doctor tries to kiss Marjorie. Screaming, Marjorie struggles away only to be confronted by the gassed, half-crazed Ben flourishing a huge knife. Realizing that Marjorie loves Ben, the irate doctor forces him back to the table to dissect him, when the uncle, following the nurse around the room, stumbles against a shower contraption. Awakened, the drenched Ben, thinking the doctor has taken his head, falls upon him. Pulling him away, however, MacLane shakes his hand, and throwing him into Marjorie's arms, drags the reluctant uncle with him. Creeping up to the embracing couple, the doctor is just about to strike when the loosened chandelier falls upon him; and the birds sing again.

ALL BEGINNINGS

Theodore Kowalski File No. 8208

NEGLECTED by his nouveau riche parents and sisters, in their attention to society affairs and intrigues, young Tom Lyons soon forgets his school friend, Helen Morgan, with whom he had graduated, in his preoccupation with the criminals of the city. When his aunt Mary attempts to warn his parents of this, they angrily order her from the house. Persuaded at last to visit her at a party, Tom, hearing the noise of a scuffle upstairs, hurries to investigate; and finding his gangsters beleaguering Mary's dog, Ben, who loves Tom, the latter earns their enmity by rudely dispersing them. Helen's boasting of his achievement at the party afterwards, makes him so ashamed of his deceit that he runs away. Having become a blackmailer and forger,—for Tom discovers secrets of the past of wealthy society people and after threatening to expose them, obtains money for his silence,—he enters the home of an important man to get such incriminating documents. Recognizing Tom, Ben, who has been visiting the house with Helen (whose uncle is the owner of the house), barks joyously. Hearing footsteps, Tom shoots Ben, and clambers down the window a minute after Helen has entered the room and seen his face; and when the dog frantically attempts to follow him, Helen holds him back. When several days later, Tom receives her letter demanding an explanation, he decides to leave for another city.

In the meantime, the cashier of the bank of which Helen's father is president, in love with the girl, and desiring money for a business of his own, plans with Tom's gang to rob the bank. Learning of her father's position in the bank, Tom threatens to expose them, but is threatened, in turn, with death, if he does. Planning to steal the money first so he can give it to her father later, Tom arrives at the bank that night. Hiding when he sees the gang, Tom tries to escape to telephone for the police; but was caught by them immediately after he had lifted the receiver and said "police headquarters". Granted the request that he finish his conversation with his "girl friend", Tom, in their presence taps out on the telephone with his pencil the message for help while he loudly speaks of irrelevent things. When Ben overthrows one of the men, Tom defends himself with his revolver, and the police arrive to find the gang fled and Tom laden with the money. While the wounded boy is rushed to the hospital to be cared for there by his Aunt Mary, Ben runs off with a roll of forged checks he had found on the bank floor.

Accused of the crime, Tom, afraid to face Mary or Helen, resolves to die in spite of Mr. Morgan's promise to assist him to prove his innocence. In the meantime, having discovered the loss of the checks, and deducing that Ben must have taken them, the gang plans to ransack Helen's house to find them. Still downhearted and now a visitor at Mary's house, Tom is suddenly aroused from his lethargy by the breathless arrival of Ben from Helen's home. After telephoning to police headquarters, who have been looking forward to his trial, Tom rushes to her home, only to find it dark and deserted looking. Attacked from ambush as he is approaching the house, Tom fights for his life, and when the police arrive, Ben frisks in followed by Helen whom he has just unbound. The forgeries are traced to the gangsters who are forced to confess their guilt in the bank robbery; and while Mr. Morgan closes the door behind him with a smile, Tom and Helen embrace in mutual forgiveness.

TOWN HERO

Fred A. Thornton File No. 8231

HOLDING Margie close, Joe told her it would be a hard struggle for them. Weeks didn't promote his bank employees very rapidly, but at least his job as a clerk was sure, and sooner or later he'd make good. Realizing that Margie who had been watching every little wrinkle in his face hadn't heard what he was saying, he kissed her again. Joe blushed furiously when the other men in the bank cajoled him about his wedding, and flew home to his Margie.

Then came weeks of retrenchment with Joe doing the work of four other men. Every night he'd sink in his chair and only Margie's little tendernesses could make him forget the hard days at the bank. But even that was better than the terrible day when he threw back his shoulders determined to keep from Margie as long as possible the fact that Weeks had curtly fired him, told him the bank couldn't afford to keep him on any longer with conditions as they were. But try as he would, Joe couldn't keep the gloom from his face and Margie settling in his arms tried to cheer him, tell him he was lucky to have any sort of a job these days. Joe swallowed hard, and then she told him about the baby that was coming. Dazedly Joe rocked Margie in his arms. A baby now!

In the months that followed Joe searched for work with a determination that approached despair and as the last few dollars went toward the baby's coming. Joe pulled his belt in another notch. Striving to keep the tears from her eyes, Margie told him the grocer and the butcher were threatening to sue. Then the milkman left a polite note under the bottle together with a three months bill. He was sorry but he couldn't extend credit any longer. Joe couldn't sleep hearing the baby moan and Margie's sleepy directions to give the child some milk cut him like a lash. He looked down at her pinched face and silently began dressing.

The next morning a messenger arrived telling him Weeks wanted to see him. Margie speculated excitedly about the possibility of a job and Joe posed restlessly for the photographers who waited for him outside the bank. Smoking Weeks' cigars, Joe felt dizzy as the banker informed him that there was an opening for a cashier. When Joe protested faintly that he didn't have the experience Weeks complacently reminded him that a man of his type would make good anywhere. Hadn't he while going out for a sleeping powder detected bandits about to rob the vault of $100,000? Hadn't he taken his life in his hands and through a defective window he had once called to Weeks' attention, entered and stopped the burglary, shooting one of the bandits who reached for his gun?

When Joe called Margie he found that the phone had been reconnected and Margie was jabbering excitedly about his being the town hero, and about the whole quart of milk the baby drank. Everyone was calling. But when he arrived home, Margie settled herself in his lap and with her head against his shoulder asked how he could have bought sleeping tablets when he didn't have a dime, and how he happened to have suspected a robbery so he'd take the automatic he hadn't touched for five years with him? Rumpling his hair she said softly, "Town hero!" and Joe kissing her replied. "All right then, next time I go out to rob a bank I'll wake you first."

TRIUMPHANT WIFE

Antonio Rocchetti File No. 8385

BIDDING farewell to his wife, Litizia, and leaving his best friend, Thaos, as her protector in the castle, Prince Arnold departs to assist his brother-in-law, Piero, leader of the Guelphs, against the Ghibellines. When the soldiers' cheering has died away in the distance, Thaos offers himself a lover to Litizia, who, shocked by his falseness, pushes him away and flees from the room. Several weeks later, after intercepting Arnold's message to his wife, of his victory and approaching arrival, Thaos hastens to a nearby tavern where he promises Gioacchino, a soldier friend, two hundred dollars to enter and leave the castle the following evening. Having given him the key, Thaos returns home to greet Arnold and tell him the falsehood of Litizia's infidelity. Thaos pleads for his life as Arnold attempts to choke him, and promises proof of his statement in the sight of Litizia's lover leaving the house. Pacing back and forth in the garden as he waits, Arnold curses him for his lie until Thaos suddenly points out to him Gioacchino closing the castle door behind him. After embracing his friend for his loyalty, Arnold vows revenge, and pushes aside Litizia's embrace upon his entrance to the house. While Arnold shuts himself in his study, Litizia weeps and pleads for an explanation of her wrong, outside the door. Feigning cheerfulness the next morning, Arnold suggests a visit to their country estate, Maremma Castle; and when they arrive there, Arnold accuses her of her falseness and refusing to believe her story of Thaos' attempt to force himself upon her, condemns her to an indefinite imprisonment there with John and Mary, the castle keepers, as her guards, and Thaos as her only visitor.

In the meantime, Thaos, accosted by Gioacchino for the other one hundred dollars promised him, and threatened when he refuses him, wounds him. Returning to the castle, Thaos attempts to force the prostrate Litizia to elope with him; but when with the aid of John and Mary, Litizia drives him from her, Thaos rushes out to make plans for her kidnapping. While passing through the forest nearby, he is suddenly accosted by bandits, the leader of whom, Gioacchino, finding that he lacks money, stabs him; and when Arnold and Michael, Litizia's father with whom he is hunting, hear his groaning, they find the dying man after a short search. When he confesses his treachery to him and Litizia, Arnold draws his sword to kill him, but Michael, noticing that he is already near death, stops him. Hurrying towards the castle Arnold meets Mary in quest of him to tell him of Litizia's serious illness. Pleading forgiveness, Arnold's tender care soon aids Litizia toward recovery. Proclaiming a holiday for the return of their rulers, the people of Pisa leave their homes to greet them with music and cheering; and when Litizia and the prince kiss after thanking the people, the latter throw flowers and sing their anthem.

MEN LIVE ON

Lee Bartole File No. 8236

ESCAPING from battle, Martin Hardy suddenly remembers the deserter's terrible punishment which awaits him, and shoots another soldier, Richard Menwell, with whom he exchanges name cards. Informed later at the hospital that the latter's son, Jerry, to whom the nurse, (having found his address and picture in Martin's pocket) had written, was to visit him, Martin, or Richard Menwell, as he is now called, flees. Assailed by remorse at his evil deed, Martin resolves to accept a perpetual absence from home as his punishment; so that he willingly accepts the job of laborer in a distant town. Seeing always the dead man's pleading eyes and the expectant face of the son before him, Martin is driven to visit Richard's memorial erected in his native town by his Nancy and June, his wife and daughter. (Who think it is Martin they are mourning for). Just as he enters the cemetery, Jerry, who has come to brood over the strange loss of his father from the hospital, at his mother's grave, also arrives. Quickly hiding himself behind a large tombstone, Martin is horrified to see Nancy and June tearfully approaching Richard's memorial. Drawn together by their sympathy for each other, June and Jerry, who have been becoming more and more friendly in their Sunday visits to the place, now wander off arm in arm toward the entrance; but Nancy, following them, is suddenly halted by the sight of an aged-looking, staring man in her path. But when her scream of terror at his impulsive embrace reaches the couple at the gate, the stranger has fled.

Falling unconscious as the result of a heart attack the next day at work, Martin is put in the care of Jerry, the company's doctor. When he is revived, Martin, thinking he is dying and that Jerry is the minister, breakingly confesses his unfortunate deed on the battlefield. The next day, Jerry on the pretext of visiting a heart specialist, takes Martin with him to June's home; but the latter, recognizing his abode, and remembering his vow of punishment, refuses to leave the car. So that when Jerry attempts to force his entrance, Martin throws him over; and just as Jerry is about to deal him a counter blow, Nancy, hearing the noise of a quarrel, comes out to inquire. Recognizing her assailant of the cemetery, she starts back in terror; but Jerry amazes both Martin and her by his sudden revelation of the latter's true identity. When her loud weeping draws June from the house, Martin docilely allows himself to be led through the gate. Forgiven by Jerry, Martin turns to his wife's kindly arms; and later rejoices with her at the news of Jerry's approaching marriage to June. A year later, Martin celebrates the birth of his grandchild by a visit to a lawyer who officially pardons him for the desertion. (Since the Armistice he discovers, had already been signed at that time); and June embraces her husband when he tells her this happy news.

A NEW WORLD

Elizabeth Irving File No. 8238

INTRODUCED by her brother, Henry, before his departure for Harvard, to Sir Arthur Atherton, recently returned to his estate, Seaview, Mildred Harding soon finds herself looking forward to his daily visits; for only to him can she reveal her daily spiritual battles, with repulsion for her officious, scoffing aunt, Meritabel, (in charge of the household since her mother's recent death), with the sorrow caused by the later death of Henry, or with the cynical, flippant attitudes of her two friends, Honor Manley and Florence Newell. Frustrated in his promising art career by his father's demand that he return from abroad to manage the ancestral estate, Arthur finds relief from his resentment, in the girl's concentrated faith in humanity and the future. When his family returns from their sojourn in their Swiss country home, Arthur confesses his love to Mildred before his departure for Seaview. There Arthur realizes his mother's scheme for his marriage to Claire Harding, Mildred's haughty, wealthy cousin, by her constant attendance at the balls and parties given and by his mother's overwhelming laudations. Sickened at his mother's profit seeking, Arthur returns to Avondale in time to offer financial relief and advice to the striking miners and factory workers, who, however, learning of the strike breakers imported from other towns by the employers, turn to incendiarism and violence, for revenge. However, with Arthur as their intermediary, the matter is soon satisfactorily adjusted; and Mildred, who has been nursing the wounded, now departs for the home of her Uncle Laurence, Claire's father, who, hearing of the departure of her beloved governess, Miss French, at Meritabel's demand, has suggested this to Mr. Harding. There Mildred becomes the friend of Kitty, Edna, Herbert, and Willie; but Claire, jealous of her beauty and culture, as shown by her fine singing and playing at musical gatherings or by her outstanding histrionic ability parties, remains aloof. In love with Wilbur Newell, Florence's inspiring preacher brother, Edna begins to disdain the extravagances of rich dresses, social calls, and profitable matrimonial plans espoused by her mother; and Kitty, touched by Mildred's constant forgiveness for ill treatment, and awed by her vast spiritual and worldly knowledge, renounces her tantrums and flippancy. While Laurence expostulates at his wife's and Claire's nightly absences from home on parties, Mildred nurses the ailing child, Willie, through many such nights; and when the child dies in spite of the care of Dr. Neilson, Arthur's best friend who lives nearby, the broken hearted woman retires to live a life of remorse and repentance. Comforted by her faith retained even in the face of death, Dr. Hugh Neilson, his skepticism arising from his intensely scientific outlook, and his life blightedly embittered by his past unhappy marriage with a beautiful actress (who had gambled her money and life away in Monte Carlo), falls in love with her. Claire's jealousy grows as Mildred becomes Hugh's companion in his walks along the shore, and in his charitable visits to the destitute families in Cedar Row; but when he proposes one day, while Claire unwillingly listens to the praises of Mr. Walden, another suitor, Mildred, remembering her vow to await him (Arthur) upon his return from his health-giving trip abroad, refuses. This has also been prompted by the thought that Claire is in love with Hugh; but Mildred is surprised when Hugh leaves without a word to her cousin who bitterly resolves to become a nun.

Mourning the hateful spirit which urges her to such an important step, Kitty returns with Mildred, for her college vacation, to Restwold, where the weeping Edna, forced by her unbelieving father to break her engagement with Wilbur, soon follows. Learning of Arthur's interest in Mildred, through the gossipy Kitty, Claire, who has arrived to say goodbye, changes her mind, and looks forward with renewed hope to a conciliatory meeting with Hugh. But the latter, ever loyal to his friend, Arthur, and the memory of Mildred, hurries himself in his books and brooding at home, especially when he learns through Claire's note several weeks later, of the former's marriage at Restwold. Again warned by the doctors about his declining health, Arthur departs with his wife to Lyndhurst. Accepting her new daughter-in-law, whom she had previously scorned as uncultured and poor, with the best grace, Lady Atherton is as concerned as Mildred at Arthur's continual ailing; and even the birth of a son a year later fails to console her for her son's death shortly after. Discovering through Kitty that Claire's subtle hints of his growing interest in herself, may have influenced Mildred in her decision, Hugh has written many pleading letters of love and regret to her; but when they are ignored, gently upbraids Claire, who, at the crux of her bitterness, enters a convent. Informed by her aunt later of her cousin's restiveness and desire for release from the rigid regime there, Mildred sends her many letters of forgiveness and elevating moral and spiritual comfort.

When Hugh, prompted by his mother, who has always loved the girl, visits Mildred to propose to her, the latter, realizing that she has always loved him even in her husband's lifetime, is shocked at this revelation of her spiritual infidelity, and sends the heartbroken Hugh away while she probes and fights the accusations of her conscience. Returning humbly several weeks later, Hugh finds her worn out with her battle, which has taken her in blind wanderings along the shore and through the house; but her love for him has triumphed, (for she realizes that in her marriage and kindness to Arthur she has done her duty), and she readily consents to marry him. Overjoyed, Hugh takes her home where a dignified, stately wedding is performed; and when Mildred is told by Edna of her father's consent to her marriage to Wilbur, her happiness is complete. For she understands now that her spiritual talks and recommended books for perusal, have helped Laurence triumph over his crassly materialistic, basely skeptical outlook on life. Just before her trip to America to her husband's luxurious, beautifully wooded, ancestral dwelling, Mildred, hearing of Kitty's engagement to Theron Howard, the son of her father's best friend whom she had met at Restwold one summer, congratulates her aging aunt; who, in turn, bestows the blessing of the whole Harding family on her. Known everywhere for her generous charitable work, Mildred receives the town's blessing when her son arrives a year later.

ICE CARNIVAL

Loretto Dockry File No. 8241

WHILE returning from Europe Les Ware, a young sculptor, falls in love with a slim German girl traveling with a group of her countrymen. Learning that Marta is a skater, Les offers to find a position for her in Chicago and even accepts the added incumbrance of the jovial Hans Miller who depends upon Marta's friend to set him up in a delicatessen business. Les wins a contest with his sculptured figures of Marta and Hans and builds a home to which he will take his bride. However, Marta coming to call for Les one day is shown about by a doltish workman who reveals to her that Les has built a four foot wide, light-proof wall chamber from which, unseen, he can spy upon his wife. Frightened by the idle chatter about Les' jealousy, Marta runs away to Vermont with a girl from the ice palace and Hans, engaged to a fiercely jealous buxom girl, wildly waves a farewell to Marta. When Les learns that he has lost the woman he loves through his jealousy-house, he boards it up and some time later a newspaper writer features an exaggerated story of the Romantic house of tragedy.

Meanwhile years pass and Marta widowed from a dull farmer husband brings up her two daughters to be skaters. Penelope gets a position in a novel ice-floored night club but is annoyed by the worldly owner Bescoe who shrewdly uses Penelope's salary check which her sister Hester, under the influence of a gangster, has raised, to force the girl to accept, unwillingly, his offer of marriage. Bescoe's secretary, Jerry, who loves Penelope tries to reason with the girl, but knowing her mother's terrific struggle to prove to malicious small town gossips that her daughters were not educated for sin, Penelope dares not risk hurting Marta with the disclosure of Hester's crime. Bescoe gloating over the thought of his beautiful bride, insists on buying the house Les had built and Les, after a warning sells it. The night of the arrival of Penelope's mother for her daughter's wedding, Bescoe plans an Ice Carnival, flooding the basement of his new house. Hans and Marta riding together exchange glances as they realize what house Penelope is to live in and Marta learns of Penelope's sacrifice from the despairing Jerry. She learns too of the sculptor who still lives in a cabin near the house, and she gently joins him.

Amid the gaiety of the Carnival Jerry can contain his pent up feelings no longer and he draws Penelope away to tell her of his love. Bescoe, costumed as Mephisto, jealously enters the spying chamber and in his fury he starts out only to catch his skates on a chair he has previously hurled aside. Plunging down the carpeted steps, he breaks his spine and dies in the arms of the frightened Penelope. Newspapers blazon the new tragedy but Les, reawakened to happiness has the inner walls stripped and at last brings his bride Marta to the home he has built for her while Jerry and Penelope sway happily to the music of Hans' accordion.

THE GAME OF LIFE

Hildegard Tuerpe File No. 8248

INFORMED that his father has just received a large sum of money for his latest song, Bob Young, stage singer, demands a generous share to pay his debts. When his father, after scolding him for his gambling, late hours, and inattention to his work, retires, Bob telephones Helen, his partner in the act, to tell her that he has the necessary sum to buy back the act, which in a fit of drunkenness they had sold the night before. Meeting Erna, daughter of the theater owner, the next day, Bob, after listening to her admonitions and noticing the tears in her eyes, warns her not to take him seriously. When he returns for supper, he rings in vain for Anne, the maid, and entering the kitchen, finds her bashful lover, Dan, in the throes of proposal; and when Bob, whisperingly prompts him to say the wrong thing, Anne dazedly says "yes" anyway. Seeing his daughter, Alice, and her sculptor fiance, Fred Bennett, approaching him, Mr. Young, Sr. refuses to hear his plea for Alice's hand, scorns his poverty and profession, and finally drives him from the house. Accusing her father of having neglected Alice for his shiftless son, Fred leaves the house with Alice to be married.

Waiting in vain for Bob who is to have been the guest of honor at his birthday party, Mr. Young recovers from his anger after the guests have left, and falls asleep at the table. When the drunken Bob returns at three o'clock, he tells the horrified father of his having been dismissed because of his drunkenness during the act, and of his huge gambling debt. Knowing that the owner of the night club where he had been playing is Erna's friend, Bob pleads with her to have him extend the note; but when she, thinking that this emergency may stir Bob to some ambitious work, refuses to listen, Bob sells the house which the old man had placed in his name, removes all the money from the safe, and runs away with Helen.

Regretting Alice's departure and his own harshness, Mr. Young falters in his work of sweeping the floors or dusting the furniture at the poorhouse, to weep; and when Alice's son, whom Anne has brought here with her in her mission of giving away some too ripe fruit from Dan's stand, offers him sympathy by inviting him to his party, the friendship begins. Calling in vain for Robert, the little boy, who has gone with Mr. Young to see the toys in the exhibition room made by some of the inmates, Anne frantically calls upon the wardens to assist her. Discovered in Young's room, Robert looks pleadingly at the scolding Anne, who soon screams with delight as she recognizes Mr. Young. Hearing one of his songs being played the next day from Anne's window—for he lives with her now—Mr. Young fails to recognize his son Bob as the street musician to whom he offers money. The following day Alice, her husband now a prominent sculptor, is dragged by Robert at the party to see his new friend who, embraced by her, is immediately forgiven by Fred; and when Bob, discovered by Erna, prowling around the theatre, is brought in, their happiness is complete. Having heard her explanation, he has forgiven her and promised to marry her. At their wedding several weeks later, Erna's father offers him the managership of the theater since he is to retire. Mr. Young embraces his son in forgiveness as they enter Alice's luxurious home where they are all to live in happiness.

MORE THAN LIFE

Mrs. G. Dawson File No. 8274

THE moment Jock Ferguson saw the exquisite young Kathleen he fell madly in love with her; and Kathleen, knowing no love since the accidental death of both parents had left her alone in the world, was swept off her feet by the impetuous wooing of the tall army officer. Holding the young girl tenderly, Jock told her that age should be no barrier for them when he loved her so. A few weeks later, not yet out of her teens, Kathleen took her place as the wife of the broad shouldered army officer and the students of the academy of which he was head, bowed before the wife of the Major, commenting among themselves about the disparity in age. One glance Kathleen had of Pat Fenton, a lad whom the Major was supporting through school, and then Pat went to serve in the Navy; but Kathleen was troubled for a long time afterward by the remembrance of young Pat.

Never was a wife adored so by her husband as Kathleen. Her slightest wish was law and the lovely young girl seemed to grow more beautiful each day. Then, while the Major was away on one of his trips to military headquarters, trips that were increasing in frequency now that war had been declared, Pat came back on leave. Visiting the academy that had been home to him for as long as he could remember, Pat met Kathleen and again that strange feeling of belonging together possessed them both. Pat told Kathleen warmly of how splendid the Major had always been to him, keeping him on after the other lads had graduated and paying all his expenses, and not realizing that even their common respect for the Major was drawing them more closely together, the two young people found themselves unwittingly drawn closer in the coils of an overwhelming love. When the Major came back he was delighted to see Pat, see how manly he had grown, and even more did he seem pleased by the friendship of his wife and Pat. Then, with a fresh outbreak of activities, all leaves were recalled and Pat went off to his ship. Shortly after, the Major was called away and his visits home were fleeting.

Kathleen's companion Nannie saw how anxiously Kathleen waited for news from Pat and strange misgivings awoke in her. Then when Pat wrote that he had twenty-four hours leave in a place near Surrey, Kathleen threw all caution to the winds and flew to meet him. All night Nannie waited for her and concealed from the servants their mistress' absence and Kathleen's confidence that she had one glorious memory to live with now that Pat was gone, terrified Nannie.

When Kathleen's baby was born, the Major, home on leave was beside himself with happiness, but Nannie was troubled. It was only when Kathleen discovered that Pat was the Major's son, child of an indiscretion of his youth, that the strange triangle was climaxed. Attempting to embrace Kathleen, Jock told her that he was afraid Kathleen wouldn't have married him if she had known, then learning that Kathleen loved Pat, that her child was Pat's, he left for the front. A few days later, Jock was killed on the field of action and only Nannie knew that the Major had stepped out of the way of his son and the woman he loved more than life.

THE BROKEN VOW

Lelia A. Harrison File No. 8290

TEMPTED by a handsome musician who had arrived in the town with a traveling carnival, Marian Manor runs off with him, only to return a year later, penniless and broken in health after the death of her child. When Mrs. Manor, heartbroken at her demise several months later, follows her to the grave, Mr. Manor becomes a gray-haired, bitter recluse. Known now for his fierce temper with visiting friends and stray salesmen and tramps, the townspeople leave him entirely to his loneliness with his younger daughter, Elizabeth, while they shake their heads in pity and indignation at her confined state. Providing the girl with books, games, and pictures, Mr. Manor forbids her to leave the farm on the hill, even to see her friend, Mary Jane Turner, who lives in the nearest farm several miles away. Returning from her orchard browsing one day, Elizabeth, surprised to see the doctor leaving the house, hurries back to the house; and finding her father suddenly stricken from a heart attack, tearfully promises to fulfill his dying wish that she never allow herself to fall in love with a young man. Shouting his curses on the betrayer of his older daughter, Mr. Manor forces her to swear her allegiance to this vow on the Bible before he is silenced by death. Fearful of selling the farm and living in town, Elizabeth decides to rehabilitate the farm and live there on the products of her labor. Leaving her work in the garden to fetch herself a drink at the spring, the lonely Elizabeth, remembering her mother in the same attitude, weeps for lonesomeness; so that when William Wilkins, a salesman, approaching to sell her some seeds, inquires the cause, a conversation about her life soon follows. Cold to his request to visit her, Elizabeth agitatedly leaves his friendly glance and handshake to return to the house. Knowing Mr. Manor's aversion to her visits, Mary Jane has not seen her in her home until this time. Hearing of Jane's interest in the stranger who has also visited their home to sell the product, Elizabeth, in joy-

alty to her friend and to her vow, pretends to be entirely ignorant of William's prowling about the house in an effort to see his disdainful love. Unhappy by his open visits to the house with Mary Jane who lauds him to her continually, Elizabeth now extends her coldness of attitude to the latter. Resolving at last to sell the farm and obtain a position in town where she may meet people to overcome her bitterness, she packs her things one morning and is just leaving the porch when she notices William hurrying toward her. Running toward the road, she is thrown over by Jane's car; and when she is revived several minutes later, she learns of Jane's engagement to Harold Anderson, William's friend, whom she had met at the town dance to which William had invited her. Prompted by William who wished to visit his beloved, Jane had brought him with her whenever she came to see her friend. Knowing that her mother and sister would forgive her for her broken vow, Elizabeth accepts William's proposal with a kiss; and the latter receives a large bonus from his firm when he leaves his position to become a scientific farmer on his wife's thriving land.

SO in love is Isabelle Thornton with George Dummond, young artist, that disregarding the advice of her dowager mother, she elopes with him and is soon so occupied with the coming of her child that she fails to note how the formalities of society life chafe her husband. When her mother dies bequeathing a large fortune to Isahelle, however, George frees himself of the shackles and begins an orgy of spending. Although George's gambling and gaieties cause frequent scenes between them, Isabelle loves her husband so much that she bears with him and Georgia, grown now and away at college is brought up to believe both parents perfect.

Troubled by the fact that Georgia seems to be growing more like her father daily in appearance and disposition, Isabelle's fears are climaxed by the knowledge that her daughter is infatuated with Bonay, a clever French painter. The night that Isabelle prepares a great dance in honor of her daughter, George comes home drunk and when his wife reprimands him, he loses his temper and maudlinly admits that he has not only squandered her entire fortune but has gotten heavily in debt. Curbing her dismay, Isabelle is changed by the consciousness of her misplaced trust from a demure, dependent wife to a firm self-reliant woman and with admirable fortitude carries Georgia's ball through to striking success and even accepts the halting request of Bonay for Georgia's hand. Not until her daughter is off to Paris, does Isabelle break down. Then, again mastering herself, she sells her home to cover her debts and scorning the apologies of her husband who pleads his love for her, Isabelle continues to write to her daughter that all is well.

Meanwhile in Paris, Georgia is a gay butterfly and after one of their gayest parties, Bonay tries to induce her to settle down. Georgia laughs at the idea of having children, of retiring from the night life and Bonay is forced to indicate that their expenses exceed their resources. Frequent quarrels ensue and Georgia accepts the consolatory advances of Seymour, a wealthy playboy. At length, at the end of his rope, Bonay comes to present the facts to Georgia only to find that she has left him. Frantically he tries to communicate with her and at length follows the vain hope that she may have joined her mother in America.

Meanwhile, Seymour encouraged by Georgia's intention to divorce her husband drops his guise of friendliness and takes Georgia to a brilliant night rendezvous. Georgia falters at seeing the promiscuity but Seymour reassures her and as she is losing herself in the glamour she is shocked at the sight of her father who almost strikes Seymour for taking Georgia there. Ruefully Dummond explains what has happened and chastened both return to join Isabelle. They arrive to find Bonay begging Isabelle to save Georgia and the emotional scene results in a complete reconciliation.

THE PHANTOM AUTHOR

AFTER his graduation from the town school, Allen Adams regretfully bids farewell to Father Gonthier, his guardian, and to Jacqueline Meunier, his beloved, and daughter of the school headmaster, Professor Meunier, and departs for St. Joseph's University. His love for her fostered by letters and visits, Allen relinquishes the idea of becoming a priest several years later upon his graduation, and after confessing his love for Jacqueline to Father Gonthier, is given a position as bank clerk in the town bank, through the influence of Seigneur Rayon, his guardian's wealthy friend. His position and salary raised, Allen soon saves some money and plans his marriage with Jacqueline, and her father. However, when a huge sum of money is found missing from an open vault one early morning, Allen is accused and sentenced to twenty-five years of imprisonment, since he has no witnesses to vouch for his innocence. When Professor Meunier dies several weeks later, the distraught Jacqueline is taken by Father Gonthier to the rectory in the care of Mr. and Mrs. Odette. When, prompted by his guardian, Allen releases her from her engagement, Jacqueline reluctantly consents to marry Seigneur Rayon when he proposes.

Released from prison two years later when the thieves arrested in another bank robbery confess their guilt of the deed attributed to Allen, the latter returns home. Heartbroken by her marriage, Allen steals into her house one night for a last glimpse of her and takes some of Professor Meunier's valuable manuscripts. On his way home with Gonthier who had been visiting her, Allen decides to accept the lift offered him and go to Boston. When they stop at a farmhouse for rest, Allen notices Madge, the farmer's daughter; but forgets her in his position as baggage man at the wharves. Accepting the friendship of his co-workers, Allen visits many night clubs with them, and when one of them is raided one night, he gives the written version of the scene to Roger Chapman, a newspaper man who asked his assistance. Recommended to the editor, Mr. Spellman, for his fine work, Allen is given a position; and he finds prosperity and fame shortly afterwards when Mr. Spellman publishes Allen's translations of Professor Meunier's manuscripts with The Phantom Author as the mysterious writer.

Approached by a starving boy for aid one night, Allen discovers that it is Madge under the name of Peggy Donovan; and their friendship grows after he gives her a position at the office. When a huge sum of money is found missing from his desk one day, Peggy, member of a notorious gang, confesses to the police, but is released on a two year parole (wherein she is to report to Allen every week) when he pleads for her with the judge whom he tells of his own unhappy past. At his room that night, Peggy tells him of his having been designated by the gang as their wealthy victim, and of her love for the one from whom she was to steal. Noticing her revolver, Allen tries to take it, and wounded accidentally, begs her to leave. Repenting of her deed, Peggy notifies Jacqueline who immediately rushes to the hospital where Allen is taken. Very much in love with her, Allen overcomes his struggle with duty and moral questions, and lives with her, at her request for fulfillment. Traced to his apartment, she is detained in town when she returns to get her belongings, and Allen, after confessing to a priest, resolves never to see her again. Several weeks later, from the sanitarium where he has been recuperating from his breakdown, Allen travels to Cuba with Mr. Spellman; and when he meets Peggy on the boat, declares his love. However, informed of Jacqueline's illness and of Seigneur Rayon's death, Allen informs the passionate Peggy of his departure; and arriving to bid her good-bye at her hotel where she lives with her hunch-back husband (whom she married for monetary reasons), he finds her a suicide. Hurrying from the airplane field, Allen rushes with Gonthier to the hospital where the very weak Jacqueline, now the mother of his child, is calling for him, although she refuses to see him at first for fear he will think her a bad woman. Reconciled and united at last in matrimony, the two embrace and look forward to a happy future with their child. With the royalties which Allen has been sending her (and which Rayon had told her came from the inheritance of a wealthy deceased relative), and with the money from the motion picture right, the two live prosperously with Father Gonthier.

TO relieve her overworked mother, Haluma Hays hurries home from school each day to do the household chores, attend to the cattle, and gather in her stray sisters and brothers at night. Returning home from her daily field trip with her father, who taught her herding, sheep shearing, and efficient planting methods, Haluma finds one day that her mother's death has made her head of the household. However, at the suggestion of her stepmother who arrived a year later, Haluma relinquishes this position to her and sets out for college. Receiving a teaching position several years later, upon her graduation, Haluma finds the child-noisy atmosphere of school too reminiscent of her former drudgery, and leaves for a business position in the town where she had attended business school. Infuriated by her attorney-boss's continuous advances, Haluma leaves in a huff one evening for home, after she has thanked Fred Yeats, the man in the next office, for rescuing her from him that night. After many visits to her home, Fred sets up his law practice in the town in order to be near her. Jealous of his attentions to Haluma, Stella Knowles, a girl whom he had repudiated, forces him into the position of escort to a young married woman one evening during and after the party. When Haluma later repeats Stella's malicious story of his affair with the woman, Fred confesses his love for her only and proposes marriage. Forgetting his promise to Haluma to join the church, Fred is brought to his senses by the pleas of his young dying son two years later; and when at this time, one of Fred's clients puts him in charge of his two hundred acre farm, Haluma and her children are his happy companions. As they are seated at supper one evening, the growl of thunder reminds Fred of his hay and when, killed by the lightning, he falls on top of his younger son, Bobby, sitting at his side on the hay wagon, the timely arrival of the older one, Jimmy, saves him too from death. Promising to cooperate with their grief-stricken mother, the children set out to buy a horse to replace the one killed in pulling the wagon; but only bring home another dead one,—for the sickly horse sold them perishes on the way. Anxious for the advice of her father, who had finally left Haluma's house several years before because of his many quarrels with Fred over the proper management of the farm, Haluma visits her stepmother who informs her of his recent death. As time passes, Haluma, her hands full with searching for stray cattle, disputes over line fences, and suspicious salesmen and tramps, somewhat forgets her double grief. With her two oldest sons doing engineer work in another town, two daughters teaching elsewhere, and the younger children at school, Haluma hires a forlorn, honest looking wanderer, Gene, to assist her on the farm. When May, one of the daughters vacationing at the farm one summer, returns Gene's love, Haluma turns over the management of the farm to the young but capable husband, and turns to the thing she had always wanted to do—nursing. When the war arrives, Haluma serves her country as heroically as her sons, by her diligent, persevering nursing of the wounded, and at a family reunion after the strife, her children hail her as a great nurse and matriarch.

FORGETTING his wager with Paula Glenn, his actress friend, after the masquerade party they had both attended that he would recognize her in any disguise, Robert Gordon, editor of the City Chronicle stares at his quaintly dressed spinisterish visitor. Politely acquiescing to her suggestion that he drop his investigation into the disposition of city taxes and be more sensationally entertaining in his news, Robert has his office boy, Buddy escort her to the elevator. Reading the papers he has just picked up—a letter ceding certain building and supply contracts to a friend—, Buddy follows the woman, and discovering her identity at the theater which she enters, he rushes to inform Robert. An estrangement results when Robert, instead of laughing at her ruse when she confesses it, questions her suspiciously about her implications with the politicians; and he refuses to see her again when he sees her at a night-club with Morton Woodley, editor of the rival newspaper which was attacking Robert's denunciation of the city fathers; so that when she, having learned of their plot to harm him should he not accept their bribe, begs him to do so, he spurns her. Returning to the building after lunch one day, Buddy hides behind a pillar as he sees Morton trying to force some money on Dan, the night watchman. Realizing the situation, Buddy rushes to warn Robert who hears his shouts before he is taken by Morton's men. Informed by the wounded watchman that they wished him to allow them to search the place for some lost papers, Robert has an extra put out publishing the news. In spite of his rival's attempt to burn the presses the following night, Robert continues his denunciation. In the meantime, escaping from the guard of the banker's daughter, Marilyn Dowling, at Morton's apartment, Buddy gives Robert an envelope he had found there; and when Marilyn, sent to retrieve the book, steals it from his desk when she visits him the next day, Robert, who has realized that the name on other papers and these are the same, has her followed by Buddy. Entering as Morton is telephoning to Paula, Marilyn accuses him of infidelity to her and refuses to return the bankbook. Blurting out that they have been seen together many times, and that Robert knows all about them, Buddy is again caught; and when after deciding that they had better leave the city for a time, they quarrel about the shares, Buddy suddenly shoots into the air with a revolver he has found there, and in the confusion, escapes with the bag of papers Morton has brought with him. Meeting Paula, Buddy gives her the papers while he telephones for aid to Robert. In the meantime, arriving at the latter's office, Morton, after denouncing his underhand ways of investigating, has him bound. Just as they are placing him in their car, Paula arrives with the police and the incriminating papers, which indicate Morton, the banker, and the mayor as members of a tax thieving gang. While they are being hurried away to court, Robert embraces Paula happily; and Buddy beams as a cameraman approaches him to take his picture.

CAPTIVE PATIENT

Mrs. Bertha G. Crone File No. 8299

AMUSED when James Hale winks at her from the stretcher on which he is being brought to the Army Hospital, Beatrice Crane, nurse, is delighted when he is brought to her ward. Realizing that he is merely seeking a good time, she wards off his advances whenever she approaches him to dress his wounded leg; and since she is secretly engaged to Walter Brennan, now at the front, forgets her patient after he leaves again for battle several weeks later. She never receives the message which James had left with her friend, Martha Seldon, another nurse; and the latter, having learned of Beatrice's engagement to Walter through letters read secretly, sets forth to meet him at the place mentioned in the message; but when forced into a truck-load of wounded for aid at a nearby canteen, she sends the original message to Beatrice, urging her to hurry to James. The messenger carrying the note is killed, however, and when James, wounded while waiting for her in the rain, is again brought to the hospital, Beatrice is surprised at his coldness. But when she is later informed of Walter's death—for he had been the messenger who had volunteered his services to Martha (and who, despairing after he had noted the contents of the letter, had rushed into the thick of the fire)—she forgets him in her grief. Knowing that his bold advances will get them both into trouble, Beatrice has herself transferred to the lock-ward; and when he goes out late one night to consult the bulletin for her whereabouts and place a note in her letterbox, the jealous Martha, seeing him, notifies the authorities who place him in the lock-ward for being absent without leave after ten o'clock.

Visited by Martha the next day, James tells her to take good care of his friend, Murray Haley (whom he had given money to journey to his sick mother, and who was now returning to visit him) since he was not allowed to see him. Again and again Beatrice has to push him away when he tries to kiss her as she is dressing his wound; and she is horrified when he follows her outside the ward into the dict kitchen where she is to prepare some oysters for him; for should they be found there, his term of imprisonment in the ward will be increased and she will be discharged. After they have eaten, James threatens to escape unless she lives with him; and when she weepingly tries to push him toward the ward, Martha, hearing the commotion, informs the authorities who arrive just as he has been persuaded to get back into bed. Well again, James is sent on a dangerous mission as spy to the German lines and when Beatrice, transferred to the summer camp, sees him one day and calls his name, he is forced to throw her down to escape suspicion. However, several days later, realizing that he is being watched, and having obtained the necessary information, James hurries at night to the hospital to urge Beatrice to marry him and escape. But when she, remembering his treatment, refuses haughtily, he carries her off. Happily married after the explanations are exchanged, the two are met at the hospital by the newly married Murray and Martha; and the four rejoice when James is decorated for bravery by the general the next day.

THE LEADING LADY

Mary Kathryn Oliver File No. 8313

COMING out of the chorus dressing room, Pat Clayton shivered slightly at the sight of Wanda Gray, the leading lady of the show standing very close to Paul Manning. It didn't help at all to have Chris Waring, co-producer with Paul, come up to Pat and murmur something about the pair and as Pat turned away to hide her feelings, Chris asked if he could take her home.

Several nights later, during the second act intermission, Pat apologized as her flying steps catapulted her against Paul and as he explained worriedly that Wanda, claiming she was suddenly taken ill, had gone home, Pat, trembling at her own temerity, admitted that she knew every step of Wanda's Mist Dance. Paul shook his head but at length, realizing that he couldn't hold the packed house much longer, urged her to hurry. From the moment Pat appeared on the stage, the veiled figure swaying rhythmically held her audience spellbound and at the conclusion a deafening round of applause greeted the supposed Wanda Gray. Back stage Paul grasped her hand warmly and told her she was wonderful while Chris Waring possessively informed Pat that he had arranged a celebration in her honor at the Merry Widow. Pat protested but learning that Paul was to be there accepted.

In her room at home, Wanda stormed as she learned that Pat had gone on in her place and nobody was aware of her sensational desertion except the cast. Flinging herself into her clothes she set off in her roadster.

At the Merry Widow, Pat felt stifled by the great crowd of merry-makers but in Paul's arms, she forgot the other dancers crowding them until Paul unwillingly relinquished her to Chris who cut in. Chris was drunk, Pat could see and as he pressed her madly to him, Pat fought to free herself. The music reached a crescendo. Pat saw Wanda near her. Then suddenly the lights went out, a shot was fired, and through a haze Pat heard Wanda Gray ask coldly, "You idiot, why did you shoot him?" Bodies surged about her, and Pat seeing Chris on the floor dead and a revolver in her hand dazedly protested she was innocent. The police arrived and Pat was grilled ceaselessly. Only Paul, touched by her helplessness and aware now that he loved her, tried to secure her release, but there were many to testify that Pat had been struggling with Chris just before the lights went out.

Meanwhile, Wanda driving to clear her head, overturned her car and upon regaining consciousness claimed that she had lost her memory. Paul tried to get through to question her, but the doctors held him back. Desperate now, Paul demanded an entrance and forced a confession from Wanda who wildly shrieked that Chris had been married to her in secret, she had meant to shoot Pat not him, and as detectives Paul had posted rushed in, Wanda turned her gun on herself. Pat was freed and held close to Paul sighed she didn't want to be leading lady any longer. But Paul, drawing out a marriage license, induced her to become his leading lady for life.

THE BELOVED VILLAIN

Etelbe von Breton File No. 8314

SLIDING behind her desk at her office just as the clock struck nine, Arlena sighed in relief. Looking up she saw a handsome face smiling at her haste, and she dropped her eyes in dismay. It was almost half an hour before her employer came in and all that time, Arlena was embarrassedly aware of the admiring scrutiny of the visitor. Then, while he was there, Charles Bollman, brother of her employer, and fiance of her best friend went in to see Mr. Bollman and Arlena could hear the three men chatting in a friendly fashion.

The following night, accepting Zelma's urgent invitation to come to a little party Charles was giving, Arlena found that the handsome man, Harvey Tallenhoe, had induced Charles to invite Arlena. Dancing with Harvey, Arlena found herself entirely captivated by his charm, but when he drew her aside and pressed an unexpected kiss upon her lips, she left him abruptly. Harvey pulled her back into his arms and before the astonished girl could stop him he fervently explained how much he wanted her. When he asked her to come to his apartment with him after the party, Arlena drew back her hand and slapped him hard. She felt as if it were all some cheap melodrama, and when Harvey, in the best tradition of villains murmured he usually got what he wanted, she laughed at him.

The next day Harvey appeared at her desk to ask if she had reconsidered, and hurt by her laugh, he asked coldly if Mr. Bollman would see him. Error after error crept into Arlena's work as she thought of Harvey and remembered hearing about the lodge up north where he lived most of the year. He probably got his crude tactics from his solitary existence, she thought, but despite herself she felt herself wishing his arms were more tender. It was five o'clock when Arlena finally shut her desk and with a sigh because the day had seemed so long, she hurried into the street. Suddenly she felt herself drawn forcefully into a car and as she indignantly struggled against her abductor she looked up in amazement into the twinkling eyes of Harvey Tallenhoe. Indignant protests sprang to her lips, but as he explained he wanted to be her friend and she wouldn't give him an opportunity any other way, her resentment vanished. With a small groan she sank back against the rich cushions and promised to have dinner with him. Dusk was enfolding the road when Harvey put his arms about Arlena and whispered he loved her, and lost in the ecstacy of the moment, Arlena whispered that she had loved him from the first. However, her misgivings were reborn when Arlena discovered that the restaurant to which Harvey was taking her was his own isolated home, and the chauffeur's request to go home now as if it were the usual thing chilled her. But before Harvey's warm hearth, struggle as she would against his embraces, she found her efforts to escape growing less forceful and that night she remained.

The next morning Harvey was all contrition and assuring her he loved her even more, he drove her to her office and promised to call for her at closing time. With beating heart Arlena waited and as the minutes flew she dragged weary feet home. She might have known Harvey would be through with her. But there, astonishingly enough, was Harvey who had gone on home to surprise her with the marriage license. He had already won her mother's heart, and as Arlena crept into his arms she wept a little as she rejected his honeymoon suggestions of Vienna, Paris, or London, and with a teasing smile she supplied—his little shack in the North Woods where no woman had ever been before.

ERRANT YOUTH

George M. Boullion File No. 8315

CERTAIN that his advertising ideas will revolutionize the business, Steve works at pasting posters on billboards and confides his ambitions to his cynical, older assistant who returns a pessimistic reply. Rapidly changing from his working clothes at the end of the day, Steve climbs into his small roadster and calling for Irma at the florist shop where she works, overrides her insistence that they save their money, and induces her to celebrate the accumulation of three of the five hundred dollars they have set to get married upon. With that irresistible assurance of his, Steve tells her how rich they are going to be some day and adds that it is a shame to waste their youth without one little splurge.

That night they dance at a roadhouse, and intoxicated by the dancing and music have a glorious time. Putting her hand over his, Irma grows serious for a moment about how happy they will be together, and Steve whispers how much he loves her, but in a moment they are lost among the dancers again, and Steve's assistant, here with a gay party, insists upon spiking their lemonade. Protesting feebly, Steve and Irma accept one little drink and thereafter everything seems gayer than ever. Sleepily they return home and as he passes a car on the road, Steve swerves sharply to avoid an unexpected hole and not realizing that he has crowded another driver off the road goes on, followed by a motor cycle cop whose salary depends on convictions. A moment later, Steve is ruefully accepting charges of reckless driving, driving while drunk, and leaving the scene of an accident. An attempted remonstration angers the officer and Irma quiets Steve, who spends the night in jail where the other prisoners are holding a "Kangeroo Court". Steve learns a lot that night and the next morning is bailed out after appearing before a Judge who is Irma's uncle.

The Judge intercedes with the officer on Steve's behalf but he can only secure the dropping of the drunken driving charge. Steve plunges into the despondency of youth and feels that life is over for him, and when he finds the whole of the three hundred dollars is necessary to pay his fines, he sullenly breaks his engagement to Irma telling her he is no good anyway. Moreover, to cap the climax, his boss, learning of his conviction fires him.

Uncaring and sleepless, Steve broods while Irma in desperation explains the situation to the Judge. A few days later, the Judge sends for Steve and with every appearance of gravity advises Steve to marry Irma to save her from the unpleasant publicity attending their innocent spree. Stunned, Steve accepts, and whole heartedly buries himself in an advertising scheme which the Judge induces Steve's boss to consider. Steve is re-instated and with a $500 gift, starts married life with Irma again convinced that the world is a nut for him to crack.

THE CRIME BETWEEN

Harry Lagerquist File No. 8316

BANGING his tools as he worked in the garage which he and his brother Harry had inherited, Bob cursed himself for having quarreled with Constance Blair over giving too much attention to the wealthy Ted Drake. Jealousy gnawed him as Constance refused to see him thereafter and went everywhere with Ted, and when his brother brought home his bride, Bob's anguish was doubled.

Then a report came that oil had been discovered on a piece of property their father had bought as a speculation, and leaving the garage in Harry's care, Bob went west to investigate. The months dragged by though, with the thought of Constance coming before all else, and unable to endure it any longer, Bob came home intending to beg Constance to forgive him. Harry was unusually considerate and Bob, feeling something was wrong, irritably questioned him. Only then did he learn that Constance was married. Stunned he discovered that Constance had realized she was going to have Ted's child, but he wrote coldly to her telling her it was her own fault. However, her parents, morally certain they were doing the right thing, had forced the unwilling pair to marry to save the child's name, despite the fact that Constance had admitted she loved Bob.

Tortured, Bob went to see Constance and as they talked vainly trying to hide emotions with words, Bob seized Constance in his arms and asked her why she hadn't told him, he would have married her. Clinging to each other, Bob told her he was going away now, he couldn't be near knowing she belonged to Ted, when suddenly Ted appeared sneering at the unexpected ardor his wife was showing and pitying himself as a betrayed husband. Hopelessly, Bob left and a few days later, while he was broding over the knowledge that Ted was mistreating Constance more now than ever, his brother called to him to fix Ted's car, explaining the job had to be done and there was nobody in to do it. Fury blinded Bob as he worked over the roadster and as he found himself hoping that Ted would kill himself on one of his drunk, reckless drives, he slowly loosened a bur. That night Connie's baby was born dead, killed by the blows Ted had rained on his wife's body, and Bob could feel little remorse when he read of Ted's death in his smashed car.

Constance hovered between life and death for weeks and when finally Bob was admitted to her room she told him that when she had regained consciousness from the beating, Ted had begged for forgiveness and had gone away so she could sue him for desertion and marry Bob. But because of the consciousness of the murder, Bob informed Constance, when she recovered, that he had fallen in love with another woman. Then, in anguish he confessed his story to Harry who stared at him and told him that, in his excitement the fatal night he had left his tools out and Harry, getting them discovered the loose bur and fixed it. Freed of the guilt of the murder, Bob joined Constance, and confessing all, received her assurance that she had nothing to forgive him. Nothing mattered save that they loved each other.

JEALOUS HUSBANDS

Mrs. J. W. Pearson File No. 8332

THE Grayson home had long been a symbol of graciousness and hospitality and when the death of Mr. Grayson revealed that unhappy speculations had tied up his resources entirely, Gertrude and her mother were stunned at the realization that they were penniless. It was with gratitude that the mother and daughter accepted the invitations of relatives, but the proud young girl soon discovered that as poor relations, she and her mother were very much in the position of unpaid servants. Jealous and unfriendly, Estelle, Gertrude's cousin asked the pretty girl not to present herself when visitors were there.

Gertrude planned to find a position for herself in town and send for her mother, but Mrs. Grayson hysterically begged her daughter not to leave her for a moment and when Bob, a mine owner here on business, fell in love with Gertrude, she consented to become his wife on the strength of his willingness to have her mother come too. Travelling the weary miles up the mountain to her bridegroom's home, Gertrude felt her fortitude melting and only the forlorn appearance of her once dignified mother strengthened her resolution to continue. But even Mrs. Grayson shivered slightly at the uncouth appearance of the miners, and in his working clothes. Gertrude soon realized, her husband looked no different from the others. Powerful in build, Bob was insanely jealous of his wife and his brutality when he was drunk dismayed Ralph, a young mining engineer who sympathized with the pretty young girl. Realizing, however, that any display of interest would but make her position the more intolerable. Ralph succeeded in masking his growing love. Hateful as her life was, Gertrude remained on not daring to move her mother who had never ceased to ail since her arrival. Serving her husband's men, Gertrude shivered at the ribald jokes and across the table she could feel and was grateful for Ralph's unspoken sympathy.

Then one day Ralph came to tell Bob he was going, feeling that it wouldn't do to let Bob suspect his love, but finding Gertrude watering some of the little plants she was cultivating he remained to say good-bye to her. Bob came home sodden with drink. and Gertrude's mother not realizing he was there asked whom her daughter was speaking to. In an instant Bob arose and seizing his wife, tried to force from her the confession of an unspeakable affair.

Beating her unmercifully in his drunken rage, Bob watched with horror his wife's body fall down the side of the mountain, and to obliterate the memory he went to a friend's house. There, in a drunken quarrel he tried to stop the suspicions of his friend, and in the attending battle, Bob was killed.

Ralph worriedly returning was directed to where Gertrude fell by her hysterical mother, and tenderly restored her to health. In a few months, convalescent, Gertrude accepted the love of Ralph and with her mother went to live far away from the grim mines.

EYES OF GREED

N. Fitzroy Innis File No. 8334

YOUNG as he is, Henry Drake is moved by his father's inability to manage his farm, and as he watches the years of back-breaking work change his mother from a gentle little woman to one obsessed by a greed for money and the material comforts denied her, Henry runs away determined to come back only when he has made good. The boy wanders from town to town, working wherever he can, and at length arrives at the oil-fields of Texas. Laboring, saving, Henry looks forward to the day when he can return and make his parents comfortable, and through a land investment, Henry, now known as Henry Black, the name he had taken to prevent his parents from finding him before he had won his fortune, falls in love with Lois Trenton, daughter of a wealthy oil magnate. Lois, attracted to Henry, hides her interest in her father's young friend because of his humble origin. However, as they travel East together, Henry confides to her his anticipation of the joy of his parents when he makes their old age comfortable. Lois asks him why he hasn't written to them thus far, but Henry explains that all through the years he has been building to the moment when he could surprise them. They had always thought he would come to nought and he wants to be present when they learn of his success. Lois softens a little toward Henry and her father, troubled by the collapse of a gigantic scheme, urges Lois to marry Henry so that he can be certain she will be provided for. To Mr. Trenton, too, Henry confides his scheme of sending for his mother.

Singing a little tune, Henry writes a note to his mother sending her money and asking her to come to Trenton's home. Natalie Drake, however, has been terribly changed by the years. Receiving the note just as her husband has confessed that the farm is to be taken from him, she does not understand the strange note but goes to keep the appointment. To her amazement, when she enters the strangely quiet house a few minutes before the time for the appointment, she finds only the body of Mr. Trenton and a note enclosing a sum of money, explaining he has committed suicide because he was a failure; the money he has salvaged he leaves for Lois and Henry. Frightened by the inexplicable proceedings, a new idea seizes Natalie. If she takes the money and the note nobody will ever suspect and she can save the farm. She leaves and a few moments later, Henry arrives, finds the body, and stunned, is found there and accused of the murder. So different is his homecoming from what he has planned! He assumes that his mother didn't keep the appointment which he now realizes was wild and improbable. However, he does not, while under suspicion of murder, reveal himself to his parents. Meanwhile Natalie's conscience has given her no rest. She cannot understand why she was drawn into the strange case, and as she horrifiedly reads that an innocent boy is being held for murder, she determines to attend the trial and reveal her part. Under prosecution, Henry refuses to reveal his past, afraid that this disgrace may kill his parents, but Natalie, coming in, screams as she recognizes that Henry Black is her son. Chaos reigns. She is sworn in, and rocking in misery, she explains her conduct. Henry is cleared, Natalie has been punished enough, and after an interval, Henry marries Lois.

A DAUGHTER OF THE GOLDEN WEST

Lulu Green Wolbach File No. 8353

THE tiny mining town is in a flurry of excitement for the first women, the wife and daughter of Hale, the general store-keeper, are arriving. The general clean-up is more energetic than efficacious and when the miners see pretty young Dolly arrive with her mother, they awkwardly doff their rough caps. Bob Dennis officiously appoints himself head of the reception committee but Dolly hides her resentment of his high-handed methods. When she enters her father's store, she immediately proceeds to tack a picture on the wall and James, a young miner, shyly coming forward to shake her hand grasps her hammer instead. Their friendship is born with the laugh they share over his awkwardness.

A few days later, while Dolly is walking with her mother, they are suddenly confronted by a grizzly bear and Dolly's cry of fear is heard by both Bob and James who have followed. James shoots the bear but it is Bob who brings the women safely home, telling about the accident as though he were the hero. When Dolly shows her dislike for Bob by turning to the shy James, however, Bob decides to eliminate him from the scene. However, his bullet only grazes James' head, and Bob is saved from the lynching party only by the earnest interference of Dolly and James.

At this time, the miners come home jubilant over the striking of a rich vein, and Mr. Hale is approached by two Mexicans who try to rob his improvised safe. He turns them out, shooting over their heads, and the disgruntled Mexicans are approached by Bob outside the town. Pretending to hold them up, he gets them off guard and then enters a pact with them.

The whole town is gaily celebrating its luck at the saloon and roars of laughter seep through the doors as they dress a donkey in clothes and with mock courtesy lead him to the bar and force a drink down. Kicking its heels the donkey vanishes into the night. At the same time, Dolly is caring for the wounded James and when she leaves him, she is kidnapped by the Mexicans and held for Bob's arrival. However, she bribes a Mexican woman to get help, and James arrives, knocks out Bob, and carries Dolly to safety. However, the exertions of the night have been too much for him, weakened as he is by loss of blood, and at length he falls. Terrified, Dolly sees his wound has reopened. Stumbling, falling, she races against death and brings help for the man she loves.

James soon fully recovers under the adoring ministrations of Dolly and he goes back to settle an old debt with Bob, who, an outcast from the town, has been robbing the mail coach. And soon the whole town turns out for its first wedding and James kisses the lips of his adored young bride.

THE TAP DANCER

Mrs. Margaret Cunningham File No. 8356

WITH trembling fingers Barbara cleansed Buck Roger's jagged wrist where his fishing hook had caught it. When her father, the lame little station master who had, before his accident, been a promising construction engineer, came home, he frowned at seeing the son of the railroad owner in conversation with his daughter. Mr. Blackstone had no illusions about the fact that the wealthy young scion, here to inspect his father's interests, might fall in love with his child, and resentment swelled in his breast as he realized Buck was making love to Barbara. However, when he held his daughter close and warned her that soon Buck would leave her and go back to his own people, Barbara cried out in disbelief, and only after the most potent arguments did she resign herself to writing Buck that she couldn't keep further appointments with him. Even Mr. Blackstone had to admit, however, that Buck's dismay and his pleading with Barbara to marry him immediately seemed sincere enough.

A few weeks later, misgivings stilled by the confidence of her young husband that everyone would love her as he did, Barbara set off to meet her husband's people. Buck's mother was gracious enough, after the first shock of her son's mesalliance had been superseded by the realization that the girl was cultured if somewhat shy and dazzled by society. But the letters Barbara received from her father chilled her. Embittered by the accident that had killed Barbara's mother and ruined his own career, Mr. Blackstone distrusted everybody and couldn't believe his daughter's effusions were sincere. Then, at the first big dinner that Barbara, as Mrs. Rogers gave, the little bride felt herself being subjected to the most minute dissection and although Buck braced her, Barbara's heart sank as she inadvertently overheard some of the guests discussing the arrival of Louise Day, the dancer, with whom Buck had once been madly in love. Moreover, the moment the commanding Louise arrived, Barbara, who had been bearing up so well heretofore, suddenly seemed to wilt under the contempt of the world famous dancer. Louise's efforts to bring Buck back under her spell were obvious, and Barbara suffered as she saw how Buck had to struggle against her.

From then on Louise was a constant menace to the Rogers' happiness and when at last Buck explained that he loved Barbara but he couldn't go on without Louise, Barbara felt her father had been right. This wasn't her world, and quietly she returned to her father, grieving because Buck made no attempts to see her Weeks passed and then Mr. Blackstone silently handed a newspaper to Barbara in which the details of her husband's indictment for the murder of Louise Day, were set forth. Stifling a cry, Barbara exclaimed she didn't believe it was true, Buck wouldn't kill anyone, and she hurried to the side of her husband. Barbara winced at the sob stories about the wife who kept faith with her husband despite his misconduct, but Buck seemed doomed until, the final day a woman rushed in confessing that she had killed Louise. Louise had run over her child and pretending sympathy had visited the stricken home only to enslave Kitty's husband Jimmy. The day the child died, Jimmy came home to ask forgiveness and learning that his little one had died, Jimmy, stricken with remorse had killed himself, and Kitty, dazedly had murdered the woman responsible.

Buck was freed, and with Barbara started a new life.

FLIGHT DECK

Carl F. & John L. Doran File No. 8358

PROUDLY Commander Clark watches from the decks of the Saratoga, sailing over the Pacific, as his son Steve noses his trim navy pursuit plane down and makes a perfect landing on the ship. Several days later, near Panama, naval maneuvers are held and after a flying demonstration is cheered, the air squadron demonstrate the demolition of a dummy fleet. Not realizing that a piece of one of his bombs has damaged his plane, Steve prepares to land on the Saratoga flight deck. His plane suddenly swerves sharply down and he loses consciousness.

Awakening in the emergency hospital of the Saratoga, Steve feels he can never fly again, and as reports of his turning "yellow" reach the ears of his father, the Commander advises his son to try to overcome his fear of flying by flying. Trembling Steve climbs into his airship, but as he nears the Saratoga deck, his hands turn clammy and with a cry he shoots his plane along the decks, runs over the landing surface and crashes into the water. Later that evening when the Commander visits his son again in the hospital ward, he gravely presents him with transfer papers to a flying school in California. There as a ground instructor, Steve makes good and falls in love with Mary Randal, daughter of a millionaire backer of endurance flights. Once at the Randal home, while advising Mary's father, Steve gets into an argument with James Clayton, Randal's pilot, about the best type of plane to use. Realising too, that Steve is winning Mary from him, Clayton investigates Steve's past and discovering the taint of yellowness, reveals it to Mary, by taunting Steve about never himself flying although he turns out pilots professionally. Steve has no answer and Mary turns her attention markedly to Clayton who is about to set off on the Pacific flight to Japan. At the last moment one of the fuel men turns up too drunk to fly, and Clayton, having feared Steve's progress with Mary during his own absence, sees an opportunity to drive Steve into accompanying him on the dangerous flight. White-lipped Steve goes, and as Clayton, the pilot, receives the acclaim, Steve tries to look unconcerned. While they are flying Clayton sends notes back contemptuously asking Steve how he feels, but as they are struggling against a storm, Steve notices something is wrong with Clayton, and discovers that the pilot in attempting to swerve the plane sharply, has ruptured his appendix. Taking over the controls, Steve radios and discovers that the Saratoga is near. Feeling his old fear of the Saratoga flight deck, Steve conquers it, lands his patient, finds out his father is upon the dirigible Akron, and continues to Japan. Great is the acclaim with which he is received and a week later, he returns home where an even greater welcome awaits him. Mary sends a note asking for forgiveness, and as Steve sees the Akron flying overhead, he gets into a plane and maneuvers ten thousand feet in the air, to hook his plane to the dirigible trapeze, and climbing up the ladder shakes the hand of his happy father.

WHAT PRICE LOVE?

Eleanor M. Tuttle File No. 8359

FRIENDS since childhood, Alice Norton and her fiance, James Gordon part reluctantly at the station of their town where they have gone to school, attended parties, and made happy plans for the future together. Graduated with Alice from college, James plans to open a law office in the city to which the former is to come when he is on his feet. Joining the politicians, James soon meets Louise Hanley, a daughter of the judge who gives a party for his political friends one evening. Anxious for high financial and social position, James soon forgets Alice in his attention to Louise, and postpones his marriage to Alice again and again; and when Alice, intending to surprise him, and tell him of her approaching motherhood, visits him at his apartment one day, she is told by the hotel clerk that Miss Hanley is with him as usual. Heartbroken, Alice visits Louise at the address given her by the clerk, to beg her to release James; but learning that he has declared his love for her and that her father has given him a secure position as city attorney, she returns home.

Noting an item in the newspaper from his native town (given him by a home-town client) of Alice's shame and the subsequent loss of her position, and another item concerning his own rise to prosperity and fame, James, suddenly remorseful, takes the next train to her home. Forgiven, James establishes her and the child in a small country home which he visits often (with lies of business appointments to his wife). While he finds love and companionship with her and his son, Jim, his relations with Louise become more and more strained as she continues to suspect his excuses and absorb herself in the social life of her daughter Jane. Seeing him put some toys in the car after he has told her of a necessary week-end business conference, Louise follows him in her car; and when her car crashes with another several hours later on the road, Alice, who has been coming to meet James at the station, and who is the woman in the other car, brings the unconscious woman to the home of a friend nearby. Having once been a nurse as well as a teacher, Alice attends to her wounds, and is just about to notify the woman's relatives when a card inside her purse reveals her as Louise. Delirious, Louise speaks wildly of her illegitimate child, Jane, and of her lover; but when James arrives on the scene, Alice, although knowing this is grounds for his divorce, says nothing of it to him. Returning home, James does not see her for a long time, in order to further allay Louise's suspicions; but is tempted to visit her when told that Jim, now a junior at college, is bringing his beloved, a college chum, to meet his Uncle Jim, as he calls James, and his mother. Noticing his daughter's car outside, James looks into the window, and finding Jane there, sends Alice a note to meet him in town. Unhappy in his predicament, James asks for her advice, and Alice, not wishing to thwart the happiness of Jane and Jim, tells him of Louise's unconscious confession of her past; but she threatens never to see him again should he divorce Louise. Entering the house, therefore, James tells his daughter of Jim's father, his college friend, who had entrusted the care of his wife and son to him. While the two embrace happily, James and Alice stare at each other with tears in their eyes.

MAN PROPOSES

Mrs. Margaret Carber File No. 8361

A STRUGGLING young country doctor, James Kilroy looked across the little Church and as he saw Margaret Murray for the first time, something seemed to happen to his heart. Later, unconsciously following her, he retrieved the prayer book she had dropped and as their eyes held for a moment, Margaret, frowning at the intensity of his glance, hurried on.

A few days later, Tom Collins, James' best friend laughed at the young doctor's preoccupation and exclaimed suddenly he too was in love. James scarcely heard Tom as he exclaimed about the most beautiful girl he had ever met, but when he added she was a guest of Ellen Murray, and a direct descendent of a great Irish patriot, James' heart sank, for they were in love with the same girl. But it was Tom Margaret favored and as the day for their wedding approached, a terrible thing happened. Tom, having had too much to drink got in a gambling game and to cover his losses stole money from James and fled from Ireland. James' sorrow was as nothing compared with Margaret's grief, for now she knew that she had been terribly indiscreet and soon everyone must know she was going to have a child. But it was James who dissuaded her from entering a convent, and pouring out his love for her, promised to take her to America and there nobody would ever know that the baby wasn't his. Sobbing Margaret accepted, but though there was nothing James wouldn't do for her, Margaret felt she still loved the man who had deserted her. In New York James had a terrible time of it trying to establish a practice, but in the tenement district he gradually established a name for himself and as little Tommy grew up, he too was taught to be a doctor. Margaret lived only for her son, and James tried to hide his own knowledge that however much his wife respected and admired him she always loved Tom, whose theft James never revealed to her, better than him.

Even when James grew prosperous enough to take his family from the tenement district into a beautiful home of their own, and Tommy was interning in a New York hospital. Margaret continued to think fondly of her son's father, and to hope that some day she would meet him again. One day, Tommy came home and over the dinner table told of a poor derelict he had picked up. He was a Tom Collins from Ireland. Margaret went deathly pale, and James understanding offered to take her immediately to the hospital to see if it were really Tommy's father. The other doctors had given up the case and Tommy had done what he could, but James had his wife's lover brought to his house and he himself devoted the next few weeks to nursing Tom and when he was well James was willing to step out of Margaret's life. But for the first time she realized that it was James whom she loved, James whose kindness had never once failed. And although Tom found he had a son and the friendship of Margaret and James, it was the last two who found love.

THEIR ERRORS

Arthur F. King File No. 8383

COMING out of the employees' entrance of the railroad, Wayne, a young shipping clerk with lofty ambitions, saw Helen hesitantly come off a train and look about her fearfully. Her distress was so obvious that he approached her and asked if there wasn't something he could do. For a moment Helen looked as if she would run away and then hesitantly she confided she had lost her purse and as he induced her to accept ten dollars until she got some work, their friendship was born.

Wayne sympathized with Helen's artistic leanings and confided that he didn't expect to be a shipping clerk all his life. At length they were married, and in the added incentive of providing for Helen and then for little Ruth, Wayne's ambitions led to recognition while Helen dropping everything else in her love for her husband and child provided the perfect background. It was a glorious night when Wayne came home and kissing Helen's face, where the steam from the oven had made it damp, explained they were on the road to success, he had an offer to go to Nashville as an assistant manager. Soon there was a little home in the suburbs and Wayne's ambition knew no limits. Helen's happiness soon became a little strained as she realized that in his upward climb, Wayne was forgetting her and Ruth. Now when he came home for supper, it was always taken on the run with the explanation that one meeting or another demanded his time. Hiding her disappointment, Helen began to paint again and surprisingly enough she realized her work was good.

Once Wayne came home and asked her to make a big dinner so that he could interest some railroad executives in promoting one of his schemes. The dinner was a huge success, Wayne won his point, but Helen met Albert Williams and thereafter Albert called her frequently. At first cold to his advances, Helen realized that Wayne was giving less and less thought to her and when she mentioned her painting, he looked vague and patting her cheek absentmindedly asked if she thought it quite respectable for the wife of so prominent a business man. Albert's interest was quite different and responding to his warm praise, Helen felt that perhaps she might awaken Wayne's jealousy. However, when Wayne did notice Albert's frequent presenee, he asked lightly if little Ruth had admirers so early, and Ruth who was in love with a young school mate found both her father and mother too busy to help her. Finally rebelling against the neglect Helen promised to run off with Albert and Wayne found to his dismay that without Helen in the background he was lost. All his schemes seemed to collapse, and at the railroad they began to warn him his work was falling down. When he turned to Ruth, she flayed him with a bitter speech about his own selfishness, telling him her mother was right; then locked herself in her room because Peter daneed with another girl.

But Helen came back, and asking Wayne's forgiveness told him she couldn't go on with it, she loved him. And together they renewed the vows they had made at marriage and helped Ruth find her happiness with young Peter.

THE MURDERER SCREAMS

Anthony Ditonto File No. 8380

LIKING Richard Downley, a school chum of his who has been recently orphaned, Anthony Craig persuades his Uncle Jim to adopt him. Crippled as the result of a fall from the arms of a careless nurse, Anthony hates girls and resents Richard's attentions to Mary Diana, the wealthiest girl in the school; and when Richard refuses to remain home with him one night, Anthony ties him to a tree to keep him from going out with Mary. Hated by the boys for his constant quarreling, Anthony seriously wounds one of them in a fight outside the school and throws the teacher who had interfered, into a nearby lake. Thinking Richard has prejudiced them and that Mary is taking the former from him, Anthony follows them to a roadhouse party one night, extinguishes the lights and tries to kidnap Mary for harm. Stopped by someone whom he thinks is Richard, Anthony shoots him; so that when Richard is found with the revolver in his hand—with Mary as the witness against him—he is sentenced to a long imprisonment.

Returning to the boarding house where they have been living since Uncle Jim's death, Anthony ignores the questions and attentions of the landlady's daughter, Nancy, in his haste to pack. Colliding with a man who is the exact replica of Richard, Anthony strikes him and hypnotizes him as soon as he revives; and arriving in court, prompts him to take the blame for the crime. Since only one must be accused and since it is difficult to identify them, both are pardoned; and when Evangeline, a rich society girl (with whom, Anthony, on his visits to the estate to sell flowers and vegetables for his farmer employer, had tried to elope) cries out when she sees him,—for he had killed her father the night of the forced elopement when the latter had tried to stop him from stealing a valuable necklace and the girl,—Anthony pushes her against Richard with whom she falls in love. Caught by the police, Anthony is imprisoned, but escapes in the riot organized at the gate when a new prisoner is being brought in. Discovering at Nancy's house where he has fled to hide, that she is befriending Richard, the infuriated man informs her and Evangeline's lover, Jacob, of the society girl's attendance at a night club with his friend; and when in the fight which ensues there, Jacob flees after wounding Richard, Anthony (or Ruff) rushes the wounded Evangeline to a hospital. Remembering her father's death, Evangeline pleads with him to leave her alone (although he loves her) and send for Richard before she dies. Overcome by remorse, Anthony does this and follows Jacob to Hawaii where he has fled, for revenge. Pretending to fight with him over Angeline, a native dancing girl, Anthony shoots him; and pursued by the natives who want him to marry the girl, he is tortured at the stake and finally locked up in a cabin to be burnt alive. However, saved by his dog, Pal, who follows him everywhere, Anthony escapes and arrives home in time to enter incognito the airplane race sponsored by a rich friend of Evangeline's. When his plane crashes with Richard's, Evangeline, recognizing him, calls the police. Arrested Anthony leaps from the train on which he is being taken to prison, is shot, but rushes to Richard's house to die and to give his friend the plans for the gold mine owned by Richard's father who had entrusted it to Uncle Jim for his son. Returning home prosperous a year later from the mine, Evangeline and Richard are happily married.

THE PEACEFUL COWBOY

IN a saloon brawl with a Mexican, Bob Lake, nicknamed Peaceful, narrowly escaped death by the swift interference of his beloved older brother Ted, who flung himself upon the rogue a moment before a glittering knife was to be buried in Peaceful's back. Back at the ranch they operated jointly, Bob clumsily attempted to express his appreciation, but grinning, Ted demonstrated the latest boxing trick he had developed and as Bob deftly sidestepped, the two pantingly continued their mock battle. They understood each other perfectly, those two, until the day when Ted dragged himself home, and haltingly explained that he had caught his opponent cheating in a card game, and when he picked up his money and called quits, Three Fingers had shot him in the back. Holding back his grief, Peaceful tried to help Ted, but repeating, "Three Fingers" Ted died and Bob swore to avenge his death.

One day, five years later, Bob walked into a saloon in a far off town and bumping into a reeling man coming out of the swinging door, he apologized, but before he could say another word a terrific blow sent him reeling into the street. Bob saw the man stare at him for one long moment, then tossing his head as if to clear it, he rushed at the surprised cowboy. Sidestepping deftly, Peaceful demonstrated some of the tricks he used to practice with his brother and as fist rained against flesh a crowd of spectators gathered. The other fellow fought madly, eyes popping, but Peaceful's skill soon left him outstretched in the street. A young freckle-faced chap shook Peaceful's hand and admiringly asked the young stranger to come up to his place, his Dad would like to meet him. Laughing at the boy's idolatry, Peaceful went and the boy whistled as he learned the fighting fellow's sobriquet.

At Bud Marvin's place, Peaceful found a warm welcome and his eyes lingered on Bud's pretty sister Jane who brought him bandages and arnica. Before Peaceful went, he gained the everlasting envy of young Bud, by his skill in hitting a bulls-eye and throwing a knife at a twig from a great distance. In conversation with Mr. Marvin, moreover, Peaceful revealed his pursuit of his brother's murderer, and saw Jane's quickened interest, as he said the trail had led him to this town. Peaceful went back to the saloon and with cap pulled low over his face, Peaceful watched the drinkers. He saw Buck, his antagonist, fumble with a glass and to his amazement, he noticed that the man wore gloves. Remembering now the strained look of the fellow at first sight of him, Buck followed him when he left and outside the man's cabin. Peaeeful saw the fellow remove his gloves and at sight of only three fingers on one hand, Bob kicked open the door, gave his brother's murderer time to draw a gun, and as the rascal treacherously fired before the agreed signal, Bob picked up his own gun and fired simultaneously.

Riding into town, Bob gave himself up to the sheriff, but there was a reward for Three Fingers dead or alive, and freed, Bob rejected the $1,000, heading for the Marvin ranch where a greater reward awaited him in the person of Jane.

TRY TO FORGET

WITH the acclaim of the college audience still ringing in her ears, Margot happily went to her dressing room and as she removed the last bit of make-up, a knock sounded at the door. Helen, Margot's room mate dashed into the room and throwing her arms about her friend told her she was marvelous. In the big scene, said Helen excitedly, you could hear sniffles all through the audience and "Show me another collegiate who can move a hard boiled audience to tears," she ended. Then stopping suddenly, she added, "My cousin Paul, a genuine actor, was out front and he thought you were grand." That night Paul managed to cut in on almost every dance and Margot, who had always shone in amateur performances but had never actually expected to impress a big time actor was thrilled. Her parents, however, learning that Paul was an actor, frowned upon him, and when Paul waved a contract for a road show and holding her close told her it would be a long time before he could see her again, Margot felt all her intended bravado melting. She was in love with him and might never see him again. Weeping against his shoulder, Margot raised a tear-stained face happily to his when under the glamor of the moment, Paul asked her to marry him. Her happiness was somewhat overcast, however, when her parents' opposition continued even in the face of her marriage which, they exclaimed, would never turn out right.

Margot found her life as a stock company actor's wife a hard one. One night stands and the poorest quarters in small hotels were not the worst features, Paul was insanely jealous of every man that looked at his wife, and took to drink to forget his doubts. Struggling with him, Margot tried to show him that the company wouldn't keep him if he went on drinking, and the night she discovered she was going to have a baby, Paul was fired for breaking up the show by his drunken antics before a theater audience.

Remorseful, Paul promised to stop drinking now, but the next few months were gruelling ones without proper food or even shelter. At length the baby was born and it was Margot who managed to get a contract with a very small stock company and because she would not sign up without Paul, Paul was taken on as a ticket seller. However, pride made him take to drink again and one day, jealous of Margot's stage kisses, Paul wanted another drink, and carelessly left the baby. When Margot got back that night, she was stunned by the discovery that her child had strangled herself.

Mad with grief, Margot refused to be consoled by the remorseful Paul, and that night she promised to run away with the leading man of the company. Self-pity made her drink and not until she had gotten to the station did she realize that what she was about to do wouldn't help matters. Coming back to Paul she found he was about to commit suicide at having lost her and as they both wept together, Margot drew Paul's head to her shoulder and together they planned to begin life anew.

OUTLAW GUNS

A PUZZLED frown wrinkled the pretty face of Ann Belding as she watched the dust kicked up by the lone rider's horse. Suddenly he swerved off the road and started coming up the mountain where Ann was hiding. Scarcely breathing as he approached, in her over-zealousness to see his face, her foot slipped and she slid almost directly in his path. In an instant his two guns were drawn, but seeing her he put them away crying, "It's dangerous here for you, Miss Belding." Surprised that he knew her name Ann questioned him but all she could learn was that he was Jim Sande and he was escaping because the men back in Sage didn't realize that he killed Wolf Blaine in self-defense. Then as she paused, he bent from his saddle, kissed her square on her perplexed little mouth and was off in a cloud of dust. A moment later the sheriff and his men questioned Ann, but she explained she had seen no one.

Back home Ann heard her father talk about what a good thing it was Wolf Blaine had been killed, but it wasn't safe for the stranger who did it with Wolf's gang after him. When Ann informed her father about her adventure, Belding whistled. It couldn't be the same Jim Sande, the son of his business partner back East. And yet Simon Belding remembered how the little fellow used to read all the wild western stories and how he cried because his father wasn't going West with his partner.

Meanwhile in the nearby town of La Mar a stately Southern gentleman was hesitantly speaking with O'Donnell, the newly made bank president, and confiding his distrust of banks. Listening to the suave sales talk, the old gentleman finally agreed to bring his money, but as he hobbled dignifiedly out the wink O'Donnell gave a dark fellow outside was not lost on him. In the saloon the Southern gentleman drank himself into a pleasant state and incidentally heard snatches of a muffled conversation nearby from some men who assured each other that the old gentleman was "out". But when the gentleman walked out into the street, one of the men yelled, "Get him!" and a bullet creased the tall crown of the dignified fellow's hat. As Jim Sande stretched himself prone on the floor, two guns barked and the fellow who had tried to get the old gentleman fell wounded to the street while Jim enthusiastically shook the hands of Catawampus and Bud, his two fellow Rangers and telling them briefly about his difficulty with Wolf Blaine's gang, ordered them to round up the Rangers, he suspected trouble at the bank.

When the sheriff came to his office, he tried to arrest the imperturbable Southerner who awaited him, but at the point of the caller's gun, and shown his ranger's credentials, the sheriff agreed to get Jim a job as janitor in the bank. As an old, bent janitor, Jim's disguise worked splendidly until Ann came to the bank with her father and almost gave him away. But catching his signal for silence, she went calmly home with her father. Meanwhile at the bank, the hold-up Jim expected came off. O'Donnell handed over the funds to his confederates, and Jim, straightening up began shooting. Pandemonium reigned. The Rangers arrived, and the hold-up was frustrated. Jim was cleared of charges and offered a leadership in the Ranger's group, but he was going to the Belding ranch and there, holding Ann tight, he explained to her father that he was going to reveal himself to his father's partner when the trouble with Wolf Blaine held him up—for a while. With a wink, Simon Belding went out and left the two young people alone.

THE SHE-DEVIL

Andres Morales File No. 8388

ANY man would have fallen for the beauty of Lydia Williams, and Joseph, brooding over the alleged unfaithfulness of Mildred, the girl whom he was to have married, was an easy victim. Sending Mildred fifteen thousand dollars for her "friendship", Joseph felt some misgivings at his summary termination of their affair without giving Mildred a chance to explain, but if he expected her to make a scene he was mistaken. Mildred stared at the terrible letter, at the money Joseph sent her, and then with the newspaper account of Joseph's marriage to a Lydia Williams before her, sailed for Europe to have Joseph's child.

The one thing Joseph didn't suspect was the motive of Tom, who had introduced him to Lydia and was directly responsible for his terminating his intention to marry Mildred. But Lydia meeting Tom in his apartment, needed reassurance. It didn't seem right to keep on misleading Joseph; he believed in her so utterly. Tom grasped her face in his hands, and reminded her that she couldn't back out now. It was he who had engineered the whole affair, and now that she was married to Joseph's millions he wanted his share. And Lydia was willing to do anything as long as she was certain of Tom's love. It was a terrible hold Tom had over Lydia, she couldn't live without him. To satisfy Tom's ever increasing demands, Lydia cajoled thousands of dollars from Joseph who never suspected. But as Tom's gambling debts mounted, Lydia began to find it more and more difficult to get money from Joseph whose stocks were dropping precariously. Once Lydia told Tom she couldn't get any more, but when Tom laughed harshly and told her she would never see him again, Lydia pleaded with him not to leave her or she'd go mad.

The very day Joseph came home in despair because he was broke and unable to borrow money, Lydia warned by Tom that he had to have money to cover a gambling debt, kissed her husband and weepingly informed him that she had gambled on a sure-fire race horse just to help him. If she didn't have five thousand dollars immediately she'd be imprisoned. Because he believed she had done it for him, because he was certain that the promised check from an uncle in South America was forthcoming, Joseph desperately forged a friend's name and borrowed money which he was to repay immediately. Remorseful immediately, Joseph's cup of misery filled to overflowing when his one remaining servant Patsy led him to Tom's apartment where Joseph saw his Lydia give the money to Tom and receive his kiss. Lydia fleeing from his withheld fury, left after having taken the letter containing the money from South America.

When Joseph tried to commit suicide, however, Mildred with whom Patsy had been in communication stopped him and with the fifteen thousand dollars he had once given her, helped him re-establish himself. Incredulous of Mildred's love, Joseph found her and his daughter still waiting for him. However, Lydia, deserted by Tom after her money and her looks had gone, returned to accuse Joseph and Mildred of living in adultery. But the faithful Patsy's investigation revealed Lydia's succession of Parisian victims and the divorce was granted without alimony. Begging, Lydia, pock-marked and ill, stepped into the street to avoid being seen by Joseph and as an automobile ran her over, she begged Joseph's forgiveness. Tenderly he returned to Mildred.

THE LOVE PIRATE

Gladys Luke File No. 8378

WANTED for the murder of his business rival, Bill Daley escapes from the police as he is being led to prison, boards a boat where he organizes a mutiny, and becomes one of the most dangerous captain pirates of the sea. In the city, Marian, the murdered man's niece, learning of the loss of her father's fortune in the stock market, induces the latter to undertake the search for the treasure buried by her uncle on a distant island (the approximate whereabouts of which are mentioned in his will). Provided with the map, they set out; but beset in mid-ocean by Captain Bill's ship, Mr. Broun, Marian's father, is killed by one of the pirates, who has been informed that he has the treasure map. Failing to find it, Bill threatens to force Marian into living with him and then killing her if she doesn't yield it up. When Marian furiously resists his advances, Bill tries to subdue her by forcing her to kiss every man in his crew; and when one of them, Donald Graye, refuses. Bill has him flogged until Marian interferes by kissing him of her own accord,—for she has fallen in love with the stranger. Imprisoned in the captain's cabin, Marian interrupts her weeping one night to listen to Donald's whispering of a boat, provisions, escape. After rowing for a long time, the two finally reach an island on which they build a fire and a hut for shelter.

Not trusting him, Marian does not disclose the map to him until several days later when he declares his love and she realizes her own love for him; but fearing to hear of his past—for she thinks he may be an escaped convict—she refuses to listen to his proffered information about himself. Following the map closely,—for they realize that that is the treasure island—the two find the treasure beneath a heavy rock near the shore. Several weeks later, overcome by her unhappiness and homesickness for her mother, Donald takes the risk of rowing with Marian into mid ocean where they may signal with the branch they have prepared, to a passing ship. After several days of rowing, their provisions at their final ebb, Marian, weeping, is embracing Donald before she drowns herself with him—as they had planned—when Donald suddenly sights a ship. But Captain Bill has also seen them, and the two ships race toward them. Recognizing the pirate ship owned by the notorious Bill, Captain Heath, of the other ship, who has pledged the authorities to capture the criminal, follows close upon them after they have taken the protesting couple upon their ship. Ordering his men to put on speed, Bill goes below to divide the treasure with his men, and to force his attentions on Marian; and when Donald, hearing her screams, rushes to her aid, he is beaten almost into insensibility. Suddenly there is a commotion on the first deck. After a short but heated fight, Captain Heath's valiant men capture the pirates; and one of them is just about to shoot Bill, when Donald, a detective sent by the government to capture him, stops him, for he must bring him back alive. Welcomed home by her mother and friends, Marian introduces her fiance, Donald who is given the reward for the capture of the pirates after he has testified against their deeds in court. Everyone leaves as Donald kisses his happy bride-to-be.

LOVE'S ENEMY

EVERYBODY liked May Clark. Only she could have the patience to listen for hours to her father's impotent rage against Si Murdock. Henry Clark always claimed that if Si hadn't bought the Morse property first, he, Henry, would have gotten it and have had enough sense not to sell it before oil was discovered on it. As it was, Henry raged, Si didn't get any good out of it, and Henry was kept from making a fortune. After each of his rages, May would tactfully soothe her old father, cook some of his favorite corned beef and cabbage, and smile when her sister Nell complained that May pampered the old man too much.

All that was before May met Lloyd. It had been at a school dance and from the moment their eyes met across the dance floor they knew they were meant for each other. He was studying to be a doctor and as Lloyd escorted May back across the moonlit lanes, he told her of his plans. When May came home there was a misty loveliness about her, and as she put her arms about her father's withered neck, she told him she was in love. Henry smoked hard on his old corn cob and grunted while Nell, engrossed in an affair with a traveling man told May she was a fool to throw away her beauty on a school boy. Then May learned that Lloyd was the son of Si Murdock. Her heart sank and cautiously sounding her father on the subject of marriage discovered that he didn't want her to marry and leave him alone. But when Henry learned that his daughter was in love with Si Murdock's son, he rose in all his fury. Never would he permit it. For once May found corned beef and cabbage ineffectual. Nothing could change Henry's mind. He wouldn't have it, that was all. Sadly May told Lloyd of the difficulty. Lloyd poohed the idea of so small a thing keeping them apart and at length tried to convince May that her father would have Nell. But when May, not pinning too much faith in Nell's taking care of the old man, found that her sister had eloped with a traveling man, her heart sank. Henry shouted that Nell had some sense, anyway. He didn't like losing a daughter, but he had May, and to be sure of it, when May went to report the latest difficulty to Lloyd, she returned to find that her father had sold his house and already bought a home in another town. Lloyd tried to induce May to elope with him, but she wouldn't hear of his leaving school now just before he was ready to graduate, and besides she couldn't leave her old father. As Lloyd kissed her, May wept and promised to write; then left town with her father.

Infrequently May would visit friends and see Lloyd, but each time it was harder for them to part and each time May went back to her father.

Then Nell came back brokenly explaining her traveling man had never kept his promise to marry her, and had deserted her when he discovered she was in trouble. For once Henry, who had been so pleased with the match, had nothing to say. Patiently May helped Nell but grieving over Lloyd she grew paler and paler until even Henry noticed it and discovering it was because May loved Lloyd Murdock he gritted his teeth until Nell shouted and told him how he was ruining May's life. Drawing May into his arms, he told her what an old fool he had been and went over to shake Si Murdock's hand for the first time in years. Never was there a happier bride than May, or a prouder groom than the newly graduated Dr. Lloyd Murdock, and Nell tried to learn how to make corned beef and cabbage for her father.

ONE ROUND ROSIE

Joan Conn File No. 8382

"IT'S a wonder that women don't get into the fighting game," mutters old Mike Hennessey, trainer, as he gazes after Joey Long, his best fighting wager who has just given up a sure success for a wife and the bond business. Suddenly as Rosie O'Grady, robust and a good fighter in family and school circles, strides into view, Mike has an idea; and although she scoffs at first, when told of it over a sundae at the corner drug-store, his pictures of clothes, popularity, and power make it more appealing, and she consents to enter training. Sometimes refusing to fight her opponents since she has nothing against them, sometimes pummelling one of the assistants for laughing at her, instead of fighting her own opponent, and sometimes walking out in the midst of a bout after she has been interviewed by sarcastic reporters on "women's new career"—Rosie finally learns the rules. Hearing of Mike's challenge for a woman to contest Rosie's title for woman's light-weight championship, the Rooney brothers, and older of whom, Steve, Rosie's sweetheart, suggest their sister, Stella. Her Irish temper frequently aroused by the teasing antics of her brothers, Stella, like Rosie, has learned the science of fighting at home; but since these rules have been inculcated in her training since childhood by her prize-fighter brothers, Stella, having fought and victoried over Rosie in other days, is less shaky than her opponent when, after two months of active preparation, she finally enters the ring.

While the crowd cheers, first for one fair opponent and then for the other, Jake, the younger brother, suddenly hearing Steve applauding for Rosie, punches him in the eye. The crowd roars as Rosie, furious at Steve for his falseness, hits him; whereupon, Stella and Jake, coming to his rescue, create a free-for-all. Finally, after Mike has had his eye blackened by his feeble attempts at interference, the bout continues. While Stella, alert and cleverly left-handing is gaining on her, Rosie, suddenly panicky, notices her brother, Jim (with whom she was not on speaking terms because of his scorn of Steve), cheering for Stella. Infuriated, Rosie forgets Mike's patient teaching of the rules, and remembering Stella as her antagonist of her childhood days, bites, kicks and scratches, until Stella, bewildered at the unexpectedness and harshness of her tactics, is about to fall. However, entering the ring, Jim holds up the limp girl while Jake attacks Rosie; and the mob screams with delight and horror at the fouls as Steve follows to belabour his brother, and Make scurries about, receiving now a blow in the stomach, now one in the eye, in his efforts to stop the riot. Finally appearing with a minister to quell the storm by marrying the couples, Mike is mortified when the holy man is likewise punched. Restoring order at last, the two couples are married and hands are shaken in laughter and forgiveness.

SEA TOLL

BEING disliked by Bode, another boat official, Raymond Morley rids himself of his drunken attacks and his jealous plots (such as placing another official's money in his room, or drugging him so that he would be found asleep at his telegraph) by obtaining another position. Overjoyed at his more advanced job of chief telegrapher on the ship, Hawthorne, Raymond hastens to inform Sally Riley, his fiancee, of the news, and to arrange for the marriage. Sally's mien at the meeting is sad for her father has forced her to accept Bode's invitation to spend a two week's vacation on his boat; for he is heavily in debt to Bode and fears to anger him. Arrived at the boat and discovering who his boss is, Raymond plans to desert, but is caught in the act of stealing his contract from Bode's desk; and the next day, on his way to Bode's office where his punishment is to be decided, Raymond quickly hides behind a ventilator when he suddenly sees Sally walking down the deck. Recognizing his old enemy, Bode metes out the worst punishment, stoking coal,—and has two of the other stokers guard him. Sweating at his work that night, Raymond is horrified to see Sally, on a tour around the boat with Bode, approaching him; and having stopped work for a moment to look at her, is angrily pushed by one of the guardian stokers, so that he lays sprawled at her feet just as she reaches him. As he is dragged to his feet, something in his soot-laden face reminds her of Raymond, and haunted by the thought, she decides to see him again the next night; and Raymond, on his way to explain things to her, meets her on deck where they embrace. Secretly watched by Bode, Raymond returns to his room to find the latter depositing liquor—strictly forbidden aboard boat—there. In the fight which follows, Raymond shoots Bode, and fearing he has killed him, flees to another boat, where he obtains a position as telegrapher. When several evenings later, their ship begins to sink, as the result of a heavy storm, Raymond sends an SOS to the Hawthorne. Bode, listening, refuses to help—having learned of Raymond's position on that boat—and when the Hawthorne telegrapher protests, shoots him and throws him overboard. Picked up by the lifeboat containing Raymond, the wounded man tells him of Bode's treachery and of his imprisonment of Sally. After placing him in a hospital, Raymond sets out for the Hawthorne to rescue Sally and expose Bode; but caught by Bode in the act of telegraphing to authorities, Raymond accidentally shoots Sally's father, who, hearing the tumult, had entered to assist Bode. Fearing Sally's disapproval and his punishment as a murderer, Raymond flees in one of the lifeboats. Blacklisted as a deserter and murderer by Bode, Raymond becomes an outcast of the docks. Just about to dodge the telegrapher, who brings a message of freedom from these charges—(for having just been released from the hospital, he has learned from a former Hawthorne friend of Riley's health and Sally's forgiveness)—Raymond notices Bode, just off the boat, aiming his revolver at him. Sally's scream and his tussle with the man bring the police whose shot reaches Bode's heart; and while the telegrapher is corroborating his confession of guilt in not granting aid to another boat in time of need, Sally and Raymond embrace in forgiveness and happiness at the latter's clearance from guilt.

THE PLEASURE SEEKERS

Frieda Armbrust File No. 7961

STARING at the letter from Jean Wilson, Jack gave a low whistle. It had taken him four years to forget Jean, forget the madness that had led to their engagement and his subsequent realization that they could never be happy together. Even now he shivered as he remembered her violent temper, and now she was calling him to congratulate him upon his engagement to another woman. It wasn't like Jean to be magnanimous. A little glow of pride warmed his heart as he thought of the difference between his Alice and Jean. Not that Alice could ever dominate a whole room through the sheer force of her personality as Jean so frequently did, Alice's charm was a subtle, lovely aura. But Jean was back in town and shortly afterwards Jack saw her. Her hand on his arm sent an almost forgotten tingle through him. That old power of hers to stir him was still potent. Laughingly she begged him to have lunch with her, she dreaded eating alone; and Jack half-hesitantly acceeded. Strangely moved, Jack went back to the office and tried to concentrate on Alice's little endearments as she reminded him of the Steele's dinner party.

It was Alice who called his attention to that stunning woman, and a moment later, Alice recognized some strange bond between her fiance and the woman of the hour. Intuitively she realized that this was the woman to whom Jack had once been engaged but it was sheer accident that guided her footsteps to the garden where Jack was holding Jean in tight embrace. Half-resentfully, Jack accepted Alice's reminder that he was still free, that if he found he didn't love her, he was to remember they weren't married.....yet. There was no peace in Jean's presence for Jack, but her warm lips, her soft arms drew him, maddened him. And her whispered promise to be waiting for him to elope tomorrow haunted him. And Alice seemed to understand. Madly he packed and rushed to Jean's house and found a mocking note telling him that now he knew how she felt four years ago. Jean was gone!

Hours later, George, who loved Alice once, found Jack walking wildly through the park. Forcing him to come to his apartment and get some sleep, George listened gravely to Jack's reiterated statements of what a fool he had been, lost Alice. And George, knowing what it was to lose Alice, stepped in and brought the two people he loved best in all the world together again. Crying a little in her happiness, Alice kissed George lightly—in gratitude, and in a shower of rice she and Jack sailed for Europe. Too wise to question the fate that had given Jack to her rather than to the gorgeous Jean, Alice clung to her husband and for two whole years their happiness was incredibly perfect. Then, in Paris, Alice felt Jack's fingers grow cold and looking up she saw Jean. Embracing them both, chattering her joy at seeing them there, Jean took them in tow and asked if they knew that George was on the continent. It was expatriate's week in Paris, how devastating! Alice shrank from George's pitying look at Jean's party, and after several days of neglect while Jack accepted Jean's invitations, she asked him to get tickets for home for her. George's wild hope died with Alice's rueful explanation that Jack would come back to her—in time. All the way over Alice remained in her stateroom, while George looked bitterly at Jack's anxious cable to assure Alice he was taking the next boat. As they drew into the harbor, Alice confided her worry because Jack didn't know she was going to have a baby, but George, patting her hand gently gave her Jack's cable and felt he was rewarded by her shining eyes. Alice didn't love him, and Jack didn't love Jean; they loved each other!

A WOMAN'S PRIVILEGE

Fred E. Luttgens File No. 8233

IN a fashionable apartment on Park Avenue, Marion Elsmere is packing her trunks and as Richard Boyce enters and expresses his surprise she shows him a telegram asking her to come to Rio de Janeiro and marry Bob Watson. Richard tries to dissuade her telling her that he loves her and always has, but when Marion refuses he reveals he will do anything to prevent her marrying anybody else since under the terms of their grandfather's will if Marion didn't marry before she became of age, the inheritance was to revert to Richard.

Desperately attempting to make Marion miss the boat, Richard gets a friend of his to pose as a detective and by pretending to arrest her for shop lifting make her miss the boat. All goes off as scheduled, but when the supposed detective seizes Marion's arm, a gentleman with whom she has previously collided accidentally, assures the detective that he is mistaken, that Marion is his wife, Helen Trenton. Astonished, Marion realizes the ruse has been successful when the supposed detective apologizes and disappears after "Mr. Trenton" has given him a Judge's card. Marion thanks her friend as the boat pulls off, and finds that in the excitement she has had no time to buy a ticket. Whereupon her Samaritan asks if she will share his double stateroom, and pose as his wife in order to free him from the blackmailing attempts of one Edith who has followed him to the dock. Given a key to keep her door locked, Marion accepts.

Meanwhile Edith and Richard, both aboard, discover that they share a malevolent interest in Paul and his supposed wife. Richard once maligns Marion and Paul knocks him down. Shortly afterwards a blanket is thrown over Marion's head as she is entering her stateroom, and she is thrown overboard. Rescued by Paul, she learns for the first time that he loves her, but she drops her eyes and reminds him that she is on her way to be married to her childhood sweetheart.

However, when they arrive in Rio, Marion gets a letter from Bob telling her that he was unavoidably called elsewhere and she was to wait for him. Fearing a further attempt upon her life by Richard, Marion begs the reluctant Paul to remain on while Edith and Richard plan to blackmail Paul, once a gambler who had reformed at Marion's entreaty. While the criminal pair are laying plans, Bob unexpectedly returns and concluding the worst from the fact that Marion had been registered as another man's wife on the voyage, leaves her with an ugly epithet. Paul attempts to interfere, and as she sees Bob draw a gun, Marion pushes Paul so that the bullet only grazes him. Moreover, when Edith and Richard arrive, Paul has the hotel manager and Marion in readiness so that he can retaliate with enough evidence to convict the pair of blackmail unless they immediately leave town. Alone, finally, Marion avails herself of woman's immemorial privilege of changing her mind, and this time promises to marry Paul.

DREAM LADY

Opal Thomas File No. 8095

AS the Twentieth Century pulled into New York, Dolores' heart beat fast. People crowded about her and as she pushed her way through the throngs the thought came to her that some day they would all hear of her. Some day her name would be spelled out by the lights of Broadway. But as she trod the theatrical boards and the few dollars between her and starvation diminished in quantity, a gnawing fear grew in her heart. Mrs. O'Kelley, her genial landlady comforted her and when she found Dolores weeping in her loneliness and discouragement, assured her that she would make good. The next day Dolores tried to get any kind of a position. Nothing would have been too menial, but everywhere she heard, "Sorry, the position has been taken." Eyes blinded by hot tears she stepped out into the street and as a long red roadster struck her, she lost consciousness.

When she awakened she found Jerry Young hovering anxiously over her. The room was filled with flowers and Jerry was explaining that he would never forgive himself for the accident to her. Whimsically he added, "Thank Heavens your face wasn't scarred, because," he paused for an instant, "it's a very lovely face." From then on Jerry came regularly to see her and as Dolores knew she was in love, she felt that Jerry, wealthy, important would never care for her. She felt that his visits, his playing and singing for her were all done from a sense of duty. And when Jerry flew in elatedly one day waving a telegram offering him a concert tour in Europe, Dolores' heart sank. He promised to write, to call her when he got back, but Dolores had no faith in his remembering her.

Before Jerry went he got a position for her as a model in an exclusive shop, but although she could wear fine clothes now and didn't have to worry about money, Dolores thought constantly of Jerry. One day one of her customers stared at her fixedly. Accustomed as she was to men's appreciative glances, Dolores resented the intensity of his gaze. However, when he sent in his card, she jumped at the name Jack Doran, famous movie producer. With a poise she didn't at all feel, she listened to his offer to give her a chance on the screen. The anxiety of waiting for her first notices was climaxed in the raves of the critic. A new star had risen in the firmament. Hail Dolores, now known as Peggy Bennett. Fame was hers. Invited everywhere, feted, Dolores began to weary of the ever-increasing circle of admirers and syeophants.

Then one day arriving late at a Hollywood party, Dolores stood stock still as a young man sang and played a song Jerry had written for her. Forgetting everything except him, she cried, "Jerry!" And as he leaped up and exclaimed, "I thought you wouldn't remember me now," the other guests shrugged their shoulders. This was Hollywood where anything could happen, but Dolores and Jerry knew that this was Hollywood where love was for them.

THE PIONEER SPIRIT

Milo H. Fernald File No. 8076

WHEN Betty's dying mother told young Jim Bentley that her daughter was being kidnapped by the Indians at the side of the wagon caravan where the battle was at its hottest, he immediately set out in pursuit of his dearest friend, whom he had thought secure from harm in the cave he had prepared for her. The procession, both people and wagons, now entirely demolished, Jim trailed the Indians, and was seriously wounded by them in his attempts to rescue Betty. Returning to bury his parents, as well as Betty's, Jim vowed over their graves to find Betty; and it was this mission which found him many years later, bearded and mature, in a small mining town, Smokey Gap, not far from the scene of the crime. Hearing the loud voices of bargaining prospectors in the saloon one evening, and strolling over to investigate, Jim recognized the beads he had once carved and given to Betty as a gift. Offering them a huge sum both for them and information about the person from whom they were taken, Jim was told that they had been taken from the body of a dead Indian girl found on a cliff. Recalling this as the place where Betty's abductors had camped, Jim hastened to investigate, certain that the girl in question was his friend; and when his suspicions were verified by the sight of "Jimmy—I love you" engraved on a stone nearby, Jim returned mourning his loss.

During all the years that had intervened, Betty, though kindly treated by the Indians as a friend of their chief's daughter, had tried in vain to escape, once almost being killed by a bear but for the timely aid of an Indian friend. When the chief's daughter, mourning her fiance's death, committed suicide, Betty, sorry for the loss of her friend as well as her beads which she had lent her as a good luck token, was given her freedom, so that disaster—hunger, disease, and death—brought on they believed by the killing of her people years before, might cease following them. In the nearest town, Smokey Gap, Betty soon obtained a position as entertainer; and had it not been for the timely appearance of Beaver, or Jim, when she was being abused and attacked by the owner of the dance hall, Slicker Jack, Betty would have gone the way of all the other girls who had been there. With Slicker Jack dead by Jim's hand, Betty, at the latter's suggestion, went to live with Mrs. Gregg, a kindly old boarding house owner.

Learning that Jim had gone alone one night to visit the graves of some pioneer relatives who had been killed there a long time before, and remembering her own past, Betty followed him, in spite of his warning of the hostile Indians who infested the place. Overjoyed to read the names of her parents on the graves, Betty turned with recognition to Jim, who she thought was dead. But their joy was interrupted by the sudden arrival of the Indians, who, though warned not to kill white men by their chief (who at one time had saved Jim from being burnt by them at the stake), they still thirsted for revenge and warfare. Although two against many, Betty and Jim fought bravely to the last bullet, and had it not been for the arrival of Tolley, Mrs. Gregg's son, with men who had overheard the noise of the skirmish, they would have been dead. Reunited at last, Betty and Jim were married the next week at the town church amidst general rejoicing.

ALL FOR THE SAKE OF GOLD

THEIR orphan state, their poverty, and their proximity to the Montana mine where they worked, formed immediate bonds of friendship between the two youngsters, Tom Jones and Don Allen. Moreover, Tom's seven years seniority over Don gave him a paternal attitude, so that when Don, in the throes of tuberculosis, was told by the doctor that mountain life would cure him, Tom invested his life's earnings in a ranch. In the years that followed, as the cattle and farming thrived, Don was gradually cured, and Tom continued his achievement by hiring a tutor to further educate the young man. Mingling more with the other ranchers and townspeople at dances, parties, and business meetings, Tom and Don soon met Frank King, owner of the biggest ranch in the vicinity, president of the bank, and head of the town department store; but Tom did not yet know of King's love for Rose Stone, daughter of the town minister, when he himself fell in love with her.

Desperate at Rose's growing affection for the young man, King sent for the Rev. Stone to demand, and then beg, that he influence his daughter away from Tom. Finally, realizing that the minister believed in allowing the girl her choice, King sent for two of his friends, through whose bought assistance in illegal matters he had gained most of his large fortune; his plan for revenge worked. Knowing that Tom and Don had been invited to visit King one night, the two men poured poison into the watering trough from which King's cattle drank daily, and deposited the can which had contained the stuff, in Tom's barn. When the entire herd died immediately, and when the evidence was discovered, Tom was accused and brought to court. While he waited for trial, King took Don into his home, fed him with money and flattery, and picturing for him Tom's probable imprisonment and his own subsequent loneliness and poverty, enticed him into a promise to testify, for the ten thousand dollars offered, that he had seen Tom with the poison near the trough that night. Always luxury loving, Don accepted and delivered his incriminating testimony after which Tom was sentenced to ten years imprisonment. Hurt by his duplicity and released from her engagement by him, Rose dazedly accepted King's offer of marriage.

It was only during this unhappy marriage that King discovered the identity of the man whom Rose visited so often in the city; but his pain was even greater when he learned of her scandalous affairs with other men there. Deserted finally by the wife who had never loved him, King was haunted more than ever by Tom in prison for the wrong he had done him; so that half crazed and ill, he finally sent for Rev. Stone in whose hands he placed his written confession signed by himself and the two hired men. After his (King's) sudden suicide, Tom was freed, and hearing of the disgraceful life the disillusioned Rose was leading, went to her and offered her love and redemption from her reputation, as his wife. When the night after his marriage, Tom visited the old ranch which, in his absence had been ceded to Mr. King for payment of his cattle, he spied another man hovering about—Don. The latter, having wantoned away his money in drink and gambling, had come home to die, of his old malady; and it was on his deathbed in Tom's home that his confession found forgiveness.

LOVE FORGIVES

GRATEFUL to her folks for the splendid education they had provided her with, and therefore eager to assist her father now that he was old, Dorothy Bauman accepted the position as teacher offered her in the distant town of Canton as soon as she had completed her Normal School education. When Jay Langton, one of the other teachers took her along on a visit to Horace Wright, her lawyer, who was in charge of her stocks, Dorothy immediately fell in love with him; and when he waited for her one day outside the school and invited her to dine with him, she was overjoyed. Although she was corresponding with her mother and sending her money weekly, she never spoke of him, nor did she say anything to Jay, since she felt his interest in her might be a casual one; but she realized her error in this thought when Horace proposed to her several months later; and although Jay, having seen them together often, had warned Dorothy about his past and other women, Dorothy, refusing to listen, since she thought Jay jealous of her, accepted him. After they were married, noticing that Horace saw Jay more often than before, Dorothy, questioning him about it was told laughingly that it was all for the sake of business.

After paying Jay to keep his secret, and not wishing her to see too much of Dorothy, Horace persuaded the latter to leave her position and move with him to a beautiful home in another town where he had set up his practise anew. They had been married but a short time when the strangely agitated Horace informed her one evening that he had to leave her for a several weeks business trip. When Jay, whom she met accidentally in the school town where she was visiting some freinds laughed derisively upon Dorothy's mention of the "business trip", Dorothy, troubled, decided to investigate; and upon looking through her husband's papers discovered a letter from a Mrs. Keith urging him to remember his promise to meet her in New York.

Arrived in New York, and needing money to institute her search, Dorothy secured a position as waitress in a fashionable restaurant near Horace's hotel; so that when he entered with Mrs. Keith one day, he stared stunned, at the waitress-wife. Angry at his deception, Dorothy insisted that her plans for the divorce be carried out, in spite of his pleas for forgiveness. During the years that followed, Dorothy lived a lonely, hard-working life with her mother, and growing daughter of whose existence Horace knew nothing; and still in love with him, she was happy to marry him again when he appeared at the house one spring day. But the other woman soon enticed him again, for Horace disappeared one day leaving a note to that effect; and Dorothy could not understand the vengeful look on Jay's face when she divulged this information. However, she understood it later when her daughter's fiance informed her that her husband was lying seriously wounded in the hospital where he was interning; for Jay, whose lover Horace had been, learning of his further infidelities with Mrs. Keith, had shot both of them. Still forgiving him, Dorothy nursed him back to health, and her daughter's marriage witnessed a double reunion.

SHATTERED ILLUSIONS

Ethel Pearl Clark File No. 7899

THERE is a happy commotion in the Dawson farmhouse for they are preparing themselves for the homecoming of their son, Daniel, a medical school graduate. When the shock of seeing her son and his new wife, Dolores, kills Mrs. Dawson, Mr. Dawson goes to live at a hotel near the newly-weds in Stratton where Dan has set up his practise. As the years go by, and as a son, Terence, comes to the Dawson home, Mrs. Berkeley, Dolores's mother, who has always resented her daughter's rejection of the wealthy suitor she had chosen for her, continues to disturb their home by taunting her about her two-year seniority over Daniel, and about their struggling financial existence. Although it is with great joy that Daniel accepts the practise of Dr. Bradley, an important Stratton doctor who is leaving town, Dolores mingles this feeling with worry, for she has heard much of the beautiful Moira Monterio, Dr. Bradley's prima donna patient. Moreover, Mrs. Berkeley's malicious allusions to this lady's many affairs with men does not help matters much; so that it is with dread that Dolores notices Dan's frequent absences from home in the evenings, and his evasions or obviously invented excuses. For Daniel, on his first visit to this woman's home where he had treated her for a throat ailment, has immediately fallen in love with her; and he is soon devoting most of his time to her at her parties and in her studio where caresses are freely exchanged.

Finally, when they venture to flaunt their relationship in public, Dolores sees them at a restaurant; so that when Daniel fails to sleep home one night, Dolores jealously accuses him of his faithlessness. She rushes weeping from his office when the once mild Daniel angrily upholds Moira who has goaded him to this point by her flippant scorn of his conventional code of morality.

Forgetting about his child soon to come, Daniel leaves Dolores for Moira, while Dolores sorrowfully drags herself to her mother's home. She grows more and more haggard as Terence continues to ask about his daddy and as her time of labour approaches. In the meantime, Moira, whose singing is being ruined by too much drinking, proves her love, unknown to Daniel, by refusing to give him up in spite of the threats of Bordini, leader of the narcotic ring of which she is a member. Although she has intimated to Bordini that she may use Daniel as a cover for her criminal activities Moira, now, in all sincerity, renounces the gang, and burns the drugs in her possession. Thereupon, the infuriated gang threaten her life, and Daniel wearies of the hectic round of entertainment which her fear of this compels her to enter. When she is finally killed by a silent pistol one day, Daniel, the only one present in her studio when it happens, is accused; but when his strained relations with his wife are discovered, Dolores, as the jealous wife, is suspected. However, the matter is soon cleared up at police headquarters through the forced testimony of the maid employed by Moira. Daniel's new knowledge of Moira's duplicity, and of her activities with the gang, bitterly rankle in him, and in his broken pride he remembers again the peaceful Dolores and his child. In the meantime, Dolores battles her own disillusion in her travels across the continent with her mother; and although Mrs. Berkeley has hopes of her more brilliant marriage with a Count de la Falainse, met on ship, Dolores easily refuses his proposal of marriage. While Dolores is wondering whether Daniel has ever visited the children during her absence, Daniel is doing just that with Mr. Berkeley whom he had met in the street; and the sight of the new baby, Marilyn, brings the tears to his eyes. Poor Mr. Berkeley has a hard time breaking the news of the murder and subsequent events to the two women when they return, for Mrs. Berkeley waxes sarcastic about Dan's sudden interest in his children. Dan, who has immersed himself wholeheartedly now in his medical work, is delighted to follow Mr. Berkeley's suggestion that he patch things up with Dolores during the soon approaching Christmas holidays. Just before Christmas, Mrs. Berkeley, who has been left out of these plans, insists stubbornly that Dolores attend the opera with her and the Count who has been visiting them but Dolores, pleading illness, remains at home, at Mr. Berkeley's suggestion.

When Dan enters, Dolores, whose back has been turned towards him, immediately forgets her embarrassment at being a party to her father's premeditated plan of thus meeting Daniel, and is wholly delighted at Daniel's sincere display of affection and regret. Nor can she help but forgive him completely for his past misdemeanors, when he embraces her lovingly, promising in a broken voice, happiness for the future.

HIDDEN WEALTH

Le Roy J. Holmes File No. 8085

ALL New York was agitated by several mysterious jewel robberies which had been perpetrated recently; and Lieutenant Gordon Davis, in charge of traffic at Forty-second street was not the only one who found this the most moot topic of conversation at the dinner table every evening. When Philip Grant, a stranger who befriended Davis by his daily offers of rides home every night, happened along, Davis continued his heated discussion of the topic, and invited him to dine with them. But Philip seemed to lose all interest in the conversation with his host when Emily, Davis's young daughter entered to set the table, and chuckling to himself, the obliging Davis left the room. During the weeks that followed, Philip was more punctual than ever in his visits to Davis's beat, and his dining at the house more frequent; and Emily always looked forward eagerly to his Sunday visits especially, for their jaunts together through the town, Scranton by name, fostered their growing love for each other. It is during one of these visits that Philip met for the first time, John Berler, a stranger who spent every week-end at the Davis boarding house; and when Emily confessed that she had seen someone resembling him prowling about an Indian cave nearby,—the scene of reported murder and robberies, and when Berler's evasions of questions concerning his business and whereabouts in the city, were suspicious, in their evasiveness, Philip departed for the city to investigate, and look through rogue's gallery for his picture. Philip, really a private detective, overheard the conversation of two men just brought into the court on a charge of larceny, and having himself arrested, had himself placed in a cell next to them, discovered the information he sought. Seen by Davis as a prisoner in court, Philip pretended not to recognize him, whereupon Davis forbade his daughter to befriend him further. Having suspected Philip of spying on him, Berler, the leader of the jewel robbery gang, and himself in love with Emily, showered her with gifts. Finally when Philip visited her, she was cold to him and, his questions about the expensive necklace she was wearing; but, overhearing Berler and his friends whisperingly discussing the deposit of stolen jewels in an Indian cave, Emily immediately called Philip to tell him the news. Coming up from the basement where the discussion had been held, Berler overheard the telephone conversation, and fearing that she knew too much, and that she might cause further trouble, he and his men secured her in the cellar, (since no one was home at the time) while they rushed to the cave; for they intended to return for her and take her with them to their city home. Having been cut off, Philip sensed trouble; and arrived in the vicinity, was just about to enter the house when a scratching at the cellar window attracted his attention. Unknown to the gangster who was guarding the cellar door, Philip assisted Emily in her escape; and telling him of her experiences, Emily urged him to come to the cave with her. It was then that Philip revealed his identity, and while Emily filled the pistols which Philip always carried with him, the latter telephoned for reenforcements from headquarters. The problem loomed even bigger when they arrived at the cave at the bottom of the cliff; for Emily did not know which one of the eight small rooms in it held the jewels and the thieves. Using his searchlight warily and carefully, Philip could find no trace of an entrance to a secret room, and was just about to suggest that it might be some other cave, when Emily stumbled against a loose rock in the side of the wall. After a tremendous effort, Philip finally pried it loose, and Emily was just about to step inside, when Philip, fearing that she might be hurt in the skirmish to follow, told her to remain there while he entered. The room being illuminated only by a dim candle, Philip's presence in the room was not suspected until he had secretly pushed aside the earth over the buried casket of treasure, and had covered the surprised gangsters with his gun. The problem now was how to get them all through the small passageway without one escaping. Hopefully awaiting the coming the police, Philip continued to sternly cover them; but when one of them, taking advantage of the darkness of the room, escaped to carry off Emily, her screams prompted Philip to dash for the door. Fighting wildly the human barricade before him, he escaped through the passageway and quickly pushing the stone in its place and thus preventing the gangsters from leaving, Philip set out in pursuit of Emily. The police squad whom they met on the way soon disposed of Emily's abductor; and others were dispatched to round up the gang imprisoned in the cave. Emily's father, coming upon the scene at that moment—for she had left a note for him, telling him of her whereabouts—seeing Philip in the same tattered conditions as the gangsters, immediately began to berate him for following his daughter,—he, a gangster. But his forgiveness was immediate when Philip was granted the reward for the discovery of the gang. While Philip and Emily embraced, the others discreetly retired from the scene.

SHADOWS SOMETIMES SHINE

F. W. Mackenzie File No. 8161

WHILE Avery, a Canadian mounted policeman, is getting his next assignment from the colonel, John Coates, the man wanted for the murder of his partner, Munson, and the object of his search, is fleeing in his supply-loaded sled, to the wilds. Noticing footsteps, John traces them to the bottom of a canyon where he finds the wounded Jane Wilson, who, reported as lost at her town, Telegraph Creek, is another object of Avery's search. Placing her in his sled, John binds up her broken leg in his improvised camp; but it is Jane who, thankful to John for saving her life, cheers him the next day when they are lost on their way to her home; for fearing for the girl's reputation if found with him, and dreading her discovery of his past, John curses his finding her. Finally, allowing the dogs to guide them, the two arrive at an empty, comfortably furnished cabin; and with the books and supplies they find there, they settle down to more civilized living.

Meanwhile, having no clues, Avery arrives at the nearest trading post owned by his friend, Sandy MacDonald, to question him about passing strangers; and entering Hansen's saloon with him, overhears two men, Red Sloan and Angus Hunter discussing their strange meeting with John and the girl, when hungry and half-frozen, they had been given shelter for many pleasant days at the cabin. Questioned by Avery, the two men curtly refuse to offer any information, and hurry away to warn John; but Avery, arriving there before them, is just in the act of handcuffing John, when not only the girl threatens his life, but the two faithful men arrive with murder in their guns; and only the timely intervention of John, who has promised to go with Avery in the morning, prevents the latter's death. The next day, after kissing Jane, whose love for him is as deep as his for her, farewell, John departs; and when, after trudging over storm swept gorges and into murky canyons John realizes Avery's sudden snow-blindness, he binds a bandage over his eyes, and in spite of Avery's pleas that he free himself and leave him to die, John continues his journey with him to police headquarters.

Following reluctantly on the rope which John has tied him with, Avery pleads for his gun, and then for John's escape when the latter tells him they are arriving in town. Impressed by the unusual sight of the prisoner leading his captor to safety, the colonel offers his friendship and the hospitality of his home to them, but brokenly informs John that the trial must go on. When in the midst of the trial, Jane, who has been cared for by Red Sloan and Angus, arrive on the seene to tell the story of the man's great love, since, knowing his past, he had asked for nothing; and when the two men and Avery tell the story of John's staunch defense in the policeman's behalf, the sympathy of the audience reaches a high pitch. And there is general rejoicing when a man rises to confess his guilt of the murder of Munson whom he had hated as a business rival; so that taking advantage one night of a quarrel between him and John, he had killed him. It is therefore proven that while Coates had premeditated murder, his bullet had found its way into a dead man's body. Relieved at his confession, the man shakes John's hand, and is one of the many to wave good-bye to John and Jane as they depart for marriage and a honeymoon in the cabin where they had been so happy together.

POOR MAN, RICH MAN

Kirk W. Breuker File No. 8275

EXCITED by the evening dice games with the other brokers' assistants, and by the continual rise and fall of fortunes on the market, Thomas Wentworth, hoard boy for Smith, Jones & Knox demands a raise. Refused it, he obtains another position with Byron, Stacey & Co. where he rises to "runner", "customer's man" and finally salesman's status; and with the accompanying increases in salary, he gambles more and more, eagerly attends the wild drinking and petting parties given by Dave, and Henry, two friends, and buys himself a car for reckless driving. At a night club one night, he meets Edward Pringle, a broker's son with whom he had once worked; and introduced to his sister, Audrey, who stares in disdain at his half drunken condition, he immediately falls in love. Learning of his company's illegitimate practises—such as splitting the commission gained by the buying and selling of stocks at the clearing house (of which they were not members) with members, the only ones allowed to trade there; or buying for one client and selling to another client the same stock in order not to lose both customers; or pocketing profits derived from selling stock at a higher than market value to clients—Thomas initiates his own practises; and before long he has lost many friendships through the sale of some worthless syndicated stock which he had bought below the market price from his company. Pringle's friendship costs him Audrey's too,—(for he had been attending parties, theaters, horse and automobile shows with her in the last few weeks); but when Thomas saves her father's firm from a huge loss by a fortunate accident (wherein, instead of selling them the shares demanded, he had sold them on the market, making them the gainers when the market suddenly dropped later), Audrey confesses her love and consents to his proposal. As the months pass, Thomas' hectic life at the office,—with the tickers going, board boys shouting, callers yelling, lights flashing, phones ringing—tells in his home life; for Audrey, weary of the constant parties, drinking, races, and gambling, quarrels with him often. Finally, hearing of his escapade with a girl in the stolen car where their friends had placed them when drunk, Audrey, demands that he leave his position to enter business with her father who had often requested this. Fearful of losing his independence, Thomas refuses; and when Audrey, confident of supporting herself on her secretarial earnings, leaves in a huff, he rents the apartment to return to the room he had once shared with Henry. Later obtaining another position as order man, Thomas telephones under assumed names again and again to Audrey, who, influenced by her father, refuses to see him. Suddenly comes the crash. A woman customer, learning of her losses, commits suicide at the office; another man, a broker, discovering that his wife had secretly staked all his money on the market, tries to kill her, finally leaves, and is later sued for divorce. Customers plead and weep when they are wiped out after their failures to secure more margin. Telephone calls arrive from banks and business men to stop dumping their stock on the market. When Mr. Pringle, Sr. discovers that the huge numbers of shares he had ordered, had not been cancelled by Thomas according to his request, he commits suicide several minutes before his son rushes in with the notice of the cancellation misplaced by Thomas' assistant in the excitement of the day. His company bankrupt—for they had been paying huge sums to a mysterious extortionist ex-employee who threatened to reveal their practises—Thomas, along with the other employees questioned by a welfare business committee, reveals the nature of these illegal practises, and recommends immediate reformation. Returning home penniless, he turns away hopelessly when he finds Audrey there; but her pleadings to begin anew, win him over, and they embrace in hopes for a better future.

SHAMED by the scandal caused by her husband's departure from the town with May Dalton, one of his students at the Music Conservatory and Normal School where he taught, Mrs. Bennett sorrowfully moves to a distant town with her children, Norma and Horace. Several years after her mother's death, Norma, now an advaneed music student, returns to her native town for further study; but a year later, lacking funds, she refuses Horace's clerk-earned money. So that when Laurence Bartley, (a one time musician now incapacitated by a paralyzed hand) whom she had met at a school music festival one day, offers her sympathy and money, she accepts as his protoge. Realizing her growing love for Laurence, William Crawford, her childhood friend, visits her to warn her against the elderly man's intentions, and to plead his own love. Believing William an inferior violinist, and admiring Laurence's worldliness and musical knowledge, Norma spurns William. After obtaining a position in the town's theater orchestra, William soon finds favor with Laurence and his professional friends at the school. Invited to a school party one evening, William, hilariously drunk, proposes a toast to Professor Bartley and his girl, Norma. When the latter indignantly follows Laurence from the room, William discovers the reason for the sudden burst of laughter from the group in the story of May Dalton; but Norma orders him from the room when he hastens to incriminate the professor. Scheduled to play with his group at a party given by a wealthy society woman in another town, William, discovering that she was May Dalton before her marriage, questions her closely; but when, loyal to her friend, she reveals nothing, William ransacks her desk during the intermission and finds letters telling of his wife and children.

Arriving at her home to give her the evidence of Laurence's treachery, William finds her packing for her trip with the latter. Infuriated by her refusal to admit she loves him (William), he triumphantly puts his hand in his pocket to give her the letters; but finding them gone, (for the wily May, suspecting him, had taken them) rushes out to see Laurence. He stops short, however, in the parlor, where the latter stares in amazed comprehension at a woman's picture on the piano. As if enchanted, he seats himself at the piano, and using his crippled hand for the first time, plays the song she had always loved. "That was my mother's song for father," remarks Norma as she enters; but her smile disappears when Laurence coldly prepares to leave. Understanding the situation now, William embraces her crying, "Darling, it's your father!" Laurence breaks down and Norma offers him forgiveness and future happiness in a kiss. When William's debut in the city is acclaimed several weeks later, Mr. Bartley is offered his former position at the Conservatory. After her marriage Norma finds outstanding success as a music teacher, and happiness with William and her father.

IN search of her friend, Philip Goodwin, who had promised to meet her after her brother's commencement exercises, June Ward wanders away from the crowd to a more secluded spot at the side of the campus. Absorbed in revery, she collides with Milton Grayson, a graduate of the same military school; and after the apologies, the two stroll back to the campus where June introduces him to her parents and invites him to her home. It is love at first sight, and on his second visit, Milton has proposed, and June seals her acceptance by a promise to leave with him for Singapore where he has been assigned for military duty. Arriving unexpectedly at the house on the day before they sail, Philip notices Milton kissing June, and loudly warning Milton to leave "his girl" alone, assaults the latter. Since Philip had never spoken of marriage to her, and since she doesn't love him, June hastens to explain to Milton; but he has gone, and Philip follows the weeping girl back to the house.

Refusing to see Philip or anyone else, June remains desolately at home for many days, until, inspired by the thought of following Milton, she packs her trunks. Suddenly noticing Milton one evening in the large boat dining room,—for having been transferred to Africa, he had taken the boat at one of the nearby stop ports—June decides to see him in his room. In the storm which breaks out in her passage across the deck to his room, June is thrown unconscious; and in the shipwreck which follows, she loses Milton, her memory, and her belongings. About to step into the boat occupied by Milton, June is accidentally pushed into another one in which she is rowed to the nearest African town. Named Shebo by the natives and given food and shelter by them, June learns everything about the jungle, and is soon able to earn her living as a guide for tourists. In the days which follow, Milton, whom the heat and work keep indoors away from the town, pays no attention to the ship doctor's accounts of the strange amnesia case. When Philip, traveling through Africa, with his wife, Barbara, on business, needs a guide, he is recommended to Shebo. Still in love with her, Philip is just about to force his attentions upon her when a scream from Barbara who had secretly followed them, distracts him. Gratcful for being saved from the snake, and jealous of Philip, Barbara, (who had known June and her brother at home) knowing of Milton's presence in the town tries to tell June; but Philip and dangerous adventures with hippopotami, insects, and the heat, prevent her.

Secretly leaving her home one night to tell Milton, Barbara is followed by a bribed servant who immediately informs Philip. When Shebo, whom Barbara had previously recommended as his guide for a jungle trip, arrives, Barbara, noticing Milton's long stare at the girl, knows her story is told, and leaves. Suspecting trouble when she finds that Philip has left for Milton's house, Barbara hastens there only to find they have gone to the jungle; and she reaches them as Philip points his gun at Milton's back. Shebo screams and shoots at him, and Barbara kills the tiger which crouched behind Philip. Suddenly remembering everything, June embraces Milton who forgives Philip after his explanation of the past. Grateful to his wife for saving his life, Philip begs her forgiveness with a kiss. While the wounded Philip is being cared for by his wife, Milton and June embrace in happy anticipation of their approaching marriage.

FATE TAKES A HAND

Mrs. George S. Kahn File No. 8143

MEETING a very handsome gentleman, Morton Durley, in the train on her way to college, Stella Roger, a debutante-to-be chatters on in unrestrained flippancy about her home and school. When she discovers at the college that Morton is to be her Spanish teacher, her sudden bashfulness causes her to spurn him rudely. Very much in love with him, Betty, her roommate intercepts the flowers and candy he sends to her, and flaunting them to Stella as Morton's gifts, helps to widen the rift; while Morton, thinking Stella has given them to Betty, decides to wash his hands of her as well as the rest of the co-eds. Several weeks later, on his way to his home, Morton suddenly hears the sound of a scuffle from a car stationed at the side of the dark road. After a fierce fight with the boy, Joshua, who has been trying to kiss her and persuade her to elope with him, Morton assists the half fainting Stella to her dormitory. Accused of violating the college regulation which forhade a man's entrance into the girl's dormitory after ten o'clock, Morton is threatened with expulsion unless he names the girl he was with. Although Stella in her secret visit to his home that night begs him to tell, Morton rudely tells her to stop meddling with his affairs; so that he is painfully surprised when he learns the following day of Stella's confession and of her subsequent departure from the college. However, the affair is completely forgotten when Morton on a visit to her home, tells her of his love and proposes to her. Her parents, informed of her acceptance, forbid her to see him again since he is not an accepted social registerite as they are. Determined that she shall marry Spencer Rawdon, a Yale graduate of their own set, Mrs. Roger secretly hides the many letters and gifts Morton has been sending Stella; and the latter, thinking that Morton has found Betty or some other girl at the college, more to his liking, broods herself into a state of hatred for him. When Betty maliciously gives him all the details of Stella's wedding to Spencer, the heartbroken Morton vows to remain a bachelor; and his subsequent aloofness make him seem more and more of an enigma to his co-workers and students.

Years later, pretty young Marilyn Rawdon, meeting the still handsome but melancholy Morton on a boat bound for Europe, remembering her mother's past, earns the jealousy of her boy-friend, Melvin by her obvious attentions to the stranger; and when after the summer, Marilyn, now a college student, finds herself Morton's pupil, she encourages his liking for her to the point where he asks to visit her during the Christmas vacation. Learning of the girl's affection for the older man, Mrs. Rawdon, remembering her thwarted love and her monotonous life with her late husband, offers no objections to his visit or his gifts. When just before his arrival, Morton sends her some flowers, Stella Rawdon is stirred to reminiscence of past days at college, by the somewhat familiar handwriting on the card attached. While the irate Melvin, having learned of Morton's visit, is expostulating with Marilyn in the corridor, Stella stares unbelievingly at her guest, Morton; and when the now appeased Melvin returns with Marilyn (who has told him of her ruse to bring the two former lovers together) their beaming looks are answered by similar ones on the faces of Stella and Morton. Happy to hear of her approaching marriage to Morton, Marilyn embraces her mother, and taking Melvin by the arm, leads him from the room, as the other two kiss.

HONOR STRIPES

Bernice M. Fitzgerald File No. 7975

IT is the Spring of 1917 and Molly Brady, daughter of a saloon owner, is pirouetting in an East Side street to the tune of "Over There" ground out by a sidewalk accordion player. Cheeks flushed she comes to an abrupt stop in front of Joe Howard whose dark eyes speak their admiration. Putting her arm through his, Molly's eyes shine as Joe tells her she ought to be on Broadway and then as always, he grows bitter at their helplessness. Molly is bound to her father, forced to entertain in his disreputable drinking house, and Joe, to proteet his mother from his drunken father, must forego his ideal of marching off to glory over there. With her finger, Molly traces honor stripes on Joe's sleeve and tells him there are honors of a different kind from that conferred by the government . . .

A few days later Molly is stunned by the report that Joe's mother and father had been asphyxiated through the carelessness of his drunken father. Grief-stricken, Joe enters Jasper Brady's saloon and for the first time he drinks to drown his sorrows. Molly tries to stop him, but he is not himself and her father forces her to go out and dance for his customers. Seeing Joe in conversation with men she knows to be denizens of the underworld, Molly's heart sinks, and she walks with him for hours before she can persuade him that he is exchanging his dream of honor stripes for one of prison stripes. At length he is convinced and he leaves for the front, head high.

Molly finds her home life more and more unbearable and then, one day, a slumming party comes in. Despite the sarcasm of his show girl companion, James Montgomery, producer, invites Molly to look him up and after a particularly bitter quarrel with her father, Molly does.

The little girl from the slums makes good and her bright letters make cheery reading for Joe as he lies wounded in a grim hospital base. Starred, Molly is the recipient of a visit from her father. Unshaven, beady-eyed, he looks around her apartment, and startles his daughter by slipping into the seat at the piano and playing. Then, ashamed of his sentimentalism, he brutally demands five hundred dollars, threatening to expose her origin to her public unless she complies. From then on, Molly is constantly blackmailed until one day she gets a telegram telling her to come to a hospital. A stately well-dressed woman and a fine looking man are there and with a flicker of a smile on his face Jasper Brady confesses that he, John Trask, disappointed in his love for Molly's mother, had kidnapped her child. He had tried, in his way, to be a father to Molly, even though she had had to live in the slums. Dazed, Molly starts to walk out, but the kindly faced woman draws her into a tender embrace and tells her she is Rosalie Montgomery, sister of the producer who had given her her start. And when, a few months later, Joe comes home with honor stripes, Rosalie Montgomery, once Molly Brady of the east side, finds her happiness complete.

SHOCKED at the sight of his wife, Meleta, leaving the apartment of James Carrington, her former suitor, Roger Bartell demands an explanation. Her silence prompts him to inform her that they have come to the crossroads of their marital existence, and they must be strangers to each other henceforth. The next morning, after reading of the robbery of Carrington's apartment in the newspaper, Roger hurriedly leaves the room; while Meleta realizes that instead of stealing the papers in Carrington's possession which showed his bribing of Roger's bookkeeper to indicate a one hundred thousand dollar shortage, she had taken some valuable bonds. Entering the room as Meleta swoons, Roger revives her and upon learning of Carrington's duplicity,—for he (Roger) would have been immediately accused the next day by the visiting accountant of having caused the shortage—hurries to the man's home to exchange the bonds for the papers and have him arrested. His deed accomplished, Roger returns to ask his wife's forgiveness, but forgets his mission as he reads the note handed him by the servant. Noticing his worried look, Meleta questions him only to receive a curt answer of "business matters". In the midst of the party she had been giving for Roger's friends in an effort to conciliate him, Meleta goes upstairs to apply some fresh cosmetics and look for Roger who had disappeared. Passing her husband's study and overhearing his talk to his friend, Chris, of someone named, Ethelyn, whose coming from India he wished to keep from Meleta, the latter returns to the party a changed woman. Her husband in love with another woman! And to think he is going to bring her to Blue Heaven, their beautiful country estate! Throwing discretion to the winds Meleta flirts openly with the men, drinks too much, and angers Roger by dancing an indecent dance in an unclad state. Hearing that his wife is planning a masquerade party for her guests at Blue Heaven the next day, Roger excuses himself, to Meleta's chagrin, and leaves with Chris, and Meleta, weeping in her room—after her close questioning of her husband has disclosed only his love for her—feels that her road is henceforth cut off from Roger's, since he is so false to her. Resolved to discover the identity and whereabouts of the strange lady. Meleta, by disguising her maid in the costume she should have worn, and posing as someone else, spies on Roger and Chris. At the party, Festus, who, with his brother, Algon, is in charge of Ethelyn, learning of Meleta's quarrel with Roger, and now in love with her himself, decides to further Meleta's suspecions of Roger, to further his own cause. Telling her that Roger is on his way to fetch Ethelyn to Blue Heaven, Festus goads her to desperation; and when she meets Algon, whom she thinks is Festus, at a wild party the next evening, she allows him to make love to her in exchange for further information. The climax comes when with the roses he sends her, Algon encloses a picture of Roger, Chris, and a young Indian girl. Loudly shouting her knowledge of Ethelyn to him, Meleta demands an explanation from Roger, but his composure infuriates her to the point of silencing all his attempts. At the hotel where Meleta had planned to meet Algon implies that Roger is the wronger of his half-sister whom he has come to avenge, and tells her the other, Ethelyn, was being cared for by Festus until Roger sent for her. When Algon demands her as the price of her husband's good name, Meleta rushes home to accuse the latter, but even the sight of a bloody cut on his cheek fails to stem her anger. Leaving a note that she is going to Blue Heaven to see Ethelyn, Meleta leaves and is saved from the tiger, Ethelyn, only by the timely intervention of Roger and the servant, Andrews. Learning that the tiger, a trophy from an African hunting expedition, had long been his troublesome charge, and that the picture girl was Festus' sister, Meleta is reconciled to Roger; and after the two forgive each other, they promise to take the same road together always.

NO sooner is grandfather MacBain's letter urging his daughter, Mrs. Bailey to nurse him through his illness, read, than the Bailey boys—somewhat grumbly at first for the hunting, fishing and swimming lost, begin to pack. Arrived in the city, Mrs. Bailey is kept busy with the neighbors, who expect to be rewarded in Mr. MacBain's will, visit often, and with the fighting of the two youngest boys, Charlie and John. Going down to apologize to her visitor for the pillow, the boys in their fight upstairs have thrown through the window, on his head, Mrs. Bailey immediately dislikes Mr. Burden who is negotiating with Mr. MacBain on the buying of a house; and this feeling is verified when after the old man's death, Mrs. Bailey, receives his claim to one of the two houses MacBain has left her, with only an unverified receipt for proof. Upheld by the court, Mr. Burden demands rent; but after much spilling of household goods on the way over by Charlie, the Baileys move to the other house. The next evening, fearful of being caught smoking, Charlie and John visit the empty house for this purpose, and extinguish the fired box of shavings they have seen Mr. Burden (who wishes the insurance money to pay the mortgage on the other house) place in the attic. Warning him that he is being watched in a note placed in the basket, the boys deposit the latter at his home; and are just about to depart when a window-rapping attracts their attention; Mrs. Alice Martin, Mr. Burden's young widowed stepdaughter, whom he had planned to marry to a rich friend for a promise of financial assistance in his business, having fallen in love with Michael, the oldest Bailey boy, when she had taken turns with him in night nursing at MacBain's bedside, now imprisoned in the house, tells the boys of an incriminating letter written by Mr. Burden to his brother. Silently entering the house, Charlie, John and Alice, after a short search, find the letter wherein Mr. Burden talks of his false receipts—one on the house and one on the mortgage of the second house. After reading the letter and after making a copy of it, Michael steals into Burden's house to deposit the latter there and plan an elopement with Alice.

Called to the office of Mr. York, Mrs. Bailey's lawyer, Mr. Burden, thinking he is destroying the evidence, tears up the letter York shows him; but crestfallen when told that it was only a copy, confesses his guilt and deeds over the two houses to Mrs. Bailey, as well as the mortgage he had taken on the second house. Driving home, Mr. Burden sees Michael and Alice riding by on their way to York's office; and driving angrily in pursuit of them, discovers that they have just been married. While Mr. Burden is promising to visit his brother whom he had asked for a loan of money for the mortgage, and who is now visiting him, Mrs. Bailey is ceding one of the houses as a gift to the newlyweds. Coming in from the other room where he has been having a mysterious conference with Charlie and John, York smiles mischievously as he hurries away for an appointment; for having discovered their part in the finding of the evidence, he has not only offered them positions as assistant sleuths in his work, but has presented both of them with new ten dollar bills. As they exit with the laughing Mrs. Bailey, Michael remains to kiss his bride.

LOVE'S DENIAL

Mrs. Ida Watkins File No. 8031

ALTHOUGH only sixteen at the time America entered the World War, Nada Wyatt's parents were demanding that she marry Warren Kass, a friend of the family and nine years her senior. Fearful of being enlisted, Warren hastily courted the young girl with gifts and caresses which flattered her into giving her consent. At first ignored as unfit for war by the enlistment bureau, Warren was finally drafted in America's last call for men, and was immediately sent to a training camp in the south. While there, he met Laura, a young married woman, who returned his passionate affection; and when he arrived home several months later—for the war was at an end by the time his training was finished—he continued to correspond with her and even manage to see her during week-ends. His wife, worrying over his continued coldness to her and the death, in his infancy, of her child, became haggard and aged. However, when her husband was unable to find work, Nada, still loving him, supported him by her earnings from her secretaryship to a Lawyer Brinkman; but when, after obtaining a position, Warren demanded that Nada cease working, she definitely refused; for she and Mr. Brinkman had fallen in love with each other.

As time passed and as her estrangement from her husband grew more pointed each day, her passionate devotion for Brinkman soon went beyond the bounds; so that Warren, whose southern lady-love had deserted him for another, found Nada cold to his renewed advances, he accused her openly of disloyalty. And Nada's continued silence only urged his fury into actually beating, threatening her, and taunting her with her infidelity. When a boy, Charles, who resembled Brinkman in every way, was born, Warren, embracing it as his child, hoped it might patch up his wife's feelings towards him. Finally, one day in the years that passed, Warren, discovering an affectionate, unsigned letter from a stranger to his wife, realized that the child was not his; and when he threatened to kill it, Nada, recovering from her long acquiescent suffering, fled with the child from the house.

Recommended to Brinkman as one who would assist him in getting his wife and child back, Warren played into his hands by revealing, in answer to Brinkman's carefully worded questions, the story of his past and the terrible life he had led Nada. When asked to release Nada, for his own happiness as well as hers Warren, who had consistently refused to do this at Nada's request refused again. Finally using his vague suspicions of her relationship with another man, and the malicious gossip circulated by him among the neighbors, as his sole evidence, Warren attempted in court to wrest the boy from his wife, now branded as a bad character; but his surprise was great when Brinkman, who had been making his own investigation about Warren's past with women, suddenly appeared as Nada's defender. And so eloquent and persuasive was he that Nada was granted both her divorce and the custody of the child. In spite of the cruel treatment she had received from him, when she was sent news of Warren's eventual confinement to an insane asylum several years later, Nada, now the happy wife of Brinkman, gave one last sigh for her past as she turned to her husband's loving arms.

CYPRESS KNEES

Nettie Dozier File No. 8389

DELIGHTED to find that the new teacher, Mrs. Sheila Lind, unlike the former Miss O'Dell, can solve difficult problems, as the ones suggested by Bettina and Cameron, their children, Mr. John Somers, storekeeper, and Mr. Henry Byrd, Clerk of Court, send them back to school. People wonder why the prosperous wife of the lawyer, Mr. Lind, must work, and why he pays so much attention to Miss Janet Coleman, secretary to Len Thomas, whom he had been surprised to see there. Scandalizing the people by suggesting a waltz one day at a village picnic, Janet glances at Jem Lind who suddenly decides to play the violin, instead of dancing with her. And when Christmas arrives, Janet, Mr. Lind, his wife, and Mr. Waller, the preacher, and Janet's admirer, are always together in skating, hunting, and picnicking activities at Cypress Knees near the Sportsman's Club, or at the boarding house owned by Mrs. McLendon where they all board. Just at this time Mr. Reginald St. Clair arrives and people wonder why she turns pale when Mrs. McLendon introduces them, and why she repudiates his attentions with such hateful looks. The night before Christmas, after seeing her husband bidding Janet good-night, Sheila Lind, usually a loving wife, argues with him on a walk along Cypress Knees and is seen throwing something angrily away as she hastens home; and at the night of the gala Christmas party at the McLendons, Mr. and Mrs. Lind suddenly, like Mr. St. Clair and Janet, desert the merrymaking and do not return until everyone has gone home. Anxious at Reginald's disappearance, Mr. McLendon institutes a search the next day; and it is only after three weeks of this that Bob, Bettina's clever dog, in a rabbit chase, discovers the dead man. When no trace can be found of Reginald's relatives, an advertisement is inserted in the newspapers. While Mrs. McLendon puzzles over the disappearance from his (Reginald's) pockets of the huge bills she had noticed while he had been paying his rent, the coroner pronounces the death due to freezing. When at the request of his parents who arrive from Boston, the body is exhumed, Janet and Len are the only ones absent and do not hear the new verdict of "shot to death," (for the brown mark on the lapel reveals the hole). After several months of futile investigation, Bettina and Cameron, accompanied by their old friend, Uncle Ben Wilbourne, finding themselves near the grave of the deceased, dig for clues; and when they unearth Sheila's wedding ring, for which Mr. Wilbourne had seen her searching, and Len's watch charm, they decide to keep it secret. In the days that follow the Linds visit the Cypress swamp often and secretly; and when the three (Bettina, Cameron and Uncle Ben) are resting behind the Cypress screen one day after a nature study hunt, they overhear Len making love to the unwilling Janet who is glad to hear the sound of voices. Clue hunting again several days later, Bettina being hastily pushed higher in the cypress out of the reach of a large alligator by Cameron, finds a bullet; and after Mr. Deane, a lawyer friend of Jem's, boarding with him, shoots the animal, and after Cameron has given Uncle Ben his find, a revolver marked J. L., Bettina reveals hers, some golden hair, a dirty handkerchief and the bullet. After placing the clues in his pouch, Uncle Ben places the latter in the smoke house from which he sees a tall figure hastily and stealthily emerging one night. Troubled by his secrets, Uncle Ben at last tells Mr. Somers and Mr. Byrd who also vow silence in loyalty to their beloved Mrs. Lind. Another suspect is added to Uncle Ben's list when the next day after fishing, Bob, in helping him look for his jacknife, discovers it in the pocket of Mr. Deane who appeared at the moment and professes a suspicious ignorance of its presence there. At the end of the school term, assembled at the MeLendon's for good-byes before vacation departures, Mrs. Sheila Lind is arrested for murder by the detective who has been boarding there for a short time. After she has been bonded from jail, Janet, bidding farewell to the detective and Mr. Deane, who have been making love to her, leaves. The detective's evidence at the trial is found to be based on a handkerchief found to be Mrs. Sheila Lind's, wrapped around Reginald's button and a loaded cartridge. The revelation of Bettina's and Cameron's clues causes a sensation, and in spite of Mrs. Lind's testimony that she had picked up the button on the McLendon doorstep, the cartridge Mr. Lind had fired at an owl, and the ring she had thrown away in anger, Mr. Lind is accused of the murder on the grounds of jealousy. In the days before the actual trial, the village is ransacked for the revolver which shot the second bullet found by Uncle Ben in the cypress, and for the large bills Mrs. McLendon had seen. Visiting Cypress Swamp, Bettina picks up the silver case which Bob, after smelling one of Reginald's handkerchiefs, has traced under a clam shell; and when the note contained within it written by Reginald and suggesting a meeting with him there, is produced at the trial, Janet is accused; although Jem's jealousy of her, his ownership of the revolver which shot the first bullet, and Sheila's jealousy of him, have been established; for moreover, the detective has produced one of Janet's overshoes found in the swamp at the time and a note saying "shoot, St. Clair". In spite of her protests that this last was part of the instructions in a hunting game, and that after she had returned to the house, she, like Jem and Sheila, had heard a shot fired in the swamp, the evidence is against her; for it is found that she is Reginald's wife in love with Jem whom she has followed to this town where his wife, in order to get him away from her, has obtained a teaching position. Just at this moment, the weeping Bettina hastens to testify that she had heard Janet telling Reginald she loved him. And after her prayer in her defense, Polly, Uncle Ben's wife, arrives with Cale Bell, a waiter at the Sporting Club, who while hunting with his employer for swans, had accidentally shot at the white shirtfront of a man; and when at this moment, Reginald walks in, everyone trembles and Janet faints. Finally it is found that the dead man is Reginald's cousin, whose close resemblance to him had caused them to fool people at the club and at the boarding house. Not having met his cousin at the suggested meeting place in the swamp, on the night of the murder, Reginald had gone to the club house, from which after a serious illness, he had been sent home to his parents who, having heard of their son's death, mistook him for their nephew. However, when well again, he hears of Janet's trouble, he proves his identity by the mole on his ankle and has come to assist her. After embracing Bettina and Cameron, the happy Janet kisses her husband in forgiveness and love, and when Mr. and Mrs. Lind do likewise, everyone cheers and weeps with joy.

VISITING his friend Jack Kenmore, Lillard Dupree, a poor artist, demands some money on the picture he is painting of his mistress, Toots, the leading lady in the older Mr. Kenmore's show. Having lost his money in a horse race, Jack gets the sum from his father, and Dillard departs for the home of Betty Banning, to discuss the coming masquerade ball. Accompanied by Betty and her brother, Billie, Lillard the latter's visitor, met Marjorie Livingston when her horse Sinbad, whom she had been forbidden to ride, throws her on the road. Hastening to the scene when notified by Betty, Mr. Livingston orders Lillard away and forbids Marjorie to attend the ball. After being scolded at home afterwards for her wild ways, Marjorie, on the pretext of visiting the library, slips on her costume underneath her dress and leaves it in the rumble seat. Climbing down the window that night, Marjorie on Sinbad's back with Whitey, the horse's groom, rushes to the club where Aileen, her sister, has gone with the car. Sent by Aileen, Lillard escorts the now costumed girl to the dance where he infuriates Betty by dancing with her all evening and winning the prize with her. Returning home before her, Aileen leaves the door unlocked, but Mr. Livingston, hearing it banging in the wind, closes it; so that arrived at the house, Lillard is forced to climb to her room and send down a ladder made of sheets to the waiting Marjorie. When he breaks a window on his climb down, the angry Mr. Livingston shoots him as an intruder, and when the next day he orders Marjorie to a convent, the three Bannings uphold his decision. Heartbroken, Marjorie sends a note of farewell and her clothes adrift in a boat, and leaves for the city where she pawns her ring. In the meantime, Mrs. Banning sends Lillard's suitcase to his home where the landlady, Mrs. Taum takes much money therefrom; and Lillard, picked up by a policeman and sent to a hospital, sends Jack to Marjorie's home to bring her to him. At the Livingston home later, Mr. Livingston, having dragged the river in vain, presents Jack with Whitey and Sinbad, whom the latter has been praising. In love with Aileen, Jack offers to buy the picture of Marjorie and Sinbad which Lillard is painting, to present to Aileen.

Several weeks later at the horse race when Whitey runs away at the sight of the supposedly dead Marjorie, the latter, being the only other one who could ride the horse, rides him to victory for Jack. Having pawned her jewelry to place her money on the horse, Marjorie drops her tickets which Jack keeps when they are given to him by a stall man. Infatuated with the girl, Jack, at her questions, reveals nothing of Lillard's whereabouts; and when he gets her a position as actress with his father's company, their friendship flourishes. Inducing Mrs. Taum, finally, to put Lillard out for lack of funds, Jack, forgetting Toot's painting, takes Marjorie's with him. Noticing the picture in a window—for Jack, needing money for the races, has sold it with intentions of buying it back,—Lillard is arrested for attempts to steal it. The next night, having drugged Toots so that Marjorie may succeed as the leading woman (as her understudy), Jack buys the picture and hangs it in his room where Marjorie, dining with him later, notices it. Given the jewelry he has redeemed for her, Marjorie is about to yield to him when the sight of Aileen's photograph on his table give her a thought of her sister's similar yielding here; and flees from the room to her home where she is joyously welcomed. Several days later when the dying Mrs. Taum confesses Jack's betrayal of his friend and Lillard, upon his release from prison, beats up Jack, who showing him the jewels and Marjorie's purse, accuses her of infidelity. However, realizing from the handkerchief (one he had once given her) in her purse that she still remembers him, Lillard hastens to her home where she welcomes him with forgiving explanations and a kiss.

GRAND LARCENY

Doyle Thetford File No. 8176

CRUISING along in their police car, Pat and Nick listened to the drone of the radio and complained about the cold. Suddenly Nick straightened up. He had heard a girl scream. Stepping on the accelerator, he brought his car to the spot, called to Pat to follow and entered a room where two figures were locked in a bitter struggle. As the patrolmen arrived, the man fled with Pat after him and Nick hastening to the aid of the fainting girl. Nick looked pitifully down at the pretty victim and swallowed hard as the livid marks on the white throat showed only too plainly how timely was the rescue. At length he brought her to, and as she looked up into the kindly face above her, Pat came back and exclaimed disgustedly, "He got away." With a long sigh the girl fainted again.

When finally the girl was able to talk, she told them she was Gertrude Landis. She had been hired as a maid in the home of Steve Brand, and had by chance discovered her employer was a murderer. Frightened she had prepared to go, but Steve had seized and was attempting to kill her when help arrived. Shuddering she exclaimed that Steve would never rest until he got her. The patrolmen exchanged glances as the frightened girl rejected each of their suggestions, and finally Nick, looking hard at her suggested that he had been intending to get someone to help his mother, would she feel safe under his protection? Embarrassedly, Nick turned away from the gratitude in her eyes.

For weeks all went well and Gertrude, falling in love with Nick, longed for some word from him, but Nick felt it would be cowardly to take advantage of her position. Then one day, Gertrude retired to awaken with a scream as she saw Steve stealthily coming in through the window. She screamed and Nick rushed in. Grinning evilly, Steve fired square at Nick who heedless of the dizziness that seized him rushed on. With a cry Steve backed toward the window, and stumbling fell backward many stories to the ground. But Gertrude could think only that her Nick had been hurt. Through many days she nursed him, and once, tenderly lifting his revolver she toyed with it, while Nick, opening his eyes, saw the softness in hers and knew then she loved him. "Am I under arrest," he queried. The color rose to her face as she wheeled about and she nodded, and informed him it was "Grand Larceny." He protested his innocence but she assured him her heart had been stolen. Pretending resignation to his conviction, he asked if he could fix the penalty, and to Gertrude's happiness, he pronounced, "A life sentence of marriage to you. Satisfactory?"

LOVE'S CALL

Maria Spaltro File No. 8246

URGED by his parents to marry Maria, the daughter of their dearest friends, Don Jose, wealthy young man of leisure, reluctantly proposes to her at her home one evening. Invited to attend a bachelor party given by his skeptical, worldly friend, Don Philip, (whose sweetheart had jilted him and married another man), Jose becomes hilariously drunk; and upon passing the gypsy encampment nearby, forces his friends to stop to have their fortunes told when importuned by an old gypsy for this purpose. Embarrassed when she speaks of the jealous girl, his present fiancee, whom he is never to marry, his friends try in vain to drag him away; especially when he hastens after the beautiful Dolores, a young Spanish gypsy, whose mother, a cabaret dancer, has left her here with her husband's people. Stopping her in her dance, Jose forcibly kisses her, places his seal ring on her finger, and whisperingly pleads for a tryst the following evening. Stealing away from the encampment, Dolores goes to the arms of her lover not knowing that Carlo, a jealous gypsy beau, is watching her. After waiting in vain for him that night,—for he had promised to visit her—Maria pretends that nothing unusual has happened when she visits him with her mother the following night. However, infuriated when Jose tells her of his love for Dolores, and begs to be released from the engagement, Maria has her servant follow Jose when he visits his beloved that night. Arriving at the encampment the next day, she scornfully tells Dolores who is telling her fortune, of her coming marriage to Jose; so that when Jose comes to propose to her, informing her of Maria's promise to release him from his vow, Dolores weeps unbelievingly, and accusing him of merely playing with her affections, feigns love for Carlo by kissing him wildly before the bewildered Jose. Heartbroken, the latter returns home to pack his things in preparation for a trip to America; but when his parents, sorrowing for his absence and his unhappiness, plead with him to return, he comes back a haggard young man. Anxious to please them now, at their urgent request, Jose promises to renew his vow to Maria and to attend the engagement party they are going to give in his honor. Knowing of his arrival, Dolores secretly visits the house, and noticing Maria and Jose in smiling conversation in the garden, thinks they are married and mournfully decides to leave the encampment and return to her mother in the city. Several minutes later, hearing a noise at his window, Jose finds Carlo who has climbed up to find Dolores whom he has followed here. Furious at Maria's duplicity and lies to Dolores, when Carlo tells him of this and of Dolores' continuous grief for him, Jose hurriedly accompanies him to the encampment. Having packed her things in the meantime, Dolores wanders away from the encampment to weep; and suddenly caught by strong arms, cries aloud first in terror and then in happiness as she recognizes Jose. When he proposes now, and begs forgiveness for his deserting her, she kisses him as a sign of her granting both wishes.

THE SLOPE

Edmond Aeschliman File No. 7923

DISTRESSED by the refusal of Ruth Gilbert, his childhood sweetheart, to marry him until she can provide properly for her aged father, Allan Warner, an expert automobile mechanic, interests Jack Thorne and Bessie Harper whose car he is fixing. Bessie suggests that they ask the handsome young man to escort Anita to that party, and hesitating for just a moment, Allan accepts. Excited by his first taste of night life, Allan returns late to find his mother asleep on a chair. Tenderly he scolds her, but he feels her unspoken warnings. Anita calls him frequently and fascinated by the gay life he frequents night clubs and parties with his new friends, intrigued by their suggestions that they win back all they spend in a gambling den.

Becoming more and more involved, Allan scarcely sees Ruth any more, and overlooks the fact that his mother's health is suffering through worry for him. But by this time, Allan has become heavily indebted through gambling losses and Anita's demands, and Thorne begins pressing Allan to repay some of his debts. Desperate, Allan is accosted by Hector Hallard, a professional gambler, and offered a way out. Instinctively repelled by the suggestion that he cheat at cards, Allan feels the net tighten and finally accepts the proposition. But at the last moment he cannot give the signal required of him, and Hallard loses to a rich Mexican, marked as easy prey. Whereupon, Hallard has an ugly quarrel with Allan, and is overheard by Richard Wallance, a Scotland Yard detective who is looking for evidence. That night Hallard is mysteriously murdered, having recouped his losses, and the body is robbed. On the strength of the quarrel he has overheard, Wallance pins the evidence on Allan, and the lad is arrested as he is speaking to his mother. Wallance is an implacable adversary and Allen is finally convicted, although he stoutly proclaims his innocence of the murder. Believing that Thorne may take care of his mother, Allan makes a final appeal to his friend, but a month later, he learns that his mother has died, bowed down by her son's disgrace. His last impression before his incarceration is of Ruth sadly leading his weeping mother from the court.

Five years of misery drag by, and Thorne, mortally wounded in a gambling quarrel, confesses that it was he who killed Hallard. Allan is released, but suffering has etched deep lines in his once handsome face. Sadly he sees his old home, windows broken, and overgrown with weeds. There is a light in Ruth's window, but Allan turns away. An obscure item in a newspaper informs Ruth, who has never ceased loving Allan, of his release and applying eagerly to the warden, she learns of Allan's whereabouts, and writes to him. Misty-eyed, they walk together along the river bank and the past drops from them. Happiness will come.

REBELLIOUS LOVES

DISLIKING the children's school which her niece, Bell Holland, runs in the house, and her freedom from house work, the newly arrived Aunt Martha, complains so continually that Bell is prompted to set up her school in another town. However, unknown as she is there, she is unable to interest the people in her pre-school idea, but finally succeeds as a dancing school leader. As the months pass, the family is surprised when Bell substitutes long letters of her busy social life, instead of visiting them for the holidays and week-ends as usual; and they are more amazed when she arrives home one night with her child, Eve. Knowing that her wronger, Dr. Myron Wilson, is a dear friend of her brother's, Bell refuses to divulge his name; and responds to her aunt's anger and her brother, Dr. John Holland's fear that the scandal will ruin his practise, by placing Eve in the St. Agnes Home, and by returning to the school. However, always longing for Eve, she finally obtains a position as a student nurse at the Home. After seeing her nursed through a serious illness by another nurse and the unsuspecting Myron, whom she always evades on his visits to the place, Bell, fearing that her child may be adopted by someone—for that is often the case with the other children—is about to tell the head nurse of her parenthood when her solicitude for the family name, stops her. In the fire the following night, she escapes with Eve to the Harbledown gypsy encampment not far away. Given up as dead by the family, Bell and Eve are accepted by the caravan people, the former as a teacher, the latter as a playmate for Jasper Brinkley, the artistic adopted son of the leading family there. As the years go by, having assisted at births, deaths, illnesses, Bell is beloved by these unprying people. Very ill one day, Bell tells Eve the story of her past and demands that Dr. John Holland be called. Although now a prosperous doctor, John has aged as a result of the deaths in the family—Bell, Eve, and Mr. Holland, Sr.; so that he weeps in happiness as he is forgiven by Bell before she dies.

Discovering that Eve is meeting Jasper secretly, to exchange news and sketches, John chides her and invites his friend, Mildred to guide her social life. At a dance given by the latter, recognizing the rose on Eve's dress which Jasper has given her in token of his love, John picks it up when she drops it and gives it to another girl; so that when Jasper, looking in, notices Eve supposedly being kissed by another boy, he returns home vowing never to molest her again. And while he broods over his outcast state the following night, Eve, in accordance with their plan, waits long in the rain for him. Scolded for neglecting her guests, Eve rushes from the house away from the angry John toward the lake, along which Jasper, coming to bid her a final farewell, is walking. Seeing her white dress through the trees and hearing a sob, Jasper hastens after her in time to save her from drowning. Recovering from pneumonia several weeks later, Eve accepts his proposal. Returning from London a year later where, through John's and Myron's financial aid, he has been able to study art, Jasper and Eve, as well as Mildred and Dr. Holland, are happily married. Placing his entire fortune at the disposal of his daughter, the contrite Myron, who has never married, is forgiven by her with a kiss; and she laughingly turns to Jasper as he comes to claim his due.

HAVING spent the sum of money left her by her deceased husband, on her gangster brother, Ronald Kean, who visits her secretly, Mrs. Kean accepts the proposal of Bill Elmore, a wealthy bachelor. Realizing that her son, David, a detective, is on Ronald's trail, and fearing that Bill will think her too old should he see her grown-up son, Mrs. Kean offers him a monthly allowance (from Bill's money,) which he refuses. and finally pushes him from the house. After finding a boarding house that evening, David is instructed to watch the main road for Ronald's attempted entrance. Several minutes later, about to give a ticket to the occupants of a speeding car, David recognizes Julia Hartmann, wealthy society girl who passes that way often. Invited to her home, David forgets his duty and smilingly consents as they drive away. About to propose to her several weeks later, (after he had accompanied her to theaters, parties, dances), Julia informs him of her contemplated trip to Europe where her mother is forcing her to meet an eligible count. The next night, David is rudely aroused from his revery concerning Mrs. Hartmann's dislike for him because of his lowly position, by a woman's scream from a passing car. Following it, he saves Mary Dilling from her two kidnappers. After several weeks of friendship, Mary invites him to a party given in a leading night-club in New York, where Julia, visiting with her boat friend, Andrew Denby, before she returns home to surprise David, meets the latter. While she jealously instructs Andrew and her other friends to dance with Mary, Julia monopolizes David's attention. Suddenly there is a commotion as Babe, one of the guests discovers the loss of her pearls; and Mary is the only one who believes in David's innocence when they are found in his pocket. Entering Julia's house to ask her aid in freeing David of the accusation, Mary overhears Babe condemning her friend for having taken the pearls from her neck while she was embracing her and for placing them in David's pocket. Realizing that the matter has been a planned ruse, Mary waits for Babe outside and forces her to accompany her to court. Jealous of David's engagement to Mary, Julia commits suicide after writing a note of explanation to the former. Furious at David, Mrs. Hartmann exchanges the note for one charging him with the crime of her murder, before she calls the police. At the same time that Frankie, an admirer of David's picks up the other note Mrs. Hartmann has dropped near the house, the latter is paying Ronald to testify against him. Accordingly, after he has testified that David as his rival for Julia's love, has killed her in his rage, David is sentenced to the electric chair.

Weeping, Mary clings to David as he is being led to his doom, while Frankie (who has read the papers), having overheard two men discussing their shares of the money Ronald has obtained for his testimony, calls the police. Hurrying with them, he suddenly discovers the note he has picked up, crushed in his pocket. After a recklessly speedy drive, they arrive at the prison just in time to save Donald. Identified as the gangster sought for, Ronald (or Andrew Denby), is arrested with his gang, Mary's kidnappers, and Mrs. Hartmann collapses. Notified of his mother's death, of her remorse at withholding the money left him by his father, through a telegram, David accepts the money and the advanced position offered him, and turns to embrace the delighted Mary.

THE HERITAGE

ALTHOUGH her proud parents forgave her impetuous elopement and received her and her baby back in their home, Elenor was never forgiven by Richard Gilmore, the lover she had jilted to marry a stranger. It was Richard who had proven to her her husband's terrible secret and caused her to flee from him, and Richard who had killed Elenor's husband after taunting him with the fact that Elinor knew all. But when Eleanor had refused to marry her husband's murderer, Richard with a wild light in his eyes had vanished into the night chilling the anxious young mother by his threat to blight her son's life by revealing the secret to him when he was old enough to know.

Years passed and Elinor, lulled into a feeling of security by the fact that she had heard no word from Richard through all the years, permitted her son Max to realize his dearest ambition—college. Holding her boy close before he left, Elinor made him promise never to marry without telling her first, and Max patting her head reassuringly, reminded her that girls never interested him. A hero at football and lead in all the college dramatic productions by virtue of his splendid voice, Max was the despair of every co-ed on the campus because of his indifference to women, but at length Virginia Dorn, lovely sorority belle managed to intrigue Max by her seeming indifference to his glory. Once skating, she fell into the lake and dragged Max, who attempted to aid her, in after her. Both spent several days convalescing and their friendship grew. Many times Max was on the verge of accepting the practiced leads of the Southern girl, but some remembrance of his mother's actions and a recognition of Virginia's native coquetry made Max hesitate this side of a proposal. And when, given a concert contract as a result of his singing at class day, Max left for an extended tour, he had not spoken of marriage to Virginia.

At home Max found his grandfather had left his estate to Max on the condition that he never married, and dismayed by the strange provision, Max left for New York to try to forget his wonder about the shadows of the past in the furthering of his career but thenceforth he was troubled by vague conflicting impulses and emotions which filled him with a strange forboding. Max received his big chance substituting for a noted singer who had sustained a broken leg in an accident and the vast concert audience hailed him as the find of the season. Dark and handsome, Max found himself bombarded by invitations from society matrons to attend their dances and incidentally entertain their guests. On one such occasion he met Madeline Grey, and fascinated by her charm was dismayed at the belated discovery that she was on the point of being rushed by her family into a marriage to a wealthy and middle aged bachelor, Barton, who was jealous of Max's every moment with Madeline. At the same time Max was distressed by a feeling of being shadowed, and a note received from Virginia asking him to return to her, was stolen and forwarded to Madeline who consequently felt that another woman had a prior claim to Max. The night of the biggest triumph of Max's concert career, moreover, the maddened Richard Gilmore rose before a hushed audience and proclaimed that this Max whom they were applauding was the grandchild of a mulatto slave woman and a white plantation owner. Virginia shudderingly clung to the arm of Max's roommate who had long worshipped her and rejoiced over her narrow escape, while Madeline, palely confessing to the stricken Max that she loved him in spite of everything, was gently put off. With misty eyes Madeline read Max's letter telling her that he would always love and revere her but marriage was not for him, and wishing her every happiness he vanished from her life.

TRAVELING WIVES

Janie E. Rhodes File No. 8360

OF course, Tom and Kitty had quarrelled about the latter's life work. Tom didn't think a woman could be a successful wife, and mother to little Tommy, when she spent most of her time on tours of the United States with one show or another, but Kitty told Tom he was old-fashioned. Her mother had been a famous actress and Kitty saw no reason why she couldn't continue her art and still love her husband and baby. And every quarrel ended with Tom crushing his famous and beautiful wife to him and yielding to her plaintive little query, "And now may I fill just one more engagement?" But after each tour terminated, her manager would come back enthusiastic over the "greatest yet" and it would begin all over again.

Often travelling with run down actors, Kitty longed to be safely at home again, but once she stood bowing before a tumultuously applauding audience everything was forgotten. This was what she lived for. There were men, of course, attracted by Kitty's glamor, but she would have none of them. Orchids came to her and roses. But always Kitty would remind the men who would be her lovers, that she had a husband and a baby at home and they were just in love with the roles she played. There was Clarence who played opposite Kitty and as she packed to leave for home he cried he couldn't live without her. But Kitty was gentle with him, and as she presided over the dinner table at home and watched Tommy crow with glee over the fluffy dog she bought him, she laughingly told Tom about her "would-be lovers." None of them, said Kitty, were as handsome as Tom, and smoothing the spot on top of his head that was beginning to show bald, she laughed as he kissed her ruefully. She was through this time. Home to stay. And then came a telegram from Hartley, New York this time. The opportunity she had always wanted. Forgetting that a few moments before she was "through with the theater", Kitty hurriedly started packing and despite all Tom's pleas and Tommy's tears she set off. It was fun getting the adulation of the little flapper who flirted with the conductor, and the fat Italian who sent for spaghetti at each train stop, and even the little girl who was going to New York to be married was fascinated by the great actress, but more important, Kitty met Jack, the young writer. They had much in common these two, and before the train pulled into New York Kitty realized she was in love. Forgetting everything in the excitement of the moment, Kitty gave herself to Jack and when she went back to Tom it was with the promise she would soon return. At home Tom immediately noticed the change and a letter made him ask Kitty if there was anyone else. When she confessed, he let her go. Back in New York, Kitty felt tears of joy come into her eyes at sight of the apartment Jack had prepared for her, but worldly as she was, it was only then she realized that Jack didn't care about the divorce she was getting. He already had a wife. Kitty felt crushed. It didn't matter. She still loved him. But she would never see him again. And as her manager joyously pointed out the advantages of her new contract, Kitty looked down wistfully at the newspaper item telling of Tom's marriage to a girl from home.

"BAD news, I suppose," sighed Mrs. Freeman as she opened the letter her sister had sent her. But she staggered to her chair and sat down hard as she read the rambling account of how Aunt Mathilda's children left her alone all day. How they couldn't get the dole because it was discovered they had money in the bank, how she had to cook for them before they left on the long hunger march and after all that they came home disgustedly to take what work they could find. Moreover, Aunt Mathilda's sciatica was much worse and the children had scraped up some money and were sending Aunt Mathilda to stay with the Freemans. Mrs. Freeman gasped at that last and she bitterly recalled how her sister kept talking all the time about how much she missed her husband. Yet when he was alive she had complained about his laziness all day long. It was Bob who reasoned with his mother, telling her that Aunt Mathilda was already on her way and they'd have to be kind to the poor thing, even if it meant that he'd have to leave college to help support her. Besides he finished up bravely, he had no right going to college now when he might help support the family. Mr. Grant, Natalie's father, would give him a job, and maybe it was all for the best.

However, it wasn't only the money Aunt Mathilda cost the Freemans, although she claimed she needed shoes, medicines, and special foods. It was her constant nagging, her "helpful" criticisms, and her eternal complaints that drove them to distraction. Moreover, just before one of the Freemans would lose his temper, Aunt Mathilda would whine that every one abused her because she was poor, and you couldn't take advantage of her when she thought that. After one of those speeches everyone would be very kind to banish the thought from Aunt Mathilda's mind and in a few hours she'd begin her tormenting again.

The Freemans would have conferences and try to devise means of ridding themselves of their unwelcome guest. Bob missed college but there was no going back now with Aunt Mathilda's expenses draining the family exchequer. Even Natalie grew indignant and told Bob if he spent all his money on his aunt, they'd never have enough to get married on. Then, one day, when the Freemans could stand it no longer, they decided to take a farm in the country. Regretfully they informed Aunt Mathilda of their decision but she wept and told them she had no place to go, no money to buy any comfort for herself, and finally Bob gave the fifty dollars he was saving toward his marriage to send Aunt Mathilda to a specialist who told her the country would do her good. Natalie told Bob they were through and they quarreled for the first time.

However, one day on the farm, Aunt Mathilda felt a pin scratch her. She drew a red hook from her bosom to refasten it and didn't see a bull charging at her until almost too late. With astounding agility she climbed a tree and Bob rescued her from the bull. But as he was restoring the little book, he realized it was a bank book and Aunt Mathilda had five thousand dollars safely hidden away while she lived on the Freemans. There was no further question about a poor relative. Aunt Mathilda was shipped back home, the Freemans washed their hands of her, and Bob began saving toward his marriage with Natalie who admitted the days without him had been filled with loneliness.

MENACE

IN the dim light the heavy faces of the gangsters registered responses to the directions of Boss Edwards, their leader, as he outlined the plan for the big bank robbery. One alone, Dacey, showed weakness as the icy command of the chief ordered them to shoot to kill, and that night two wily men slipped from the bank and hurried into a big touring car which pulled up at precisely the right moment. One patrolman noticed the car pulling away from the bank and noting signs that the bank had been entered called headquarters immediately. Two motor cycle cops in instant pursuit followed the trail of the big car, but as they neared, the bandits opened fire. The stillness of the night was broken by the staccato bullets and a minute later first one and then the other of the motor cops groaned and lost control of his vehicle as bullets pierced his shoulders. The touring car swerved sharply, followed a new trail. The wheels of the motorcycles whirred for some moments and then all was still. The other police had lost the trail.

In his hideaway Boss Edwards gloated over the rich spoils and assigned various tasks to his men, but Dacey who had shot one of the cops crept to one side and shook in terror. Edwards' voice shrilly calling him to his senses roused the boy from his apathy.

Meanwhile, nearby, Miriam and Jane, lost in the rain that had fallen heavily all that night, looked at each other in dismay as their car, skidding into a ditch, only dug deeper holes as they tried to get it out. Jane looked out into the gloom and suggested they spend the night in the car, but Miriam seeing a light, insisted on going for help. Her knock aroused Edwards' gang, and every gun in the room was drawn, but someone whispered, "It's a skirt," and Edwards gave hurried directions to open the door. As soon as Miriam stepped into the room, she felt something was wrong, and when she tried to withdraw, a hand closed over her mouth and she was dragged inside. Edwards ordered her to be brought to an inner room, and there the girl, tied and gagged prayed that Jane would somehow bring help. Dacey, who had been at the breaking point for several hours now, could stand it no longer when he heard Edwards and one of his men fighting over the girl, and running out into the storm he found Jane sitting impatiently waiting for Miriam to return. Hastily putting boards under the car, he helped her get the automobile out of the mud and begged her to hurry for help. Going completely to pieces when he saw the bodies of the two cops still in the road, he helped the trembling Jane get them into the car and urged her to hurry as she screamed at identifying the one who still lived as her fiance, William.

While Jane drove William to the hospital, Dacey squealed to the police and cried out in anguish when they ordered him to direct them to the hideaway. The bandits hearing the cops approach began shooting and it was a grim advance the police made through the curtain of death. Dacey fell dead, but John, a young lieutenant led his men on until all but Boss Edwards had been either captured or killed. The leader, however, was taking refuge in Miriam's room, and only the ruse of John in taking the desperate man off guard, and Miriam's bravery in knocking his gun to the floor, gave John the opportunity to close in. A terrific battle ensued and the young lieutenant came out triumphant. In the mutual admiration awakened, John and Miriam fell in love and at the bedside of the recovered William, a double wedding took place.

LOVE'S SECRETS

APPROACHED by her friend, Arthur Collins, for the next dance at the party, Dolores Stratton glances hopefully at handsome Neal Stratton; so that when the latter not only dances with her later in the evening but escorts her home—instead of her sister as he had done in the past—Dolores is overjoyed. When Neal proposes to her, Dolores begs him to wait until she is of age; but when another beau, Alexander Rogers, disappointed because she refuses his attentions, tells her of having heard Neal deny any attachment to her, Dolores accepts Neal's proposal immediately at the next country dance. Leaving Mollie, the girl from across the river whom his parents are urging him to marry, Neal escorts Dolores home where she promises him not to see any other man before the wedding. Returning from his business trip several weeks later, Neal begs Dolores to keep their marriage secret, since his parents would object, and they depart for the city to meet the preacher and to spend their honeymoon. As the weeks go by, Dolores continues to meet Neal secretly and when she realizes she is about to become a mother, pleads with him to publicize their marriage; but thinking of the cultured and beautiful Mollie whom his parents like, Neal refuses.

Promising to take her to another city upon his return, Neal departs for another business trip; and when Dolores is informed later of his death in a drunken brawl after a liquor sale, she faints. Worried by her condition and lack of funds, Dolores accepts the position as cook offered her by a rancher one day; and when gossip begins, Dolores, still keeping her vow of secrecy, is sent by her pitying father to her aunt Lucy where she is comforted by the visits of Darlene Bates and other of her friends who had been in similar trouble. When Darlene, refusing her offers of employment, marries an old man for protection from gossip, Dolores returns home with her child. After she and the ehild have recovered from a serious illness, Dolores's sister marries and moves away. To ease her loneliness, Dolores begins a correspondence with Gerry Mallory introduced to her via letters by Darlene who had met him on her travels. Refusing Gerry's offer of employment in his town, Dolores leaves her home with her child and aging father for her sister's house; for Alexander has become insulting in his attentions. After a quarrel with her sister, Dolores packs her things and with the money Gerry has sent her, travels to his town. At the station a messenger gives her sister a telegram, but Dolores does not hear her message. Immediately after a gentleman hands her the purse for which she had been looking (and which her sister, who had been holding it, had thrown into the window with the telegram), their train crashes with another train. Crowded into the station waiting room until the wounded are cared for and an emergency train sent for, Dolores screams when she sees Neal pushing toward her. Returning from the hospital where he had spent a long time, Neal had immediately gone to her home and informed of her visit to her sister's, had immediately wired. While they are kissing, a young man brings them the telegram found. In Gerry's town, Telson, assisted by him (Gerry), Neal sets up his business, and Dolores is happy several months after the death of Darlene's husband to hear of the engagement of her benefactor to her friend. The following year they all celebrate the birth of Dolores's second child, a girl who they hope will not "be found wanting when weighed in the balance."

HER OWN SPHERE

IT was at a football game that Joyce and Richard met. Her fine eyes and her air of independence and confidence immediately appealed to him and after a whirlwind courtship Joyce agreed to give up her interior decorating career for which she had prepared herself at college, and become Mrs. Richard Mallin. However, almost from the first Richard immersed himself in his legal career and the handling of several large cases kept him working long hours. Joyce remonstrated gently and induced the family physician to warn Richard that he was over-taxing his health, but kissing Joyce lightly, the young lawyer assured her she worried too much. Then came an epidemic of influenza and dazed by the suddenness of it all, Joyce found herself a widow with a baby on its way.

Brooding and melancholy, Joyce refused to be consoled and at length on the advice of her physician that she was in danger of losing her mind unless she interested herself in something, Joyce, never troubled about finances, installed a nurse in her home for the baby and opened an interior decorating shop. Her friends shrugged their shoulders and said it was just like Joyce to go about her own affairs asking no quarter. But by her fine talent, Joyce soon built up an exclusive clientele, and one day Arthur Hart, a noted architect enlisted Joyce's aid in refurnishing his apartment for his invalid wife. Bringing her tact and maturity of understanding developed by her own tragedy, Joyce soon captured the affection of the Harts and a strong friendship sprang up. Often on Sundays the Harts asked Joyce to bring little Richard, and often Joyce saw Arthur look longingly upon the boy. However, it wasn't until one rainy night when Mrs. Hart asked her husband to take Joyce home, and Arthur marvelling at the beauty of Joyce's apartment, found himself pouring out his own disappointment in not having children of his own, that he grasped Joyce in his arms and told her of his love. Thereafter it became a frequent occurrence for Arthur to drop in to see Joyce and the subject of a love child arose. Joyce's business had grown so that now she hired assistants and spent several months in Europe studying antiques. On one of these trips she bore Arthur's child and after a year of having the child raised by a nurse, Joyce sent for the baby and claimed simply she was the child of a friend who had died. Meanwhile Mrs. Hart was declining and Arthur sent a brief note telling Joyce his wife had died in Baltimore where he had taken her for the services of a specialist.

Some time later, Arthur and Joyce were married and giving up her shop, Joyce devoted herself to her two children. Years passed and as the youngsters matured, Joyce realized with growing horror that Richard was in love with Arlene. Clinging to Arthur, Joyce stood by as Arthur took Richard into their confidence. For a moment the boy seemed stunned, then drawing himself up, he made them promise they wouldn't tell Arlene. Accepting a position in Los Angeles, Richard soon wrote of a girl with whom he had fallen in love, and Arlene, recovering from the first moments of dismay, found through her parents a renewed interest in the social round.

HAVING gambled his money away, Alberto, at the recommendation of a friend, obtains a position as butler at the Castle D'Ayla in the nearby town of Salerno. Recognizing in the dressmaker there, Alvira, a former sweetheart, Alherto proposes to her. Retiring after their marriage to their own home in Sorrento, the two die a year later in an epidemic after the birth of their twins, Titto and Totto. The latter, cared for by their more fortunate uncle, Filipo, after their graduation from college as agriculturists, decide to visit America. After hurting Rido, a detective, who, suspecting them of being the twin gangsters he is searching for, has followed them,—Titto and Totto hasten to the boat. Anxious, at Rido's request, to force the twins to reveal their implication in the recent Neapolitan murder, the captain subjects them to a vicious third degree. Saved from torture by the storm which sinks the ship, the twins and the steward Jack soon find themselves on a nearby African island. Meeting Rido on the boat which later picks them up (now including a wealthy Mrs. Blinda Eldridge, whose husband has been killed by the cannibals)—Titto and Totto hide. Noticing them leaving the boat, Rido follows, but losing track of them, is discussing them with Hogan, another detective on their trail, when sudden shots and screams nearby reveal a jewelry store robbery and the twins rushing off in a roadster. On guard outside the deserted house across the way which the detectives are searching, Rido meets Pat, a now starved and reformed member of the gang who tells him of the spinning floors in the place,—the cause of the disappearance of the men; and aided with food and money, reveals the whereabouts of their (the gang's) meeting place. Raided the following night, everyone in the gang, except Dave and Dan (as the twins are known in America) are arrested. Informed by Pat of the twin's work as gardeners for a Mr. William Celton, the detectives question them there, look up their references, and lacking evidence, return baffled. While the twins are touring Canada on their vacation, Hogan has the ten thousand dollars he has taken from the bank for his mortgage, stolen from his office in his absence by a man who poses as a painter, and hastily returns to his waiting roadster downstairs. In the meantime, having rescued two girls, Florence and Dorothy Celton, from a serious automobile accident, the twins fall in love with them at the hospital. Rewarded by Mr. Celton with generous checks the twins and the girls attend dances and parties; and when at one of them, Mr. Edmund Raymond, Totto's new acquaintance, is shot, the twins found examining the body and revolver, are arrested. Bailed, the boys are awaiting trial in company of the girls who have refused to return to college; and when after several weeks of tennis, golf and horseback, the twins are seen by the butler in the act of leaving the house with their jewelry, the girls are heartbroken; and continue to believe in their innocence even after the boys suspiciously disappear when their room is searched. Distraught the next day by his daughters' sudden departure to search for them, Mr. Celton arrives in Montreal to postpone the trial when he meets the two couples at their roadster outside his hotel. Kidnapped by the gangsters, the two had been imprisoned until the building was raided and Dave and Dan, the twins resembling them, arrested. Found guilty of Mr. Raymond's murder the next week, the twins are saved by the timely arrival of the minister with the note from the true murderess, —now dying—Mr. Raymond's mistress. Kissing them eagerly, the girls return home with their fiances and Mr. Celton to plan their marriages.

WITH maddening calm Paul listened to Doris trying to awaken in him remorse for the waste of his natural talents and the fine education his parents had squandered upon him in a vain attempt to turn him from drink and dissipation. Then, as she paused breathlessly, he bent swiftly and silenced her with a kiss, convincing her that trying to reform him was a lost cause.

But when one of the town gamblers, infuriated by Paul's defense of a defrauded old woman, set thugs to beat up the man he held responsible for his conviction, in self defense Paul seriously injured his assailant. Narrowly escaping being made an example of by the court because the fracas occurred in a notorious speakeasy, Paul found that Doris had induced her father, editor of a progressive newspaper, to give him a chance on his paper. For a while shocked by the trial and grateful for the chance to make good, Paul justified Doris' faith in him, and when her father was arrested for a too vigorous campaign to rid the town of its lawbreakers, Paul carried on the editorial policies of the paper with unprecedented success. But the responsibility and chance to publicly cudgel his opponents was what appealed to Paul, and soon despite the fact that Doris felt a new respect for him, Paul fell in with some of his old companions. Bored with his police court assignments, Paul threw up his hands when necessary retrenchments in the reportorial staff gave him the assignment of covering the Sunday sermons. Meeting Joe Davids, one of his old cronies, Paul accompanied him to a "speak" and for several hours rolled dice on the dirty floor. Bleary-eyed, he noticed the time and with a muffled oath realized that he had missed the important sermon of a prominent minister. Rushing to the Church he found the congregation leaving and espying the minister boarding a trolley, Paul wildly followed. Hiccoughing and reeking of liquor, Paul begged for the minister's notes but when the elergyman indignantly refused to help the drunkard and coldly replied his lecture had been extemporaneous, Paul, in despair managed to talk someone into mentioning the text of the sermon, and repairing to a backroom of the speakeasy with a pint of whiskey, a bible, and an unabridged dictionary, he worked for four hours to turn out a supposed synopsis of the minister's speech.

The flood of inquiries and the really beneficient results of the hoax caused the minister to accept the article, but Mr. Whitlock, disgusted with Paul fired him on the spot. Dismissed, Paul realized what a blow it was losing everything and even Doris, turning from him hopelessly refused to believe his sincerity when he told her of his love.

Forlornly Paul boarded an outgoing train, headed he didn't care where. Suddenly there was a severe jolting and as the cars careened wildly, Paul realized that the coach had gotten disrailed. Bumping, lurching, the speed of the train did not let up and at length the car plunged sickeningly down a creek. Able to move, Paul attended to the wounded and dying and rushing for aid telegrammed the whole story extravagantly to Whitlock's paper, scooping the country on a wreck killing a notorious bandit. Whitlock reinstated him, a syndicate made a bid for his services, and Doris allowed herself to be convinced that Paul would make her a fine husband.

SOPHISTICATION

ROSE MARIE'S eyes dropped before the enthusiastic admiration of Jim Linsey. Even while she was explaining that she was his mother's social secretary, Rose Marie considered the wisdom of her mother warning her against having her head turned by her new position. "Remember," her mother had said wistfully, "you may forget that your mother was employed as a scrubwoman, but someone will always remind you." And in the succeeding days while Jim, just graduated from Harvard, wealthy, and eligible, cornered Rose Marie at every available moment to tell her how different, how sweet she was, she had to keep remembering who she was, that she had no right to Jim's love. The more she pleased Mrs. Linsey with her efficiency, the more opportunity Rose Marie had to learn just how much faith Jim's mother was pinning on a socially desirable match for her son, and the more her heart ached.

At the annual Rose Garden Party given by the Linseys, Rose Marie caught the approbation of Mrs. Linsey as she played and sang for the guests, but she knew that her employer's good humor would have shifted had she known that Jim led her out to the garden after the excitement of the announcement that the United States had entered the World War had somewhat abated, and on a bench under the stars, told her of his love. Jim told her other things too, of the tradition in his family to be first in the service of his country, and begged her to marry him. But Rose Marie, grown suddenly chilled said it would break his mother's heart now. When he came back, it would be different. Finally Jim consented giving Rose Marie a diamond ring to keep in secret. There were bitter sweet hours before he left, and Mrs. Linsey catching the expression in Rose Marie's eyes thought it was just as well that there would be no opportunity for Jim to return the love of her little secretary. Mrs. Linsey shared the hope of Wanda Lane, a tall blonde heiress, that Jim would some day marry her.

Months passed and from the strain of worry over her son, Mrs. Linsey became very ill. Wanda who learned of this sent a note saying she was coming and bag and baggage she moved in "to help", reporting incidentally that she had received two letters from Jim. Cold to Rose Marie, Wanda raised a nasty fuss when she discovered that she was expected to eat with "a servant who didn't know her place". Sindie, the cook, comforted Rose Marie and exclaimed bitterly that that Miss Wanda had better not be making any more eyes at her George.

Then one night Rose Marie going down for the milk for Mrs. Linsey overheard voices in the pantry, and to her astonishment heard Wanda bribe Sindie's George to rob the Linsey safe so that when Jim returned and found himself broke, he would be glad to marry Wanda. Knowing that Jim's lawyer, Dennan, was to be trusted, that night Rose Marie left to secure his aid, feeling that Mrs. Linsey might suffer a relapse from the excitement of Wanda's guilt. However, she didn't know that Wanda had also bribed Jim's business manager to buy worthless stock and had shifted the blame for the robbery on Rose Marie's shoulders because of her disappearance. Hidden in her mother's house, Rose Marie waited for Dennan's help and it came in an unexpected form when Jim, back from the wars, championed her, exposed Wanda's guilt without, however, pressing charges, and introduced his bride-to-be to his mother who had been among the first to turn against Rose Marie.

AN infant prodigy, Rita had made a brilliant debut in New York and had received acclaim as the singing find of the season. Adulation followed in her wake, and among her wealthiest admirers was one Francis Roberts who could give her a coveted position in society as his wife. But because she resented his growing jealousy of her legion of almirers, and because she was more than intrigued by the humble devotion of an unknown composer who sent beautiful songs dedicated to her regularly, Rita sent Roberts away. But when at length she promised to marry the worshipping Carlotti, who could offer her nothing save love and a glowing faith in his own genius, she felt her eyes brim over at Carlotti's incredulous acceptance of his happiness.

Leading her to a tiny house he had bought for them in the Canadian Rockies, Carlotti devoted himself to making Rita happy. There was nothing too good for her, and until the early hours of the morning he composed the music he assured her would bring them fame. At first Rita had faith in her husband, hut as their funds grew smaller and smaller and the birth of her daughters kept her from the concert stage, Rita began to grow embittered and urge Carlotti to sell insurance, do anything to bring them money. "Soon," she cried bitterly, "you'll have enough waste paper to make a pyre." But Carlotti only looked up whimsically and sighed, "I have always thought it most economical to be cremated." "Bah," Rita replied, "you are impossible." But Carlotti went on covering reams of paper and always from the publishers came the same polite rejections. The public was interested only in trash. It wouldn't be expedient to try to sell Carlotti's impassioned music.

And at length, feeling that she had wasted her life, Rita determined to go to New York and attempt a comeback. But she needed money to go, and in desperation over Carlotti's quiet faith in himself despite all disappointments, Rita sold their little house, long grown shabby and unkept. Striving to withhold his grief at the collapse of all his shining hopes, Carlotti wished Rita happiness and fortune, and brokenly accepted the invitation of one of his daughters to come and live with her and her husband.

Middleaged, a failure, Carlotti felt the loss of his wife the keenest blow. Only the birth of a grandson eased to some slight extent the pain in his heart. Poor Carlotti, he had always wanted a son who would grow rich by reason of Carlotti's fame. He softly crooned to the babe and declared that with his signature the little one would some day gain wealth, but his daughter shook her head sadly. Her father's mind was going.

For a while the little house to which Carlotti had brought his famous young bride stood empty and desolate. The new owner, renovating the pitiful little house thoroughly, found to his great interest, some music stuffed in a window seat. A publisher friend in New York caught his enthusiasm and offered to publish if Carlotti's signature were obtained. Happily fortified by the contract that justified his years of work, Carlotti went in search of his wife and as Rita sobbed her tale of a fickle public and confessed that she had found Roberts now married, entirely indifferent, the gray haired little composer held his wife close. He could provide for her now.

ROUND-UP KID

Walter Brandewiede File No. 8197

AL WHITE, a Federal Officer trying to clear the names of men believed to be railroaded to prison by the notorious Fade-away Bob in league with the unscrupulous Mayor and Sheriff of Fidell, disguises himself as a bandit and to frustrate a mail robbery, himself holds up the fast mail and escapes with $200,000. Pursued by a posse, Al is getting the worst of it when Ben Bennett, watching from a hillside admires the courage of the lone fighter, and discovering Fade-away Bob, whom he has followed to avenge the murder of his father, among the pursuers, joins forces with the lone man. However, running out of ammunition, Ben and Al are captured, led to jail, and there discover that they are both "after" Fade-away.

The Sheriff, Mayor, and Fade-away, in secret conference decide to offer Al his liberty if he discloses the hiding place of the loot, but when the cell is opened, Al and Ben rush the sheriff, seize his gun, and shoot their way out of jail closely pursued by the aroused Sheriff and posse. Al escapes but Ben, wounded, is captured, tried, and found "not guilty" of participating in the hold-up of the mails. Ben is closely questioned by the official trio and when he tells them he intended the hold-up himself, he enters an agreement with the Mayor, Sheriff, and Fade-away to hold up the post office. Realizing, however, that the life of Arthur Price, young post master is in danger, Ben finds Al in a cabin in the woods and works out a plan.

The night of the robbery, the conspirators wait for the delivery of the registered mail, see the clerk at his desk, and Ben shoots. The body falls to the floor, the robbery takes place, and in the excitement a gasoline can is upset, ignited, and the building is set afire.

The next night the newspaper headlines the Post Office fire and the fact that Arthur Price was burned alive. The spoils are divided and Fade-away hastens to force his consolation on Ruth Johnson, Price's fiancee who has always avoided his oily advances. They struggle and Lucy, Arthur's sister, enters and picks up a poker to aid, but Fade-away knocks her to the floor and escapes with Ruth, while Lucy implores the aid of Ben, who follows and wrests the fainting Ruth from her abductor. Realizing that Fade-away to save his own skin has reported that Ben kidnapped Ruth, Ben leaves the girl with a sympathetic farmer and disguised joins the hunt for himself. But Al, thinking Ben in danger comes out of hiding and is caught and sentenced to be hung for the mail hold-up.

Worried, Ben reports the progress to the Federal authorities and when he comes to the trial, he is immediately arrested for the murder of Arthur Price, the cowardly Fade-away having testified to save his own skin. However, ordering the Federal men to guard the doors. Ben produces both Arthur Price and the supposedly kidnapped Ruth. The guilty trio attempt to escape but are held and later convicted for their crimes. Al is promoted for his work, having turned the $200,000 over to the government the day of the robbery, and he is kept busy acting as best man for Arthur and Ruth and Ben and Lucy—newly-weds.

THE THROW-BACK

John T. McCoy, Jr. File No. 8169

TROUBLED by the fiendish light in the eyes of Dr. Van Gau as he explains the completion of his device to speed up the process of evolution, Dr. Wallace, president of the institution in which Van Gau has been working, imoatiently demands the mad scientist's resignation. Resenting his treatment Van Gau plans a horrible revenge.

Van Gau entices William Wallace, the son of Dr. Wallace, to his house which is an old, rambling mansion. William is led to the laboratory in the subterranean cellar. There, amongst strange scientific apparatus, skeletons, and models of prehistoric man, Van Gau drugs the boy and by means of his apparatus manages to "throw-back" the boy through the various stages of Man's development, to a monstrous primitive form. The once-handsome young man has unwillingly and unknowingly become a grotesque creature, a stranger in mind and body to his former self. Before the creature recovers from the effects of the drug he is caged in a chamber that Van Gau has previously prepared.

Later, Van Gau sends a note to Dr. Wallace explaining enough to cause Wallace to hurry to the scene. Van Gau tells him he may see his son in an adjoining room. Then as the president enters, Van Gau closes and locks the door. Wallace finds himself in a dark room and sensing danger retreats to the door demanding that it be opened, but at that moment William, the monster, suddenly appears from a dark corner and ferociously attacks and kills his father.

Worried over her inability to communicate with William, Ethel Morris, his fiancee, implores Robert Grace, William's best friend who secretly loves Ethel, to accompany her to Van Gau's home.

In the meantime, "the Throw-Back" escapes from his prison chamber and attacks and kills Van Gau.

Ethel and Robert arriving at Van Gau's house proceed to search for William, neither of them aware of the presence of the blood-thirsty creature groping aimlessly through the house. They realize impending danger when they discover the mangled remains of Wallace and Van Gau. Ethel, becomes separated from Robert and, in the laboratory, is confronted by the monster. She screams for Robert, and William, who she thinks is somewhere in the house, never dreaming that he is the monster before her. Robert rushes to her aid and shoots the monster as he is about to attack the girl. The "Throw-Back" falls and crashes against the machine causing the apparatus to re-act. To the astonishment of the couple, the creature goes through a reverse series of changes until he returns to his original self. However, the wound proves fatal and Ethel, in hysterics, is gently led away by Robert, whom only friendship for William has kept from declaring his love.

TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE
(TRADE MARK)

Vol. VI MARCH, 1933 No. 2

To Our Producer and Writer-Friends Throughout United States and Foreign Countries

NEW YORK CITY negotiates by far the majority of all stories utilized in Talking Pictures today, and our new department thus enables adequate representation in this field.

We maintain a staff of experts who are second to none. Whether it be work of synopses, technical working continuity, criticism, revision or typing, you may rely upon work of integrity at all times.

The necessity for legal protection through copyright is very evident. Proof of this is demonstrated almost daily in newspapers throughout the country. The Library of Congress at Washington is maintained for that purpose. Reliance upon the common law is unwise. No honorable author or producer desires to become involved in burdensome litigation, and copyright protection is protective insurance, by registration, against that substantial expense. The producer is thus protected against any unfounded claims of authorship, as well as the author himself.

TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE reaches only the producers and our clients. It is not on public sale. No advertisements are accepted, it being our purpose to keep it a strictly professional magazine.

Our offices are available to those producers who do not depend upon staff continuity writers. Our rates for this work are reasonable and are subject to contract.

In addition to synopses herein printed, complete script is submitted to suitable producers where, in our judgment, such submission is advisable.

Free copy of publication is sent to each author whose story appears herein.

Producers will find it extremely useful to retain TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE in their files for a future emergency, in the event that their present needs are supplied.

Talking Picture Magazine is not available to the general public. DANIEL O'MALLEY CO., INC., 20 West 60th Street, New York, Publishers; Daniel S. Margolies, General Manager; Associate Editors, Edith Bersin, Margot Hoff.

THEY THAT HAVE RICHES

Frances H. Hammond File No. 8476

ACROSS the Parisian Cafe table two impeccable noblemen smoked monogrammed cigarettes and discussed somewhat ironically their diminishing funds. Count Friedrich listened tolerantly to the advice of Hans, more decadent in his handsomeness, and admitted that it sounded easy. All one had to do was find an American heiress ready to buy an Austrian title and a handsome husband and there you were. As the conversation progressed, the last of Friedrich's objections was silenced. He booked passage for America.

It was absurdly good fortune that Friedrich should have met Constance, and that she as well as her incredibly rich father and pompous mother should have become so attached to him. Moreover, to compensate for Connie's odious scheming mother, there was the indubitable beauty of the girl. Before the steamer docked in New York Friedrich had proposed and had been accepted. The wedding was scheduled for six weeks, and immediately afterward Friedrich would take his bride on a trip around the world. He had been around the world countless times—on the yachts of his friends, but this time he would display his knowledge of the old world for his very rich young bride. A few days later, Friedrich came down with an attack of appendicitis, the first illness of his life. The surgeon advised an immediate operation lest he have another attack in some out of the way place during his honeymoon, and cursing his fate Friedrich submitted. He paced the hospital room restlessly and only the deft movements of his pretty little night nurse soothed him. Fannie Deering thought she had never seen anyone so handsome and considerate and the day nurse who suspected Fannie's interest reported slyly about how strange it was that Friedrich was unwilling to see his fiancee and her mother when they called. When at last they did come in with their bluff heartiness and total lack of comprehension of the fact that Friedrich wanted a little sympathy, he worked himself up into a nervous state that required all of Fannie's patience to calm. His gratitude was touching and Fannie noticed his relief after Connie had called to tell him she would be unable to call the next day.

Then Hans came to visit. He looked admiringly after Miss Deering and seizing Friedrich's hand told him about his coming to America in response to an opening for a travel adviser. Hans winked prodigiously and explained that he was after a little of his own advice, however, a rich heiress. Then Connie came and Hans gasped as he realized the success his friend had achieved. Friedrich noticed with considerable irony Connie's reception of Hans title. She regarded Hans exactly as she did Friedrich . . . he had a title. Outside Hans was speaking to Miss Deering, fatigued from lack of sleep, and while Connie explained about the wedding invitations Friedrich realized he could never marry her. She was all glitter and entirely self-engrossed. Her concern for him was only that it might necessitate a postponed wedding. Hans took Connie home and Friedrich, realizing he loved Miss Deering brooded over his finances. It was Hans, growing enthusiastic about Connie who suggested a way out. Three weeks later, Hans led Connie up the red velvet aisle, while Friedrich, proud holder of Hans' position as travel adviser, seized Miss Deering's capable young hands and told her that as his wife she would have to give up her work. He had the continental idea of marriage.

THE YEARS BETWEEN

Mrs. Samuel Wilson File No. 9177

"YOU'RE fired!" Tears blinded June's eyes as she dashed from Mr. Golden's office. Her brief career as model in the exclusive dress shoppe had terminated when she slapped the leering face of the great Golden, and Benjamin Wildermere, waiting in Mr. Golden's outer office, on an impulse followed the girl. Inside the office boy and the telephone operator exchanged glances which vanished as Golden angrily stalked out and bellowed directions, while Benjamin caught up with June and said softly, "Good girl."

Over lunch, June explained her last hope had vanished and as Benjamin assured her she was much too young to lose courage, she reached across the table and placing her hand over his told him he was the only kind person she had met since she arrived in New York alone. Benjamin smiled, he knew how it was with her, he had a son, almost her own age, studying art abroad. It was Benjamin who kept her spirits up all through the lonely weeks and when he asked her one day to marry him, she, who had nothing, married him because there was not much joy for him. Even his love seemed right to her until the day that Johnny Wildermere came home and held June's hand a trifle too long as he whispered, "Stepmother . . . " From then on it was agony. Always Johnny's eyes seemed accusatory, and June realized she had had no right to marry a man she didn't love. Without saying anything, Johnny and June avoided each other, and Benjamin, prostrated by a heart attack, begged his son to take his wife out for a ride because her pallor worried him. To please Benjamin, Johnny and June rode together and their silences were as great confessions. One day, riding together on horseback, they hurried before a sudden storm and in attempting to jump a fence, June slipped from her horse. Lifting her in his arms Johnny carried her to the hunting lodge for which they had been heading, and as he held her close little endearments escaped his lips. June regaining consciousness twined her arms about his neck and their lips met for the first time. Awakening to their positions, they tried to brave the storm but at length great peals of thunder drove June to the shelter of Johnny's arms and at last they clung together, unmindful. Soberly they returned together, and Johnny made plans to go abroad. Once Johnny through gritted teeth exclaimed he hated his father for separating them, but June stopped his mouth with her hand.

Then they found Benjamin dead. It wasn't a heart attack, said the doctor. It was poison. Benjamin's estate had been equally divided between his wife and son, but now an inquest was held, and when it was discovered that Johnny had bought some poison several days before, "To kill some rats", June broke down and confessed to the murder. Johnny tried to shield her, but June insisted it was her crime. Sadly packing his father's effects, Johnny found a note heretofore undiscovered written by Benjamin saying he had poisoned himself because he had no right to keep the two he loved most, apart. When June saw it she admitted she had confessed to the murder because she believed Johnny had done it. A check-up at the drug store proved that Benjamin had bought the poison that killed him, and freed, Johnny led his June from prison. Together they faced happiness.

NOT WANTED

Marie T. Kleine File No. 8452

AN unconquerable ambition caused James Creeley to bend all his energies toward making a success of himself. All through the years of struggle amassing a legal education the while he supported his adored wife, Janet, James kept his eyes toward the goal of governorship of the state, and when, still little more than a youngster, he was given an opportunity in the District Attorney's office, he threw his arms about Janet and cried he was one step nearer his goal. It was the famous Sims and Goff case that gave him his first public recognition. The case seemed hopeless. There was scarcely any evidence, yet young James through sheer force of will forced the racketeers to confess their guilt and while the newspapers acclaimed the fighting spirit of the young attorney, James, ignoring gangdom's threats, secured long terms for the criminals. From time to time, thereafter, threatening letters would come to him, but he ignored them and on the strength of that case won the coveted election to the office of District Attorney.

Years passed and James' children, proud of their illustrious father, teased him about his absorption in his work, but James' eyes were still fixed on the gubernatorial chair. Happy in the engagement of his daughter Irene to a young Bostonian, James whose own musical talents had been sacrificed to his legal career, became interested in a guest, Gladys Watson, a singer. Not suspecting that Gladys was being paid by the now released racketeer Sims, to entrap him, James managed to resist her seductions. Nevertheless, he was not unmoved by her vibrant young beauty and her skilled allurements. But when James won the gubernatorial nomination, Sims, remembering his old grudge against James whom he held accountable for his prison term, doubled Gladys' fee for ruining James. One day, while James was celebrating his nomination with his family, be received a call informing him that Gladys needed his help. Hesitating for a moment as he looked in and saw the aging Janet sitting with her children, he finally decided to go, but once in Gladys' apartment realized she was trying to seduce him. In disgust he turned to go, but suddenly Gladys began screaming and as police broke in she informed them that the thoroughly bewildered James was the father of her child and had again attacked her. Innocent though he was, the scandal ruined James' political career and his family turned from him. Stunned by the suddenness of his fall, James took to drinking.

Irene broke her engagement through shame, and Sims, whose revenge was not yet complete, attempted to ruin Irene. In self defense she shot him and faced a murder charge. However, James came to the aid of his daughter and by a brilliant defense cleared her name, forced Gladys to confess her own part in the scheme, and triumphed as popular favor again offered him the gubernatorial nomination. Tired now, he refused, but found his happiness reconciled to his family who had once told him he was "not wanted".

THE WOMAN IN BLUE

Paul de Longpre File No. 9050

AT Canal de Nor, David's colonel, Holmes, fell and David carried him across the battlefield to the dressing station. Before Holmes died, he asked David to look after his wife. Two years later, smoothing his shabby clothes, David walked into the huge Holmes mansion and stammered before the cool imposing beauty of the woman in blue. Shirley Holmes thanked her caller for the message he brought her from her husband, and feeling the interview terminated, David left resenting immeasurably her haughty air of superiority. Despite himself, however, he felt an attraction for this woman,—patently absurd in view of their different circumstances and while he spent weeks sleeping on park benches and starving because he could find no legitimate opening for a man of his capabilities, he thought of Shirley. One of his former buddies showed him how to make money through subtle blackmail, and from this, bootlegging and other activities of a like nature, David's fortunes began to rise.

Once one of his friends saw a picture in a tabloid and called David's attention to the fact that Shirley Holmes, widow, had inherited a fortune. David snatched the paper away and with set lips ordered his gang of ex-army officers to steer clear of her, weren't they working on Jasper, a rich, sleek foreigner who was secretly running a chain of gambling houses under the protection of various distinguished people whom the police did not care to assail?

A few nights later while waiting in a theater lobby, David saw Shirley Holmes and his pulse quickened as she smiled in recognition and asked him to call sometime. A moment later, she was joined by Jasper and to David's dismay left with her bald escort. When David called on Shirley he warned her against Jasper but she smiled at his fears for her.

Meanwhile, David appeared at the table Jasper reserved every night at a famous restaurant, and pretending to be an intoxicated hick, refused to leave. Jasper, interested sat down and when David flourished a bank roll and explained he was leaving for the continent because he couldn't find any place to spend his money in New York, Jasper signalled to a friend, a "Mr. Smith" who befriended the drunk and as a special favor took "Mr. Brown" to a series of parties where well dressed people gambled. David dropped a thousand dollars that night at the gaming tables but he learned plenty about the establishments Jasper maintained, presumably as the homes of various titled noblemen and women. Moreover, David met the group of former buddies who enthusiastically agreed to David's plan of supposed raids of the Jasper establishments. On the appointed night, David and his buddies entered successively each of Jasper's places as detectives. At the last David found Shirley Holmes was hostess! Shocked he drew her away from Jasper and on the balcony learned that Jasper held her I. O. U.s and had forced her to be one of his hostesses. The inheritance story was just one of Jasper's advertisements to act as a blind! Telling Shirley of his love, David sent for Jasper and promised not to turn him over to headquarters if he turned over to him the I. O. U.s of the future Mrs. David Stephens. As David and his men left, Jasper asked, "What of the money from the tables?" David's hand crept about Shirley's shoulders, "That," he answered, "goes to the pension fund for ex-officers."

JEALOUS HUSBANDS

Ferne Evens File No. 8467

THE very beautiful young lady Joan Beverly jumped up from the depths of a sofa and lifted eager lips for her husband's kiss. She sighed as he patted her shoulder and hurried in to dress for dinner. Across the beautifully set table, Joan inquired about Piers' case, and as he informed her he was glad the case was over, it had been difficult securing a life sentence for the boy, Joan angered him by wistfully expressing sympathy for the young criminal. Piers rose abruptly and telling her he disliked having anyone argue with him, informed her he had some work to do. When her husband frowned as she tried to tell him something, Joan accepted his suggestion that he would call her when he was finished with his work. Hours later, Joan shiveringly rose from her chair and admitting herself into the library found Piers smoking his pipe. He greeted her pleasantly and then recalled that she had wanted to speak to him. He had forgotten. Hesitantly Joan explained to him that their marriage was a failure, because he never considered the human relations of marriage. Placing his hands on her shoulders, Piers whispered she was very beautiful and as she closed her eyes happily, he assured her that the next morning he would breakfast with her, his legal appointments notwithstanding. The next morning when Joan came down radiantly to breakfast she found Piers had completely forgotten his promise and had gone on to work. The telephone awoke Joan from her bitter reverie, and when Lady Windermere refused to accept Joan's excuses, Joan agreed finally to go to the races.

At dinner that evening Joan reminded Piers of the broken promise, but dropped the subject as he seemed never to have heard of it before. Suddenly Piers, buried in the evening paper, exploded as he read of Joan's appearance at the races with Lady Windermere and her guest Sir James Ottis, who seemed much attached to Lady Beverly. Joan reminded Piers that she had told him about her going, but he jealously fastened on the Sir James item and refused to be pacified by her laughing assurance that Sir James was just twenty-one. When, however, Joan told Piers who had planned that they would spend the evening alone, that they ought to entertain, having fallen behind in their social obligations, he grumblingly consented to let her invite guests.

At the dance, Piers jealously remonstrated at the presence of Sir James, and as Joan tried to explain that it would be an insult to Lady Windermere, whose house guest he was, to exclude him, the young boy claimed the dance. Joan smiled at his impetuous confidences and when he begged her to listen to some songs he had composed, she accompanied him to the piano. A few moments later, Piers, finding them together, made ugly insinuations and the boy insultedly left. Joan was bewildered and as the other guests made their excuses, Piers informed her she should have gone with Sir James, At the height of their quarrel, Joan left, bitterly refusing the money the angered Piers offered her.

In Paris Joan looked for work but ill-qualified as she was failed to secure anything to replenish her funds. Reduced successively from poorer to poorer lodgings she at last fell ill, and was asked to leave for not paying rent. When Piers, after months of searching arrived, he learned that "Ella Sanders" had gone, and only after almost running her over did he find her and beg forgiveness. He had given up his work.

Gaily laughing, Joan scolded Piers for taking the baby out seven times today, and Piers, kissing Joan pulled her to the garden pool to watch Piers, Jr. splash about.

THIS MADNESS

Diana Hearne File No. 9051

ALWAYS Sylvia reminded herself when her parents' bickering shattered the stillness of the night, that they had once loved each other, these two who had only harsh words for each other now. It was marriage that had tied her dreamy impractical father to a grocery business for which he was totally unfitted, and had turned her mother from a vivacious slip of a girl to a woman eternally dissatisfied. Even Charles Darmoden couldn't shake Sylvia's distrust of marriage. She liked him more than anyone she ever expected to meet, she admitted, but she had seen too many young people destroyed by marriage,—especially a marriage based on poverty. Charles reasoned with her. There was every reason to expect that he would achieve financial independence soon. It was true his legal practice was a thing of the future, but he had excellent prospects. Besides Sylvia wanted to write. She know she could write and lost in a dreary round of housekeeping her musical and literary ambitions would be swamped. They quarreled then for the first time. Sylvia said things she didn't mean, and Charles, convinced that her arguments were silly told her so. It was his parting slur upon her ability to write that sent Sylvia away from Petersboro forever.

Arriving at the small college town, Sylvia found it difficult to find work to support her. For dreary hours each day she taught a bored youngster to play halting scales on the piano until she felt if she ever saw a piano again she would scream. Discouraged, Sylvia wondered why Mr. Scott kept up the lessons when his child made so little progress. One day Scott, alone witb his daughter's piano teacher pulled Sylvia into his arms. With blazing eyes she stalked from the house and alone in her small room wept from the strain. Her concentrated study of literary technique took tolls of her health as she worried about getting money for her tuition and at length she fell ill. Doctor's fees took the last of her money and when at last she informed the President of the small college that she would find it necessary to drop out, he seized her hands and offered to pay for her tuition. Startled, Sylvia looked up at his sparse white hair and as he pressed some bills in her hand and murmured something about a chance meeting at a hotel in a nearby town, Sylvia choked and fled from the room. As she packed her things a letter came from her mother telling her that Charles had married and left for the coast.

Selling her winter coat, Sylvia got train fare to take her to New York and there stenographic work gave her money enough to attend Columbia Summer School. At one of the informal dances Sylvia met Rotier, a brilliant young Frenchman with whom she found herself lunching each day. Rotier thought the stories she managed to write after weary hours of working and studying, had unusual promise. It was he who introduced her to an editor who agreed to accept some of Sylvia's stories. Happier than she bad been since she left Charles, Sylvia poured her gratitude upon Rotier and as he kissed her fiercely, she felt that perhaps she had been wrong. Many times she had felt regret for having thrown aside her happiness with Charles and now she listened with suspended antagonism to Rotier's pleas. It was only when she realized that he was not intending marriage at all, and that he had very recently been married to a rich American girl, that Sylvia realized he was just another man. Slowly she dismissed him and her laugh grew hysterical when she found that the Editor wanted his "reward" too from the beautiful young writer. However, Sylvia's story was bought by a movie company and she was sent to Hollywood to write. In the film Mecca she became a recluse and she smiled at the wierd stories advanced to rationalize her actions. Then, one day, she accepted an invitation to a house-party on the plea of some writer friends who told her she was the only one who could help them. They had a man who had been disillusioned in marriage and would only come on the promise that he wouldn't be bothered by an acquisitive woman. Sylvia, needing a vacation laughed and she was absorbedly playing a Chopin nocturne when Charles entered. She gasped and continued playing, and Charles told her softly how he had hoped she would come. This time Sylvia dared marriage.

WHAT GAIN?

Martin Offenbecher File No. 9520

THREE youngsters huddled on East side tenement steps discuss their life ambitions. Little Paddy Dugan wants to be a cop like his father, but ragged Johnny agrees with his brother Joe that the greatest thing in the world is to be rich. When they separate, the Schmidt boys go home, find their father and mother both drink-sotted, and philosophically return to the streets where they rob a push cart of some fruit and a well dressed drunk of his watch. With the money they go to a restaurant and buy all the food they can hold, while their eyes widen as Officer Dugan passes by. At home Officer Dugan stretches himself out in his easy chair and over his paper tells his wife that the Schmidt boys are getting worse every day. He tells about how tbe excited Tony, the fruit peddlar had gesticulated after the fleeing lads and as Paddy explains that the Schmidt boys never get anything to eat at home, and begs his father not to prosecute his friends, the Officer holds his own lad close.

Ten years later the newsboys are selling extras about the latest gang chief murder and the headlines predict open gang warfare. That night the murdered man's gang meets and Dutch Schmidt announces to them that he is ready to take over the leadership. Speed Clancy backed by a small minority challenges him and insists on a gun battle. Although Johnny Schmidt tries to dissuade his brother, the two contestants put their guns on a table and at the drop of a bottle reach out and shoot. Speed is shot through the heart, and Dutch announces to the cowered gang that they will carry on a war to the death with Panelli's gang for killing their former chief, Blackie.

A week later, Dutch directs the hi-jacking of Wop Panelli's booze trucks and when Panelli arrives to settle the score, there is a pitched battle from which Dutch and Johnny walk unconcernedly away. The next night Paddy Dugan visits the Schmidt's apartment but the Schmidt's have an airtight alibi and Paddy warns them that one of these days they are going to slip up.

Later, Johnny stops at the Silver Slipper Night Club owned by his brother Dutch and waits around for his sweetheart, Mildred, a blues singer. She smiles to him from her spot on the floor and after the show comes to his table. Johnny takes her to her apartment and kisses her, but when he asks her when she is going to promise to marry him, she tells him soberly that as long as he is in the racket she won't become his wife. Johnny tells her he can't quit but when she tells him to choose between her and the racket, he decides to take her to another city and start a legitimate business. Dutch tries to convince Johnny that the gang won't let him go, but when Johnny cries he's tired of dodging dicks and bumping off people, Dutch shrugs his shoulders and promises to help Johnny. However, they have been overheard by Lefty, Speed Clancy's pal, who gets the gang together to prevent the Schmidt brothers from running off. Dutch learns of the mobilization and speeds to Mildred's apartment and urges his brother and Mildred to hurry out—immediately. It is too late, however, the gang arrives. Dutch gets Mildred out on the dumbwaiter, but Lefty shoots the lock from the door and cuts off the others' exit. Johnny is shot through the head. Dutch returns shot for shot but finally falls dead, and Paddy Dugan reads his newspaper and shakes his head over the end of the Schmidt brothers. They wanted money, but they paid an exorbitant price for tbeir ambition.

BIG GUY

Elizabeth Brooke File No. 9545

ENTERING the revolving door of the cafeteria, Jessie snatched her ticket witb accustomed ease and sidled into place in the throng that milled down the long counter. As she waited for her beef stew and mince pie she started in recognition of the tall lean boy in the grimy overalls. Her heart ached as she saw him sipping his coffee slowly to make it last as long as possible. He was about the same age as her brother Jim, and had the bluest eyes. She had seen him there before and always he looked so lean. She supposed he didn't have enough money for food these days of depression and as the counter boy handed her steaming stew across to her she felt she had no right to eat so much when he had nothing. Startled at her own temerity she dropped down into the vacant chair next to him and stammeringly explained that he'd think her fresh but she had a job and if her brother were hungry . . . Anyway she had beef stew, would he take the mince pie? It would go so well with his coffee and nobody was looking. She shifted the plate across to his chair before he could prevent her and while the raucous shouts of the counter men set up an accompaniment she saw how eagerly he ate the pie. It was companionable sitting here like this with him even if he didn't say a word. Suddenly he found his voice and in halting phrases told her how white it was of her to share her dinner. Jessie saw him look repeatedly toward the counter and she kept assuring him that nobody saw and even if they did it was all right for her to give it to him. The counter man kept shouting "Plate O' Wheats" and the big fellow looked distressed. He tried to ask her, where she worked but suddenly the counterman came over and asked him if he were so interested in his lady-friend that he'd forgotten about his order of wheats. It didn't pay, added the white-coated figure, although she sure was some looker. The boy's ears went scarlet. He'd been trying to figure out some way of speaking to her when she had come along and given him her pie. But as he found his tongue she was gone, her head bent very low. The boy rushed after her, but by the time he had waited for two fat men and a fussy old woman to pay their checks, she was nowhere in sight.

Back in the office, the girl typed furiously while she thought he must have felt she was trying to pick him up. Mr. Thompson dictated hour after hour and her shoulders sagged. At last he called a halt and as she put her things away and shuddered at the storm outside, he offered to take her home. Jessie shook her head but at length he persuaded her it was on his way and not a bit of trouble. Jessie saw they had passed her corner but Mr. Thompson assured her it was a mistake. Instead of turning, however, he took another road and swinging into a deserted lane, snapped off the lights and slid his arm around her. Jessie struggled fiercely against the descending mouth and stunned at the change in him, managed to get up against the horn and toot frantically. Thompson slewed her around in the seat and as Jessie saw headlights on the hill, she screamed loudly. Huge hands shut off her cries but gasping, Jessie flung open the door and stumbled to the road. It was the blue-eyed mechanic driving a service truck. He soothed her as she sobbed but when he heard about Thompson he swung her up to the high truck seat and strode determinedly to the car Thompson was trying to start. Jessie cried out to stop him. She heard a dull crack and as the truck rumbled on Jessie sobbed that now she wouldn't have a job. Shyly he told her he wouldn't worry about that. Queer how the dreary winter night looked cozy from where she sat huddled under the big truck's top with Plate O' Wheats. She grinned happily as she told him Ted Hughes was a nice name but she liked Plate O' Wheats better, and when he put one big paw on her arm she shyly laid her hand over it.

THE DUDE PROSPECTOR

Lawrence W. Rakes File No. 9047

RANCE could see from Bill's face that Betty had refused his proposal, and he felt sorry for Bill who had everything he wanted save Betty. Later, however, as they danced out on the halcony and Rance kissed Betty, he, too, told her of his love, and when Betty promised to marry him when he graduated from Harvard, Rance held her as if he would never let her go.

At the station Bill silently drove Betty home after she had unashamedly kissed Rance before the train crowds. Two months later, in response to a frantic telegram from his mother, Rance hired a plane and arrived one hour after his father, having lost his entire fortune in a stock market speculation, drew his last breath. There were just a few dollars left and some papers his father had left telling the location of an abandoned gold mine he believed to have about ten thousand dollars in diggings. With a set mouth Rance called on Betty and to her amazement informed her he had thought the whole thing through. He, a pauper, couldn't marry a millionaire's daughter. While Betty was protesting that his decision was absurd, Bill drove up. With a tremendous effort of will Rance made a sporting proposition. If he had ten thousand dollars he could buy an interest in a firm and be able to support Betty. He would go West to examine the mine. If at the end of the year he had not made ten thousand, he would leave the field to Bill. The three shook on the bargain that meanwhile Bill was not to make love to Betty, and Betty was to wait—one year.

Eleven months later Rance had gotten the last ounce of gold from the mine and he estimated that at most he had eight thousand. There wasn't the remotest prospect of his being able to make two thousand more in less than a month. He would fail. Betty's letters had been encouraging, but Rance wouldn't go back on his word. After all Bill was wealthy, he loved Betty and would make her happy. As his Ford chugged across the sandy desert, Rance saw something dark move. Finding a man, throat parched with thirst and feet bleeding from the cacti that had pierced his worn shoes, Rance gently brought the half-dead man back to life. A day passed before the stranger could talk. The sensitive nostrils of the stranger, Albert Hartley, quivered as he explained that for days he had been living on grasshoppers and had about given up. Weakly he explained that he was a scientist who had strayed from his party, at work on Sunday feature articles about a lost city. Into the night Rance and Hartley discussed minerology, geology and law but the next day when Rance, who had not exchanged his gold yet lest he start a rush on the Sage Plains emptied his treasure into a sack, he had some misgivings over the stranger he had befriended. Later, as Rance was packing his things to go to Beckley, the nearest town, the radio told of a reward of twenty-five hundred for the capture of one Dargon, a bank robber who had killed the president and cashier. Suddenly Rance was looking into Dargon's automatic, and his joke was frozen on his lips. Cursing himself for a fool, Rance helplessly watched the man whose life he had saved tie his hands and thrust him into the car. and Dargon explained he was taking Rance with him to help with the car in case of trouble. A few miles outside of Beckley,—poof—and then coyotes for Rance. It was Rance's life or Dargon's. Bitter thoughts filled Rance's head as they jogged along and as they reached a hill, Rance brought his feet "accidentally" down on the bandit's still swollen right foot. A sudden twist of the wheel and the car catapulted down a hill. Dazed, Rance worked to free himself of his bonds before Dargon regained consciousness. Then, as the bandit stirred, Rance tied him up. Hours later Rance had lit a fire which attracted one of the airplanes searching for Dargon. The reward made Rance's required sum complete, and as he walked into Betty's parlor and took her in his arms, he thought, "Poor Bill!"

RENEGADE

Myrtle Marsh Vallier File No. 8361

TUGGING vainly at the chain of her dog as a big hound threatened to grow too friendly, Zoura began to grow panicky until a tall fine looking man approached and drove off the strange dog. Before she coud thank him, however, he had hurried off and telling the story to her brother later, Zoura learned tbat the man rarely spoke to strangers. He was a squaw-man, had married a half-breed Esquimau girl, Ula. All during her visit Zonra wondered about the strange man, and when she was called one day to help the man's youngest child, Bobby, she had an opportunity to learn more of the story. Zoura, a New York nurse spending one of her infrequent vacations with her brother, a Nome doctor, was astonished by the neatness of the house, the collection of fine books, and the soft intelligence of the man's wife, and her heart ached as she saw the child could not live. But when the man, summoned from the mines, came in and lifted the child with an infinite pity and tenderness, and comforted his little wife, Zoura wondered the more. Two nights later Bobby died and after doing what she could, Zoura, who was leaving for New York found the man sitting hopelessy alone. It was then, very softly, that he told her his story.

Bob had been a prominent New York lawyer whose life was absorbed in his sister Coleen. Soft and gentle, she inspired a protective attitude and it wasn't until Bob fell in love with Nora, a fascinating woman, that he had negected his sister. It was then she had fallen in love with Bill Graham, and when Bob frowned on the match she reminded him in a hurt voice that she didn't think Nora was the wife for him, but she didn't interfere. Troubled by her attitude, Bob said no more and shortly after, Coleen and Bill were married. Absorbed in his own affair, Bob took for granted that Coleen's happiness was genuine, but as he was leaving on his honeymoon, Coleen murmured as she kissed him that she hoped his marriage would be more happy than hers was. It was a great shock to Bob and as he clung to her the guests laughingly called to Coleen to stop detaining the bridegroom. Even Nora teased Bob about his perturbation and when he returned to his practice, Bob was the more concerned by the knowledge that Coleen was going to have a baby and now that she needed Bill most he rarely came home nights. Important cases and worry about Coleen kept Bob away from home and always Nora would assure him that she understood and besides she spent her time shopping and at her mother's. Then one night Bob came home and before his shocked brain could register the disorder, clothes strewn about, house dark, he found Nora's note telling him she had eloped with Bill. Anguish at the realization that he would never hold Nora's body again blinded him for a moment, but the discovery of Coleen's heart breaking acceptance of her desertion just when she needed her husband most, broke Bob up. He never left her for a moment but though he reasoned with her always she hoped that she and her baby would die, and the doctors shook their heads.

When Bob heard at last that Coleen had gone and the baby lived only a few hours, he dashed madly from the house and wandered for hours distrait. A chance headline reporting a gold strike in Nome gave him a direction and drawing his money from the bank, he dazedly booked passage for the gold city. There he drank himself ill and when he tried to eat his stomach collapsed. The kindly Doctor took care of him but as soon as he recovered he made his way to the saloon and began another siege of drinking. Remembrance of Nora drove him mad and he sank lower and lower. When he recovered from one of his debauches he found that Ula, a little half-breed Esquimau who had been studying school teaching had found him lying in the street and to save him from freezing to death had taken him to her house. Bob laughed sardonically when in a frightened voice she begged him not to drink so much, but when a letter that Nora had written was forwarded to him, telling him she had discovered her mistake and wanted to return to him, Bob seized Ula in his arms and refused to release her until the frightened little half-breed promised to marry him and save him from his divorced wife. But married, Bob gave scant attention to his wife and youngsters until one of the frequent illness of his youngest child, Bobby, awakened him to his own neglect. The doctor's grave explanation that the child's weakness was a result of its father's bad living, and the added information that the uncomplaining Ula was slowly dying from the climate, brought Bob to his senses. Thereafter his tenderness to the adoring little Ula was marked. He had at last thrown off Nora's hold.

Two years later when Zoura returned to Nome, she found Bob recovering from the death of his wife, and preparing to take his two children to New York with him to re-establish his law practice. Holding Zoura's eyes with his own, Bob asked if sometime in New York he couldn't look her up, and she softly answered, "Yes."

APE MAN

Max Lechner File No. 9231

WHEN Dr. Stone invites two brother savants to witness the birth of a human child from the mating of two experimental apes, he brings down upon himself a storm of protests but he has sworn his fellow scientists to secrecy.

Years later the pertly pretty Bella is chiding two friends, Jack and Larry, who are continually fighting over her. She reminds them that they are to keep training regulations and the trio grown suddenly serious discuss the difficulties the Alma Mater is going to have in the track meet. When the coach comes up Jack sarcastically suggests that he ought to get Tom Stone out for the team. Larry is chiding Jack for being jealous of Bella's friendship with the honor student when Tom himself comes up, sensing that he has been under discussion. Bella, realizing the sensitive lad has been hurt, walks off with him and he explains to her that all his life he had been brought up sheltered from all outside contacts by his uncle, Dr. Stone. Because of his ugliness he has never known kindness from any but Bella and the Doctor, and it is the former who induces him to develop himself physically. At the track try-outs, Tom is a sensation but when he returns to his uncle's home he confesses he has been troubled by dizzy spells and continuous pains. The scientist examines the boy, and a much agitated Dr. Stone explains to his comrade, Dr. Cobb, that what he has dreaded is coming to pass. The athletic workouts plus the girl Bella are awakening animal instincts in the brilliant boy strong enough to deform his body. Gravely Dr. Stone explains to the boy that his father was not normal and unless Tom gives up all excitement there is the danger that he may inherit his father's characteristics.

At college, Tom's sudden decision to quit when the college is depending upon him arouses a furore and taunted by Bella, Tom enters and wins a contest. Exhaustion overtakes him in the locker room and when Jack maliciously tries to 'bring him to" with a pail of ice water, Tom, reverting to an animalistic state strangles him to death and sinks back into a coma. The unaccountable murder is hushed and it is assumed that the prostrate Tom who does not suspect his own culpability, was a victim too of a maniac. Bella working in a professor's laboratory learns through a telephone message of an autopsy to be performed on Jack. The horrified girl unwittingly upsets an inflammable liquid which soon sets the laboratory on fire. Screaming she rushes from the room, but all escape is cut off. From the tower room she cries for help and when she has been given up, Tom rushes to an adjoining roof, scrambles up the flag pole and swings to the flaming building. Badly burned himself, he carries out the unconscious girl.

Lying in the doctor's house he wonders why his bandages are not removed, but overhears Dr. Stone explain that in everything but brain Tom has changed into an ape. The last desperate remedy of Dr. Stone is to reduce Tom's brain to that of an animal. Bella calls, Tom's keeper bungles in his job and Tom kills the man. When Bella enters she retreats horrifiedly from the mouthing beast. Tripping over the prostrate body of the keeper, she strikes her head in falling, and Tom lifting her in his arms is overpowered by desire for her. He places her on a couch but as his hand reaches toward her he is shocked by his own hairy paw and turns to get help for the injured Bella. Dr. Stone entering the room sees the bodies of the keeper and Bella and mistaking Tom's inarticulate cries fears that Tom is advancing to attack him too. He shoots and Tom dying, murmurs, "Help . . . Bella . . . injured." But Larry is already at the injured girl's side while Dr. Stone holds Tom's body in his arms.

LADIES IN LOVE

Isaac I. Stutler File No. 9508

ARRIVING in China to attend in person to his father's rice exporting business, Tom meets for the first time in many years, his father's partner Mike Logan, and is astonished to find that little Blanche Logan has grown up into a lovely blonde young person. On their fathers' rice plantation, Tom sees Blanche constantly and learns that since their childhood she has been cherishing the idea that someday they will be married. Tom is somewhat dismayed to find that Logan shares the hope too, and when they sail for home, Tom and Blanche are engaged to be married. Jack, one of the ship's officers who sits at their table, falls in love with Blanche, but dares not speak since she is already betrothed. At the same time, while on deck watching some of the passengers play quoits, Tom assists May, one of the passengers to take a splinter from her finger, and as their eyes meet, Tom realizes that this is the girl he loves. However, it is not until a terrific storm rages and the ship strikes a reef that things begin to happen. In the confusion, Tom, Blanche and May find refuge in the same boat and drift out to sea, while Jack, running to Blanche's stateroom to save her life finds her gone, but her father caught under a fallen beam. Jack rescues the elder Logan and their lifeboat is picked up by one of the ships summoned by the S.O.S. When the survivors are counted it is found that only Tom, Blanche and May are lost. Jack, in his anxiety for the girl he loves charters a plane and scours the high seas in his efforts to find her. Long after everyone else has given the trio up for lost, Jack continues his search.

Meanwhile the three in question have brought their lifeboat to an island and after many futile attempts and volunteering of all the information they have ever gleaned about castaways, the trio get a fire started by rubbing dry twigs together. Tom guards the two girls while they sleep, but Blanche realizes that Tom and May love each other. As the days pass and hope of rescue seems dimmer, Blanche feels that she has no right to keep the other two apart and when she overhears Tom tell May that they must protect Blanche, the little blonde girl vanishes into the woods, and falls into the hands of savages who had thus far been kept off by the castaways' bullets. Tom and May are horrified and leaving May the one gun with instructions to use it rather than fall into the cannibals' hands, Tom sets out and in the dead of night rescues Blanche from the clearing where she is being held by the Prince who has won her as his spoils. Carrying Blanche in his arms, Tom returns to May with the savages on the trail. May's fire is discovered by Jack and when he lands his plane he terrifies the blacks and rescues the trio.

Several weeks later two happy pairs kneel at the altar and the scene dissolves as Tom seals May's lips, and Jack kisses the fragile little Blanche.

THE MAD BOND

Joseph Sawchyn File No. 9539

THE son of wealthy Ukranian peasants, Ivan spends every spare hour away from his classes at the University studying, and the other students try to induce him to join them at their pleasures. One day he receives twenty dollars from home as a gift and he is persuaded to accompany a group of students to the Monte Carlo, a cabaret. The gaiety and free living make his head whirl, but suddenly his eyes are fastened on a beautiful young girl who is serving cognac to the boisterous students. They all call to her, and Kitty seems impervious to the students' hands groping toward her. Ivan stares in fascination and she brings him drinks until the whole of the twenty dollars has been spent. The next morning Ivan awakens at home with a splitting headache and as he plunges his head into icy water to clear it, a kaleidoscope of memories of Kitty's silvery laugh and eager kisses passes through his mind. Thereafter he spends all his nights at the Monte Carlo to be near Kitty, selling his books and clothes to pay for his evenings. However, when Kitty tires of him, she ignores him entirely and Ivan, not jealous of the men who embrace her, is content just to be near her. One night he receives a telegram ordering his immediate return home, but Ivan instead goes to Monte Carlo and is dismayed at not seeing Kitty. He pleads with one of the other girls who makes him buy round after round of drinks, delighting in his agony before she finally reveals Kitty's address. Ivan waits outside her doors for hours and sees Kitty go out in a large hat with ostrich feathers. She smiles sardonically and hurries down the street with Ivan following desperately. At length, however, he loses her, and returns after hours of searching to his room. Despondently he stuffs an accumulation of telegrams in his pocket and after days of searching for Kitty he collapses. When he comes to, he is being tended by Kitty who with an unfathomable expression on her face tells him that the newspapers are carrying the story of the death of his father. She promises to go away with Ivan if he sells his father's estate and Ivan, who has always loved the spacious grounds, realizes about half of what the beautiful lands are worth and hurries from the city to the hisses of the countryfolk. He joins Kitty and together they leave the city. Ivan is helpless in his overwhelming passion for Kitty and the days with her are the happiest of his life. One morning, however, he awakes to find a note from Kitty telling him she has fled with his money. She tells him she is unwilling to see him but asks him to write. Some day, she says, she may return. Ivan is distracted, but he dares not violate her directions and he takes teaching exams and accepts a post that no one else will take in an isolated mountain town. For five years he labors among the people who worship him and once a year he writes a letter to Kitty but receives no response. Then, one day, an automobile pulls up the dirt road and from it steps a feverish eyed, rouged Kitty. Ivan looks at her in wonder but in a broken voice she tells him that she is dying, and having given her youth and beauty to other men she has come to die at his side, if he will let her. Ivan cares for her tenderly till the end and at length returns to the continent to begin life anew.

DOCTOR'S ORDERS

THE Barry Bates household is giving a party. They invite Bill Toll, an eligible bachelor. Upon being ushered into the cocktail room where the other guests had already assembled, Bill soon finds Ina Fulton because she is still wearing brown, much to his dislike. At the dance that night Ina appears in a brown tulle gown, but Bill forgets this color grievance he has against Ina when he has her in his arms dancing. A sudden dizziness overtakes Bill while he is leading Ina in a waltz. His complaints arouse no outward show of sympathy from her. Her indifference and spit-fire manner make Bill cut short his week-end stay, and the following morning he returns home. Dizzy spells come over him frequently so he goes to see a doctor. The sight of the nurse who takes him into the doctor's office makes him jump nervously. The doctor uses the stethoscope on Bill, then the x-ray, and then the fluoroscope. Bill faints under this last examination. The doctor's verdict recommends an exploratory operation as soon as possible.

Discouraged, Bill asks his best friend, Fred Johnson, to come over to his home to take things over. Just as Fred advises Bill to consult Dr. Fulton, Ina's father and a great psychologist, Tomson, the butler, announces Miss Fulton who has come to see how Bill is faring. The bachelor, thinking he is going to die under the operation, asks Ina to marry him so that he can will his wealth to her. In the same abrupt, cold, business-like manner that Bill proposes to her, Ina accepts the proposition and leaves immediately to shop for a ring. She hurries to keep a luncheon appointment with her father, and tells him all about her engagement. Dr. Fulton decides to investigate the seriousness of Bill's illness and pays his future son-in-law a professional visit. That night he informs his daughter that Bill's trouble is purely a mental condition caused by his fear of falling in love. He calls up Fred Johnson to come over to his home immediately. After Ina retires, the two men plan to cure Bill. Coached by Dr. Fulton on what to say and how, Fred visits Bill the next day and urges him to delay the operation until Dr. Fulton has given him several treatments. Bill consents to this and to giving Fred permission to take Ina out and make things more pleasant for her. Fred goes directly to the telephone, calls up the florist and orders flowers to be sent up to Miss Fulton. Bill stands by so surprised he cannot talk. Then Fred orders a diamond bracelet at Bill's jeweler and has them deliver it to Miss Fulton right away. Lastly, he calls up Miss Fulton and makes a date with her for that night. Before Bill has a chance to say anything, Fred leaves to keep his date with Ina.

A week goes by before Ina comes again to see Bill. All she talks about is Fred, the flowers and gifts he sends her, and his understanding attention toward her. When Fred dines with Bill that same night, he talks enthusiastically about Ina. Believing that Ina and Fred are in love with each other, Bill decides to go on with the operation because he has not much to lose now if he dies. Ina comes to make final arrangements about the will. She declines the assistance of Bill's lawyer because Fred has already offered to lend his aid and advice. Bill's jealousy turns into a rage. He throws a book across the room, orders his car, and whisks Ina down to City Hall where they get married. As the chauffeur speeds toward the pier to catch the next steamer which is leaving in fifteen minutes for a cruise around the world, Bill in the back of the car, holds Ina in his arms and presses his lips tightly against hers.

DISGUISED FOR LOVE

STRICKEN ill while walking in his garden, the king is carried into his hushed chateau and before he dies, entrusts the affairs of state into the hands of the crown Prince. All through the colorful coronation ceremony, Robert's thoughts are with his beloved father, and at length, fleeing from the disturbing memories, Robert journeys to the United States. Pressed for funds, the Prince accepts a position as a hotel doorman and is seen by Julia Walpole, a debutante. In her efforts to meet him, Julia offers the attendant a ride in her roadster and rebuffed, determines to take a position as maid in the hotel where Robert is employed. Fortified by the understanding of her mother, Julia braves the fury of her snobbish father and her sister Patricia, who is herself not unimpressed by the aristocratic looking doorman. Robert is startled as he recognizes Julia in her maid's uniform and he stares after her as she drives off in a cab he has hailed for her. The following night, however, touched by her loveliness, he speaks and in the days that follow, he asks her to theater with him. When, at last he tells her of his love, Julia confesses her identity and induces Robert to visit her at her own home. Despite her mother's graciousness, however, the flirtatious glances of her sister, and the outburst of her father when he realizes his guest is a doorman, mortify Julia. However, when Robert reveals his lineage to Julia, her father embraces his daughter's titled fiance, and immediately launches an elaborate program for a wedding at St. Patrick's. Attended by Robert's sister and brother, visiting from abroad, Julia is joined in wedlock to the man she loves. Later, at the sumptuous dinner, Mr. Walpole is dismayed by the unseemly antics of his trusted butler who has, for the first time, imbibed too much, but Julia and Robert are wholly amused by the commotion.

Accompanied by her husband's royal family, Julia returns to the country and she is received with the pomp due her exalted status. In the ancient chateau overlooking gardens and a wide expanse of lake, Julia happily clings to Robert and exclaims she is afraid she may wake to find all this a dream. Several days later, Robert takes his bride on a visit to a neighboring Indian Chief, and the colorfully costumed natives throw flowers before the path of the royal car. That evening in the garden, Indian movies and an elaborate show are performed for the honored guests and Julia is carried away by the ceremony. However, just as Julia is beginning to feel overcome by grandeur, Robert, in response to a request from his host mounts the platform in the solemn guise of a holy man, only to break suddenly into a tap dance which restores humor to the situation. Thereafter the stiffness of the evening is abandoned, and as Julia returns to the chateau at the side of her husband, she is seized in his arms to receive a kiss wholly American in its fervor. "Happy?" he asks. "Happy," she answers.

THE PRISONER IS GUILTY

Amy Carrington File No. 8061

EDGAR knew that he had antagonized Maud by telling her he wasn't certain he could be present at her coming out party. He knew she couldn't understand. Having had all the money she had wanted all her life, she couldn't realize that the only thing that kept Edgar from asking her to marry him was the feeling that it wouldn't be fair to ask her to give up luxury to share his penurious existence. Now Mr. Ayleson was asking him to come to dinner the night of Maud's dance. More than anything Edgar wanted to go to the dance but Ayleson was the power behind the broadcasting company, and if Edgar could convince Ayleson to give him a contract, Edgar wouldn't have to worry about money troubles. If he could get that contract, he could ask Maud to marry him!

Edgar thought Ayleson would never finish talking. He knew he was going to get that contract the moment Ayleson greeted him with that marked cordiality. He couldn't leave, and all the while he knew that Maud was thinking he didn't care enough to come to her ball. But at last, the contract signed, his career set, Edgar rushed to Maud's house. Maud's father, smiling at his breathlessness, told him Maud was in the garden, but prepared to tell her of his love, Edgar was stunned at the sight of John Hilton putting an engagement ring on Maud's finger and drawing her into his arms. Brokenly, Edgar dug his fists in his pockets and turned away, not suspecting that Maud, believing that he didn't care enough for her to come to her party, had tried to cover her own hurt by accepting the love John always seemed so ready to lavish upon her.

Four nights later, Edgar, a house guest at the home of some friends, dozed in the library, and hearing a noise in the adjoining room, was stunned to discover John Hilton robbing the safe. Desperate at being discovered, John brought the butt of his revolver down hard on Edgar's head, stole the money he needed to cover a gambling debt, and made his escape leaving Edgar lying unconscious before the empty safe. When Edgar was found and pressed for an explanation, he refused to say anything fearful Maud might be hurt at the knowledge of her fiance's guilt. Even when in court he realized that the jury would be moved by the true story, Edgar looked over at Maud and said nothing while the jury pronounced, "We find the prisoner guilty, as charged."

But that night when John came to see Maud, she turned from his embrace and said she realized that she loved someone else and wanted the engagement broken. John tried to hold her to her promise, needing the money which she would have brought him, and finally realizing that he had lost her he grovelled, told her that he needed her, wanted her, but Maud knew now she had never loved anyone but Edgar.

John, pressed by his creditors now that he could no longer promise that Maud would settle for his debts, attempted suicide, and as he was carried to the hospital, he confessed that Edgar was being held for his guilt. Freed after a year of his sentence had been served, Edgar discovered that Ayleson, hearing of his case, was still willing to employ him, and as he opened the door of his apartment, a soft form glided into his arms. With his lips against her hair he murmured, "Maud, Maud." There was no need for words.

NEAR HAPPINESS

SEEKING refuge out of the storm at the Crowell house, young Albert Simpson falls in love with Carolyn who is demurely embroidering before the fire. However, although Carolyn responds to his love, her older sister, Fay, feels that the child is too young to be thinking of love and frowns upon their meetings. Before Albert leaves for law school, he asks Carolyn to marry him and she promises she will when he graduates and they are both of age. However, when letters come for her, Fay disturbed by what she considers a case of puppy love, orders Carolyn not to answer them. Bill, the hired man, notices his favorite's woe, and when she tearfully confides in him, he offers to act as intermediary. For several months Carolyn corresponds with Albert through Bill, but Fay suspects and angered, determines to find out how her sister is eluding her. Often Carolyn is on the point of throwing herself upon her sister's mercies but each time she is discouraged by Fay's coldness and when Albert writes that he is coming home on a short vacation and can't wait to see her, she trembles with fear. Bill continues to help the young lovers, but Fay learns of this and summarily dismisses the faithful hired man. Thereafter, she confiscates all Albert's letters without allowing the worrying Carolyn to suspect that Albert is still writing. Moreover, Abert receives a letter purporting to have come from Carolyn telling him she has realized her mistake and it is best that they no longer see or write to each other. When no further mail comes from her he anxiously comes to see her only to learn that she has gone away with her sister. Meanwhile, sent to college, Carolyn grieves over Albert's faithlessness and the years pass. One day, however, as she is shopping in her home town she meets Albert. They look at each other with all the denied longing of the years, but when they learn how sadly they have been misled by Carolyn's sister, it is too late for Albert is to be married the following day to a girl who loves him. Neither of them can feel they have a right to ruin the life of Albert's fiancee by breaking the engagement on the wedding day, and with a hand shake they part, they who loved each other so Albert devotes himself to making Sylvia happy and to try to forget Carolyn, but Sylvia dies giving birth to a child. Shocked by her loss, Albert moves from the house and establishes his residence in another town, where he brings up the baby. However, the thought of Carolyn is never far from his mind and he determines to find her and find the happiness that has been so long denied them. Arrived in town, however, he learns that she has at length found love with Joseph Henderson and has just been married. Consoled by the thought that Carolyn will not realize that he has come for her at last, Albert returns home and as he bends wistfully over his child, he realizes how near they were to happiness.

AS Dick Howard stops his car for a traffic signal, Mary Grant sees him nod to a woman in a taxi and as the cars start Mary is dismayed at the realization that the man riding with Elsie Connel is her own father. The next morning Thomas Grant tells Mary he didn't realize what a fool he was until she caught him and having paid Elsie a large sum of money in return for her promise of silence, his great fear is that his wife may learn of his affair. Seeing how earnest her father is, Mary understands his infatuation for the other woman and promises to keep his secret from his wife.

However, Dick Howards loses a large sum of money playing cards, and threatened with the exposure of various fraudulent activities, he turns to blackmail Mary. Realizing that it is true that if her father's affair is revealed it will mean public disgrace, and that her mother will suffer as well as her father, Mary gives Dick the money he requires.

Shortly afterwards her father is tendered a dinner by some friends and Mary meets John Brennan, a law student, who as the son of one of Grant's friends compliments Mary upon her father's rise. Mary bites her lip at the realization of how close her father was to shame rather than honor, and as she dances with John she is attracted to him. They ride and golf together and when John tells her he loves her, they are engaged to be married the following summer when he shall have graduated from law school. However, Dick continues to exact hush money from Mary and threatens to reveal the story in time to break off Mary's engagement. Her father's business difficulties make it impossible for Mary to get financial help from him and she dares not ask John, who suspects that something is troubling her.

Mary comes to tell Dick that she has been unable to get the required money, but another has visited him before. Elsie, in love with Dick has grown jealous of his meetings with Mary and has emptied a vial of poison into a glass of rye. Half-convinced by Dick's explanation that he is only using Mary to get enough money so he can take Elsie abroad, Elsie escapes when the bell rings and seeing Mary enter changes her mind about getting the poison out of the way. Dick is infuriated by Mary's confession that she was unable to get the money and he shakes her. However, during the altercation he drinks the poison Elsie had brought and to Mary's horror falls dead. Mary rushes screaming from the room and finds protection in the arms of John who has, pursuing his suspicions that all is not well with Mary, gotten an explanation from Mary's maid, and was coming to Dick's apartment to settle a score.

However, Mary has left her purse behind and is indicted for murder. John defends her brilliantly and keeps Elsie's name from the case on the condition that she go abroad as she had planned. As a result of the case John establishes a reputation as a criminal lawyer, the blackmailing of Dick Howards ceases to be a menace, and with the assurance that her parents' marriage has been saved, Mary marries John,

IN a drunken fit Godfrey Davies, irritated by the crying of his new born infant whom he suspects is not his own child, gives it to his outlaw friend, Claude Stone. Beaten and abused for her supposed infidelity, Mrs. Davies at last escapes from home with a Salvation Army group; and when she is killed on the battlefield while attending to the wounded, her son, Jeffrey Davies is the only one to mourn her passing; for Godfrey, long remorseful, has been slain by Claude for his attempt to kidnap the child. Years later at a family reunion in Shadow Valley, the scene of these events, Jeffrey Davies tells this story to his grandson, Everett Davies and his friends, Warren Rockford, and Forster Burton, also medical students. Inspired to view the historical spots connected with old Jeffrey's past, the three don their cowboy suits and ride off. Suddenly they forget their search as they gaze at three beautiful horsewomen, Constance Shard, Helen Jannings, and Edith Sirrell, approaching them. The girls, who are also vacationing here, dismount. They all become friendly at the little nook to which Constance leads them. The horses wander away and with the dusk comes the realization that they are lost. The brush road nearby tempts them. Forster asks Warren for a cigarette, and when Helen screams at the sight of a figure with a gun dimly seen through the brush at the side of the road, Warren throws his silver cigarette case at it. Forster runs in the direction of the figure, and when he turns back, finds that he has been separated from the others. After futile shouting and aimless wandering, he drops exhausted. The others, in the meantime, have entered a small stone cabin where they are offered refreshments by a beautiful girl and then suddenly clapped into a dungeon. Claude Stone who has spent many years in prison and been hounded by the law even in this retreat, takes this means of revenging himself upon society. While the girls weep, the boys prowl about in the dark trying to find a window or a door. Suddenly there is a scratching sound and their hostess, Thelma, whispers that she will help them out in the morning when Claude goes hunting. The latter who has overheard her, drags her away. Her screams and Warren's prostrate form attract the attention of Jeffrey who is staring at the picture inside the cigaette case he has just picked up. He realizes they are on the right track when he remembers Everett's previous admiration of it at the house. Claude hears them approaching the house and accosts them with cocked gun; but Thelma shoots him before he can pull the trigger. Jeffrey, who sees in her a resemblance to his mother, questions her; and Thelma, remembering the conversation overheard years before between Claude and a stranger (Godfrey Davies) (when the latter had tried in vain to regain her) now produces her identification papers from a rock behind the fireplace. Ill from abuse and intimidation by Claude, she is now taken home by her family. There Everett announces his engagement to Constance to whom he had proposed in the dungeon. While Jeffrey accompanies Helen and Edith home, Warren comforts the reclining Thelma. But Constance and Everett gaze at each other oblivions to everything; for they have decided to be married as soon as Everett receives his medical degree. Everyone laughs as they forget the summons to dinner in their fond embrace.

AMERICAN MILLIONS

Mary Louise Rodgers File No. 9522

PARVENUS. the Boswells are anxious to marry their daughter Signa to a foreign title and they violently break up Signa's affair with young Dick Linden, taking her with them to Deauville, France. There they meet a former acquaintance, Mrs. Rayboul, a widow, who introduces them to Forrest Madsen. In a confidential mood, Madsen informs Mr. Boswell that he is an Earl traveling incognito, and the Americans immediately design to encourage Madsen's attentions to their daughter.

At the Casino, Signa, trying to forget Dick Linden gambles for high stakes and is flushed by the excitement of winning. Suddenly she sees Dick watching her and with a cry she crosses to his side. They go out to the balcony together, reminisce, and after a warm embrace plan to meet the following day. Dick takes Signa to a polo game and Madsen, seeing them, is so upset that he strikes his horse instead of the ball and is carried from the field. However, when Signa asks why Dick has come here he refuses to reveal his motives, and scorning his plea that she trust him, Signa orders him to take her home.

That night at the Casino, Signa urged on by Madsen loses large sums of money and attends a wild party upon Madsen's yacht. The next morning her father meets her gambling debts but warns her that hereafter he will not be responsible for her losses. Whereupon Signa borrows from the widow Rayboul and worried by her continued losses goes to the races with Madsen. On the way back he asks her to marry him and when she refuses, he produces her I. O. U.'s bought from Mrs. Rayboul, and Signa is forced into an enagement. The Boswells are delighted that their daughter has captured an incognito Duke and give an elaborate engagement party to which the widow is escorted by Dick Linden. Signa pales at sight of him at her party and later sees Madsen take Mrs. Rayboul in his arms and assure her that he is marrying Signa only for her money. Signa weeps on a garden bench and Dick steps forward to comfort her only to be ordered away by Madsen.

Meanwhile Madsen's valet visiting Linden's gets into an argument over drinks. Confidentially he has explained that his master is the Earl of Nottingham and when Linden's valet calls him a liar the two men fight and are separated by the arrival of Linden who, the next afternoon calls on Madsen and produces credentials to show that since he is the grandson of the deceased Earl of Nottingham the title is his and not Madsen's a grand-nephew.

Linden is lionized as he is revealed to society as an Earl and Signa is dismayed when Dick flirts outrageously with the widow. Mrs. Boswell immediately tries to fix matters and when she learns about the notes assures Signa that her father will take care of the I.O.U. if she can only win back Dick's love. The wealthy Boswells thereupon plan an airtrip to Paris and invite six couples. A storm arises and the plane is forced down the only one hurt being Signa. Madsen and Dick rush to her side but the latter gets there first and calls her endearing names. Dick induces Madsen to sell him Signa's notes and when he rushes to Signa's apartment, embracing her and telling her of his love, she shyly reveals that she never lost consciousness but she liked having Dick kiss her. He does, in earnest.

KID ACE

J. A. Harrington File No. 8277

WHEN Frank wanted anything he took it, and the fact that frequently his spoils resulted in his being brought before a judge didn't stop him. At fifteen Frank decided he wanted a bicycle. Since his hard-working mother couldn't afford to humor him, he stole one from Mr. Grant's bicycle store. A few days later, calmly riding around, he was caught, haled before a judge, and despite his mother's pleas was sent to a reformatory for six years. Undaunted, Frank made two friends, Nate and Pat and gambled with them in secret. The unreformed trio planned activities for their release and although Frank had a few more years to serve he boastfully assured his pals he'd get out before them. His chance came when his mother died. Frank was permitted, under escort, to attend the funeral. On the way back, he dived from the train as it was going over a bridge. Eluding the police watching the banks of the river, Frank crept to the door of Grant's bicycle store, and with his finger in his coat pocket ordered Grant to put up his hands. He made the intimidated store-owner divest himself of his clothes, got the fellow's own gun, and cold-bloodedly shot down the man who had gotten him sentenced to the reformatory. In Grant's clothes Frank, called Kid Ace since a card cut to determine which of the three would be leader, had given Frank the Ace of Hearts, went to New York.

In a speakeasy Kid Ace picked out the most prosperous looking racketeer, one Pete, learned that he was head of a dope racket and that his "speed" was Kitty. Kid Ace went after Kitty, picked her up one night, and made love to her. He gave her the Ace of Hearts, and Kitty, who was only Pete's moll because of his money, lost her heart to the reckless Frank who was using her for his own purposes. In his apartment, Frank told Kitty how much he cared and got her drunk enough to spill what she knew about Pete's latest haul. With Nate and Pat, Frank hi-jacked Pete's truck, and escaped. Frowning and cursing Pete knew someone had double-crossed him but couldn't lay his hands on the guilty person, while Kitty, sick with shame realized how Frank had used her. But Pete was psychologist enough to know that the hi-jackers would come back for the rest of the haul and he laid a trap. Dividing the spoils, Frank, Nate and Pat drew cards, low man to go back for the rest. Nate went and was shot down. In their apartment Pat and Frank impatiently decided to find out what was keeping Nate, but Kitty, having realized she loved Frank, came to warn him about the trap. Pete followed her and knew then who gave him away. He bided his time until Kitty came to his apartment, then forced her to make a rendezvous with Frank and just as they entered a night club, guns were dug in their backs and they were marched to a back wall. However, Pat arrived, and gave the Kid time to turn the tables. The Kid gave Pete the works and went home with Kitty and Pat. However, the law awaited them there. The Kid went down under police bullets and Pat and Kitty escaped. Kitty bought a paper and wept as she read of Kid Ace's death. In her hand she crushed a card. It was the Ace of Hearts, the Kid had given her.

MURDER BY CHANCE

Marie E. Stehman File No. 8331

IT was a perfect working arrangement. Dick did most of the research work, and Bill concentrated on the trying of the cases. Bill and Dick had thus complemented each other all through law school, and their friendship went beyond their law partnership. Bill had always been popular, with men and women, and Dick more studious and reserved more frequently attended the dances Bill insisted that he appear at, stag. But when Jane Terry came into the office to arrange about the sale of some property, Dick felt his pulse quicken. All the while he arranged her business for her, he wondered how he might ask to see her again. And then Bill came in. Enthusiastically he greeted Jane, and as Dick saw her eyes light up, his heart sank. Together they told him about how they had both hailed the same taxi on a rainy day. Bill had gallantly given up his turn, and with a return of courtesy, Jane had offered him a place in "her" cab. Both had wanted to speak but the unconventionality of the meeting had constrained them. Jane had shaken her head whimsically at his request to see her again and had sent him on his way. Now it was different. Poor Dick didn't have a chance. Bill swept Jane off her feet. But they were too independent, both of them, not to quarrel frequently. More than once Dick banished the thought as unworthy that Bill and Jane might split up so he'd have a chance. Thereafter Dick never took a girl to the affairs their crowd gave and he just smiled at the jokes of his friends. Bill guessed how Dick felt about Jane, but there was nothing he could do about it. Then, one night when the whole crowd was going to the opening of a lodge out of town, Bill had to try a case in the state capitol. At the last minute he called Jane who had set her heart on going and who disappointedly reminded Bill it wasn't the first appointment he had broken. Glumly Bill set off, while Dick, dressing to go to the lodge called Jane and said he'd call for her if she still wanted to go.

Meanwhile Bill, distressed over the quarrel with Jane, managed to get back late that night. He called and found she had gone without him. Driving recklessly through the night, he found Dick had taken Jane and self-pity seized him as he considered he had been wronged by the girl he loved and his best friend. Dick resented his inference and as the two men almost came to blows, Jane took Dick's arm and asked him to take her home. The road wound through a deserted section and as Dick said he shouldn't have asked her, Jane reminded him they had done nothing wrong, and Bill had acted jealously and unbecomingly. Jane was just commenting on the first house they had reached on the road when Bill's horn sounded behind them. There was a sharp crack, Dick slumped over on Jane's shoulder and the car crashed into a tree. Bill stopped, got help, but the doctor announced after a careful examination that Dick had been dead before the crash. There was a dent in his left temple, the side which Bill passed in his car. Evidence pointed to Bill's guilt. The quarrel, the lonely road. But at length, through a dent on his fender, the young lawyer proved that a blood stained stone had been the instrument of murder. His tire had picked it up as he sped by, sent it spinning, and it had killed Dick. Bill was freed and Jane, a slim, pale, trembling Jane put her hand gently in his as he was released.

FLYERS

WITH the rhythm of tramping feet sounding in her head, Hope Hamilton finds the social round distracting and against the entreaties of her wealthy father she enlists as a Red Cross nurse. Overseas, she tries vainly to harden herself against the suffering that is everywhere prevalent, and her work at the hospital base is a constant torment. Triumphing over nerves that shriek at the sights and sounds, she keeps her head when a bomb dropped over the hospital crushes a whole section of the emergency wards. Then, in the round of her duties she sees Jack Griffin and as she bends over him to administer a hypodermic, his eyes open and his pain-wrenched face manages a little smile of appreciation. Despite herself Hope finds Jack's face a recurrent image and when she sees that he is worse she devotes herself to him. Through his delirium she learns that he was in love with one Madge who ran off with his brother. Convinced of the faithlessness of women, Jack had enlisted as an aviator and had been engaged in trying to protect the hospital from a German ace when the bomb was dropped over the hospital. Jack had swooped down upon the German and when firing had failed to bring the death-dealing airship down he had maneuvered to land his plane on the others and shoot down. However, both planes had crashed together, and as he and the German had been pinned under the wreckage waiting for help, the German fellow had poured out in his own tongue the fact that his wife and baby would be left destitute. The German had been called to military duty from his honeymoon and over a period of two years had only seen his wife when on leave. To-morrow he was to have gone home to her, and Jack had promised the dying enemy to give a last message to his little family. It was this which made Jack struggle so to live and fulfill his promise and with Hope at his side every free moment, Jack begins to mend. From the first he is stricken with wonder at her, and as he convalesces he finds that he, who has renounced all women, is in love. At length he asks Hope to marry him, but because she would be sent home if she were married, away from him, they pledge themselves to each other amid the shrieks of battle. Jack broods over the German's family and only Hope can cheer him at those moments. Jack tells her that if he ever lost faith in her he would want to stop living. Then, one day he sees Hope kissing a young English soldier, and something stops within him. Hope was to get her first leave of absence the following day and they had been planning to spend the time together. Feeling that Hope is no different from other women, however, Jack rushes from the hospital and is hurt by a German bullet. Hope spends her leave of absence nursing Jack although in his delirium he expresses his bitterness against her and turns his face away when he regains consciousness.

For days they avoid each other and then the news of Armistice turns the hospital into a madhouse. Everyone embraces everyone else and Jack learns that Hope had only kissed the English boy because he had begged her to before leaving for the front. Jack and Hope are married and go to Germany to find the German's family. The little wife is dying but she blesses Jack and Hope who take her baby with them as their adopted child, and holding the little one in their arms, the young people return to Hope's father.

THE ISLAND WOMAN

Harry Reisert File No. 9523

IN rebellion against having his domineering parents manage his life for him, Fred Spencer dashes furiously from his house and wanders down toward the docks. He stops in a sailor's cafe and his attention is caught by a pretty entertainer, Ruth Brown, who seems out of place among the squalid surroundings. Changing his mind about getting drunk, he tosses her a coin and goes outside where he watches the ships going out to sea. Suddenly he hears sounds of struggle behind him and he sees a huge brute carrying the struggling form of Ruth Brown to a small ship. In a few moments the ship begins to push off and Fred hesitates for a moment and then jumps quixotically on the boat to aid the girl. He creeps cautiously along the decks until he sees through the porthole the cabin where Ruth is moaning. Cautioning her not to cry out, he enters and she weeps as she tells him that Captain Mully had made advances to her in the cafe, which she had resented. The other men had roared at his discomfiture, whereupon he had rushed at the trembling girl and carried her off while the men, silent in fear, had not dared to come to her rescue. Fred promises that Mully will take her only over his dead body and he prepares to defend her against the drunken brute. When Mully staggers into Ruth's room, Fred struggles with him and finally knocks him out. He races with Ruth to the life boats and tries to escape with her, but Mully staggers out and rushes at Fred. A storm which has been in progress grows fiercer and a life and death struggle ensues. The crew, frightened by the struggle leave the deck to the three. Suddenly the Captain picks up a belaying pin and hurls it at Fred. His aim is uncertain and it catches Ruth on the temple. As Fred realizes that the girl is dead he goes berserk. Plunging into the Captain he belabors him and throws the bestial body into a life boat while he tries to revive Ruth in vain. As quiet reigns above the crew dare to come up. The storm now rages like a hurricane and as the crew cower before the storm's fury, they ascribe the storm's increase to the death of their captain. With superstitious horror, they seize Fred and set him adrift in a life boat—to find their captain's ghost. Scarcely caring what becomes of him since the shock of Ruth's death, Fred drifts to an island. Through the storm he hears a faint cry for help. Startled he plunges into the wood and sees the huge figure of the Captain carrying off a girl. Wonder and despair seize him and he leaps at the brute only to be felled. Again the two antagonists face each other and the girl screams as the Captain rushes with drawn knife. Fred dodges and the madman falls, pierced through the heart as he falls on the knife.

The trembling girl tells Fred that her father's yacht had anchored for safety off the island. The brute had come abroad, smothered her outcry, and taken her off. Meanwhile the girl had despairingly watched her yacht go on without suspecting she was gone. Fred soothes her and they shiver together before their fire. The next morning the yacht comes back and as Fred and June run toward it June sinks into a pit. Fred, attempting to help her falls in too and as he lights a match he is startled by sinister eyes gleaming about them. Again he lights a match and discovers that he has fortuitously come upon a veritable fortune in diamonds. June's father, believing Fred to be his daughter's abductor, draws a gun, but June intercedes, exonerates Fred, and Fred and June's father exploit the diamond mine together. As the yacht with its precious burden sails toward home, June lifts her lips for Fred's kiss.

SEPARATION

H. M. Barrows File No. 8469

WHEN Ann Lynton saw her husband, Wade, kiss another woman the bottom seemed to fall out of her universe. She had said nothing then, had silently withdrawn from the scene, but when Wade came home, Ann had been very distant. Wade tried to explain, but his assurance that so small a thing should make no difference to them, maddened Ann. Her pride was irreparably hurt by Wade's attitude and before they finished they both said things which they later regretted. But it was too late then; in the disillusion of their first quarrel in four years of married life, they decided to separate. They were very modern about it. Ann would take the baby, Wynne, and Wade would bring up Ted, then three years old. Only two people who loved each other as much as Ann and Wade could have been so final in their severing of bonds. Ann even assumed her maiden name and both of them let his child believe his other parent was dead.

Eighteen years passed and Wade returning from the Orient with Ted wrote a brief note telling Ann what a splendid son she had. Ann's note was equally curt, mentioning the remarkable musical genius of Wynne and assuring Wade that if he cared to see his daughter he was welcome to call. Concealing his agitation, Wade took Ted with him on a visit to "friends" and as they entered the house the two men were transfixed by the sight of the lovely young Wynne, seated before the piano, engrossed in the composition of an original sonata. When Ann entered the room, she gasped almost inaudibly, but despite her own anticipation of her meeting with Wade, she greeted him coolly across the years. Ted eagerly discussed music with Wynne, and the two older people walked in the garden discussing in halting phrases their children and their interests. Wade asked stiffly if he might call again and in the weeks that followed they planned dinners and outings together. Rejoicing that the children got along so well together, the elders drifted until a terrible thought came to Ann. The children did not suspect their relationship and she feared they had fallen in love with each other. So agitated was she that she spoke in her sleep and Wynne hearing confided in Ted, who had already revealed to her his love for one Doris, about whom he had said nothing to his father, fearing to leave his one parent friendless by his marriage. Ted then realized that the elders were in love with each other but neither would confess, and the youngsters planned to bring their parents together through a common fear that the youngsters were in love. Ann and Wade suffered agonies before each revealed to the child he had brought up the open secret of his relationship. However, Wynne and Ted revealed "in confidence" to Ann and Wade the fact that his other parent's love still endured. Incredulous still, the two older people continued their plans for the ride into the country from which the children excused themselves. Doubts vanished while they were together, and when Ann and Wade radiantly returned home it was to find Wynne entertaining Ted and his fiancee, Doris. Ted and Doris, married, bid goodbye to Wynne, going to Paris to study music and to Ann and Wade taking a second honeymoon on a specially purchased yacht.

LITTLE NURSE

Ludmilla Mengel File No. 8263

IT was Kay who kept the vivacious, lovely Doris from being dropped from the nurse's training. Not that Doris wasn't an excellent little nurse, but her capacity for fun was limitless, and often her hours didn't correspond exactly with hospital regulations. It required judicious management on Kay's part to keep her friend's infractions from being discovered, but she never failed. The two, different as could be, adored each other, and frequently Doris inveigled Kay into joining her on one of her dates. To-night as Doris wiggled herself into her things, she became very firm in her objections to Kay spending the evening reading and after minutes of persuasion telephoned Lee to bring a "blind date" for Kay. All the while she had Kay dress in one of her chiffons and fluffed Kay's hair she chattered gaily. It was a grand opportunity for Kay to meet Lee. Lee was a dear. Kay would like him; and a wealth of small instructions about how to act to Lee's friend.

Lee's friends were giving him a farewell party before he left on his first really important architectural enterprise abroad, and as Kay's date was interested in the girl on his left and Doris was dancing from one pair of arms to another all evening, Kay and Lee spent much of the time in conversation. One thing they agreed about was that Doris was a very grand young person. After they returned home that night, Doris apologized because she was responsible for providing Kay with Dizzy for an escort, but she grew more enthusiastic over how well Kay and Lee had gotten along. Wasn't Lee great, she asked.

A few weeks later, Doris despondently explained she was going to give up nursing. She had been present when a young husband had wept over the unconscious, battered form of his wife. Doris cried she was never intended for nursing, but Kay, soothing her took her mind from the pathos of the incident by relating an anecdote that occurred in the maternity ward when an expectant father fainted and caused more trouble than his brave little wife. It wasn't only nursing that was distressing Doris. She had received a note from Lee eagerly inquiring about Kay and Doris was realizing that her friendship with Lee had turned to love now that she was in danger of losing him to her best friend. It was hard with Lee, never guessing she had changed, asking Doris to help him win Kay; and Lee smiled as Kay told him Doris had excused herself from joining them because of a headache. But although Kay's heart sang when she was with Lee, she felt she had no right to interfere with the friendship of Doris and Lee. Then, one night she discovered that of late Doris' symptoms had been genuine. She had been removed for scarlet fever. Anxious days during which her nursing duties were a torment followed and when she was at length permitted to see her friend she was shocked by the ravages of the disease. Then, one night Doris died leaving a note wishing Lee and Kay, the two people she had loved best every happiness together. Only Lee's tenderness comforted Kay and she turned wet eyes to him when he explained gently that Doris would have liked them to raise the monument of their love to her. Softly Kay nodded. Monument of love. Doris would like that.

WHEN WOMEN WANDER

Mrs. Agnes Shorb File No. 8455

TOO young to take Paul's proposal of marriage seriously Grace didn't realize how she hurt him by her flippancy, but she was surprised when Paul, instead of hanging about forlornly abruptly left town. Serious minded, himself, the young lawyer knew that Grace, sheltered from every harsh contact, thought life a playground specially designed for her, and although he didn't love her the less, he felt it best to try to forget her.

The year, however brought great changes to Grace. Her father, whose speculations had always brought comfortable financial returns was completely bewildered by the break in the stock market, and worry over his straightened circumstances made him succumb to pneumonia. The realities Grace had never been trained to face suddenly confronted her with a starkness that appalled her, and her stepmother, hitherto friendly out of respect to her father, feeling cheated by the discovery that her husband had left nothing, shrugged her shoulders and told Grace she'd have to take care of herself. In Mrs. Hilton's campaign in search of a wealthy provider, there was no room for a step-daughter. However, she did know of a Mrs. Salter, a friend in New York who needed a governess for her children. But when, after a correspondence had assured her a position, Grace arrived, she learned that Mrs. Salter had suddenly changed her plans, gone South for the winter, and placed her children at a school. Grace looked dazedly about the tall buildings, the indifferent crowds hurrying past, and fingered the woefully few dollars she had left after the expense of coming to New York. Taking a room in the back of a cheap boarding house, the girl began a weary round of answering advertisements. Even the landlady, coming to demand rent, was touched by the girl's pale face and brought up some hot soup, but in spite of the advice to remain in bed and rest for a day, Grace grasped her morning paper and set out determined not to give up. But always the position was filled, or her inexpericnce lost her the opportunities. At length, throwing away the paper, she pulled herself together and applied for the last position. No, it hadn't been filled. But as she admitted she had never taught before, and knew but a little German, the woman regretfully informed her she wouldn't do. For a moment Grace tried to plead, then weak from lack of food, she hurried out. She almost cried out as she saw Paul running up the steps unseeing, but swallowed her outcry, at the realization of how pitiful she looked. He would be sorry for her and she couldn't stand that.

Paul, kissing his sister, inquired if she had gotten a governess, never realizing that the girl he had passed was Grace, whom he had tried to communicate with lately only to discover that she had gone. However, when he went to the drug store to get some medicine for his sister's sick child, he found a girl, unconscious in the street, and carrying her into the drug store cried out in recognition of Grace. Tenderly he carried her to his sister's house and soothing her, told her he would never let her go again.

THE STOLEN BRIDE

Bela Kovach File No. 8310

IMPOVERISHED by sudden financial reverses, Mr. Richard Marlowe, racing enthusiast, is forced to sell his most valuable land, family heirlooms, and horses to Thomas Woodworth's family who are now living next door. Anxious to regain his former financial social and sport position, Mr. Marlowe urges his beautiful daughter, Lillian, to marry the elderly bachelor, Thomas. Although envied by all the town girls and encouraged by the town gossips, Mrs. Sippy and Mrs. Profus, who visit her one day, Lillian steadfastly refuses until her father's rage subsides into tears of frustration for his "ungrateful daughter" as he dubs her. Remembering the luxuries heaped upon her, and anxious to please her parents, Lillian consents to send Thomas a twig from the rosemary bush as a sign of her acceptance of his proposal. In her room that night, Lillian weeps as she recalls the lover's glance given her by Charles, her father's groom and gardner when she had entered the stables to entice their favorite colt with some sugar. And when Charles, asked to deliver the twig to Thomas, refuses, until he is threatened by her father, Lillian realizes his growing affection for her. Apologizing for his haste, however, when Charles afterwards gives notice, Mr. Baker invites him to the wedding the next week. That night, escaping from the offer of champagne and kisses by the bold maid, Lucille, Charles, finding Lillian weeping in the garden of the Woodworth house where the wedding is taking place, threatens to kill Thomas unless she elopes with him. Quieting him, Lillian promises to give her answer later. Noticing her anguish before the wedding ceremony, Charles taps on the window so that she may take the clothes for disguise he has brought. Giving her answer, "yes", Charles hides behind a bush just as Mrs. Baker, (whom the jealous Lucille, having witnessed the scene, has told) enters Lillian's room. Having seen Lillian speaking with Charles in the garden previously, Thomas accuses her of having a lover, and hurries her to the altar where she faints after the ceremony. Secretly meeting Charles outside her home, Lillian flees with him to his house where his mother, Mrs. Cornish, remembering her dead daughter, Marie, receives her kindly. The next day, informed that the wonderful racing horse (Mr. Baker's) which Thomas had sold to another man (and from whom Charles had bought it with all his savings) had won the first prize of twenty thousand dollars, Charles rushes to show the telegram to his mother and Lillian. Finding the irate Thomas there, Charles refuses to yield up Lillian who demands a divorce since she doesn't love him; and when Thomas hurries out, planning to hire a gang to kidnap Charles and beat him to death, he is killed in the automobile accident which results from his speeding. Fearing for Thomas's life, and vowing to subdue his daughter, Mr. Baker hurries to Charles' house where he finds Howard Thorne, a sport columnist friend of the former, telling him of Thomas' death. Thinking Charles has killed him, Mr. Baker shoots, wounding Lillian who has tried to protect Charles. Merely grazed, Lillian explains the situation, and the news of the prize especially wins his commendation for Charles as her future husband. They embrace happily as Mr. Baker leaves the room chuckling with delight.

A MAN'S TEST

Ethel L. Hugunin File No. 8451

WRONGLY suspected of a ten thousand dollar theft from the Midgefield Bank, Derring Howard, now known as Lial Druce, flees from town and from his sweetheart, Ella, whom Ned Brownley, the banker's son has influenced against him, to the distant Cross Bar Ranch. Returning from town one day, Lial is rescued from dying of thirst in the desert by Mona, wife of John Carlos, a suspiciously prosperous rancher. Mistaking him for a ranger, a species whom her husband hates, Mona hurries him out after she has promised to see him again. In the meantime John, visiting his mistress, the widowed Mrs. Petrie, plans to divorce Mona, or get rid of her in some other way so that he may marry the former. In the days that follow when the rumors of his affair with the widow, and his constantly beating her, do not prompt Mona to suggest divorce, John one day in the town saloon offers five hundred dollars for the disposal of his wife. That night, Ned Brownley, a stranger who had overheard this offer, kidnaps Mona and after binding her in a small cabin, threatens to kill her if she does not promise to leave the state forever. Returning to her home, Ned, refused the money by John, kills and buries the latter near the house. After splitting the money with his cronies who have assisted him, Ned, half in love with Mona, leaves her in the cabin instead of forcing her departure. Knowing of Lial's presence in the vicinity and of his attentions to the girl, Ned sends him a note of her whereabouts. At the cabin, the fainting Mona now revived, tells Lial of John's implication in the deed, since she has overheard one of the men talking. At her home, Lial finds the newly made grave, and upon reporting it to Sheriff Olson who recognizes him as the wanted Derring Howard, is arrested. Infuriated at the murderer of their most prosperous citizen, John, the people storm the jail where Lial is confined, and both the sheriff, who refuses to give up the prisoner to be hung, and Derring, fight and shoot for their lives. In the quiet of the following night, the sheriff in response to a mysterious note concerning a contemplated robbery of the stage coach at the crossroads, hastily collects a posse, and arrives in time to save Jessen, the driver of the coach containing a cargo of gold, and the latter, from being taken by Ned and his gang. While Mexican Pete, the gangster who had notified the sheriff, is on his way to town to tell of the deed, and receive the reward offered for the taking of the man who robbed the Midgefield Bank,—for through spies in other towns he has discovered this part of his past,—Ned in his dying moments confesses his guilt in John's murder, in Mona's kidnapping, and in the robbery of the Midgefield bank. Rushing to the scene with Mona, Lial tearfully forgives the dying man as if he were not his transgressor; and after revealing his entire past to Mona, is forgiven with a kiss, and a promise of ever-lasting love.

WEBS OF FATE

B. E. Carr File No. 8474

FROM their car seat, Geraldine Gordon and her cousin, Cyril, hurrah as the farm and Aunt Maggie at the gate, come into view. Always remembering her grandmother's words, "Be true to yourself," Gerry resists the bold attentions of Cyril; but when her sex-ridden cousin, Anna, arrives to entice and humor him, she is jealous and glad to return to school. At school she recoils from the girls' ravings about boys; and weeps despairingly when she notices her parents kissing each other. Mrs. Gordon's wholesome talk encourages her, and she offers her friendship to Mickey, the school quarterback. However, she soon forgets him when Cyril, captain of the rival team which is to play her school, introduces her to Rex Scherer. After the game, she denounces Mickey, the victor, for injuring her new hero whom she rushes off to nurse. Told of his poverty, Geraldine promises to marry him when he finishes his law course and can support her and his widowed mother. After an ardent correspondence, Rex arrives from college for her graduation, dances and rides with her. At college, after his departure, Geraldine greets the admiring Cyril, president of student council, but scorns his companion, Anna, whose mother's adventures with alimony and lovers, have made them rich. When the following night after the welcome dance to the freshmen, Cyril makes love to her, Gerry is saved from abandoning herself by Anna's arrival. She spurns him, and rushes upstairs with her studious room-mate, Maggie, who descants on the glories of her bespectacled sweetheart, Anthony Smith. The next morning, Gerry vows to ignore all boys and dates while awaiting Rex's arrival at Christmas; but the latter's letter postponing his arrival for the spring, makes Gerry reckless. Alicia, the professor's daughter he has been writing about, is the cause. Well, she can play his doublecrossing game too, so that she eagerly accepts the drinks, cigarettes, and caresses offered by Cyril's friend, Blake Craker, that night after the dance. Cyril's interruption of her drunken antics saves her from her disgrace, and she returns home for her vacation a weary woman.

In Rex's college town, she notices the latter viewing the same play as she is, with Alicia; and when in answer to her mother's note, he visits their box and promises to see her later, Gerry merely nods. At her home, he refuses Gerry's dare to marry him "if, as he insists, he truly loves her," for fear of his mother's welfare and his inability to support her without her father's aid. In the days that follow, Blake, who visits her often during her illness, finally proposes. Her married life with him at his home is blighted by his gambling and his promiscuity with other women. Mrs. Gordon takes her much abused daughter home, and Mr. Gordon offers Blake, who has been working for his bootlegging father, an office position. Gerry finds comfort in the visits of Whistler, a bird-imitating vagabond from Cyril's farm who had taught her to fish. Blake turns white when he sees him one day, disappears and returns bloodily distorted. Gerry, who is about to become a mother, screams as he enters her room to vent his lust on her; and when Mr. Gordon returns with the doctor, they find Blake strangled. Whistler, whom he had once wronged, has done his work. Befriended by Rex after her child's death, Gerry faints when she receives an announcement of his marriage to Alicia. Her plans to take a business course and forget him are broken by her mother who rushes her into bridal clothes, on a mysterious trip; and into a strange man's hotel room in the city. Rex, a minister, her mumbled "yes" bewilder and anger her; and when she tries to rush from the room, he tells her of the jealous Alicia's ruse to dishearten her by the announcement. They kiss happily, and Mrs. Gordon sighs with relief.

THE AUTHOR HIMSELF

Florence Burden File No. 9090

WHEN Mrs. Hollander enters the room she scolds her daughter Muriel for giggling over Tom's burlesque of his Uncle Daniel asking a newcomer if he has read MY LIFE. Mrs. Hollander reminds her children that they are dependent upon their uncle to leave them his fortune, and his vanity is the book he had published in his youth. The doorbell rings and Muriel hastily explains it must be Jim, but when the expressman comes in, gingerly depositing two gilt chairs and then leaves, Mrs. Hollander turns a dismayed look upon the objects of art, then turns to inquire sharply who Jim might be. The explanation that Muriel is interested in a detective almost prostrates the dowager and the inquisition to which Jim is subjected upon his arrival is fortunately terminated by the entrance of the author himself, who collars the handsome lad to ask him if he has read MY LIFE yet. Expanding amiably, Uncle Daniel advises Jim to shape his life as the author did in order to derive the maximum happiness, and giving an autographed copy to Jim's care, an invariable habit, Uncle Daniel relates how he found a furniture dealer who had been guided through life by MY LIFE. Wearily Tom interjects, "So you bought those chairs from him?" But ignoring his nephew's sarcasm, Uncle Daniel turns toward the chairs and when, expounding their good points, he invites his sirter and Tom to sit down, the pair are immediately deposited in a heap. Jim's snicker doesn't help his case, and Muriel rushes from the room to conceal her amusement. Uncle Daniel, at Jim's advice stalks to the phone to berate his furniture dealer, and rubbing his hands, the author explains that he has made an appointment for ten tomorrow when the dealer will make an adjustment. Uncle Daniel leaves, and Mrs. Hollander frets over the thought that her brother will spend all his money on antiques and leave none to them. When she discovers that Jim, the detective, has overheard her she invites him in no uncertain terms to leave, and Jim goes while Muriel rebukes her mother and Tom, rubbing his aches, says that Muriel would feel the same way if her back felt the way her mother's and his do. Mrs. Hollander gasps.

The next morning Uncle Daniel arrives to belabour his furniture dealer, but under the smooth flattery of the man who claims he has read MY LIFE Uncle Daniel pulls out his check book and is about to buy the rest of the gilt set at an incredible figure when his sister and her children come in to stop his extravagance. He is adamant, however, as he commends the fine sensibilities of the reader of MY LIFE until Jim enters and ignoring Mrs. Hollander's sniff, proceeds to question the art dealer, having himself read MY LIFE for the occasion. Exposing to the over-trustful Uncle Daniel the man's ignorance of the fine autobiography, Jim snaps a pair of handcuffs on the dealer, proves he is a fake who has been extracting money regularly from the guileless author, and as Jim goes off with Muriel, Mrs. Hollander beams in response to her brother's assurance that henceforth he will let himself be guided in business matters by his sister, since she has shown such fine judgment in bringing Jim around.

HONOR

M. Lynch File No. 8179

WITH her mother an invalid and her father and brother, Ted dependent upon her for their meals, laundry, and entertainment of their guests, Gladys Carter finds compensation for the drudgery these conditions entail, in the sincere love of Jack Phillips. Packing her things in preparation for a week-end to be spent at the home of Jack's aunt at Southampton, before he leaves for a three year's sojourn in India as an English official, Gladys immediately discerns the anxiety for her return in her father's good wishes; for she knows that they now, as in the past, begrudge her absence from the home. So that it is only her mother who has always been her friend and confidente, whom she leaves with sincere trepidation for her health, and sorrow for her departure. The days at Southampton, filled with parties, picnics, and teas, having passed all too quickly, Gladys soon finds herself bidding a tearful farewell to Jack at the boat.

Returning home, the death of Mrs. Carter completes Gladys' despondent mood; and she cares little when upon having her father's bills at the town tavern, and her brother's gambling losses, broached to her, she is forced to give up the money left her by the dead woman. Life passes in the same monotonous round of household tasks unlightened by social activities,—for she has gradually given up all her friends—until Jack sends her fifty pounds to pay for her ticket to India. On her way to break the news to her family, Gladys suddenly hears a loud tumult from the parlor where her father has been entertaining two tavern friends. Confronted by the sight of her father pleading for mercy from abuse at the hands of the two irate men, Gladys, demanding an explanation, discovers that Mr. Carter has gambled away the money which in his position as secretary of the newly formed tavern savings club, he had been entrusted with. To keep her father from imprisonment, Gladys reluctantly yields the fifty pounds Jack had sent her, but her hope is renewed by Jack's praise of her deed and his promise to send her more money which he will earn from a trip to the mountains for the purpose of consulting certain wild tribal chiefs. However, when several days later, news of his death is brought to her, Gladys' sorrow is complete; and even the arrival of Jim Atkinson, a supposed friend of Jack's in India, fails to revive her spirits. In conspiracy with Mr. Carter on his plan of marrying Gladys and keeping her from the knowledge of the five thousand pounds insurance which Jack has bequeathed to her, Jim, as their new boarder, takes Gladys to theaters, parties, and dances. In the meantime—Ted, suspecting Mr. Carter's pretended illness—for having been found drunk one day, the latter had remembered Gladys' threat to leave the house if that occurred again, and had feigned sickness—begins his own investigation. Finally, informing the old man that he is really terribly ill, Ted is just about to get a confession from the suddenly frightened patient, when Jim, who has just seen the returned Jack downstairs, agitatedly enters the room. Drawing his revolver he shoots the old man into silence, and after confessing his own crime of handing Jack over to the natives, and of stealing the insurance, commits suicide. As Jack rushes into the room to embrace his beloved, the latter has forgiven both Jim and her father; and when they married, Ted was their proud best man.

CHARITY SISTER

Mrs. Mary Torn File No. 8471

TAKEN through factories and slum quarters by her economics professor, Rosemary Bradford, wealthy college girl, decides to become a sister of charity after her graduation. She gives up her dates, luxuries, and friends, and rents a room in the slum settlement house. Suddenly the crash comes and Mr. Bradford, unable to pay his debts,—since Rosemary has secretly donated most of his money for hospitals and settlements,—commits suicide. Poverty-stricken, Rosemary enters wholeheartedly into her social work; and when her brother, Robert, now a tramp is brought to the settlement house one day, she recommends him to Jordan Bailey, a bank president, one of her former suitors. After Robert is installed in his position as his secretary, the infatuated Jordan beseiges her with his attentions. An anonymous letter informs him of her brother's intrigue with a married woman, a Mrs. Kingston. Rosemary, fearing that Robert will turn to crime if unemployed, begs Jordan not to discharge him. When she promises to marry him, he retracts his threat and begins his investigation of the letter.

In the meantime, Mr. Kingston, supposedly a lawyer, falls in love with Annabelle Harlow, Robert's fiancee at a party. After several weeks of dances, parties, and theaters, he finally induces her to break her engagement by showing her the hush check given by Robert to one of his clients, Mrs. Kingston. Ruminating upon his secretary's predicament at a party, Jordan suddenly recognizes Mrs. Kingston as his divorced first wife of many years before. "That is the woman," cries Robert as he hastens from the room; and Jordan as her pretended lover, soon discovers her racket of blackmailing young men whom she has falsely accused of intrigues. When her husband enters and demands money for not exposing Jordan, the latter refuses. Kingston edges toward the door as Jordan threatens to call the police if they do not exonerate Robert, and finally rushes out. Thinking that he is about to doublecross her, she follows him pursued in turn by Jordan. At his destination, Annabelle's house, they find him planning to elope with her,—for he knows how wealthy she is. As his wife enters, he shoots, wounding Jordan; but the latter kills him just as Mrs. Kingston screams in recognition. After she explains the racket, Annabelle forgives Robert who kisses her joyfully. When they arrive home, Rosemary, who has been about to tear up her letter to the hospital asking for admission there as a sister of charity, hurries to Jordan. She is ashamed to ask him to release her from her vow. But when she overhears Mrs. Kingston telling of child born after the divorce, and when she sees them in loving embrace, she enters boldly. After the two couples are married, Rosemary, now peaceful at heart, becomes a sister of charity in the hospital Jordan has bequeathed to the poor in her name. She has found her work and love at last.

BEAUTY AND THE LIE

Peggy Flaire File No. 8424

MEETING Nathan, a counterfeiter, fleeing from the law, in the lobby of her father's hotel where she is the clerk, Naomi immediately falls in love with the handsome stranger. Confessing her condition to him several months later, Naomi pleads for marriage, but Nathan, in love with Amuria, a Grecian dancer, and anxious to escape the police who have discovered his whereabouts, refuses harshly and flees. Fearful of the censure of his orthodox friends, Naomi's father flings her from the house when she reveals her betrayal. Taking the stage coach, Naomi soon arrives in the town where Nathan is hiding, and after promising to protect her if she will be silent about him, he takes her to a small fishing hut. A week later, starved and the mother of a child, Naomi, realizing Nathan's falsehood, attempts to drown herself, but is saved by Gabreale, servant to Lieberman, (a millionaire) who has been walking along the shore. Trading her mother's jewels for food and clothes for herself and the child, Naomi is packing her things to look for work when she is petrified to see Nathan hastily enter and rush away with the child; but Gabreale, whom she has called on for help, throws Nathan unconscious and saves the child from being drowned. Offering her pearls as an inducement to allow her to keep the child in the house where she (Naomi) is to work as maid, Mrs. Sarah Abrams, to whom Gabreale has recommended her, sends them to her son's jewelry store. Hearing of the return of her rich neighbor from Greece, she now sends Naomi with gifts to his home. From a pillar nearby, Gabreale sees Nathan, who has immediately recognized Naomi, threaten her with violence should she reveal his past; and he is also a spectator of Nathan's kissing of Amuria, the dancer whom Lieberman has brought from Greece as his wife, and to whom he has ceded half of his fortune as an inducement for her to love him. Noticing the amorous glances of Leheia, Amuria's sister who is visiting her with Nathan (disguised as her footman) bestowed on Mr. Abrams, Mr. Lieberman's friend at the sumptuous banquet given at the latter's home, Gabreale follows her to the lake where she is to meet her new friend. After promising her money and marriage should she grant him her love, Abrams tries to kiss her but is pushed into the water instead. Taking the valuable pearls from his son's store the next day, Abrams departs to give them to Leheia while his son, thinking he has been robbed, sends for the police. When his children, Becke and Jacob announce their engagements that evening, Abrams, anxious for a means of getting rid of his wife, suggests that merely for the lark, he divorce his wife, Sarah, and remarry her at their weddings so they may rejoice at the triple ceremonies. Bribing the rabbi, the divorce is soon granted; but Abrams glancing happily at the veiled face of his bride, is amazed to find it is Sarah instead of Leheia with whom he had planned the trick. Suddenly a commotion at the door shows Leheia, Nathan, and Amuria, all members of the same criminal gang, in chains; for Gabreale, having learned through spies in other towns of Nathan's past, and of the association of the two women in his thieving schemes, has notified the governor. And Naomi's father whom he has also notified of Nathan's arrest, appearing now, forgives his daughter and bestows his blessing on her betrothal to Gabreale. The four couples kiss happily and the music rejoices with them.

HER MAJESTY'S TOOTHACHE

Ada L. Barrett Fie No. 9193

WITH the lower half of her face swathed in a veil so that her jaw swollen from the toothache may be hidden, Queen Elizabeth, escorted by her lady-in-waiting, Leda Vera Howard and by Lord Seymour, enters the Council Chamber. Elizabeth regally stretches forth her hand for the kneeling Sir Walter Raleigh to kiss, but as he walks beside her to the great table at the head of the room which is already flanked by Lord Burleigh, Bishop Aylmer, and other courtiers of the realm, Elizabeth's face contorts in an agony of pain caused by "jumping" toothache. Imperially she pushes away Burleigh's suggestion that the affairs of state await her more favorable health. Busying herself with the numerous documents upon the huge table, listening to the words of her advisers, she carries on the affairs of her realm while anxious councilors stands by noticing her evident anguish. When she becomes engrossed in the matters before her she pushes the veil away from her faee but Lady Vera steps immediately from behind Elizabeth's chair and puts the veil back in place. The French Ambassador, who is finally bringing the picture of the Duc D'Aleneon, prospective suitor for the hand of Elizabeth, enters. Though discomposed that he should choose a time so unsuitable, she receives him. Scornfully she tosses the picture of the ungainly, pock-marked Duc, to Jane the Court Fool, for by his picture he is hardly "fit mate for England's Queen."

During a period of two months, many remedies, ineluding an onion treatment which sets all the attendants in the Queen's boudoir, sniveling and sneezing, are tried. They prove useless in allaying the Queen's pain and she finally sends for the dentist. Timidly he wields his clumsy instruments but as she winees his hand slips and the instruments scratches her face just over the offending tooth. She berates him wildly and sends him from her presence. The kingdom is aroused by Elizabeth's persistent toothache. When she refuses to try the loathsome compound made from toads, snails and earthworms which the Court astrologer, Dr. Dix, suggests, the apothecaries convene so that perhaps their combined wits may aid the Queen. But the meeting dissolves in a fight when the learned men eannot agree. Finally the House of Lords takes the matter into its hands, and courageously sends a letter from the learned Dr. Faustus to the Queen. The letter is presented to Elizabeth in the Great Council Chamber, with Burleigh, Aylmer and other notables. Elizabeth breaks the seal and unfolds the parchment, which urges her to have the offending tooth removed by a eapable dentist, whose "modern" methods will not require more thav two hours for the job. But Elizabeth's previous experience has made her wary of dentists. Then white-haired old Bishop Aylmer steps before her Majesty and eourageously offers to surrender his sole-remaining molar from his shriveled gums to prove that the extraction is not as bad as she fears. The Court and Councillors look on while the Modern dentist who has been called struggles with the tooth. Clock ticks away the time till one hour and a half is registered, and finally the Bishop, his face painfully scratched and bloody, stands bravely before his Queen and tells her "It wasn't bad at all." Though he has made the sacrifice above her protests Elizabeth cannot but follow the example set by this loyal servitor and she seats herself in the dental chair. The clock ticks away the minutes, the hours, as an anxious eourt watches the dentist striving to remove their sovereign's offending molar. Then suddenly the dentist's drastic efforts are rewarded, the swelling collapses with a "blop" and the queen, bloody, scratched, torn but triumphant, sits up, smiling victoriously at a perspiring dentist and admiring Court. Excitedly, the serving-women surround the Queen with bowls of water and towels. The exhausted Queen slumbers, dreams the whole thing over, and laughs immoderately in her sleep.

UNDER THE HAMMER

Reginald L. Panton File No. 9501

TWICE before John had postponed his marriage to Pat, and each time Pat had accused him of not loving her as much as she loved him or he wouldn't let other things. no matter how important, interfere. Pat couldn't understand his father's feeling about his profession. For three generations the Willsons had been famous among art connoisseurs as auctioneers and the senior Willson had groomed his son to take his place. Now with the rush of Christmas auctions, old James was finding he had overtaxed his strength. He asked John to give up the idea of marriage at least until after Christmas. John dreaded the way Pat would take the postponement, but he knew his father, ailing since the recent death of his wife, would excite himself if he knew that his son was planning to go on with the marriage at this time. But when Pat cried hysterically that if they weren't married to-morrow, as they had planned, she would leave him, he realized her decision was final. Soothing her he told her he would meet her at the City Hall. She would get the license. They would just have time to get married before the boat sailed for Europe. Smiling through her tears, Pat searched John's facc and said solemnly, "And nothing, nothing, can come between us." John knew it would be hard to tell his father he was leaving, but when he arrived home, he found James had suffered a stroke. The doctor told John the stricken man had refused to lie quietly until he was assured that his son would conduct the auction. Palely John entered the room where James was lying and shocked at the old man's appearance, heard himself promise, through a haze, that he would carry on the Willson name. It seemed so trivial to give up a lifetime of happiness so that an auction sale could go on, but he had promised his father. Pat sent a telegram saying she had left for Europe—alone. And John, hurrying home saw his father's eyes light up as he told him the sale was a success. A moment later the old man was dead and John sank sobbing at his side.

John made frequent unsuccessful efforts to find Pat but she had vanished. The only hope he clung to was that she still had the very valuable Russian antique diamond he had given her. Surely if she kept it, she still thought of him. Only in his work could John find surcease from his love for Pat. Then, several years later, having added fame to the Willson name, John received a letter from a Madame De Voinegne asking him to auction her property for her so that she could meet the debts her husband, a dissolute young Count had accumulated before committing suicide. John arranged the sale but although he got unprecedented prices, she still required 1,000 pounds. A few days later, she sent John a Russian ring to sell for her. Shaken, John begged for an interview and pleaded with the Countess to reveal how she had gotten the ring. Surprised the Countess told of an old college friend who had cherished the ring, memento of a happiness that might have been if she had not let pride destroy her romance. Pat had given it to save her friend.

A few hours later, John called at Pat's home and as she gasped at seeing him, he held out the ring. This time there was no postponement of the marriage.

THE LOST NAME

THEIR child, Roy Dickson, kidnapped by the same notorious gang who had previously robbed them and their neighbors of some valuable jewels, Mr. and Mrs. Dickson leave their luxurious Southampton home to consult the police in New York where the gang is known to have its headquarters. In the meantime in another Long Island vicinity, Ralph Brown, an insomnia victim, witnesses through his window at midnight, the arrival with a baby of the people who have recently rented the house next door. An ardent reader of the newspapers, Brown spies the next day upon the inhabitants of the house, and recognizing the child according to the descriptions given, plans with his wife, upon a means of obtaining it from the gangsters. Realizing from his constant staring at the house that he suspects something, the gangsters send Ralph a note threatening to kill him should he come near the house again. To get them away from the house, Ralph, in turn, sends them a note promising them a huge ransom for the child if they will bring it with them the following night to an appointed place at the edge of a woods nearby. That night, while his wife waits in the car outside, Ralph overcomes the gangster left to guard the child, takes the latter and flees. Finding his parents gone, the Browns rush on to Chicago and then to Los Angeles in attempts to locate them. However, Mrs. Brown, long childless, gives up the search and adopts the ehild. As the years go by, the boy, Roy is well cared for at school and home; and when Mrs. Brown dies, after his graduation from college, he takes her place as manager in Mr. Brown's ranch office. Meeting Nancy McCrew, a former college friend, in town one day, Roy invites her to the ranch where their love flourishes, in rides and walks together. After deciding to wait until Roy is of age to marry, Nancy returns home, and her foster parents, the Dicksons, seeing Roy's picture, question her closely about his childhood and parentage. The weeks pass quickly with letters and week-end visits, and finally Roy arrives with Mr. Brown to arrange for the marriage; but the latter, seeing the Dicksons approaching them, suddenly pushes something into Roy's hand and takes the train back to the raneh. At the Dickson's home, Roy finds that the newspaper clippings Mr. Brown gave him and the pictures (taken of himself when young by Mrs. Brown) are conclusive evidence that he is a son of the Dicksons. Tearfully, Mr. and Mrs. Dickson bless the couple at the wedding; and bid them a reluctant good-by as they depart for a honeymoon on the ranch with Mr. Brown. Finding the latter dead of a heart attack, the two mourn his death after Roy has entirely forgiven his foster father for keeping him from his true parents all through the years; and later, told that he is heir to the thirty thousand dollars left in Mr. Brown's will, Roy kisses Nancy, happily secure in his future at the ranch with her and his parents.

THE SUNSHINE GIRL

Olive Jackson File No. 8454

AN idealist, Dr. Winston Grover took his wife and his child, Janice, to a little house in the outskirts of a village and eschewing his opportunities to establish a lucrative medical practice, experimented with the curative effects of sunlight. Although he received many offers to join the staffs of exclusive hospitals, the doctor continued to give all his money to his charity cases and to be unaffeeted by his fame which brought the rich in flocks to his door.

Meanwhile in the home of the Landons, multi-millionaires, there was great distress beeause the young heir, Ronny was a sickly, weak child. Landon, an inventor trusted his wife's judgment implicitly and did not question her strange ideas of how to raise Ronny. The child was never permitted to play with other babies or to romp in the sunlight. Governesses were hired as they subscribed to the theories of Mrs. Landon who was firmly convinced that her father died from eating spinach, and was determined not to let her child touch vegetables. However, when Ronny grew more sickly, Landon began to notiee. Over the bridge table one night one of the Landon's guests spoke of the marvelous treatments of Dr. Grover, and because it was fashionable, Mrs. Landon brought her Ronny to the famous sanitorium. Ronny was put in a sun suit and sent into the garden where Janice, splashing in the pool saw him. She called gayly for him to join her and as he held back timidly she drew him playfully into the water. Instantly the child started gasping for breath and frightened, Jan called her father who explained she must be gentle with Ronny. From then on Ronny and Jan were inseparable. Under her tender tutelage, Ronny learned to play as normal children and when at last his mother eame to visit him, she was astounded by the ehange in her child. However, when she saw her Ronny ride a pony, she eried out. Landon smiled as his boy showed how manly he had grown but when Mrs. Landon insisted on taking him home and pampering him all over again, the inventor for the first time put his foot down. Ronny would go to a military school, and Ronny did although Mrs. Landon hated Dr. Grover and his family for ruining her boy as she considered it.

As the children grew up they eontinued to write to each other and Jan, graduating with honors from a nurse's training school reeeived a huge bouquet of roses from Ronny who had not forgotten her. However, Mrs. Landon, meanwhile, had picked a bride for her son and made Ronny miserable with her nagging. Ronny wrote Jan that he would eome to see her, but as Jan excitedly made preparations, Mrs. Landon gave out the news of her son's engagement to a debutante to the newspapers. Jan, reading it, wept and wrote Ronny that he needn't come. When his letters of explanation were returned unopened, Ronny got into his roadster and rode to assure Jan he knew nothing of an engagement. His mother, whom he told to stop interfering in his affairs, had her ehauffeur follow Ronny to prevent him from going back to Jan. As the two ears drew abreast, Mrs. Landon's wheel caught Ronny's and his car smashed. Ronny was carried to the hospital more dead than alive with his hysterieal mother beside him. When Jan heard of the accident, she rushed to the aid of the man she loved and for weeks she stayed at his bedside, nursing him faithfully. Dr. Johnson who attended Ronny fell in love with Jan but he knew he had no chance and gently he left, although Ronny tried to make Jan turn to the young Doctor, believing he would never fully reeover. And in the little Church near the Grover Sanitorium, Jan and Ronny were married.

SKY FIGHTER

Jack H. Berry, Jr. and Barron Le Berry File No. 9519

THEIR friendship established through living in the same town and attending the same schools, Willie Grant and Diek Oleott enter the same aviation quarters together. There they stand the test of constant drilling, see new recruits killed on their first take-off, and bring destruction to many German planes hovering about. For saving one of the student flyers from death through a bad landing, Willie and Dick are granted a two-day vacation in Paris. At their hotel there they are delighted to meet Amy Rolland and Diana Barrett, their home town girl friends who are also on vacation from their hospital work. The four spend all their money at cafes, in drinking, eating, and gambling. Finally, Willie, reeling drunkenly out to call a taxi, eollides with a friendly young aviator, John Stiner, who hails the cab for him and begs to be allowed to join the party. His eyes light up when at the hotel the boys reveal their eonnection with an American flying camp. In Dick's room where they have retired for more drinks, John arouses their ire by trying to pet with Amy. In the tumult of the fight, Eleanor Harrison, one of the other hotel visitors, lounges in to stop the noise and ask to be introdueed. At last they all fall into a drunken stupor. In the morning, the boys awake to find the girls gone; and Eleanor, taking advantage of John's short absence from the room, tells them of having seen him search Dick's pockets, and of copying something from a slip of paper found therein. The following day when the airdrome is bombed, and several planes and hangers destroyed, the boys realize how they have been duped. In the meantime, John is transferred from the anti-aircraft company with whom he has been working, to the boys' flying camp. Every time he is sent on a flying mission, his fellow pilots are killed, by heart attacks from the gas, or by the enemy, as he states in his reports. One day the boys notiee him tying a green ribbon to his plane; and that night follow John, now their roommate, to a mysterious midnight errand to the barn. In the air battle the next day, they observe one of the German planes going down before John shoots at him, and realize that the green ribbon is the signal of his German eonnection. When the major is told about this, he connects his telephone with the one in the barn which John is using to inform the enemy of their manoeuveurs. Before they go on their photograph mission the next day, Dick secretly removes the green ribbon. So that John who has suddenly opened fire upon Dick who is photographing the land, shouts in vain to his German attacker. When he stands up in the plane to signal his German extraction to the pilot of the German plane, he is killed by his countryman. Returning to camp. Willie and Dick are rewarded for discovering one of the most notorious war spies; for his wireless messages have revealed the reason for the American's great losses. At the awarding of the medals the boys are met by their sweethearts who grant them their own rewards,—fond kisses.

MYSTERIOUS TRAITOR

Laura Langster File No. 9511

ON the trail of Tim Knight, suspected as the leader of a gang of criminals who have been robbing many of the farmer banks in the section, Thomas Earney, detective traces him through his friendship with Frances Muller. She had fallen from her horse on her way to town, and when Thomas, in passing, had offered assistance, her companion, Tim, rudely pushed him aside. Quick-gun Tim's notorious past has been whispered to him by old Chumley, the hotel proprietor. At Frances's farm where Thomas obtains a position as hired man, he notices Tim's angry glare when he becomes friendly with the girl. When Tim finally induces Mr. Muller, who has lost most of his money in a recent bank robbery, to accept him as his partner, he forces the latter to discharge Thomas. Moreover, he threatens to withdraw his financial aid and the additional land he has put in Mr. Muller's name if the latter does not urge Frances to marry him. Needing the land for certain agricultural experiments, and needing the money to send his son through the advanced farming college, Mr. Muller makes the despairing Frances promise to discontinue seeing Thomas and name the marriage day with Tim. Several days before the wedding, Mr. Muller, in response to a mysterious letter calling him to the city on business, departs, Tim also leaves for the city after he has had a furtive consultation with his gang in a cabin at the edge of the woods. Thomas, who has obtained a farm position in a nearby town where he can secretly meet Frances and follow the movements of the gang, follows him. At Mr. Muller's hotel where the latter has been told to meet a business associate interested in his experiments, Thomas tries to warn him of his danger. The gang and Tim who have come to assassinate the farmer, beat Thomas into unconsciousness and drag him back to town. Returning home, Tim prevents the heartbroken Mrs. Muller and Frances from beginning any investigation of Mr. Muller's mysterious death until the wedding ceremony has been completed. After a futile and long wait at Thomas' boarding house,—from which they had planned to elope,—Frances tearfully returns to prepare for her marriage. Several weeks after their wedding, the unhappy Frances is about to drown herself. However, she is saved by Thomas who is rowing to the other side of town where he is to be tried, as the jealous suitor, for the murder of her father, which the city police authorities, have discovered. Accompanied by the steward of the hotel where Mr. Muller had been killed, Thomas with his testimony that he had overheard Tim forcing the farmer to sign over his experimental results, daughter, and money to him before his death, soon exonerates himself from the charge. On the strength of Thomas' accummulated evidence against Tim—after several doublecrossed men in the gang have confessed—the former is sentenced to death. Mrs. Muller weeps in happiness as Thomas proposes to the now divorced Frances. Her answer, "yes" is given in a kiss.

OTHER MEN'S WIVES

Yuster Jordan File No. 9514

TO the home of John and Betty Hammond comes Louise Carter, secretly in love with Betty's husband. Pretending to be Betty's best friend she brings with her one Joe who is immediately attracted to Betty. Louise subtly calls John's attention to his wife and Joe dancing together and arouses a feeling of jealousy in his breast.

A few nights later John is prevented from keeping an appointment with his wife by the sudden fluctuation of the stock market. So busy is he that it is several hours before he calls her up and Betty, having worried herself into a nervous state over John's lateness, is so annoyed at his glib explanation that she accepts the importunities of Louise to come out that night. Wearing the dress she has gotten for her husband's pleasure, Betty captivates Joe, whom Louise has induced to come by the promise that Betty will be present. The party goes to a roadhouse and Joe, having had too much to drink attempts to make love to Betty. Sorry now that she was ever persuaded to come, Betty determines to go home, but Joe insists on escorting her back. As he starts his roadster he swings it into another car and without waiting to ascertain possible damage, Joe drives off while Betty sits unhappily beside him.

The next morning Betty tries to tell John but suddenly the house is beseiged by reporters, one of the occupants of the smashed car having recognized Betty and given the news to the papers. John is stunned by Betty's apparent duplicity and when Louise adds fuel to the flames he leaves Betty, and accepts the consolation her friend is so eager to give him.

Betty is disconsolate at the trick Fate has played her and she leaves town. Beautiful as she is, many men vie for her favors but she remains unapproachable. Then after two years she returns to New York and Dorothy, one of her old friends, recognizes her and insists on lunching with her. Betty is cheered by the gaiety of her friend and agrees finally to come to a party at Dorothy's apartment. However, Dorothy has been leading a fast life and that night in the pent house apartment a lover has given her, Dorothy is shot. Betty hearing the sound from the next room rushes in and is found beside the murdered girl. The lover is wealthy and influential enough to keep his name from the case and Betty is held. However, Ross Campbell, a young lawyer, senses there is something wrong in the newspaper publicity of the case, having known Dorothy and her lover, and he offers to help Betty. Through his efforts Betty is freed and the two young people fall in love with each other.

However, the publicity brings John back to Betty and burying his face in her lap he begs her to forgive him. Betty, at first indifferent is moved by his hysterical pleas, and because he has lost all his money in his speculations and needs her so desperately she tells Ross that she must go back to John. Ross stares at her dully, reminding her that John has forfeited his right to her, and that he, Ross loves her too. But Betty sends him off and he goes to Bermuda where they were to have honeymooned together. John soon realizes he is keeping Betty from the man she loves and because he worships her he drives his car into a tree. Months later Betty goes to Bermuda and with a glad cry Ross, who has hungered for her, takes her in his arms.

LOVE IS A BATTLE

Everett Haley File No. 8453

IT all happened when somebody pushed Mary's hand and the perfume she was selling the pompous Mrs. Parker spilled over the lady's dress. Stalking to the manager's office in indignation, Mrs. Parker registered her complaint and Mary, hopelessly surveying the debris knew before she was called that she would be fired. "The customer," said the imperturbable manager, "must be satisfied." That night Mary's room mate, Janet, consoled Mary and assured her she would soon get another position, but Mary not so sanguine, only acted the more dejected and unwillingly accompanied the gay Janet to a movie to "forget about her troubles." Embarrassed by the fact that she had sat on the hat of the man in the next seat, Mary apologized, but as he showed his interest her annoyance mounted. At length, she turned to Janet and despite the astonished protests of her friend insisted on going home. Once in her room, however, she was moved to laughter by the persistence of her annoyer who had inserted his card in her cuff. With a gesture of finality, Mary tore up Raymond Parker's card.

However, the depression kept Mary from finding another position, and impelled by the hitherto patient landlady's demands, Mary set out to a pawn shop. The indomitable Raymond Parker, seeing her, followed and when the girl dejectedly realized that all she could get was enough to pay her rent bill, he stopped her and asked if he could help. Indignantly she turned from him, but when Raymond asked her at least to have dinner with him and appeared not at all daunted when she slyly asked if he would accept the company of her friend too, Mary accepted. That night Raymond escorted both Janet and Mary and at the night club introduced Janet to his friend John Shane. On the way home Raymond told Mary how much he liked her, but realizing he was a little tight, she kept him at his distance and put no stock in his protestations. However, the next day Raymond called her to ask if she'd accept a secretarial position in his father's office, and Mary, trying to remember to keep her head, started her new job. Raymond seemed genuine enough, and Mary, loving him, feared to be jolted from her dream. Then one day Mrs. Parker came to the office and recognizing her husband's secretary as that fresh shop girl, insisted that her feebly protesting husband fire the girl. Whereupon Mary, stil dazed by a note from Janet telling her she had eloped with John Shane, returned to her bare apartment. However, Raymond, learning what had happened came over and insisted that Mary marry him. Even though his father disinherited him, Raymond insisted it was worth it, and proudly he returned home to tell his bride that he had landed an eighteen dollar a week job. However, in his efforts to bring his son to his senses, the elder Parker secured his successive dismissal from five positions, and at length, Raymond became discouraged and ill. When the Parkers offered to care for their son only if Mary would get a divorce, she brokenly accepted, refusing however, to accept the money they offered her, or promise to give up Raymond's child. Years of struggle injured Mary's health, but it was her son, eventually, who brought Raymond back, and discovering that everything he had been told about Mary was a lie, Raymond humbly begged Mary to remarry him.

CHARACTER

Margaret E. Davis File No. 9513

HAVING become acquainted on the train, Betty Calley and Marie Boyden, decide to room together in Cornersville, the town in which they are to teach. At the boarding house owned by Mrs. Smith who met them at the station, the girls are told that there are no parties, dances, or shows in town. After several weeks of work, however, the girls decide to risk a trip to the next town for amusement; and when they return from the dance late that night, Mrs. Smith, who they know from an overheard conversation, dislikes them for being different, tells them to move, since she is giving up the boarding house for a men's hotel. Frantic at not having found a room at ten o'clock that evening, the girls hurry to the home of Superintendent Bickford for help; while the town people peeking through their curtains, cluck their tongues in disgust at such behavior. When Ronald Brown, a surveyor for a road company, arrives at the boarding house, Eliza, Mrs. Smith's daughter falls in love with him and watches Marie and Betty, who at Bickford's suggestion, had been granted the attic rooms until they could find another place. Repudiating Eliza's attentions in the form of extra food, or suggestions for walks, Ronald escorts Marie to dances and shows in other towns; but when he follows the latter to her room, where she was looking for some glue he needed, Eliza's report immediately spreads throughout the town, and Bickford warns her to beware of losing her position. Reluctant to get her into further trouble, Ronald has himself transferred to another town, while the girls, asked to leave by Mrs. Smith, are recommended by Mrs. Wright, the head teacher, to Aunt Lucy, a kindly woman.

Liking the girl, Superintendent Bickford persuades the school board to keep her (Marie) another year; and noting her frequent auto rides and attendance at dances with Irwin Holmes, a store clerk whom she had met at a dance after her summer vacation at home, he plans to get rid of him. The following night, noticing on the road outside the town that Marie has left her car for a minute, to get some water at the auto station, Bickford has his friend Henry Skillings, whom he had been visiting in the next town, drive his car into hers (where Irwin waits for her). When in spite of his wounds, Marie continues to see him, Bickford, at the Town Meeting Day, prompts Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Adams of the school board also, to spread gossip of Irwin's bad character and disreputable family; and when Marie, warned by Aunt Lucy about this, disregards her advice and flaunts her rebelliousness in the face of the town by driving Irwin from the hospital to his home in her car, Bickford, prompted by Eliza, who now likes him, discharges her on the grounds of associating with people of bad character. Hoping that she will come to him for assistance, Bickford informs the schoolboards of other towns of her discharge; but Marie, unable to get another position, starts for home. Meeting Irwin, who, afraid of harming her reputation, has stayed away from Cornersville for several months, she accedes to his request to visit him. Later meeting Mr. Brown, now a married man, Marie tells him of her difficulties; and it is not long before he and Irwin have subpoenaed the outstanding gossips of Cornersville to court to answer charges of libel. His character vouched for by an old family friend and by Mr. Stevens, his employer, Irwin is freed from the charges. After Bickford and the others are fined for libel, and told to keep their peace in the future on pain of imprisonment, Marie and Irwin rush to a minister. In the car they kiss happily in hopes of a gossipless future.

FORGOTTEN IDOLS

Willard C. Faulkner File No. 9506

PROSPERITY went to Tom Martin's head, causing him to lose much of his sense of decency, morality and respect. He mocked his mother as old fashioned when he saw her praying that no harm befall her only son who frequented roadhouses and gambling dens. At the Pelham roal house, Tom's favorite resort, he was introduced to Sadie, a red-headed hostess. They went from one road-house to another, drinking liquor at each place. When Tom wasn't looking, Sadie dropped a sleeping pill into his drink. When he fell asleep she rummaged through his pockets and took out the one hundred dollars which were still in his pay envelope. She left him lying there and took a cab home. When Mrs. Martin went out in the morning to take in the milk, she found her son sleeping on the door step. When he awoke she asked him for some money to buy some food and to give to the church charity. Enraged when he found that his pockets had been picked, he threw a vase across the room and hit his mother in the ankle. In church that Sunday, his mother asked that he be forgiven for he and his friends were crazed by the large salaries they received, and did not know what they were doing.

Tom returned to the Pelham on the following Saturday night. Sadie was not there. Instead, a dark-haired, blue-eyed girl entertained him. Marie Hastings who accepted the job as the last resort to earn a living for her sick parents, detested her present existence which was contrary to her personal principles. Tom grabbed her by the arm, pulled her down into his lap, and tried to kiss her. Marie picked up the bottle of gin that was on the table and hit him over the head with it. He was taken to the hospital unconscious. While he was recovering, he began to think that he really liked Marie and did not mean to insult her. He tried to date her out, but she would have nothing to do with him because he was a drunkard and conducted himself disrespectfully. In spite of these despicable characteristics Marie found some good in him, and grew to like him more and more. Every night, she kneeled at the side of her hard cot and prayed that he reform soon so she could speak her love heart to him.

From the conversations that went on among the employees of the Pelham, Marie learned that Tom had been hailed into court, and was charged with being the father of Sadie's unborn child. For days, Marie went about her work listlessly. Finally, Saturday morning she hurried over to the offiee of Jackson and Sobel, lawyers defending Tom. When the trial was resumed on Monday morning Marie testified that on the night that Sadie swore Tom had seduced her, he had been with her to a party at her aunt's house. The Distriet Attorney could not puncture her story. The jury returned a verdict of not guilty.

On their way to the City Hall to get a marriage lieense, Tom asked her why she lied to save him. Her testimony was no lie, she insisted. On the night in dispute, she reealled, she had gone to bed and the prayer on her lips asked that a good angel urge him to take her to the party her aunt was giving. And when she fell asleep she dreamed that she danced with him and that he had his arms around her and held her elose to his heart.

AT the party given by a fellow artist, Frederiek Faber, impoverished painter, is immediately enamoured with the beautiful soeiety girl, Judith Tracy. He poses as a seion of wealth, and soon her parents, inpressed, give their consent to their marriage. Diseovering that she has little money, Frederick forces her to diseontinue modeling for him, since he has fallen in love with a blond Venus, Jean Stewart, his new model. Herself an artist, she has been prompted to do this work to avoid starvation; and Frederick finds her suggestions and eompanionship stimulating. She resists his advanees, for she has fallen in love with John Burr, Frederick's young lawyer friend who often visits the studio. Meeting Frederick at a restaurant for dinner one evening, she notices John eseorting Judith to a nearby table; but sinee she fears trouble for him, neglects to draw Frederick's attention to them. Several weeks later, John buys Frederick's pieture of Jean, (whom he had seareely noticed on his visits) at an exhibition to prcsent as a gift to Judith; and Frederick, alarmed when he notiees the picture there—for he eannot pay alimony should she divorce him—grows eold to the model. His love finds its most physieal vent in Beatriee Kraft, his next poser whom he finally betrays. When she threatens to expose him, he uses his wife's money to hush her. In the meantime, Jean discovers Judith's intrigue with the wealthy John and promises to reveal nothing to Frederick only if she is liberally paid. With this money she buys clothes and rents a luxurious apartment to whieh she invites Burr after she has met him outside his home one day. At their engagement party a week later, Beatrice, who has eome in spite of Frederick's protests, meets his new model, Grace Healy. When she tries to warn her against Frederiek's designs, the latter kisses her (Beatrice) and offers her more money. Judith who has come as an uninvited guest to tell her husband she is about to have a ehild, sees him giving her money. Disgusted with the mess they have both made of their married life, she plans to commit suieide. As she stands on the poreh, her husband's best friend, Karl Lieso, again offers her his love and protection. She refuses him, and smiles cyncially when she soon sees him engrossed in Grace Healy, younger and more vivacious than she is. Just as she is about to climb the balustrade, she hears Jack Coll, another of Frederiek's friends, rebuking him for his negleet of his wife. He promises to return home immediately; but remains in a troubled state after Jack has gone. After watehing him from behind the eurtains, Jack, who knows of his harrassed state, suddenly notiees the hiding Judith. When he attempts to force his attentions upon her, Frederick is aroused from his suieidal thoughts. Angrily throwing his friend down, he embraces his wife lovingly. Several minutes later there is a erash. Beatrice Kraft whom Frederiek has promised to marry after he divorces Judith—and he thought that an approaching event—having noticed their reunion, has thrown herself from an adjoining balcony. The two stare tearfully at eaeh other. The party breaks up and the two return home sorrówfully. Judith refuses to hear his explanations, and after whispering her secret into his ear, begs to begin anew with him. Frederiek buries his face in her lap in his fervid acquiesence.

WHILE her mother and her new stepfather, Maurice, continue on their honeymoon, Roxanne is left at the Indiana home of her uncle, Philip Beauclain. Although her cousin, William besieges her with his attentions, Roxanne ignores him for his more debonaire brother, Felix. Judy, a poor relative who has been betrayed by the latter while visiting the Beauclains, warns Roxanne against secretly meeting him. When Roxanne scoffs at her, Judy informs William. Caught by him, when in spite of his protests, she rides his wild horse, Sultan, Roxanne resists his love-making and his proposal. As they enter the house, Mrs. Beauelain, noting William's unhappiness and Judy's restlessness, telephones Mauriee to take the cause of it, Roxanne, away. The following day, Roxanne and her parents depart in a terrible storm and Felix, who is planning to compromise Roxanne after he has induced her to ride with him, follows them. William fears for Roxanne's safety in the storm, and likewise follows. Near the village, he sees Felix dash out from the side of the road, but is too late to stop the collision. Just as Felix and Roxanne are dragged from the wreek, a lightning-struck tree falls on the ear killing the latter's parents who are pinned beneath. After Roxanne reeovers, she again meets Felix secretly; but confronted by the infuriated Judy one night, deeides to leave. William passes by in time to prevent Felix from further hurting Judy. After gaining her consent to their marriage, William writes two notes for his mother and Felix before he departs with Roxanne. When Felix reeeives his mother's note by mistake, he changes the tone of its contents to indicate that William's indiscretion with Roxanne has forced him to marry her. Mrs. Beauelain ealms her irate husband by showing him Felix's letter (which she has received), and the warning therein that he discontinue molesting Roxanne soon prompt Judy to reveal her betrayal. Felix refuses to marry her, and suggests that Mr. Beauclain pay her. Ashamed of the dishonor to his name, and fearing seandal, Mr. Beauelain goes to Sultan's stall to eommit suieide, but is killed by the fiery horse instead. In the meantime, Roxanne and William, who, after some difficulty (since they are minors), have been married are on a train, honeymoon bound. Roxanne realizes she doesn't love William, writes a note to that effeet, while he is in the smoking room, and promising to send her address to his mother, leaves the train. Several weeks later, proprietor of a shop in a midwestern eity, Roxanne meets Judy and her starving young friend, John Thomas. The latter, a nephew of Ferrer, a friend with whom William is staying, returns thenee after saving Roxanne from Felix, (who, having forced the address from his mother, has followed her here,) and after eompelling Felix to marry Judy. Mrs. Beauclain eomes to bring Roxanne to William and Felix trailing them is followed by Judy. When the former throws his brother from the house, Felix attaeks Ferrer's house with a gang. In the shooting that follows, Judy kills him, and William and John Thomas are wounded. Roxanne declares her love for her husband, gives Judy her shop, and departs on a happier honeymoon with him.

ALAN NOTTINGHAM, twenty-four and good looking, takes more than a dancing master's interest in his new pupil, Anna Hyde. Moonlight nights find Alan and Anna drifting lazily along in a canoe on a nearby lake. Alan strums on his guitar and sings love songs to his beautiful lady. Barbara Henderson, who is as sincerely in love with the master as he is with Anna, sits home night after night, brooding. Progress on the Nottingham-Hyde friendship is interrupted by the girl's taking a vacation with her mother at a shore resort where she attracts the attention of the handsome, hotel clerk, Paul Lederer. He is with her in the morning when she goes walking or swimming; he goes motoring with her in the afternoon, and at night he monopolizes all her dances. She becomes so enrapt in his suave manners and his excellenee as a dancing partner that when Alan is unable to keep a week-end engagement with her, she just tears up his telegram, and easts the bits of paper into the waste paper basket. In the eity Alan remains faithful to her, even though he does take Barbara to the theater oceasionally. Barbara flirts with him. She wears alluring gowns to make herself more attractive. But Alan is able to resist her womanly eharms until he receives a phone eall from Mrs. Hyde who tells him that one morning, while Anna and Paul were out hiking at the resort, she purposely falls from a roek into Paul's arms. This stirred his emotions and he has the eourage to ask her to be his wife. She puckered her lips that they be kissed. Beeause the girl's mother objeets to the girl's suitor, the young eouple elope.

The news distresses the dancing master and he takes to drink. Every night that Barbara comes to his offiee she finds him completely inebriated. During one of his sprees, he attempts suicide by jumping from a ferry. Alert Barbara who had followed him from his home to the ferry, saw him go overboard and she screamed. Reseuers are attracted and Alan is reeovered alive. In his semi-conscious condition he hears Barbara pose as his sister and orders the rescuers to take him to her apartment where she nurses him. When he is strong enough to sit up he asks her why she is so good to him. She tells him how much love she has for him, and Alan tells her that he will marry her when he gets well. Their married life is a happy one.

At the Lederer's much bickering and arguing goes on between Anna and Paul because Anna's parents will have nothing to do with them. Paul is discharged from his job as clerk. He refuses to accept the position his father-in-law offers because it is manual labor on road constructions. As their money grows less, they sell various fixtures from their home to get enough money to buy food. Few pieees of furniture are left. Anna wears shabby clothes. When she realizes that she will soon have a child, she leaves her husband and goes home. Her parents urge her to institute divorce proceedings immediately. Destitute, Paul is glad to return to his father's drygoods business in San Franeisco. Paul works very hard to make the small store look well so that customers will be attracted to it. Within three years he and his father aequire proprietorship of the largest department store in San Franeiseo. The newspaper account of this deal is read by Anna who stops in at that store the next day to do her shopping. While she is examining some gloves Ruth, her three year old daughter, strays away from her, and wanders to the toy department in the back of the store. An official notiees the lone ehild and eomes to talk to her, taking Ruth up into his arms. Realizing the child has wandered away, Anna goes to look for her and finds the ehild in the arms of an exeeutive-looking man, but she eould not see his faee which was hid behind the ehild, until she came up very close. She is surprised beeause the man is the ehild's father—Paul. In his private offiec he reiterates his love for Anna, and the three elasp in a love embraee.

AT her Aunt Franees' house, Corinne Ross falls in love with Thomas Pollard, one of her cousin Delia's beaus. Delia displays a heightened interest in him when she notiees his attentions to Corine at her father's store where he is assistant superviser, and at her house. He brings both girls flowers, and Delia eonfides to her mother that he will probably propose to her the following night at the party. However, when she notiees Thomas giving Corinne an engagement ring, she is furious. At her suggestion, her mother urges her husband to discharge Thomas. When the latter leaves for another town to find work, Corinne returns home in despair. There Mr. Ross and his brother, joint owners of a sawmill, as weil as the store, urge her to friendship with Peter Bentley, foreman; for both men see in this progressive young man a prospeetive and profitable partner in their growing eoneern. Although Peter visits the house often and brings her gifts, Corinne treats him like a brother; for she is still eorresponding with her Thomas. They contrive to visit each other at his mother and sister's home where he lives. Corinne is overjoyed when they plan to elope seeretly. Suddenly his letters eease; so that when his sister invites her for a week-end visit, Corinne refuses after questioning her about Thomas. When Janet, the sister, thereupon writes him to inquire, and seold him, he answers with a seathing letter to Corinne about whose supposed engagement to Peter he has heard from Delia. For the latter, in her visits to Corinne, has diseovered his address, and has eorresponded with him. When Mr. Ross is finally informed through Delia of Corinne's eorrespondence and visits to Thomas, he demands that she marry Peter immediately. And Corinne who has angrily sent back her ring is answer to Thomas' last letter,—accedes. After the death of her first ehild, Corinne, desperate because she does not love her husband, plans to eommit suicide. But when Delia who visits her while enroute with her new husband to another town, confesses her intrigues, she gains new vigor in the thought of Thomas' constancy to her. As the years pass, she finds consolation for her lost love in the care of her children. When her oldest son, Lewis, fails continually in his business ventures, she sends him for a position and advice to Thomas whom Janet had brought with her one day. At her suggestion he has kept aloof all these years, and as an excuse for visiting her finally, has attaehed himself as the elderly friend of one of her daughters. When he offers Corinne luxury and love in exchange for poverty, she suddenly realizes her devotion to her aging husband, weak and friendless. Her duty lies with her ehildren and him. Several weeks later, Lewis, whom Thomas, as his secret foster father, has assisted financially and morally, returns with his city fianeee, Cecilia. And when Corinne scowlingly eontrasts her with the town girl whom she had favored as her future daughter-in-law, Thomas' reminder of her own parent's imposures, quiets her resentment. As the couple depart with Thomas, with whom they are to live, Corinne places her arm about Peter's shoulders in understanding and peacc.

HASTILY leaving the party announeing his engagement to Mary Conner, a girl he does not love, John Neilson enlists in the army. Forgetting their joy at their son's betrothal to the girl of their ehoiee, his parents weep as they watch him parading by on his way to the front. As the weeks pass, Mary, worrying about his suddenly stopped correspondenee, gives up her position as seeretary to the president of the bank, to become a nurse in Franee. Always willing to entertain at the eanteen and in the hospital, Mary soon becomes popular with the offieials, espeeially with Jack Norman who is convaleseing there. On his day of leaving the hospital, when he kisses the unwilling Mary good-bye, he is watehed by Nell Lewis, another nurse there to whom he had been friendly. While she is planning revenge, Jaek finds himself in eommand of John's troop, and jealous of the latter's engagement to Mary, makes his life miserable with continual complaints and punishments. Depriving him always of his days off,—for fear he will visit Mary,—Jack writes several cold letters to the former under John's signature. In the meantime, sent with the ambulance to get some wounded men near the German lines, Mary notiees John disguised as a German, hiding in a nearby treneh. Informed of his dangerous mission to the enemy's eamp, Mary pleads with him to give it up; but eovers him with her eloak as some Ameriean soldiers rush by. Forced to throw her out of the trench, John hastens forward, but is stopped by a shot from her revolver. Taken to the hospital, John meets Jaek who has come to propose to Mary, and break his engagement with Nell. Furious at this news, Nell at the Thanksgiving party given the next day, poisons Mary's tea whieh is drunk not only by the latter but by Jack as he pledges to her love. While Nell hastens after Jack, Mary suddenly drops in the midst of the song with which she is entertaining the soldiers; and when Jack, also ill, is placed in the bed next to John's, the latter, overhearing Nell pleading forgiveness for her ruse, intercedes for her. More and more troubled as Mary, upon her recovery, continues to visit him, John, always loyal to his vow, promises to marry her as soon as he recovers, although he realizes his love for Nell. Mary, however, having seen Nell and John secretly meeting outside the ward one day, overhears their conversation, and learns of Nell's broken engagement with Jack, and of John's determination to carry out his promise to her. So that when John comes to take her to the minister, Mary refuses him and confesses her growing love for Jack, who, arriving at this moment to bid her a sad good-bye, is met with open arms. That night, therefore, the two couples are married amidst the cheers of the soldiers and doctors; and when armistice is declared the following morning, the couples hastily pack their things after the general rejoicing, and take the next boat to America.

THE CLEAR CALL

PLANNING to marry Mariella Healy when he is of age, George Woodward takes her riding in his car, to dances, and shows; and when the war is announced, enters heartily into rehearsing the play they have both written to earn money for the Red Cross. Drafted on his twenty-first birthday, George is surprised not to find his name in front-page headlines; and before departing, buys Mariella a diamond ring, which he presents to her with the plea that she marry Harold Kaley, his rival, should he never return. Promising to wait for him always, Mariella bids him a tearful good-bye before he departs for the Oregon training camp. Meeting Harold there, George becomes his bunk mate; but shuns him when he learns that he is involved in the complaints of parents in the town of the enforced attentions on their daughters of the soldiers; and he continues to ignore him when he sees him associating with the women at the camp. Meeting him with several others of the soldiers at the town soda store on their night off and asked to accompany them on their escapades with some women, George refuses, but after being wheedled into some drinks by the counter girl, who has been bribed by the gang, consents. Recovering from his stupor the following morning, Harold tells him of the terrible future consequences to his own health and to the girl he loves. Horror-stricken, George becomes a misogynist and writes cold letters in answer to Mariella's loving ones; and it is not long before he falls into disfavor with the officers for slovenly dress, lateness, and impertinences. Still bitter at his indiscretions, and foreseeing a lonely future for himself, George leaves for another town for final practise before departing for the front. Uged to attend a Y. M. C. A. lecture with his barrack mate, Red, on one night off, George is comforted by a Minister, the Rev. Timothy Dalton, who takes him to a doctor and persuades him to have more faith in himself and in the future. Returning home after the Armistice, George is forgiven by Mariella with a kiss, and is overjoyed when she promises to marry him soon. However, seeing Harold leaving her home one evening, he is again overcome with remorse, thinking he may ruin her life by not giving her a chance to be wooed by a purer, finer man than himself. Obtaining work, therefore, with a big-scale wheat farmer the following week, George absents himself from her home and town for several months, during which time he almost becomes insane from longing for her. Noticing the boy's despairing state, his employer, Mr. Doyle, a business friend of Mariella's brother who lives in the same town, communicates through him with the former; and when he brings George with him one day on a pretense of business, introduces him to her. Laughing happily, they all go driving; and before long George and Mariella, in the rumble seat have kissed and made plans for their marriage in Spokane the following week; for Harold, having been refused, had praised his rival's integrity of character and exonerated him from evil. After many happy years of husband and fatherhood, George's old doubts attack him; but he finds true spiritual freedom from sin in his renewed church attendance and constant prayer. Their constant works of charity and faith soon win them a high place in the community; and when George's fourth child is born, he kisses Mariella as token of his thanks for an inspired and comfortable life with her.

OF a scholarly bent, young Nathan Hale was humiliated by the taunts of his bullying cousin Claude and, determined to build up his frail little body, the child imposed upon himself a rigid outdoor training which made it possible for him, years later, to challenge the husky Claude to a contest of strength. Before an admiring audience composed of pretty Alice Haskins and Philip Adams, Nathan worsted Claude in a series of feats the most spectacular of which was jumping from one hogshead to another; and Claude carried a grievance against his cousin throughout his life as Alice's laughter sounded in his ears.

Years later, while debating at Yale on the subject of women's rights to a liberal education, Nathan caught sight of Philip and Alice in the front row and moved hy Alice's enthusiastic applause, Nathan outdid himself. It was only later, when Alice confided to Nathan that financial straits were forcing her to an early marriage and since Nathan had a hard struggle before receiving his college degree and a long struggle afterward as a teacher before he should be able to support a wife, she had already given her promise to marry Philip. Nathan tried to remonstrate. He was ready to give up everything to marry Alice, but she had already given her promise. They parted with a handshake. For two years Nathan taught in a little school trying to forget Alice. Then, one day a messenger on a galloping horse dashed through the streets of New London crying the tale of bloodshed, of Lexington and Concord. Immediately a town meeting was called on the courthouse steps and Nathan Hale rising to the steps exhorted his listeners in an impassioned speech to take patriotic action at once against England. His was the first cry for Independence and the following morning the young pedagogue took leave of his pupils and left for the wars. With courage and distinction he fought for the cause and then in New York startled the apathetic countryside by his daring in capturing with a picked band of followers a fully armed British Sloop whose prized provisions inspired new hope in the colonial hearts. In the acclaim that greeted his triumph, Nathan again met Alice. He was dismayed by the change in her and learned that Alice had only pity for Philip who, in anguish at his own failings as a husband, had hurriedly undertaken a diplomatic mission in France, leaving her behind. His old love for Alice reawakened, Nathan struggled against his unwillingness to take advantage of his friend's absence, and when Alice pleaded with him to take her, save her from the mistake of her marriage, Nathan gently put her from him.

However, when finally their love could no longer be denied, Nathan agreed to ask Philip to release Alice. On his way home, Philip's ship was bombarded and when he came in with his legs shot away, and Alice fell down at Philip's side, weeping, Nathan softly took his leave realizing that Alice could never leave Philip now when he needed her so desperately. Dazed by the sudden crash of his hopes, Nathan volunteered when a spy to relate the British movements was needed to save the demoralized American hopes. Realizing the terrible risk he was running, Nathan was accepted among the British as a teacher looking for work and his heart beat high as he returned with fully outlined plans. However, the night he waited for his own ship he was discovered by his cousin Claude, now a Tory, who delivered him into the hands of the British. Caught, Nathan sent his plans on with another spy while he was sentenced to the gallows. At the last, his message to Alice was torn up by a brutal British gaoler and as he mounted the scaffold he said quietly, "My only regret is that I have but one life to give to my country."

WHILE everyone on board the oil tanker, California, is engrossed in watching or working the pouring out of the oil into the huge oil pumps on shore, Bobby Maldon, the mess boy, suddenly notices a small craft silently attaching itself to the side of the boat. Stealing down upon his secret visitors, Bobby takes them by surprise, but when the cook and sailors hasten to inquire the cause of the commotion, Bobby tells them of his having fallen accidentally into the water; for having noticed the starved, pleading faces of the two boys as they disappeared into the boat, he says nothing of the boat they had set adrift. After bringing them some food in his cabin, Bobby hurried out to meet Larrie, the cook, before he entered his cabin to narate his adventures on shore with the beautiful Spanish girls. As the boys, Edward and John, fearing their betrayal by Bobby, scramble across the deck to another hiding place, the cook's sudden listening attitude is disturbed by a burst of laughter from Bobby as he pushes his fat friend towards the kitchen. In search of his stowaway friends, Bobby's prowling ways implicate him in the mystery of some money and papers (the latter being important contracts with a New York company for the importation of oil), stolen from the captain's office. Ordered under strict watch by the captain, Larry takes the key to the pantry from Bobby, since he has noticed a sudden shortage of food; for Bobby has been feeding his friends, who, however, ousted from their cabin hiding place by news of the captain's search for the papers, again disappear; so that it is while looking for them one night that Bobby notices Martin, the boat swain, handing some papers to a stranger who has rowed over to the boat. The captain, warned, captures both, and discovering that they as representatives of a blacklisted company have been trying to forge their name on the stolen contracts, the captain rewards Bobby with a raised position and a large sum of money.

Arriving finally in New York, Edward and John, after several narrow escapes from automobiles (as a result of their staring at the skyscrapers), and after a fight with the taxi diver whom they fear is taking them in the wrong direction, arrive at the home of Mollie Brown, Bob's sweetheart. Heartily welcomed by her and her sisters, Doris and Mabel whom they love immediately, the boys are delighted when Bob is also a visitor there the next day. Accepting the positions as salesmen offered them by Bob's new friend, Morton, a representative of the company whose contracts Bobby had saved, the boys soon rise, through credit and managerial positions, and through several safe investments in real estate and oil shares, to prosperous heights. So that when Bob, arriving with the news that he has been made assistant to the captain, proposes to Mollie, the two boys embrace their sweethearts with the same question; and several weeks later the sight of the luxurious triple wedding, brings tears of happiness to Mrs. Brown's eyes.

ANXIOUS to marry a wealthy man, Mildred Graham, a social climber, pays Guy Alcott, her detective friend, to get her an invitation to a society bazaar. When a large sum of money disappears from a neighboring booth, Mildred, as an outsider, is accused. She flees from the place followed by Gilbert Balfour, the financially disabled society heir who has stolen the money. Won over by his flattery, Mildred forgets her anger with the four hundred, and promises to elope with him. When he discovers after their marriage that she is not of the nouveau riche as he had thought—that she is quite poor—he begins to neglect her. After many quarrels, —for she refuses to work for him,—Mildred returns to her mother who had previously warned her against the marriage. Eager to revenge herself upon the society which had inflicted Gilbert Balfour upon her, Mildred forces her mother to sign over her entire small fortune to her. For she needs clothes, property and jewels to introduce herself to society in the authentic manner. Several weeks later, synonymous with the entrance of the wealthy widow, Isabel Barton, to society circles, many robberies are reported in the exclusive Long Island section. Gilbert recognizes her one evening at a party, and follows her home to threaten blackmail should she refuse him money. At the home of a friend, Mae Adams where she is week-ending, Mildred falls in love with a young lawyer, Myron Harris who has come to give some valuable bonds to the hostess. When they are walking in the garden one evening, she suddenly turns pale at the sight of Gilbert behind a tree. She sends Myron to the house for her wrap while she reluctantly agrees to get him the bonds in exchange for a divorce from him. Myron returns in time to see the disappearing form, and look for the strange guest in vain at the evening party. Having long suspected her, Myron searches her room, and has just found a note from a Mrs. Graham who signs herself, "mother" when Gilbert enters to await Mildred. In the fight that ensues the hostess enters; and Gilbert leaves her to face the crisis alone. When Myron confesses himself the thief, Mildred confesses her guilt, but threatens the hostess with exposition of her notorious past should she call the police. So that when the guests question her, she quickly exonerates them. Divorced by Gilbert, Mildred marries Myron; and absorbed in her political aspirations in her husband's behalf in the years that follow, continues to neglect Mrs. Graham. Under the latter's too gentle care, her children grow beyond bounds. The latter, irked by the old lady's restrictions, finally place her in a charitable institution. Canvassing for Myron who is running for mayor, Mildred is shown through the place. She breaks down when she finds Mrs. Graham there, gives up her political work and takes her home. Alice, the younger daughter is convicted for robbery, and when the notoriety forces Myron out of the candidacy, he returns home to build up his broken home. Mildred embraces him repentent.

LITTLE ENEMY

THE advertisement of the farm sounds enticing for the raising of thoroughbred dogs, Roger Evan's hobby. Now that Anita, his fiancee, has suddenly eloped with the rich Freddy Collins and now that his father's death has left him heir to a huge fortune, Roger resolves to devote himself to his work and forget all women. Absorbed in building his kennels and preparing his meals, Roger forgets first the dislike and then the sympathy of the townspeople; but the sight of his neighbor's beautiful daughter, Clytie Sherwood, trespassing on his grounds one day in search of her cow, brings him the restlessness of love. Clytie, whom he had seen horse-back riding while he had been clumsily trying to enter his car with his groceries one day in the village, feels ashamed of her shabby clothes and mission. For Viney, Dr. Sherwood's housekeeper is ill, and Clytie has stoically undertaken the house and farm duties. Roger stares after her in admiration as she peevishly runs away; and although he thinks of her constantly as he repairs and dusts the house, cuts the weeds and attends to the dogs, Clytie spends her time privately lamenting her poverty and disliking the stranger next door.

To cool off after a very hot day's work, Roger strolls into Robin's Rest, a soothing nook on the Doctor's grounds, and again is left staring at Clytie's hasty flight with her dog, Nip. As the weeks pass, while Roger is preparing his catalog and selling his puppies, Clytie rapturously buys the much needed new clothes with the sudden large payment by one of her father's clients. On the road one day, Roger urges Clytie to ride to town with him; and she accepts both this offer and his invitation to see his puppies. Their friendship ripens on frequent visits and notes at Robin's Rest, walks together in the autumn afternoons—after Dr. Sherwood has come home from his calls. In the springtime, Dr. Sherwood, of whose office and bills she is supervisor, rejoices with Viney, at their approaching marriage. The house is renamed Hillcrest, and the two blissfully indulge in orgies of buying furniture, clothes, jewels. They plant a garden together, and dance to the tunes of their new radio, to the delight of their new maid, Jessie Barrom, Viney's cousin. An estrangement over Clytie's departure with her friend, Sally Atherton, for a matinee despite Roger's demand that he take her instead, is short lived. Their long silences at meals and in the evenings is broken by Clytie's sudden burst of weeping, and their mutual forgiveness.

Several weeks later, vacationing in New York, the two invite Anita, whose husband is killed in an automobile accident, Paul Corryington, Ben Housing, and other of Roger's friends to their home for a Thanksgiving holiday. Parties and hunting comprise their good time, and Clytie is undisturbed by Anita's attentions to Roger. However, when she discovers her note in Roger's pocket—in the coat she is bringing to the cleaners—indicating that he has been intimate with his former fiancee, Clytie leaves him. He returns to his architect work in New York; and sent to Europe to build a theater, becomes blind through overstrain. After a year of suffering he regains his sight, and returns to Hillcrest to sell it and grant Clytie a divorce. At Robin's Rest he meets his more mature Clytie and his child. After he has explained that Anita, having showered her attentions upon him in vain, has married;—that he had ignored and disliked her, Clytie comes to his arms. They are to have peace and love at Hillcrest again.

WOMAN'S QUEST

WHEN the pioneers her father, Jacob Story, was leading west, called a halt in the Ohio Valley, Susan protested bitterly. With all the fire of youth she pleaded the romance, the glory of the great unsettled country that stretched to the Pacific Ocean, but Jacob, patting her shoulders told her there was another side to the story she didn't know about. He has counted the cost well before settling here. If they pushed on they would only lose more cattle, more lives. Even Perry Wayne, years older than Susan, tried in vain to assure her that settling here was the most practical arrangement. Susan looked scornfully upon the huge man who loved her so devotedly and with words that lashed proclaimed he would think of the practical when he might be furthering the destiny of a nation. But the Story settlement grew and became a stopover for the pioneers who were pushing on toward the Mississippi and beyond. Often Susan would grow wistful as the little caravans would disappear toward the promised country and when Perry pleaded his love, Susan would look beyond him.

Then one day Randall Laird came with a group of pioneers. The little band had suffered grave losses through an Indian attack and were grateful for the opportunity to remain on for some time at the Story settlement to replenish their stores and heal their wounded. Although she was aware of Perry's suffering, Susan found in Randall a kindred spirit and she would sit apart with the tall, muscular woodsmen each evening and together they would talk of the land they both longed to see. Then Jacob was captured by hostile Indians and when Perry was gravely injured in a gallant rescue of Susan's father, Susan looked upon the crushed form of the man who loved her so desperately and when Randall went on, Susan remained at the settlement as Perry's wife, with the words of Randall telling her he would always love her still ringing in her ears. From time to time thereafter Susan would hear snatches of news about Randall from travelers, and Perry, walking now with a limp worshipped his wife although he knew that her love was somewhere in the great West. Five years later that limp caused Perry's death when it psevented him from getting out of the way of a falling tree while he was helping some new settlers. Susan nursed him faithfully and tears filled her eyes as Perry grasped her hand and told her he had tried to make her happy but had failed. With Susan and their two children about, Perry passed beyond care, smiling as Susan kissed him for the last time.

Some months later a band of people going west passed through the settlement and going on took with them Susan as cook. Her sister Anne, alone understood and cared for Susan's children while through the years Susan followed elusive rumors about the glamorous Randall Laird. Fabled as Mother Sue, she at last found the constant questing too wearying and took up housekeeping for a rancher. Then one night she was summoned to care for a dying man and as she entered the shabby little room, she cried, "Randall" and flung herself upon the prostrate old man. He tried vainly to allocate the bent little woman in his past but at length his struggles ceased and the townsmen realizing that Mother Sue had found the man for whom she sought, didn't tell her that Randall had been shot as a rustler.

That evening Susan's thoughts were not of Randall so much as Perry and with trembling fingers she packed her things and went back to the little home in the Ohio Valley where were her children and Anne and memories of Perry.

THE LAST ROUND

Rev. John E. Stanley File No. 8079

WHEN George Tanner, a former English prize-fighter, came to America, he was immediately employed by a traveling vaudeville company as their strong man. At a benefit performance given by them for the church in the small Florida town which had received them most enthusiastically, George met Lula, a young Sunday School teacher, and related to the wife of John, George's acting partner in the show. When the girl's brothers and father, suspecting all actors, and intending that she marry Martin, a friend of the family, threatened to punish both her and George if they continued to see each other, the latter arranged to meet at the home of John's wife. Suspicious of Lula's meekness in not seeing George at her home any more, her brothers, upon investigation, discovered their clandestine meetings; and fearful of George's designs and the risk to the girl's reputation, threatened to beat him within an inch of his life if he didn't leave the town that night. Anxious to avoid further trouble, Lula acceded to George's plan that they elope; but noticing Lula's absence from her room, the brothers set out to find her at John's house. After they had pulled the weeping girl out of the car, they locked her in her room, and agreed with George that it would be best to fight the matter out the next day.

Not knowing of George's fighting prowess and unusual training in acrobatics, boxing, and wrestling, abroad, the brothers boasted of their sure victory to the townspeople; and many were the bets paid in their name, for they were known everywhere for their sturdiness and remarkable vigor, in the fields and in the sports of the town. Moreover, trained thoroughly by Martin, once a skillful boxing instructor, they were more than confident of their success. The next day after the brothers had left, John's wife succeeded in wheedling the old aunt in charge of the imprisoned Lula, into seeing her and thereupon arranging for her escape from the window. With the hostile eyes of the villager upon him, George bravely faced the youngest of the brothers, for he was to fight one at a time; and in but four quick rounds, the youngster was out. With the same dispatch, George disposed of the other two, evading their ill directed blows, playing with them rather than hurting them overmuch with his own, for he already thought of them as his future brother-in-laws, and why should he wound those who has nurtured his dear Lula? As the crowd, now completely won over to his side, cheered him on, his confidence rallied him on to the winning; and weary at last, his smile however, was bright as he met Lula's glance of thanks.

But a man had stepped forward and offered himself as the final opponent; and a buzz of consternation went through the crowd as they recognized Martin whom they saw as more than George's match at this time. The fight that followed was grim and bloody, and George panted as he received blow after blow. About to fall, he faintly heard Lula's cry, "George, it's for me. You must fight or I'm lost." With a last groaning effort, George raised himself, and dealing the unsuspecting Martin a huge blow, felled him at last. Lula's kiss for the victor was cheered to the roof by the excited crowd, which now surged forward to carry him aloft; and similar was the rejoicing when Lula and George were married at her house the following week.

HAPPY DAYS

Anna M. Herzog File No. 9048

EVERY time John Heinrich Schiller loses his position, he visits his sister, Mathilda for comfort and advice on how to curb his weakness for women. In school his work was copied by the other boys, his shoelaces untied, and his ink spilled down some innocent girl's back while he gaped at his lovely teacher. As a barber's assistant, he cut up his male customers when there were pretty girls to stare at, and was finally discharged for the fantastic haircut given to an ugly spinster while ogling some lovely legs. He almost succeeds as a messenger boy, for Miss White, office managress takes him to dinners and theaters where she holds his hand and gazes soulfully into his eyes; but when he delivers the boss's gift, a chemise, to the latter's wife instead of to his mistress, he is angrily fired by the beaten up man the next morning. At last Mathilda's fiance, Ralph, gets him a position as clerk in a Mr. Schnitzel's grocery store. Mr. Schnitzel watches him closely and leaves notes to save his clerk from sudden absent-mindedness when women customers enter the store. However, returning from a business trip one week, he is dismayed to find that many women patrons have suddenly lost their purses or become poverty-stricken as soon as they noticed John in charge. Mr. Schnitzel demands the latter's salary to cover the loss; so that the next time he leaves on a business trip, John adopts the ruse of telling the suddenly bankrupt women that the vindictive Mrs. Schnitzel is listening behind the door to their illegitimate pleas; or else he secretly collects the money from their purses which they place on the counter, and laughs with them as they depart. Mr. Schnitzel arrives to find lip rouge stains on John's face, a pile of books which a pretty imposter has sold him, and the cash register minus its payment of twenty-five dollars. Again his salary pays the expense, for he discovers that Schnitzel did not order the books as the girl had said. Sent on a bill collection tour, John is given kisses by one, a baby to hold by another woman, and a punch in the face by yet another's irate husband. He grimaces remorsefully as he sees another salary disappear, but brightens up as Frieda, Schnitzel's daughter, enters. She slaps him at his advice that she sell her books to the love-starved baker next door. Their quarrel brings down the Schnitzels who introduce her as their offspring just home from college. John is forever stumbling in her way with a broom, or writing pad. The next week, assisting her in the inventory of the cellar, he accidentally pushes her into the mustard barrel after she has overthrown the pickle keg on him. Fired, he obtains a position with a Mr. Konig as plumber's assistant. On Christmas night he reluctantly accepts the invitation of Emma, a lady's maid, to a kitchen party. Placed on the porch to cool off (for he is drunk), John rolls off thereby frightening a man who is assaulting his hold-up victim. After the hold-up man has dragged his victim into a hallway, he throws his coat at the prostrate John. The latter, finding a huge sum therein, consults Mr. Sehnitzel for advice. The iron pipe used to injure the man, later is used as evidence against him in court; but at the hospital, the now recovered man exonerates him and rewards him for returning the money. His Greek friend who has constantly urged him to withdraw his money from the bank, is identified as the notorious hold-up man. Brought home by the Schnitzels, John is greeted by Frieda. He puts the handkerchief on his head instead of his hat, and tries to stuff the latter into his pocket in his confusion. They all laugh, and the Schnitzels beam at their daughter's "good match" as the couple embrace happily.

THE IMPERFECT DECEPTION

John Knight File No. 9505

THE evening that Alice Jones pledges her heart to Charles Ellsworth, Bob, his cousin, swears an oath to take the girl away from Charles even if it means using foul play. All Colonel Ellsworth's money is stolen during the night, and when the butler testifies to the poliee in the morning, he accuses the son, Charles. Before Charles can clear himself, his father banishes him from house and town. He wanders from one city to another, looking for work. Each shop turns him down. Finally he comes upon an airplane factory where he secures a job repairing motors. One day, while he is tightening bolts, he hears the newsboys outside selling extras which carry news of the declaration of war by President Wilson. Instead of going to eat on his lunch hour, Charles goes down to a recruiting station and enlists in the aviation corps. At the government aviation school Charles is taught to pilot a plane. As soon as he receives his license he is assigned to the allied air service camps alone the Rhine. During one air battle, Charles is able to bring down four German planes. For this he receives a commission and honor stripes on his shoulder.

During Charles' absence from home, Bob takes Alice boating and dancing. He declares his love for her, but Alice urges him to prove his love for her by taking up arms in defense of the country. At the military camp he is subjected to coarse food, damp sleeping quarters, ditch digging and rifle practice. The transport on which he sails for France runs the gauntlet of the German U boats. After disembarking he is assigned to the same division wherein his cousin is registered. He lays out plans to kill Charles. Under cover of the night, Bob forces a subordinate at the point of a gun, to loosen parts in the motor of the plane scheduled to carry Charles over the enemy's camp in a raid the following day. Ellsworth and six other pilots leave the field in the morning. When the company returns at night, Ellsworth is not with them. Thinking that his cousin is dead, Bob hurries home after Armistice is signed. The announcement of the forthcoming wedding of Alice and Bob appears in the papers. Charles reads about it while he is sitting in his shabby room which he shares with the buddy Bob had forced to tinker with the airplane motor. As a result the plane crashed while over the German camp. Fortunately Charles escaped serious injury and though he is taken prisoner, he gets in on the exchange of prisoners after peace is declared. Now he is determined to clear himself in the eyes of his town folk, and win back the girl who really belongs to him. He arrives in town during a party which is being given in honor of Alice and Bob. He rushes past the doorman who tries to stop him, and into the ball room where all the guests are dancing. He orders the orchestra leader to stop playing the music. Then he stands up on a chair, and speaking as loudly as he can, denounces Bob who he explained, had been the one guilty of robbing his father. He tells how Bob tried to kill him during the war. Realizing that Charles' truth would convince Alice of his deceitful measures, Bob flees through a side exit never to be seen in that town again. The old Colonel forgives his son and extends his blessing to Alice and Charles who are married that night.

WOMAN AWAKENED

BETTY EDWARDS, red-haired daughter of the North Side grocer shuns the wealthy South siders who attend the country school with her. When they laugh at her for her shabby clothes and gawkiness, she returns their taunts, then weeps. Comforted one day by Jack Cross, a North Side neighbor, who had seen Johnnie Reid, the banker's son, throwing snowballs at her, Betty invites him to her house. Jack continues to befriend her on their fishing trips at a nearby creek, and in her work at her father's store to earn money for her graduation dress. Graduating with honors, Betty is congratulated by her friends; and when she enters high school, she realizes, from the kindness of the South Siders towards her, that she has grossly misjudged them. The years pass, and in between her housekeeping duties for her father, and studying, Betty fishes, attends concerts, and philosophizes with Jack. Another graduation day arrives, and Betty stoically decides to remain home and help her father instead of attending college as Jack, John, and her best friend, Elsie Newell, are doing. As the seasons follow in quick succession, Betty studies horticulture,—plants a beautiful garden, assists the overworked librarian of the town, and dreams of Jack who has promised to visit her during his vacations. However, work and his social life prevent Jack from keeping his promises; and as his letters become less frequent, he becomes vaguer in Betty's memory. Johnnie Reid, who arrives in his roadster from college one day to admire her garden and invite her to picnics with Elsie Newell and her fiance, is more real. In his many visits to her house, John discusses music, books, and philosophy with her, and finds himself in love with her before he departs on his vacation trip to the West Coast. Betty, weary of being poor, decides to accept him should he propose. She has the house painted and renovated with new curtains and furniture; but when he asks the question one day after she has been looking over some old snapshots of Jack and herself, her answer is "no". Elsie's revelation of the rich girl, Dorothy, whom Jack had rushed at college, again brings up the old North Side, South Side barrier. Besides she doesn't love him, for Jack's image is always in her mind and heart. John departs heartbroken, and returns a year later to become the assistant cashier for his father, and to introduce his wife, Dorothy, to town society. Elsie and other of Betty's friends are married and drift away to other towns for a livelihood or gayer society. Unable to bear her loneliness, Betty hurries off on a fishing tour to the creek. Suddenly a voice applauding her efforts arouses her from her brooding. Jack, a full-fledged lawyer now, has been in town several weeks, disillusioned by Dorothy's (his college mate) refusal of his attentions. The sight of Betty's garden, and the more matured girl herself under the tree, have aroused pleasant memories. Again he is the little boy, disliking the South Siders. Betty is the girl for him. They embrace happily in their discovery of each other at last.

JEALOUSY

Mrs. Michael B. Schmitz File No. 8266

ENGROSSED in his affairs with some of his fair clients, Mr. Wallace Spar, lawyer, pays no attention to his wife's sudden disinterest in social life resulting from the recent news that she may never have a child. Seeing a picture of Marcia Dally, winner of an infant beauty contest, Mrs. Spar, recalling Mrs. Dally as a former sweetheart of her husband's, decides that Marcia is her husband's child of the past and therefore rightfully belongs to her. Visiting Mrs. Dally, now the wife of a very poor man, Mrs. Spar showers gifts of money and clothes upon the large family, and begs to be allowed to adopt the child. Accused of past infidelity with Mr. Spar, Mrs. Dally denies ever having known anyone by that name, and refuses to accept the money Mrs. Spar offers her in exchange for the child's adoption. At home, breaking open her husband's desk in his absence Mrs. Spar, having read the letters written her husband years before by Dorothy (Mrs. Dally's first name), determines to kidnap the child. Hastily packing her things, Mrs. Spar rushes into the car outside only to realize that she is in the car of Mrs. Kay Dwight, one of her dear friends who has come to visit her. Kay, noticing her agitation and her valises, and recalling Mrs. Spar's enthusiasm of the day before about the child (whose mother she had met through Mrs. Spar), has her car followed. Arriving there several hours later, and finding the family distraught about the loss of the child, Kay soon overtakes her friend with Marcia. Imprisoned in spite of her bribes and protests, and heartbroken by the scandal,—in spite of Mr. Spar's promises to defend her in court,—Mrs. Spar finally escapes from her cell by slipping back the night lock. Still longing for Marcia, she again kidnaps her; but colliding with the car of Mr. Spar who is rushing to consult a fellow attorney, is seriously wounded. Realizing that the child will be marred, she refuses to undergo the operation which means life, and weepingly offers all her money to the Dallys. Shown a letter by Mr. Spar of the real Dorothy's recent departure for South America with her husband, Mrs. Spar, realizing her error about Marcia's legitimacy enters the operating room. As the years go by, Mrs. Spar continues to offer money and gifts to the Dally family; and interested in Marcia's singing voice, has her well trained. Her scars finally effaced by a skillful specialist sent by Mrs. Spar, Marcia makes a brilliant debut at the town hall. Never at a loss for singing engagements at concerts or in the opera, and everywhere acclaimed, Marcia sends home generous checks from her travels; but meeting Walter Barton, Mrs. Dwight's nephew one evening at a party given by Mrs. Spar in her honor,—and after several months of parties, walks and rides,—happily agrees to quit her career for the greater bliss of marriage with him. At the wedding, informed that she may have a child, Mrs. Spar sees a hopeful future in her husband's tearful eyes, and smiles joyfully as Walter kisses Marcia after the ceremony.

HIDDEN ADVENTURE

Woodrow Strickland File No. 9092

WHEN Melvin Barkley's interest in strange places and travels leads him constantly to the maps and books at the library, he meets Bob Radisson, a youthful enthusiast in such adventures. In talking to the boy, Melvin forgets his slavery to a desk, and promises to go with him as soon as he has saved the money. At Barkley's home, Bob falls in love with the latter's daughter, Catherine, who scorns his impracticality and dreams. Mrs. Barkley also dislikes Bob, especially when she learns from Mathew Webb, the son of her husband's employer, and Catherine's best friend, that Mr. Barkley's absent-mindedness is threatening his position. One night Catherine goes riding with Mathew whom she is certain will propose. But when he takes her to a wild party instead and suggests that she be his mistress—since he is to be married shortly to a society girl—she runs away. He follows her and tries to force his attentions on her; but her cries attract the notice of a passing truckman who takes her home. Infuriated, Mr. Barkley, long submissive, now violently denounces his employer to his face and resigns his position. A shortage of money is discovered after his leaving, and when he is called by the office, his wife's information that he has suddenly left the country with Bob, strengthens the case against him. Catherine who is angry because her father has taken her mother's savings and her own, and because she is anxious to prove his innocence, follows them. Bob is irritated at her presence and tries to get her off the boat before it starts; but Catherine threatens to denounce Mr. Barkley as a thief unless he leaves with her to prove otherwise. But Mr. Barkley, having seen her, has hidden, and while looking for him, the boat gets under way. Arrived in China, the three are camping beneath a cliff when Catherine's sudden disappearance is noted. Their search leads them to a cave from the mouth of which the boulder has been pushed away. After they have penetrated the dark labyrinth they are about to turn back when they realize they are lost. They stop petrified as they become aware of the sniffing and treading of an animal. This is followed by a terrific roar, and when their searchlight reveals a huge monster, they reel with terror. Their shooting has no effect upon it; when Bob sees Catherine crouching in the path of the animal, he hastily climbs to the boulder covering the cave directly above it. One strenuous push and the thing is killed by its fall; but they have not noticed that immediately in front of Catherine is a foul abyss. Catherine screams as the animal revives somewhat and tries to get out of the way of its lashing tail. Bob takes her across the narrow ledge of the opening at the risk of his life, just one minute before the monster hurls itself at them and falls headlong into the chasm. There is a sudden crumbling, and a chink of light is revealed. They go towards it, out upon land again. They wonder why the caravan of Chinese merchants whom they ask for assistance, flee from them. Crash! The earthquake which besets those regions, has come. On the boat Mr. Barkley dies of exhaustion and shock; and at home it is discovered that his office enemy who had created the shortage, has been found. Several weeks later Bob and Catherine are quietly married, while Mrs. Barkley who has been ill from worry, smiles her blessing. Bob is acclaimed as the great explorer who has at last excavated the nearest resemblance to the prehistoric monster for which museums have been searching. And he finds Catherine's embrace his best reward.

EXIT FROM EDEN

Arthur Miller File No. 9058

AFTER a violent quarrel with her husband because in his newly acquired dignity as President of the Tapscott Bank he will not take her to night clubs, Mella Robbins flings herself out of the house and visits the notorious Burgundy Inn. There she meets Joseph Collins, a prominent lawyer who attracted by her dark beauty becomes an ardent admirer. Unknown to Mella however Collins is the mouthpiece of the gang of gamblers which "Slippery" Jack Rider, secret owner of the roadhouse leads. Therefore when "Slippery" calls Collins aside and demands a large sum of money Collins begging him to speak lower is forced to agree. During the next few days Mella and Collins see each other constantly. Presuming upon this friendship Collins persuades Mella to introduce him to her husband, Edward Robbins. By his pleasing and ingratiating manner Collins succeeds in interesting the banker in a corporation he claims he is forming but for whose financing he lacks funds. Robbins agrees to aid the corporation and convinces the Directors of the bank to lend large sums to it which are given to Collins. Meanwhile Collins has drawn Robbins into an intimate association with "Slippery" whom he knows as William Leighton, a prospective member of the new firm. Aware that his friendship with him has not prevented Collins from continuing to see Mella, Robbins comforts himself with the company of Mary O'Donnell, a friend of Leighton's, alias "Slippery".

Robbins succeeds in putting off the Directors whenever they bring up the question of returning the loan since Collin's glib tongue has convinced him that the money is tied up in the business. Finally, spurred on by Walter Mead, a member of the Board who begrudges Robbins his successful affair with Mary O'Donnell, they hold Rohbins responsible for an immediate payment. He is forced to resign his presidency and when the relationship between Collins and "Slippery" is discovered it is assumed that Robbins was also associated with the gambler and he is arrested, charged with embezzlement. At the trial Collins and Mary O'Donnell testify that not only did Robbins know "Slippery's" true identity but that he received generous fees for securing the bank loan. Mella, realizing that she is still in love with her husband and that this misfortune is the result of her prompt acquiescence to Collin's plans by introducing the two men stands by Edward even when he is sentenced to jail.

Some time later Collins is shot in a brawl with "Slippery" and confesses that Robbins sincerely believed in the corporation for which he secured funds and that he did not know "Slippery" except as Mr. Leighton. With his last breath he tells "Slippery's" hiding place and here "Slippery" is captured after a difficult siege by the police. Through Mella's efforts Robbins is pardoned after serving a brief sentence and is happily reunited with Mella who can never forgive herself for the havoc wrought in their lives by her innocent desire for a gayer life. But Robbins holding her tightly in his arms kisses away her misgivings sure of untold happiness now that they are together again.

YOUTH MUST WED

Ruth Willis File No. 8448

WHILE Richard Paige is sitting in his summer home trying to untangle a fishing line, his mother, a widow who is very ambitious for her son, exacts from him a promise that he will find his soul mate and be married before the end of the summer which is just beginning. Amy Louise Rodgers, the daughter of a wealthy neighbor, gets tired waiting in the boat for Dick to come back, and she comes up to the cottage to see what is delaying him. Enraged when she finds him still fussing with the lines she darts out of the room calling him a miserable pest. Dick runs after her but Chickie, as he calls her, refuses to go boating with him. So he returns home, and ponders over his promise and how to make it good. He decides that he needs some practice in making love to a girl. Just as he gets down on his knees, Amy walks into the parlor. He continues with his act, using her as his subject for a stuttering proposal. Amy declares he is hopeless, makes him quit the nonsense and drive her and Genevieve DePere, another neighbor's daughter whom they are to stop for, into town. When he returns, Dick finds that Robert Bishop, his best friend, has arrived for the week-end. Dick asks Bob either to get him a girl or teach him how to get one himself, because he must fulfill his promise. Bob agrees to the latter providing Dick does not use his newly acquired technique to score on Amy because he was going out for her in a big way.

At a party given that night by Gen, Bob makes love to Amy out in the garden, but meets with little success because Dick, with Gen on his arm, happens to stroll along and interrupt him. The following afternoon Bob resumes his ardent wooing outside in a swing on the lawn. Amy declines his marriage proposal. When he dares to ask her if it is Dick whom she loves, Amy starts to weep, leaves Bob and hurries into the house. Bob goes to his room, packs his bag, and makes a hasty get-away, explaining his sudden departure in a note to Dick. Dick is out on the porch, reading, one afternoon, and Gen comes running up yelling that Amy is drowning. Dick jumps off the porch and runs toward the lake, diving in with his clothes on. By the time he reaches the nearest lake bank, a doctor arrives and treats Amy. As soon as she is well enough to have visitors, she is permitted to sit outside in a swing padded with pillows. She is visited by Gen who is dejected because of Bob's going away so soon. Gen explains that her making up to Dick all the summer long had been merely a flirtation to make Bob jealous, but the plan failed. She says good-bye and returns to the city where she intends to register at the same college Bob attends. The thought of Gen's trick played on her makes Amy break down into a sob. Dick comes along and sits down next to her. He dries her eyes with his handkerchief and tries to comfort her. Between sobs Amy reminds Dick jokingly of the proposal he once offered her, and Dick repeats it. Mrs. Rodgers is on her way toward Amy with a tray of lunch. Seeing her daughter cuddled up in Dick's arms, she goes back to the cottage to call Mrs. Paige. The two mothers, arm in arm, walk over to the swing where the two young lovers are sitting, shake hands with each and bestow parental blessing upon them in different ways. Mrs. Paige, flustrated because her son has surprised her in his choice—Mrs. Rodger's attitude that of a normal mother who is happy in her child's newly found happiness.

THE DEVIL STRIKES

Louis Nagy File No. 9530

FRANZ JOSEF of Austria-Hungary stares horrified at the paper announcing the murder of his cousins, the Crown Prince and his wife. Suddenly he hears a bugle call followed by the incessant tread of feet and the singing of all the national anthems. But young Lester Toth, making love to his father's worker, Mary, outside his spacious Hungarian dwelling, does not hear the tumult of mobilization. Drafted at last, George, Lester's best friend, and leader of the town orchestra, plays a song of farewell for the embracing couple. After a lingering glance at Mary, George departs with his friend for the front. At the camp, Lester's physical and mental prowess win him a lieutenantship; and George resenting the authority of the uniformed stranger, refuses to obey him. However, Lester proves his true friendship by saving him from deserting while on duty, and from subsequent court martial. Several weeks later the gaily starving, shabbily-clad friends are marching with their troop from the deserted Russia front to France. Tempted by the thought of seeing Mary and his parents as the train passes through his native town, George, though previously warned against such rashness by the colonel, jumps.

But he shows no disappointment when at Mary's house he finds Lester being royally entertained. After his medals have been praised, Lester hastens with George to Budapest where the troops are stationed. There the colonel sorrowfully withdraws Lester's rank for six months while George is sentenced to two weeks in prison. When Lester is transferred to another regiment for further punishment, George, at his request, writes letters of love, to Mary. Returning to camp six months later, Lester is shot in the dark by George who guards the entrance to the trenches. His wound healed, the following week, Lester earns the devotion of the colonel by saving him from being shot in the back. When he is granted a short vacation in town as a reward, he steals food and cigarettes for the starving soldiers.

To celebrate their feast, George sends Lester for his violin; but hearing a shot and cry, rushes out to save his friend. When George's legs are shot off, the wounded Lester hurriedly covers them so that he may not see his misfortune. Suddenly there is a shot, and George rolls over on Lester to save him. His dying words declare his love for Mary and his friend; and Lester, noticing one of the letters written in his (Lester's) name which he had been about to mail to Mary, realizes George's silent love for her. As repentence, he resolves never to return to his sweetheart. Months pass, and Lester gains new scars and cynical forgetfulness with his recently arrived American comrades at the front. Armistice is signed at last, and Lester is free to wander. As he is leaving his trench, he hears the cry of a dying soldier, who, when he is approached, begs him to write a letter to his parents. Lester writes, but a sudden shell severely wounds him. Identified by the letters in his pocket, he is sent to his native town after he has been treated at the hospital. Mary, who has been telegraphed by the hospital authorities, finds him trying to creep back into the train when he finds himself at his station. She pushes him into the waiting car; and when he tells her of George's death, she swears that she had known nothing of his love. They kiss in mutual love and remembrance of the dear departed.

THY NEIGHBOR'S WIFE

Eva Westlock File No. 8463

IN a tiny apartment Ann slaves for her husband, a blunt, unresponsive lawyer who gruffly flings his wages at her each week. Then a lifelong friend of Dan's is killed with his adored young wife as they happily leave Dan's office, and Dan brings their lonely child, Carol, then fifteen, to his home. Carol is immediately assimilated by the youngsters, Tommy and Margaret, but Dan grumbles when he finds that Carol has inherited only her parent's beautiful home in the suburbs. At the same time Aunt Edna, Dan's sister-in-law, announces that she is coming and Dan protestingly yields because Aunt Edna has more money than she knows how to handle. Aunt Edna it is, who convinces Dan that instead of selling Carol's estate, he should bring his family there for a vacation much needed. At the end of the summer, Dan is induced to remain and he commutes, while Ann soon becomes a vivacious and sparkling person through her part ownership of a Fifth Avenue dress salon with Cassie, a neighbor, whose life desire to own a fashionable dress shop instead of her own, is realized when Aunt Edna promises to finance her and Ann.

Dan's craving for position is realized when Tony Langford proposes Dan for membership at the fashionable country club but Ann, although she sees in Tony the answer to all her yearnings for romance turns Tony away. However, Tony's wife, Alice, notoriously unfaithful, gradually plays upon Dan's vanity to win him, while Tony's son, Bob, in love with Carol, turns to Margaret when Carol censures his excessive drinking. Margaret's marked talent as a dancer brings her recognition and she leaves for a successful road tour. In her absence Dan, rebelling against his wife's making more money than he does, goes on a trip abroad and Alice, angered by her failure to win him, follows on the same boat. Carol and Bob are married, but when Margaret learns of this she tempermentally refuses to go on with her tour, walks out on her manager, and comes to New York. Bob, harassed by financial worries and the fact that Carol is soon to be a mother, is victimized by Margaret, who, when he tries to leave her, induces him to take her up in his plane, for the last time. Margaret madly gives Bob a sleeping potion and as he tries vainly to ward off the drug she holds his inert body for one moment before the plane crashes and the pair are brought to the hospital where at the moment Carol's baby is being born with only Ann and Tony at her side. Margaret dies but Bob painfully recovers.

Ann, hurt by Dan's failure to return to help her face the scandal at length goes to Paris with Cassie to get her divorce and marry Tony who still wants her.

So it is to the office where a shamed Dan is working in Paris that Ann comes. Despite his pleas for forgiveness, however, Ann for once is adamant and she gets her divorce and returns to snatch at the glamor for which she has always longed with Tony. She doesn't need Edna and Cassie to tell her she is making a mistake, but shouting at them all to leave her alone, she dresses in her wedding outfit. As Tony knocks to find out why she is so late, Ann sinks weakly in a chair but her eyes widen at the sight of a changed Dan standing in her bedroom door. Ann realizes then she has never ceased to love him, and excited as a small child she elopes with him and she and Dan are remarried by the captain of the boat on which they spend their second honeymoon on their way home.

RIDING THE WEST

Charles D. Scott File No. 9518

ZEAL and untiring effort win for Jim promotion after promotion in the small Arizona bank. Then one day a shortage is discovered and Buck Termin whom Jim has bested in the struggle for the coveted post as cashier uncovers sufficient evidence to indicate Jim's guilt. He is harshly prosecuted and sentenced to a long term jail sentence. However, the bank closes as a result of the robbery and the infuriated citizens storm the jail and prepare to lynch Jim who manages to escape by breaking his bonds and outriding his pursuers. Embittered, Jim rides for days and at length applies for work on the ranch owned by Blake Greenward. Jim falls in love with Blake's daughter, Lora, who returns his affection with an honesty and candor which makes Jim fearful of losing her. Lora senses that he is hiding something from her and wonders why he will not reveal his past. Some time later cattle mysteriously disappear from the Greenward ranch and despite all the vigilance of Blake and his men, the rustlers cannot be detected. While Blake is in conference with his men, Buck Termin rides up and Jim pales. Buck, who has discovered previously that Jim is here casts a sardonic look upon Jim and alone with Blake asks him if he knows that there is a price on the head of Jim. When Buck offers proof of Jim's escape from the law, Blake believes that Jim is not above stealing the cattle and he sends for the sheriff. However, although Lora is dismayed by the evidence of Jim's past, she rides to meet him and warns him that the sheriff is coming for him. Jim tries to explain, tries to kiss her, but Lora angrily withdraws telling him she has only saved him from prison—she has not forgiven his failure to tell her of his past and his making love to her under false pretenses. Jim's mouth hardens and he seizes her in his arms, kisses her "for saving him" and rides off.

A few days after Jim goes, Blake Greenward is found murdered. Lora is stunned and she gratefully accepts the aid of Buck Termin who confuses her by his suspicion of everyone on the ranch. Ranch hand after ranch hand leaves and Lora is distrait. Then one day Buck seizes her while they are alone and carries her to a shack in the woods where he orders her to sign over the ranch to him. Lora screams as he twists her arms but he tells her harshly nobody can hear her. However, Jim, homeless and friendless has been unable to remain away from the girl he loves and although he realized that he was risking his life he had come back to see her again. Amazed to discover the ranch has deteriorated so rapidly, Jim learns of the murder of Blake Greenward and the disappearance of Lora and rides frantically in search of the woman he loves. Hearing her screams, he enters the room just as Buck is bending Lora to his will. There is a terrific struggle, Jim with his hands on Buck's throat forces him to confess that it was he who stole the bank money out of jealousy, stole the Greenward cattle, and killed Lora's father so that he might get the ranch and the girl—unhampered. Buck is given over to the sheriff, Jim is exonerated, and as Lora and Jim ride silently home, Lora breaks the constraint by asking Jim if he will manage her ranch. He demands a bribe and as she promises he asks her to become his wife. She consents happily.

JEWELS AND A GIRL

John Gazay File No. 9502

THERE amidst the disarranged jewelry, after the thieves have fled, Alfred Ramsey, fiance of the wealthy Alice Crandall, finds an unfamiliar watch charm. On the boat bound for London where they are bringing the jewels for safe keeping, Alfred notices detective Hawley, Alice's new friend, wearing the same type of charm. Following him from the ballroom the next night, Alfred notices him in furtive consultation with Bob, the wireless operator. After the latter has left, Alfred steals into the radio room and discovers message, "Last deck, 12 p.m." At the ball that night, Hawley persuades Alice not to wear her jewels for safety's sake; and Alfred, hearing this, slips out to replace the real ones with imitation jewels. When Hawley arrives to get Alice's scarf and take the jewels, he finds Alfred at the safe and raises a cry. Alice notices Alfred fleeing from her cabin, but at the request of the wounded Hawley, promises to be silent. In his secret searching of Hawley's cabin the next night, when Alfred finds a letter addressed to Mr. Crandall from his jewelers, warning him of the gangsters who await him at the dock, he hastens to Alice's cabin. There he warns her not to befriend Hawley who is in league with some notorious jewel thieves; and when she scorns him, he shows her the letter sent by Hawley's detective agency denying the latter's association with them. That night, Alice wears the imitation pearls Alfred gives her, and at twelve o'clock, docilely accompanies Hawley to the last deck for a stroll. In the meantime, the wireless operator, having traced the lost message to Alfred, tries to warn the gangsters on their yacht to remain away. Another ship, on which the Crandalls' jewelers have sent their secret service men to protect their client, picks up the message. After they have overtaken the yacht and arrested the gangsters, the secret service men guide the boat toward the Crandalls' ship. Disregarding Hawley's surreptitious signals not to approach, they board the boat. Just as Alice and Alfred, who rushes from a nearby stateroom, hold up the men, Hawley begins to run with the jewels as he sees their strange faces in the light of the suddenly opened door. Overthrowing Alice and Alfred, the men hasten after him, pursued by the latter. Just then the captain and his officials arrive to quell the disturbance; and the former's defense of Hawley is overthrown by the story and identification of the secret service men. Suddenly the storm which has been brewing all day breaks, and Hawley escapes in the excitement. Almost trampled to death in one of the lifeboats where he has hidden, he is taken together with the other people from the sinking boat to the yacht. On the boat which later relieves them of the load, the notorious gang of which Hawley is leader, is arrested; and Alice and Alfred cap the excitement by getting married. Their kiss is the last thing Hawley sees as he is taken from the room.

BLACK CHILE

Mary Grubbs Lambeth File No. 9056

WHEN Letty, the daughter of their faithful servant, rushes in to announce the latter's death, the Sanbornes take her to live with them. She soon becomes the confidante of Patricia, the youngest Sanborne; teaches her Bible history in a way that convulses her elders, and takes her to school every morning. Her thieving habits however, trouble Mrs. Sanborne. For one evening, Claire, the oldest daughter, wearing the anonymous gift of pearls she has received, to a dance, is accused of having stolen them. Letty confesses her guilt to the jeweler, and as punishment, is ostracised by her friends. Several weeks later, Mr. Sanborne leaves on a business trip to the city, so that when Hugh Connolly, a supposed business associate arrives for some bonds and money, he is heartily welcomed. Letty, who dislikes him, takes every opportunity of indicating it,—once by giving Claire's other friend, Raymond Mitchell, the flowers she should have delivered in his (Hugh's) name,—and another time, by telling him Claire was not home, disliked him,—when he appeared to take her to the theater. When one day she agitatedly tells Mrs. Sanborne of Hugh's plan to obtain their fortune through an enforced elopment with Claire—(something she had overheard in the cabin to which she had followed them), she is put to bed supperless for lying and gossiping. When Letty however gives Mrs. Sanborne the package of letters she has taken from his coat (in the closet), the reason for Mr. Sanborne's unexplained delay is revealed. For he is being held until a later day for ransom, and for his consent to Hugh's marriage to Claire. The latter is arrested, and as a reward, the Sanborne's present Letty with a new outfit for her part in the Sunday school Easter day celebration. After a fight with one of her school friends who has laughed at Mrs. Sanborne's hat—a gift from her—the disheveled Letty recites one of the other girl's pieces, in error. Several days later, threatened with a spanking for fighting with a school friend—(who had laughed at her turning the dog on Brother Jordan when he came to persuade her to church membership),—she leaves home. Her father, who years before had run away with her mother's friend, follows her; for he has been prowling around the house in the hope that he may induce her to steal from the Sanbornes. Realizing the latter's affection for her, and angered by Letty's persistent refusals, he now plans to use her for ransom. Eluding him in the woods, Letty, exhausted, cries to Raymond who is on his way to visit Claire, for help. When the father, seeing in him a better prey for ransom, attempts to drag him off, Letty runs to warn the Sanbornes. Seen by Hugh's men who are carrying Mr. Sanborne off for revenge, she is pursued when she screams with horror. When she meets John with a posse, she tells her story and drops exhausted. The matter is cleared up and several years later, now a high school graduate, and a talented dancer, she receives her reward in a dramatic and college education. Upon her graduation, she marries her dramatics instructor Jason Lindsey who later becomes a famous producer of negro opera and plays. On the opening night of his own theater, Claire and her husband Raymond, Mr. and Mrs. Sanborne, John and his wife, and Patsy, attend. After presenting her with a generous gift, the Sanbornes embrace their Black Chile.

HOT LEAD

Lois McCracken File No. 9533

THE climax of Patricia Stone's graduation celebration comes with the arrival of a telegram from her Uncle William in Arizona inviting her to vacation at his ranch. Provided with a complete cowboy's outfit and money for a horse which she plans to buy in Iowa at the farm of her father's friend, she departs the next day amidst the cheers of her friends. From Iowa she decides to horseback to Arizona and surprise her uncle. Since she has cut her hair and pinned it under her sombrero she is not taken aback when she is addressed as "mister" by the waiter of the restaurant where she is lunching. On the road to Sante Fe, she notices two horsemen, Pancho and Pedro, two outlaws whose faces she recognizes vaguely from posters. Arrived in town she enlists in the coming rodeo, and when laughed at as a weak young man by Red Smith, hotel proprietor and Pedro, gives an astonishing proof of her skill. When in spite of Pancho's attempts to intimidate her, she persists, the latter attempts to shoot her from ambush, but slinks away when caught by a visiting cowboy, Jim Larson. Although most of the wagers are on Pancho, Pat and Jim are the winners and divide the reward. When Pat tells Jim she is on her way to her uncle's ranch, Jim, the latter's superviser there, realizes her identity, but says nothing. When the angry Pancho now challanges Pat to a shooting contest, Jim acts as tosser of the dime which is to be their target. The people gape at her remarkable feats; and the sheriff offers her a ranger's position as a reward. Pedro whispers something to Pancho who thereupon urges her to accept a more lucrative one with their gang. Patricia declines both, however, and Pancho glowers at her departing form. At the hotel she is disappointed to find that Jim has left without bidding her good-by; for he has gone to inform her uncle of his niece's doings, and to frustrate the plans of Pancho's gang to steal the cattle. One of the men who has seen him hiding berind their secret discussion place, with two others, follows him. In the meantime, Pancho, who hates Patricia for her victories, and fears her suspicions, hastens after her. At the bottom of a hill near her uncle's ranch, she finds Jim in conflict with the outlaws. They shoot as they ride, and Patricia drops exhausted at the ranch. Her uncle is surprised to find that the "young man" is his pretty niece, when he uncovers her shoulder wound. Patricia's friendship with Jim ripens into love as they ride, picnic and discuss the escaped bandits together. In the midst of exhorting her not to leave the next day as she had planned, Jim sees Pancho and his men far ahead, eseaping from town with a safe and several prisoners. The two overtake them, and assisted by the sheriff and his posse, soon capture them. After they have been granted the thousand dollars reward for Pancho's arrest, the sheriff, who has been selected for the same position in another town, offers the job to Jim. The latter's first command in that capacity is that Patricia marry him; and when she answers a submissive "yes" he kisses her laughingly.

SALUTE THE DESERTED

IT was love that made Alice give up a secretarial position to become the wife of John, but as three babies came within a few years and John found it more and more difficult to provide for his family, he turned from an adoring young husband to a surly brute. Carol, one of the girls who figured in his life before he met Alice, came to town with a traveling show and as they met in a restaurant, John felt that his wife and children were keeping him from enjoying life. That night when little Bobby breaking a wishbone with Tommy, slipped and pushed over a bottle of milk, John threw down his paper in a white fury, and enraged by the disturbance kicked and cuffed the youngsters until Alice threw herself upon him to stop him. Whereupon he flung her aside and stormed that he wasn't going to waste his life supporting an ungrateful family, and without another word he rushed from the house. All night Alice waited for John to come home. The next day when she called his place they told her John had resigned saying he had gotten a better position out of town. For the first time then Alice realized John had really left her.

Even the furniture was called for by the installment people and to support her little ones Alice acted as chambermaid in a boarding house in return for lodging and food. Little Tommy insisted on selling papers, but Alice wouldn't permit Bobby to help. However, by wheedling a paper from his brother, Bobby sold it and when a passer-by gave him a nickel for it, the little one dashed happily across the street to bring it to his mother. Tommy's screams brought Alice running from the house and as the ambulance jogged through the streets, Alice prayed beside the still form. At the hospital the doctor told her there was a chance of Bobby living and when he asked where the child's father was Alice dazedly made efforts to locate John, who, believing Carol that it was just a trick to get him back in the yoke again, made no answer.

Doctor Kramer, admiring the courage of the little mother, refused to accept a fee, but when she protested against the charity he agreed smilingly to let her work as secretary. To his own surprise she proved efficient and soon grew indispensable. Bobby recovered and Tommy, who had been taking care of the youngest, interested the doctor, by his keenness. Once the doctor saw Tommy bandage a dog's leg and when he learned the youngster's dearest ambition was to be a doctor, he helped to finance his studies.

As honors were heaped on Tommy, now a distinguished young surgeon, Doctor Kramer pressed Alice's hand gently and asked her to marry him, but Alice softly refused telling him she had never been divorced.

Meanwhile, John, broken in health learned of the success of his son, Tommy, and read too of the fact that Bobby and Dickie bid fair to follow in their brother's footsteps. Drawing his thin coat about him, John approached the hospital only to slip and fall against a wall. Tommy saw the man fall and discovering a fractured skull, took the charity case himself. Bobby, meanwhile, was showing his mother the hospital and when Alice saw Tommy's patient she turned pale. Not realizing the drama, Tommy explained the delicacy of the operation and grimly humorous explained what a great opportunity a brain operation would give an enemy. It was only later, when John convalesced that Alice revealed herself to John, and as he writhed, Tommy grasped one hand and Alice the other, and together they assured John that the past had been buried.

BRIDES-TO-BE

TO Grace Winslow, vivacious young heiress, came her three sorority sisters, Eleanor, Helen and Louise and as they drape themselves around Grace's apartment, the others complain they suffer from the common difficulty of being unable to bring their once enthusiastic fiances to the altar. Grace promises them some solution to their difficulty and to help them along invites some twenty young people for a week-end skiing party at her Adriondack camp.

The scene is gay as they have luncheon together in the luxurious lodge and they meet enthusiastically in their skiing togs later. Grace captivates them all and is the life of the party. The men vie for her attention and Ralph Moore, Eleanor's fiance, fascinated by her daring, begs her to dress quickly and meet him before the others come down for dinner. As they sit before the open fireplace with its blazing logs, Grace is in high spirits and Ralph, losing his head asks her to marry him. She admits it's a bright idea but when she asks what of Eleanor, he vows he has always loved Grace. Evading his embrace, Grace promises to marry him—secretly.

Later while the party is skating at the lake, Helen, who does not skate, sits with the others before the bonfire, and her fiance, Allen, teaching Grace some fancy steps catches her as she is about to fall and kissing her, he asks her to marry him. Again Grace accepts on the promise of secrecy. Her score is complete when, the next day, after a heavy snow Grace dons snow shoes and sets off alone. At a point overlooking the valley she is joined by Louise's fiance, Robert, who looks out over the magical scene of snow capped trees and friendly cottage lights below and growing romantic tells Grace that she is the one woman for him. Breathing deeply, Grace startles him by the rapidity with which she assures him she will marry him, but he is to tell no one.

A few days later, Grace phones Eleanor, Helen, and Louise, tells them of a plan and the girls agree to the stipulations. Thereupon at dinner that night Grace tells Ralph to meet her at her home the following Monday and wearing aviation suits they will be romantically married in an airplane. Ralph agrees as does Allen at lunch the following day and Robert on a motor trip. Athough still fond of Grace the faithless suitors are, amid the commonplaces of the city, beginning to regret the romantic proposals but none backs out and with considerable reluctance at different times Monday evening three young men lead three heavily togged and veiled young ladies to chartered airplanes and return married to the supposed home of their brides.

Meanwhile Grace invites the other guests who had been at the houseparty to a "wedding supper" and Paul, who has not realized that he loved Grace until he thinks she has gotten married, comes forlornly to the feast. When the newly weds arrive they are greeted with explosions of mirth redoubled when the grooms discover the identities of their brides, and Paul, happily, gets his opportunity to reveal his love to the smiling Grace.

MANIPULATING his morning paper so that his wife's hated red paeonias are hidden, Mr. Hutching gulps his coffee as his wife asks if the "dear paeonias" aren't lovely this morning. Twisting his unoffending newspaper, he bounces violently from the table while she unconcernedly coos endearments to her "little preciouses" her paeonias Samantha, Isabella, and Evangeline. When the family depart for their annual trip to their summer cottage, Mr. Hutching driving the battered car wears a dreamy smile in anticipation of two months free of obnoxious paeonias but as the car is ready to leave Mrs. Hutching arrives bearing a large box which James is cautioned to watch carefully so that not one paeonia may be harmed. James growls, pulls down his hat with a violent gesture and starts the car with a jerk which sends Mrs. Hutching flying backward into her seat beside him and sixteen year old Willie underneath the load of assorted boxes, bundles, and fishing poles which protrude from all sides of the car. The snail-like pace of the journey is continually interrupted by Mrs. Hutching teaching Mr. Hutching to drive and by frequent stops to retrieve lost boxes and bundles. Arrived at the cottage the hurried unpacking is disturbed by a hysterical screech from Mrs. Hutching who has discovered that all her plants except her little Evangeline are hopelessly crushed and mangled. Leaving everything in its topsy-turvy state she devotes herself to making her Evangeline regain her lost bloom.

Mr. Hutching returning from a day's fishing jaunt, excited about the "Whopper" he almost caught, stumbles upon young Willie cooing to Evangeline (Eva to her friends) Allen, a young neighbor. Disgustedly Mr. Hutching keeps on his way. That evening his fish story is interrupted when his wife suddenly perceives that her darling Evangeline is budding. At that moment young Willie glides through the door, sleep-walking and as Mr. Hutching explodes about his son's puppy love affair Mrs. Hutching merely sniffs and turns again to her darling Evangeline.

A few nights later they visit the Allens while Willie is kept at home away from the fair Eva. Just before dropping off to sleep Willie envies the hero's opportunity in the book he is reading to save his beloved from drowning. When Mr. and Mrs. Hutching, deep in the usual quarrel over the game return they find Willie in pajamas sitting on the lawn busy at a pair of invisible oars. With a determined expression Mr. Hutching seizes and plays the hose upon Willie who clutching desperately at his mother's beloved Evangeline and crying, "Courage, dear Evangeline, your William will save you," lunges flat upon the lawn. As Mrs. Hutching shrieks that "muzzer's darling" has been killed Mr. Hutching still holding the dripping hose sits down on the cottage steps convulsed in a spasm of mirth which Willie rudely awakened out of his sleep stands dazedly still clutching the petals of the ruined Evangeline.

FOLLY'S TRAIL

Myra Whiting File No. 9088

THROUGH the glass partition of his office, Eddie Huckabye, salesmanager for the Cosmo Sporting Goods Company, looks longingly at the pertly pretty Sally, a stenographer who has never evinced the slightest interest in Huckabye's attentions. Suddenly Teddy Barnes, a Broadway playboy who has never worked a day in his life breezes in to see Huckabye and he whistles appreciatively as his roving eye lights on Sally. "Some swell. . ." he begins enthusiastically but Huckabye waves an admonishing arm and strains forward to eavesdrop on the conversation between Sally and Bert Cross, a college football hero now working for the concern. Sally's eyes light up as Bert tells her about quail hunting and Sally draws an ecstatic breath and sighs, "I just adore quail."

While Barnes looks on wonderingly, Huckabye snaps his fingers and advancing with sinister mien upon his retreating friend announces, "We are going hunting." Barnes swallows hard, takes another look at the blonde Sally, and nods. Huckabye and Barnes raid the firm's equipment and after dashing about the city getting the necessary licenses, they emerge shiny and over-laden with hunting uniforms and guns. At the foot of a mountain they park their roadster and begin their upward climb. On the way they meet Bert who greets them illy suppressing a smile at their elaborate outfits. He offers to show them where the best game is to be found, but they haughtily refuse assistance. As they walk, Barnes and Huckabye begin arguing about what to shoot and how, and as a rabbit races across their path, Huckabye orders, "Shoot that cat it's bad luck." Bert, attracted by the shot finds the dead rabbit and immediately appropriates it, deciding to follow the hunters. A covey of birds fly overhead, but Huckabye turns up his nose and claims they are too small and dull looking to bother with. Soon they stumble on another covey and angrily they shoot exclaiming, "That will teach them not to get under our feet all the time." Bert coming up with his dog, picks up the five fat quail and stands staring perplexedly after the two Santa Clauses.

As Bert peers out through the foliage he sees Barnes shoot and Huckabye looks at the fowl and then at Barnes and excitedly explains his mother used to raise those things to eat at Thanksgiving and they'll be arrested. The two huntsmen make a wild dash into the woods while Bert, patting the twenty-pound wild turkey his friends have abandoned roars in laughter. Meanwhile the fugitives run until exhausted, lest they be captured, and finally drop to the ground. Their speculations are interrupted by sight of some beautiful birds. They shoot and bag as many as they want. Swearing each other to keep secret their hunting ground, they walk to the foot of the mountain and admire their quail, anticipating Sally's new respect for them. A country lad comes by whistling and when Huckabye proudly calls his attention to their kill, the lad turns disgustedly away exclaiming, "Say them's just blue jays." Huckabye and Barnes stand up and shoot their remaining cartridges into a tree, hurl the guns in a heap and disgustedly ride home, while some squirrels chatter excitedly.

At the office, Huckabye sighs lugubriously while an admiring group of friends count Bert Cross' string of game and Sally exclaims, "How wonderful!"

ATOMS IN EDEN

George M. Bouillon File No. 9052

MOVING his jaws in a way that left no doubt as to the evident relish he was having from his gum-chewing, Pa Drinkwater pulled the battered Ford to a stop before the curb. As the six children tumbled from the car after Mrs. Drinkwater who laboriously heaved herself from the seat beside her husband, he settled himself comfortably to await their return knowing from experience that Ma's five minutes meant at least twenty-five. Gradually his head began to nod. He slumped over the wheel and only the regular sounds of his snoring disturbed the afternoon. The sounds of Pa Drinkwater's snores merged into those from a huge machine in another corner of Sleepytown around which a group of wild-eyed scientists were excitedly working. The chief of the group was walking about explaining the intricacies of this gigantic bullet-shaped contraption with numerous levers and wheels to his colleagues. After oratorically declaiming the miracles of this machine which would convert into atoms anything placed within it, shoot them into space, and then condense them into their original form he called for a volunteer to take part in his experiment. When no one offered himself for the unique trip in his "Atomizer" the Professor frenziedly promised one hundred dollars to anyone who could be prevailed upon to make the trip. It was then that Pa Drinkwater was rudely dragged out of his sleep to find a white-coated, bedraggled individual waving a hundred dollar bill bending over him. In his befuddled state Pa could only grasp that he had to make some sort of a trip but for a hundred dollars he was ready to journey to the gates of Hell, and when he stood among the gathering of scientists he understood that all he had to do was climb into the odd contraption before him, wave a damp rag rather vaguely and then return to his waiting flivver. But before he was well within the machine, the door was slammed, wheels were turned and Pa Drinkwater, accompanied only by a two-way radio set was sent hurling into space. Next thing he knew he was seated, still clutching the radio, amidst the wreckage of the machine. He was immediately surrounded by a number of very beautiful girls who bore down upon him. Pa wanted to take to his heels but could see no avenue of escape. The Queen, attracted by the noise came from the palace and having heard the manner of his arrival told him that he was in the land of Neoterria where young girls were kept away from men until they had reached a marriageable age when they were returned to Mamapapaland. Assured of no immediate attack from the host of excited females, Pa Drinkwater resumed the nonchalant chewing of his gum which had remained with him through all his journey. Whereupon Pa was besieged and had to pass his gum around so that all could see it though he insisted upon having it back again. After a series of incidents in which Pa found himself embarrassed by the attendance of so many women, the Queen threatened that unless Pa returned her affections she would hurl him to the crowd of howling virgins in the courtyard and Pa frantically radioed for a carload of chewing-gum which arrived at the psychological minute and saved the day. But this only convinced the Queen that he was a powerful Prince in disguise and she carried him off, disguised as a woman to Mamapapaland. There the King commanded that this serving-woman to whom the Queen pretended to be so devoted should be kept hidden in her bedroom because of her extreme uglincss. Of course the King ultimately discovered the disguise and commanded that Pa be executed. In an agony of fear he stood upon the scaffold watched by all the court of Mamapapaland. As the rope which the executioner had just fastened tightened around his neck, Pa Drinkwater heard shouts and opened his eyes to find the arm of one of his children hugging him while others screamed their delight from the rear of the car. And Pa barely gave his wife time to get seated before he sent the car flying on its way.

SIDE BY SIDE

Henry C. Fitch File No. 9093

WHEN David Blake, home from law school for the summer vacation came over to greet Jane Seymour she introduced him to Marcia Richards a newcomer to town who already had all the men seeking her favors. And Marcia's languid yet interested movement of acknowledgment showed that she had accepted David's introduction as a man whose only interest was his career as a challenge to the power of her charms. To David, unpracticed in the ways of women it seemed that Marcia, continuing her conversation with Jane was oblivious of his presence but Marcia's every word and glance was calculated to make David aware of her flaming loveliness. When she casually offered to drive David home in her car he accepted with alacrity. In the car she questioned David about his work and having ascertained that he had years of work before him before he could hope for success she turned the conversation. When David cut in on her while dancing at the country club next evening, Marcia, fully conscious that she was challenging him, made some taunting remark about ambitious lawyers who took time to dance. But David who had thought of nothing else since meeting her was only conscious of the joy of dancing with her and ignored her cutting words. David spent that summer playing Marcia's devoted cavalier. She accepted his attentions graciously, as if they were her due and though she only occasionally refused to see him David feared that she would quickly forget him when he returned to school. After a violent scene David induced his father to give him a position in his bank and here due to the native ability which David brought to any job he undertook regardless of how little he liked it, he soon became an influential figure. He deemed Marcia's favor as ample recompense for the sacrifice of his career and it was only Jane's refusal to congratulate him when he encountered her at the bank on several occasions that momentarily made him regretful. Marcia basked in his success and ridiculed his former aspirations.

At the Rotunda Club one evening Timothy Shawn whose reputation was none too savory presumed upon his business acquaintance with David and came over to his table. David was forced to introduce Marcia and to accede to their dancing together. When Shawn brought Marcia back she invited him to join them and while David sat by she devoted herself to this suave, self-possessed man of the world. On the way home she stifled David's objections to her attitude with kisses and told him he was silly to worry about her. But after that evening David noted a new aloofness in her attitude and upon several occasions she was out when he called. When David, suspecting that she had been seeing Shawn warned her that he was nothing more than a fortune-hunter she bitingly accused him of jealousy. On his way home one evening the newspaper blaringly informed him that Marcia Richards, prominent debutante had eloped with Timothy Shawn. Tied to a position that became intolerable now that Marcia's elopement had made it meaningless David settled into a state of profound moroseness. Then Jane came into the bank to discuss some financial matters and afterwards invited him to dinner. In the living-room after dinner David renewed his old friendship with Jane who very bluntly asked him why he shouldn't revive his old ambition and go back to his studies. The simplicity of the solution amazed David and as he saw Jane sitting opposite him, so calm and wise he realized that she had always been a part of the untangled life he had known before he met Marcia. All this he tried to explain to Jane and stammeringly he asked if despite everything she could help him find it again. Jane's only answer was a kiss as she bent over and drew him to her.

FARM FOLLY

William G. Kittel File No. 9172

FROM inside Farmer Fry's barn resounds a conglomeration of noises, a chorus in which the sounds of every farm animal may be discerned. Within the barn queer things are taking place. While fat Mrs. Fry sits on a tiny milking-stool assiduously playing the flute, Farmer Fry milks the cow in time to her playing, and the cows, the horses, the sheep, and the pigs move their fat bodies in what resembles an elephantine chorus. Suddenly the shrill blast of a siren disturbs the scene causing Bossy, the cow, to upset the milk pail and to send Farmer Fry reeling headlong off his stool. When Mrs. Fry trailed by several of the animals gets to the barn door she sees an old truck with glaring posters all over it. These advertisements screech forth the news that a movie company is stationed in a neighboring town and is searching for any and all trained animals for its picture, "The Kicking Zoo." Mrs. Fry immediately determines to take the inhabitants of her barn and she, Farmer Fry, and the seedy-looking farmer's helper proceed to get the animals ready. After numerous trials in which Farmer Fry is held prisoner by a protesting donkey who refuses to budge so that the overwrought farmer can move from the wall, the animals are sleeked and prettied with colored ribbons and bows, and are ready to start. The ludicrous procession arrives finally at the studio and is assigned quarters. One of the horses, hearing the music from a near-by lot, insists upon dancing and Farmer Fry is having a terrible time of it when a clown comes up and confidently comes to the rescue. The clown is pushed to the floor by the horse and when Farmer Fry laughs at the clown sprawled before him the clown attacks him and a brawl ensues. Mrs. Fry, however, arrives upon the scene, drags her husband away and routes the poor clown who cowers timidly before her mammoth proportions. That afternoon the Clown, peering around a corner to make certain of Mrs. Fry's absence, finds the farmer busy with some of the pigs. He punches him and the farmer falls to the floor in a faint. Frightened the clown runs for aid but is brought back by a policeman who refuses to believe his story. Farmer Fry recovers and falls upon the clown. The policeman tries to interrupt and is caught in the quarrel. Finally he arrests both the clown and Farmer Fry. Mrs. Fry, however, comes to the small town jail with her assorted brood of pets and the commotion they create causes the jailer to release the new prisoners. As the last scene closes Farmer Fry and the quarrelsome clown are shown sliding down the court house steps escorted by the joyful animals and followed by a somewhat disheveled Mrs. Fry who is still telling the authorities what she thinks of them.

THE GLORIOUS FAILURE

TIRZAH prays fervently as she rushes with the crowds towards the temple where her husband Nathan, and his fellow Jews are resisting the Roman attack. Suddenly, as she sees her servants, Rachel and Lemuel approaching her with their lifeless burden, she falls paralyzed from her station at the head of the stairs. Her health wanes as the doctors' ministrations, and the love of her growing son, David, and her father, Laban, fail to console her. Weeping at her invalid state, David listens eagerly to Miriam, his visiting kinswoman, who although pushed aside by another pleading Jew in her rush to the Prophet's side, had at last touched His hem. Now, cured of her illness, she tries to persuade Laban to take Tirzah to the Stranger. But Laban, scoffing at her faith in the son of a carpenter, and denouncing her as a blasphemer of the Israelite God, refuses to listen.

The sight of travelers on their way to Jerusalem for the Passover celebration suddenly inspires David with the thought of following them to find the Prophet. Lemuel is also imbued with the hope of curing Tirzah with a piece of the Prophet's sacred garment, which David will bring. Yes, he will urge Laban to grant his permission. So that the following morning, David departs with Miriam. Anxious to find Jesus before he becomes engrossed in the holiday ceremonies at the synagogue, David searches feverishly for him in the throngs. Encouraged by Anna and Philip, Miriam's friends who shelter him, he continues his search. Informed by an acquaintance, John, one of Jesus' desciples, of the latter's sojourn with Lazarus at Bethany, David hastens thence. But he refuses the hospitality of Martha and Mary, Lazarus's sisters, when he finds Him gone. Back in Jerusalem, David, after a restless night, awakes to find the house and city strangely quiet. Hoping to find Jesus, according to John's information, at his Passover meal with his disciples, David hastens towards the temple. The startling news that the Prophet has been betrayed that night while praying in the Garden of Gethsemane, by one of his disciples, to Pilate, brings tears to David's eyes. Tirzah must live! Suddenly, just before a strange darkness covers the earth, David sees outlined against the sky his Prophet bleeding upon a cross. Pushing through the crowds, David recognizes the weeping forms of Mary and Jesus' mother. As a Roman soldier angrily flings him aside, David notices the piece of Jesus' garment he has slung across his arm. Snatching it, he flees. In the garden of Joseph of Arimethea where he hides from the pursuing Roman soldiers, three days after the crucifixion he is saved from the carthquake. A witness of Christ's ascent from His sepulcher there, David hastens home glowing with faith. However, John, whom he meets on the way persuades him to give up the garment for Jesus' heartbroken mother. This act has cured Tirzah, who, together with Rachel, meets him at the door of his home. Their kisses are prayers for the past and hope for the future.

UNTRUE LOVE

WHEN Yvonne Aubin opened the telegram which announced her husband's death in Africa she expected nothing more exciting than the date of his return and the sudden shock made her violently insane. Failing to regain her normal condition her family committed her to Rochard where Dr. Roubillion eventually reduced her to a state of mental tranquility. However she persisted in the belief that her husband, Charles was alive and always she read her visitors a paragraph from the newspapers which only she saw there and which denied the rumor of Charles Aubin's death. Dr. Roubillion determined to use a desperate experiment to make his patient regain her sanity and inviting Alice Berger, Mrs. Aubin's sister and her fiance, Maurice Benoit to his office persuaded them to have Maurice, who bore a remarkable resemblance to Charles, take the latter's place as Yvonne's husband. The sudden shock, the doctor argued, would restore her mental balance. Though fearing the results, Maurice sent Yvonne a wire which stated, "Returning home safe. Disregard rumors." and then presented himself before the joyful Yvonne. She accepted the deception unquestionably and tearfully clung to the suffering Maurice. She let him leave only upon his promise to come to her early on the following morning. The days spent with one whom she believed to be her long-lost husband made her again aware of the world around her. But the strain told upon Alice and Maurice. As they clung to each other in one of their stolen meetings while Yvonne slept, Maurice begged Alice to come away with him and put an end to this travesty but Alice assured him that things would come out all right soon. Then one day a real telegram came, this time actually from Charles and bearing the same news which Maurice had wired some time before. It was Alice who read the message and she kept her head as the full import of this new aspect of the tragedy struck her. Maurice and Alice took Yvonne to Plouda for a vacation. Alice met the real Charles' train at the station and related all that had happened in the interval of his absence. Then, in accordance with their plans, Charles changed clothes with Maurice and went in to greet his wife, pretending that he had just come in from his daily walk. But Yvonne cried out that he was an intruder and when he laughed at her fears and repeated again and again that he was her husband she hysterically called him an imposter. Charles left the room and only Maurice could comfort her. And Maurice had no choice but to agree with her that the man had been an impostor. When every means of convincing Yvonne failed Alice again visited Dr. Roubillion and told him that her brother-in-law had miraculously escaped death at the hand of savages in Africa and returned only to find his wife with her sister's sweetheart from whom she refused to be separated.

Since there was little to be lost, the doctor decided to try a very radical experiment which might prove beneficial. He came back to Plouda with Alice and in her presence and that of Charles and Maurice, he succeeded in getting Yvonne into a hypnotic state. While Yvonne was extremely amenable to suggestion he told her over and over again who her husband was and who her sister's fiance pointing each time to the person as he spoke. He did this until she could repeat them for herself without the hesitation she showed at first. Then as Charles knelt before his wife's sleeping form so that he would be the first one she saw upon awakening, the doctor aroused her from her hypnotic sleep. And as Yvonne hesitatingly sat up and seeing Charles took his head in her hands and kissed him, the doctor motioned to Maurice and Alice to withdraw. Outside the door they breathed a sigh of relief and fell into each others arms repeating the scene they had left behind them.

"GENTLEMEN, I REFUSE." Maurice Bergson, ambassador for Litania to this commercial conference, tosses aside the treaty granting concessions for the building railroad needed by a near-by country, Bolaria, for a shorter route to foreign markets. Disregarding the arguments of Bolaria's representative, Gabrial Chappel, that supplies have been bought and labor hired, Maurice leaves the room. Fuming, the representatives of the foreign markets follow him from the room. The secret service chief, Godwin Nash, his friend, reads death in their glances, and persuades Maurice to use him as a bodyguard. The following night, Godwin is on his way with his daughter, Clarice, to Maurice's study,—for they have a dinner engagement for that evening. Near the door, Clarice is stopped by Maurice's secretary, Lewis Fielding, who is in love with her too. While he is complimenting her upon her appearance, a stifled cry from the study which Mr. Nash has just entered, draws them to the room. There they find both Nash and Maurice murdered. The desk has been ransacked and some valuable bonds are gone. While Clarice hastens home to comfort her mother, Lewis quickly removes the strange glove Godwin is grasping just before he is arrested by the police;—for he is known to have favored the signing of the treaty. Gabrial's movements are checked up by his fellow ambassador with whom he has been dining. When he leaves the country, presumably for home,

Lewis, who has been given a chance to prove his innocence, follows him to the English home of Cora Bergson, Maurice's beautiful sister, who is the substitute ambassador for her brother. Clarice likewise follows and obtains a position as a stewardess for Cora's household. In love with the girl, Gabrial forces a promise from her to meet him one night in the parlor; and Clarice, arriving too early, sees him trying to open the safe to get the treaty. As she slips away, he follows her and notices her kissing a photograph. The next morning when the dog, Flash, dashes into the room holding it in his mouth, the carpenter, Adam Merriot, recommended by Clarice, snatches it before Gabrial can get it. That evening, the butler, sent for Gabrial's gloves, returns with only one, much to his chagrin; but he turns white when Adam hands him the other one. While Adam follows the butler who has been ordered to burn the gloves, Clarice, rummaging around Cora's table, finds an anonymous note advising the latter to appear with her reward for the return of the bonds (which Maurice had been entrusted with to pay Latania's war debt to Ameriea) at an appointed plaee. Clarice in disguise at that place, watches the transaction, and with a secretly concealed camera, photographs the man. At home, Lewis recognizes the man as Gabrial's messenger who had previously visited Maurice. Clarice ealls the police, and Lewis, hearing a cry, rushes upstairs. After the ensuing struggle with Maurice and his men who are trying to force Cora to sign, tbe former are eaptured by the police. The exonerated Lewis embraees his future wife, while the others are taken to prison, after Adam or Lewis has produeed tbe incriminating gloves and photograph.

FRANTICALLY waving the letter whieh the postman has just left with her, Allyn Dameron runs across tbe yard to the home of her friend Mrs. Waring and tells her that her novel has been aceepted by the publishers for a fabulous sum. Eleanore joins in her friend's exeitement as Allyn glibly relates her plans to buy back Roselands, her husband's family estate which they have been forced to sell because Dimitri Dameron's salary does not warrant its upkeep. She enjoins Eleanor to secrecy so that Dimitri may be surprised by what she chooses to do witb her prize money. As she greets him that evening Allyn jubilantly shows him the letter. Dimitri bravely tries to join in her happiness but feels that he is being rebuked for bis inability as a provider when Allyn dances about him talking of all that this money means to her. At the Inaugural Ball to which the Damerons go with their friends, Doctor and Mrs. Waring, they meet Wendell Banning, a former suitor of Allyn's and now a successful architect. Allyn discloses her plans for remodeling Roselands to him and commissions him to do the work. On the way home Dimitri chides Allyn for paying too much attention to Banning. Several weeks later Dimitri asks Allyn if she will lend him some of her prize money to invest in his business. Allyn is unwilling to reveal that the money has already gone to pay for Roselands and hastily tells him that since the money is hers she would prefer using it to purchase the things she has always craved. Though this is the truth Dimitri takes it as a personal affront. Coming home earlier than usual one evening he finds Allyn still out. Hearing a car stop outside the door he looks out the window and sees Allyn stepping from Wendell Banning's automobile. That evening at the supper table he accuses Allyn of carrying on an affair with the handsome Wendell. Allyn is too stunned by his words to reply and Dimitri, shouting something about being unable to make her happy and taking himself out of her life slams out of the house. Though Allyn waits for him he does not return that night. The next day she receives a letter telling her it is best that they continue on their way separately and admitting his failure as a husband. Numbly Allyn finishes the work of making Roseland habitable again though it has become meaningless to her without Dimitri. Just before everything is completed Wendell and Allyn are walking around the estate together when Wendell suddenly draws Allyn to him and blurts out the love he has always felt for her. He begs her to forget her husband and marry him. Discussing plans with Mrs. Waring some time before New Year's for the Colonial masquerade she is giving that night to celebrate the opening of her new home, Allyn eonfesses that Wendell has proposed to her and that she has promised to give him her answer at the party. Her friend smiles knowingly and counsels her not to be hasty. At the party Allyn becomingly dressed as a Colonial dame dances with a masked stranger whose identity she cannot guess. Though he speaks no word Allyn notices that his eyes are taking in every detail of the room as if he notes each change that has been made. After he has left her she dances with Wendell who reminds her of her promise to give him an answer tonight. Snatching a wrap she goes out to the porch and as she looks up from quietly closing the door so that no one will see and follow her, she finds the stranger, no longer masked leaning against a post. The flutter of her voluminous Colonial skirts causes him to look up and she recognizes Dimitri. As they hungrily embrace he asks her forgiveness and tells her that Eleanor and the doctor had explained everything and had planned this homecoming. Then as the New Year chimes ring out, Allyn and Dimitri go in to join the merry-making of their guests. Their entrance upon the festive scene, arms about each other's shoulders sends delighted smiles to the faces of the doctor and his wife and is answer enough for Wendell who is among the first who crowd around the Damerons to wish them a very happy New Year.

LOVE AT FIRST SIGHT

WHEN Captain Morris Gershon sueccssfully bid against Emanuel Vogel for Jupiter, the famous mare of the Upton stables he did not realize that Mr. Vogel was the father of the lovely young girl he had been meeting when driving in the Bois each morning. On the train going back to Paris Captain Gershon saw the girl with Mr. Vogel and realized too late that she was his daughter Jewel for whom he had desired to purchase the horse. Thereafter when Captain Gershon and Jewel Vogel met she cast admiring glances toward Jupiter until the Captain decided to court her favor by selling her father the horse at the price he himself had paid for it. After Emanuel Vogel had aceepted the offer and the transaction was completed Jewel invited the Captain to come and see Jupiter whenever he wished. The friendship thus begun flourished quickly and the handsome young Captain soon proposed to Jewel and was accepted by her. Life at the garrison where her husband had his post was unbearably dull but as long as the two were together Jewel was content. Then Captain Gershon was called to a distant station for a period of some months and Jewel was left to her own resources. When he brought his bride to the loncly post the Captain had given her a diary which he had teasingly told her to use to record her new life. For a time Jewel had filled it with the bubbling happiness she was feeling. But after Gershon was gone she soon tired of recording the drab routine of her days without him. She began to yearn for the gayety of the Parisien life she had known. The only occupation which gave her any pleasure was riding Jupiter whom they had brought with them to the army station. Jewel however longed for company on these rides and when on several occasions she passed another lone rider she flashed him her charming smile. Soon they stopped to talk and Jewel learned that he was Andrew Marechal, an engineer in charge of the laying of a roadway between the garrison and the nearby town of Louvois. To Marechal life at the post was as uneventful as it was to Jewel and he spoke constantly of how happy he would be when the road was completed and he could get away. Together they spent every hour that Andrew could take from his job riding about the country. Gershon realized what had happened when he returned and hoping to please her sent her for a brief visit to her parents in Paris but the round of gayety only made the dull routine of the army post more intolerable when she returned again. In a mood of desperation she resumed her friendship with Andrew and listened to his pleas when he begged her to come away with him when the road was finished. Won over by the pictures he drew of the things they would do together in Paris and the drabness of the scene if she remained behind, Jewel consented to flee with him. As she packed her bag that night preparatory to eloping the diary which her husband had given her when they first came to their new home slipped to the floor and opened. As she bent to retrievc it her eyes fell upon the words of happiness she had written as a happy bride. Memories of her thrilling courtship and the first happy years of her marriage reawakened in Jewel's mind and she realized the stupidity of the step she had been about to take. When the signal they had agreed upon sounded outside from the horn of Andrew's car she disregarded it and Andrew realized that he was to travel to Paris alone. Then Jewel, still holding the dairy sought out her husband and asked him to read aloud from it and as she nestled contentedly in his arms they again lived through the happiest episode in their lives.

HARLEQUIN

ENCOURAGED by his mother who had been a member of the Imperial Ballet, Igor works zealously at the arduous regime of practice and exercise that dancing under the celebrated Bloskin demands. But when his mother dies Igor is left to the care of his uncle Serge, a miserable drunkard who constantly taunts him for being a lazy good-for-nothing who would rather dance than work. And when Bloskin beats him before the class for not grasping the intricacies of a particularly difficult pirouette Igor revolts and boards a ship as a stowaway determined to seek his fame in America. Howcver the ship is headed for Brazil and when Igor is discovered he is forced to work his way as a deck-hand. When the boat docks at Rio de Janeiro Igor escapes and makes his way to one of the cafes along the water front. Fired by the music he has not heard for so long Igor dances for the crowd and achieves a sensation. He comes every night to dance wearing a mask so that he may not be recognized and soon becomes known as Harlequin. Ria, his dancing partner at the cafe falls in love with him and when Igor is forced to return to France because he is a stowaway she goes with him. Back in France they become the featured dancers in a traveling circus. Here Igor makes friends with Eitel, a lion tamer who is in love with Moogie, a comic dancer with the troupe. Talking in their dressing room before the performance Eitel tells Igor how mistrung he feels because Moogie will not heed his pleadings. He confesses to a fear that one of the lions will see through his nervousness and will harm him. This talk awakens an old fear in Igor that his affair with Ria is keeping him from reaching the heights for which he yearned. Eitel is called for his act where what he fears happens when one of the lions claws him. While Eitel lies dying Igor must dance for the audience outside.

Unable to bear the circus which reminds him so constantly of his dead friend and determined to break off his relations with Ria before it is too late, Igor runs off to London where as Harlequin he becomes the partner of a leading ballerina. He puts Ria out of his thoughts and continues in his success until the name of Harlequin is acclaimed all over the world and he is invited to make an American tour. But Ria without Harlequin's knowledge has followed him and is now a member of his chorus. On the eve of his sailing for America Carlotta, the leading ballerina of his troupe comes into his dressing room and declares her love for him. Harlequin determined that women shall play no part in his life laughs at her and leaves for his performance. Furious because she has been spurned Carlotta sets fire to his dressing room. When the fire is discovered Harlequin keeps on dancing so that the audience may be quieted. Later as he is rushing from the theatre with the last remaining people he remembers the opal sunburst which he has always carried with him and which had been a gift from the Czar to his mother and rushes back to get it. Overcome by the fumes he falls exhausted as flames rage all about him. Ria huddled with the frightened chorus outside the burning building hears shouts and learns that Harlequin is still in the theatre. Throwing off restraining hands she fights her way through the flames, finds the unconscious Harlequin and drags him to safety. Harlequin opens his eyes to find himself in the arms of Ria and gratefully realizes that to her he owes not only his career but his life.

HAPPY FLASHES

THE two preoccupations of Dr. Kenneth Wells' life were his interest in medical experimentation and his devotion to the children in the hospital charity wards. It was while making his rounds of the wards, one day, that Kenneth stopped to examine Dickie Grey, a child for whose heart ailment, pronounced hopeless by the other doctors, Kenneth was developing a cure. Raising his head, Kenneth looked into the violet eyes of Doris Strong, a society girl whose social work had led her to interest herself in Dickie's case. Doris, recovering first, asked Kenneth about the child, and as Kenneth replied to her questions he found his interest mounting. Later Doris drove Kenneth home in her roadster.

Kenneth and Doris met frequently in connection with the charity bazaar Doris was running for the social cases, and Kenneth always ready to help with plans, found himself falling in love with the society girl. It was at the bazaar that Doris met John Whitney, a middle aged philanthropist who took an immediate interest in the girl. Kenneth, looking on said nothing but his heart sank as he realized for the first timc the social abyss between him and Doris. He had nothing to offer her. Thereafter Kenneth took pains to avoid meeting Doris and when little Dickie commented that Dr. Wells always seemed to come now when Doris wasn't there, Doris swallowed hard. The next day she called him at his office and after a few excuses which Doris refused to accept, Kenneth agreed to come riding with her. Parking her car under a low hanging tree, Doris asked Kenneth why he had been avoiding her, and then she explained that she was not wealthy as he believed. Her parents had lost all their money and they were depending on her to make a wealthy match. Breaking off his fervent declaration of love, Kenneth relapsed into silence and they drove home without speaking.

Doris waited for Kenneth to call her and when John asked Doris to marry him, telling her that he hadn't much longer to live but he would be so happy if she were his wife, Doris looked into the kind grey eyes and wept softly. Gently John informed her be could wait for her answer. At home Doris heard her mother's exclamations about John and as she saw Mrs. Strong's brows wrinkle over the mounting bills, she tore up the letter she was writing to Ken and accepted John's invitation to take a trip on his yacht.

Kenneth was finishing his operation upon little Dickie when Doris' mother weepingly sent in the mcssage that Whitney's yacht had becn lost at sea and Doris was on it. Taking his life in his hands, Kenneth chartered a plane and set off in the storm to search for Doris and John. He found them clinging to the wreckage. But the strain was too much for John and his heart, never too strong, gave way. Working under strain, without adequate equipment, John applied the same treatment he had perfected for Dickie and pulled John through. The entire medical world was agog about the new treatment, and Kenneth's reputation was made. John donated a fine new hospital for Kenneth's work, and as Kenneth took Doris in his arms, Doris' mother showed the proud Dickie about the new hospital.

THE Warden who recognizes that Jerry Kane is no hardened criminal wonders over the apathetic manner in which he receives the news that after almost ten years at hard labor he is to recover his freedom. Jerry hardly seems to hear him as he gives him the customary farewell advice but when the Warden, trying to break down his defensive armor, kindly asks him how he came to be sentenced for burglary in the first place, Jerry breaks down and tells him the story of his past.

Jerry Kane lives in one of the cheaper sections of San Francisco. Though his morals are none too strict he is not fundamentally dishonest. While walking one evening he flirts with a stunning young girl who smiles back her readiness to be accompanied. Jerry walks her to her home and accepts her invitation to come in. She leaves Jerry to make himself comfortable in a lavishly furnished room which she enters an adjoining room and returns clad in a gown which seems to Jerry to be molded to her supple form. She yields readily to his embraces and Jerry remains with her. After that he has free access to her apartment though he dares not question her relations with other men. Tied to her faster than by chains because of his passion for her, he grants all her requests for lavish gifts and entertainment though his salary as a mechanic does not warrant these extravagances. Gradually he falls in with her suggestions that he make easy money and he soon becomes adept at cutting stones from their mountings. Thus the frequent visitors at Helen's apartment find Jerry valuable in helping them get rid of stolen jewelry. He begins to feel certain of his ability to get away with things and when a caller at Helen's offers him a share in a big haul, Helen's arguments convince him to join in the robbery of a large department store. They are making their get-a-way when a watchman unexpectedly shoots and as his partner falls, Jerry escapes with the loot. With the police after him he dashes up the stairs to Helen's apartment but is stopped by Helen's raised voice mingled with that of Wilson whom Jerry has seen at the apartment on several occasions. As Jerry listens outside the door Helen tells Wilson that as proof that she is tired of Jerry and loves only him he can give Jerry who is even now engaged in robbing the Greencarn Department Store up to the police. Jerry pushes open the door and faces an unabashed Helen and a leering Wilson. He strikes Wilson and as they grapple the police rush in. Though Jerry is sentenced to imprisonment Helen sends no word nor does she make any attempt to see him. As Jerry realizes what a price he is paying for his love he vows to revenge himself when he sees Helen after ten years and spends all his waking moments planning that encounter. Then after six years a newspaper clipping informs him of Helen's death in a raid upon an opium den in Frisco and all his plans are shattered.

As Jerry concludes his tale with a vacant shrug which indicates his feeling that there is nothing for him when he gets back to the outside world, the Warden rises and patting his shoulder tells him to rejoice that punishment is taken out of his hands since that would only bring him back to jail. And as he shakes Jerry's hand he advises him to try and build a new life and thus make himself worthy of the real love of some good girl.

THE GRAY SPOT

Mrs. W. L. Cleaveland File No. 9195

WHEN Van Hugh Lennox, the commercial artist, discovers that the beautiful girl whom he has helped onto the crowded street car, is the person whose piano playing he has often paused entranced on the balustrade to hear, he effects an introduction and thereafter the two travel down to the business center together. At lunch together they find how many interests—especially in the arts—they have in common and as they make a round of the theaters and concerts together, the artist tells the girl of his love. At length, with Mabel's adoring uncle Ross the only witness, the two are married in a little parsonage. As the artist takes his bride in his arms, she fingers the spot of gray hair which he tells her has run through generations of Lennoxes, and Mabel whispers, "It's a dear spot and so distinctive."

A year later, Mabel is setting a festive table when Van Hugh slips up behind her and kisses her hair tenderly. Later, as they sit before their fireplace, he tells her that he is wearying of the commercial art. His work misses the dignity and power of the old masters, and he has long felt that with the necessary application he could turn out really worthwhile works. When Mabel learns he wants to study in Paris, she looks wistfully into the dancing flames, but Van Hugh, caressing her hair, tells her he knows, only after the child comes she may not want to make the ocean trip for several years. At length, bidding farewell to Uncle Ross, the young pair embark on the "Tempest Queen". Several days of calm are followed by a terrific storm and pandemonium breaks loose as the liner springs a leak. Van Hugh helps his ghastly pale wife into a lifeboat, and as he struggles with a life preserver she sees him knocked overboard into the raging waves. Oblivion settles down over her, and when her boat is picked up by a freighter, and she is brought to a hospital, her memory is too befogged to identify herself until months later, when her baby is born and she strokes the silky dark hair, she sees the traditional gray spot and the veils are lifted for her. Her Uncle Ross arrives jubilant over her restoration, but through the years although her beauty deepens her eyes retain the sadness over Van Hugh's loss. Years see Uncle Ross passing on leaving his money to Mabel and her talented youngster who learns one day the reason for his mother's sadness. When Professor Chase, the boy's art teacher urges Mabel to allow her child to study in Paris, Mabel has a long internal struggle, but finally it is the argument that the boy may bring to fruition his father's dreams that convinces Mabel and she gives her child over to the care of Chase and his daughter Diane, who is to study under the great De Soule.

In Paris, the boy timidly awaits an interview with the great artist, frightened by stories of the great one's idiosyncracies, but under the warmth of De Soule's personality, the boy reveals he is Lennox and when he shows his mother's picture and tells her story, De Soule leaps up and exclaims, "But she is dead. You . . . you . . ." And De Soule tells how he had been picked up unconscious by a French boat, and not finding his wife's name among the survivors had never gone back to the America where they had been so happy. Now at last Mabel and Van Hugh are reunited, and the boy softly withdraws with Diane Chase, leaving the two elders together.

THE CLOUD

Eugene S. Woodbury File No. 9030

FOR weeks Knox-Mason college speculated about the mystery of the uncanny disappearance of pretty Betty Warren from the Junior Prom. But Jack Putnam who loved Betty never forgave himself because a few moments before Betty had gone, he had quarreled with her, begging her not to accept a dare to drink one of the men under the table. As a result of Betty's disappearance, Jack had become a different person. Haggard and sleepless, he had resigned from his promising bank position and gone to New York and had fallen in with bootleggers and through his reckless unconcern about his life had rapidly risen to a commanding position as a racketeer. Although a figure in the underworld, Jack had steered clear of women and every year he returned to Hallstead to discover if there were any news of Betty.

Meanwhile, at the dance that night Betty soon began to feel the effects of the drink, and ashamed to have Jack see her that way had slipped outside hoping the air would refresh her. She had gone to sleep in a roadster parked outside and when the intoxicated owner had found her there, he had started his car and driven off with his prize. When Betty awakened in the moving car she asked him to let her out, but laughing thickly he had put one arm about her and attempted to kiss her. Betty struggled and finally managed to open the door of the zigzagging car. At length she managed to get out, but the drunken driver, not realizing what he was doing had suddenly gathered speed and Betty was thrown forcibly to the ground. The driver saw her stagger to her feet and with burlesque wave of his hand he disappeared into the night while Betty tried vainly to clear her head of a terrifying blackness. A car had finally given her a hitch and she found herself without money, without a memory in a strange city. For years she had managed to subsist on theatrical engagements and small positions and one day in an agency she overheard a well dressed man and woman inquire for a maid. It was the name Insley that jogged Betty's memory. Insley had been the town at which Betty had been found and she begged the Van Ess' to employ her, feeling that since she was somewhere near Insley when the accident occurred she might find some clue to her past. At the Van Ess', however, Betty was distressed by the interest of the master of the house and only her fondness for his wife and the baby and her eagerness to solve her mystery made her remain. Then one night Van Ess was left alone with Betty. Her screams as Van Ess tried to take advantage of her were heard by Jack who was returned from one of his fruitless pilgrimages to Hallstead. Startled by the resemblance to Betty's voice, he stopped his car and a moment later was appalled at the sight of the harassed girl leaping through the window to escape from Van Ess. Jack took the stricken girl to his home and the shock of her fall restored her memory. As she convalesced, however, Jack determined to make one last clean-up in the racket and then retire. Betty, learning of Jack's business, sent him on a wild-goose errand by falsifying a message from his henchmen, and as a result Jack escaped capture when the other members of the party, having decided to double-cross Jack, themselves fell into the hands of the police. Jack learned of Betty's part in his escape and taking her in his arms, he promised to go straight for her.

FIRST NIGHT

Alice Parker File No. 9194

HAVING watched Madolene Berkley grow up from childhood to national honors as the Canadian Skiing Champion, dignified John Raymond is shocked by the intensity of the kiss she presses on his lips when he helps her from her horse. It is only after she has gone abroad to compete for world honors in the skiing competition at Switzerland that he realizes he loves her. Meanwhile, however, on board ship, Madolene's beauty attracts the attention of Cyril Latham, a renowned English actor who tries to induce Madolene to accept a role in a play now being completed. Although she declines, Madolene unwittingly wins the enmity of Evelyn Rennalds, Cyril's mistress traveling with his troupe.

The amorous affair of Madolene's chaperone causes them to miss the boat to Switzerland, and they accept the offer of Flight Lieutenant Bailey to fly them to the Skiing contest. Bailey falls in love with Madolene, and when she sprains her ankle on a trial jump and despite the tremendous ovation which greets her leap, is informed by a physician that her skiing career is ended, Bailey flies her back to London. There, while dining with Bailey, she is enthusiastically approached by Cyril Latham, who tells her the part is still waiting for her. Madolene accepts and as she is going on, the first night, John Raymond's letter, reaching her at last, informs her of his love. Excitedly she pens an answer but her cue calls her to the stage. Transformed by happiness she is a sensation and in the excitement, she is unaware that the jealous Evelyn Rennalds, misconstruing Cyril's applause for a fellow trouper, has maliciously substituted a blank sheet for Madolene's happy acceptance of John's offer of marriage.

Weeks pass and Madolene receives no answer from John who has been stunned at the acceptance of the taunting blank sheet, and has turned to politics as a refuge from bitter thoughts. At the same time Bailey begs Madolene, now the star of the theatrical season, to marry him, but she puts him off because she still loves John. However, Bailey's mother, a little gentlewoman who does not suspect that her son had not given his name to Ann Gilbert, a cashier in his father's store, who had died in giving birth to Bailey's child; is shocked at her son's infatuation for an actress. Only when she comes to London and completely capitulates before Madolene's charms, does she withdraw her objections. And Madolene adoring the little old lady, receives her son more kindly. The closing night of the show when Madolene is to receive Bailey's ring, John Raymond, in town lecturing for the government, on an impulse sees Madolene perform and calls backstage as Bailey is putting his ring on Madolene's finger. The two men instantly resent each other, and Bailey shows his weakness of character in his conduct. John remaining asks Madolene why she sent the blank page and the misunderstanding is cleared. However, Bailey apologizes humbly for his actions, and although she loves John, Madolene is loathe to distress Mrs. Bailey who has been so happy over Madolene's promise to wed her son. Moreover, a heart attack which brings from the doctor the admonition that any shock may prove fatal further deters Madolene from breaking her engagement. While Mrs. Bailey is ill, however, she is visited by the dear old ladies in town and among them comes Mrs. Gilbert leading her grandchild, Bailey's son. The resemblance between Bailey and the boy is unmistakable and the old woman, thinking it is her son's ghost to tell her that her son has been killed at his dreaded flying, dies of the shock. Bailey confesses he was Ann's betrayer, and belatedly acknowledges his child, while Madolene returns to John's home as his wife.

POOR GIRL, RICH GIRL

Florence Scafidi File No. 9162

ARRANGING to meet him in an hour so that they could take their usual walk together, Lilly Brenner said good-bye to Don Martin and ran up the stairs. As she pushed open the door of the shabby Brenner flat she saw the portly Mr. Brenner dancing a protesting wife around the room as he frenziedly waved a letter in his hand. From the letter which he eagerly thrust forward she realized that her father had inherited the vast Lyeman estate through the death of a distant cousin. Now her father told her, he could get her away from the son of that old drunkard, Martin who worked in the factory with him. When Lilly met Don that evening she said nothing of the inheritance but convinced him to marry her immediately. After the brief ceremony at the minister's house she told her husband of her father's sudden wealth. Don angrily accused her of tricking him. She knew, he bitterly told her that he would never take advantage of her money nor would he take her from the enjoyment of the luxuries she had always craved but could never have. Despite the fact that they were now husband and wife he left her with only a curt good-night and hurried away. Lilly kept the news of her marriage from her parents. When Don sent her notes back unanswered she moved away with her folks to their new home. She did all the things she had dreamt of when her father had worked in the factory but found them meaningless.

Meanwhile Mr. Martin did not return home one night and Don, making the round of his haunts, found him in a disreputable crony's rooms. As Don entered his father was standing over the body of this man, a smoking revolver clutched in his hand. Near them lay an overturned table and cards were scattered over the floor. Taking the revolver from him Don pushed his father from the room. A neighbor who had been awakened by the scuffle in the room found Don bending over the body and called the police before he could make his getaway. In the Brenner home the newly rich Mr. Brenner snorted as he read of the murder. What could you expect from the son of such a father, he demanded of his daughter who was seated across the table. Lilly, having read the news for herself, palely informed her father that she was going back to help Don and when he flared up and said that she was through with that episode in her life she bluntly told him that her place was with her husband. Stunned but none the less determined he declared that if she left now it was forever.

Despite Don's pleas that she keep out of the mess she stayed with him and tried to break down his stubborn response that all he had to say was that he was guilty. Going over to Mrs. Martin's she met the doctor just leaving. Mr. Martin was confined to his bed and he held out little hope for his recovery since his body was worn out from all the liquor he had consumed during his years. Conscious that his end was near, he stammered forth a confession which freed Don from any connection with the crime. Lilly rushed to the jail to tell Don that his father's death had made further shielding unnecessary. Since there was no one but Don now Lilly and he made their home with Mrs. Martin and were blissfully happy on Don's little salary, except that Lilly yearned for her parent's forgiveness. When her baby was born, therefore, she wrote telling her parents that she had named her son after Mr. Brenner and inviting him to the christening. And so it was that Mr. Brenner who had only been waiting for Lilly to make the first move so that his pride might not be humbled, came back with his wife to scenes he had known so well. And Mr. Brenner beamed his gratification as Don, with Lilly and her mother smilingly looking on, placed his namesake in his outstretched arms.

BRIDAL PATH

Lillie May Riddell File No. 9161

IRENE SHERIDAN knew that her room mate Betty drank and necked to forget the one love she had had and lost, and as she helped the staggering Betty get back to the dormitory without being seen, she winced under Betty's effusive advice to have a good time while she was young. Long after she got Betty to bed, Irene studied under the shaded light.

At length college was over, and as Betty waved from the platform her parting admonition to Irene was to forget her books and enjoy New York. As Irene walked steadily into the big mansion, her father held her at arm's length and approved what college had done for his baby. Irene had never cared for men and parties. It worried her father sometimes. He remembered the day when Irene had come back from a riding jaunt in the park. Two red spots on her cheeks told of her annoyance when a lad, who had often admired her, had dared to speak. Mr. Sheridan chuckled. He was a likely lad, too. Hadn't meant any harm. When, therefore, Mr. Sheridan met his nephew Jim on the street and saw that the young man with him was the one of the bridal path encounter, Irene's father suggested that Jim induce Irene to attend the party for which the two boys were shopping. After all, Mr. Sheridan explained to his puzzled secretary, he knew the boy's father, and it would be all right.

It was just for her cousin Jim that Irene went to the party, but the two red spots came back to her cheeks when Jim introduced Roy. As they danced, Roy told her how much he had wanted to meet her and soon all Irene's formality was melting under Roy's warmth. A new light shone in her eyes, and her father chuckled over the breakfast table. He knew youth. Rides into the country followed for Irene and Roy and when one night he kissed her under a friendly moon, Irene learned for the first time what love was.

Betty came from home to be at Irene's engagament party and as she dressed in the guest room, she exclaimed she was dying to see what kind of a man her friend had finally fallen for. Together they descended the stairs, and as Roy came forward, Betty gasped and dashed up to her room. Irene looked at Roy and slowly returned to Betty, who begged forgiveness for being such a fool. "You loved Roy." "But it's over." Irene tried to smile as the congratulations were showered upon her, but despite Betty's and Roy's assurances to the contrary, Irene felt that she was separating the two she loved best. Jim, guessing something was wrong, tactfully danced with Betty, but when Roy tried to kiss his fiancee, Irene detached herself and whispered, "Please . . . "

It wasn't that Irene didn't love Roy but always there was the thought of Betty's white face and when Roy had to go South to his father's plantation, Irene wouldn't marry him and go too. It was a long winter without Roy, but when she received a telegram from Jim and Betty saying they had eloped, she stared wildly at it. It was for this she had given up Roy. But Mr. Sheridan, watching his daughter closely took matters into his own hands, and when in response to a telegram saying Mr. Sheridan was very ill, and Irene alone, Roy returned, he found it wasn't quite true. But Irene was there with her love and that was all that mattered.

THE QUEEN'S PARTY

Emerson Hynes File No. 8473

NO sooner have the art connoisseurs departed than Sir Walter Raleigh, a statue no longer, waves his hand to Aristotle in the next room. When he enters in his huge raccoon coat, Raleigh calls their girl friends, the Queen of Sheba and Cleopatra who arrive shortly after, still wearing as are the others, their name and price scarfs. When during their bridge game, Cleopatra flashes the diamond ring which Henry VIII has given her, in Aristotle's face, the latter sulkily throws the cards on the floor, and threatens to tell Mohammad of whose harem she is the leading lady. At this moment, Napolean, Raleigh's butler, entering with the drinks, is caught winking at the Queen who promises in her pantomime to meet him outside later, when he is pushed from the room by his jealous employer. Edging towards the door, the Queen suddenly stops when she hears Cleopatra reading from the Babylon and Baltimore Herald of Caesar's wife, her best friend, divorcing her husband, and of Bismarck, her rumored next husband. On the pretext of telephoning her friend for further gossip, the Queen leaves the room for Napolean's arms; and Raleigh in the midst of reading the stock quotations, sends for his secretary, John Smith, whom he urges to telephone his broker, Charlemagne to buy one thousand shares of Marco Polo Barber Shop stock and to sell six hundred of the Roger Bacon Butcher Shop shares. Turning to receive his visitor, Michaelangelo, his former secretary who has come to ask for employment, Raleigh shakes his head, but invites him to join the party. Just then Napolean and the Queen with news of the arrival of the prohibition officers led by George Washington and Ulysses S. Grant; but after Shakespeare, the first lieutenant has sniffed them all, he reports "nothing doing" to his friends, and they depart. A few minutes later there is a commotion at the door and Dante, the football hero of the day's game enters with his admirers, Queen Elizabeth, Mary, Queen of Scots, Joan of Arc, Kit Carson, Nero, Beethoven, William the Conquerer, Christopher Columbus and Abraham Lincoln. Enjoying a drink with Honest Abe, Queen Elizabeth in laugning answer to one of his jokes exclaims "That's as impossible as measuring the distance to the moon"; whereupon Euclid immediately expostulates upon its possibilities, and mentioning "the flat surface of the earth", gets into a quarrel with Columbus. Several minutes later, simultaneous with the announcement by King Tut, the doorman, of Benjamin Franklin, reporter on the Bagdad, Babylon and Baltimore Herald, Queen Elizabeth announces her marriage to Miles Standish; and Martin Luther, who is to marry them, immediately demands his fee. When they depart shortly after, Confucius throws rice at their automobile while Caesar belabors them with spaghetti; and Luther entering the ear to again kiss the bride, is thrown out by the angry groom. Suddenly Nero, discovered kissing Cleopatra by Aristotle, pushes the latter aside as he pulls Cleo with him on the back of the ear. They are going to be married they shout as they ride away; and Aristotle shakes his fist at them. Raleigh pushes him on his pedestal and climbs upon his own yawning "what a dull life!"

THE WHITE HORSEMAN

Rembert L. Butterfield File No. 9512

SCOFFING at his statement that the First National Bank is tottering, Mrs. Constance Hunter, at the suggestion of Croydon, his partner, urges her husband to continue keeping his deposits there; and kissing him good-by, goes to meet Croydon, with whom she is dining as usual. Mac Hunter, however, immediately telephones his bank to advise them to transfer his deposits to another bank, and knowing of the constant fall of his Amalgamated Steel shares, he now calls them to cancel the huge order he has sent them recently. In the meantime, at their dinner table, Croydon, a secret trustee of the Amalgamated Steel Company, persuades Constance to make a huge investment in such shares so that their planned elopement may be successful financially. The next week, hearing that the bank to which he had transferred his money, has failed, Mac is delighted when he learns that Constance, without his knowledge, had removed all his deposits there. Visiting him that evening to say good-bye and perhaps discuss separation proceedings, Constance turns white when Mac informs her of the failure of the Amalgamated Steel Company and of his good fortune in having cancelled his order; and hastily kissing him, rushes with a murderous look in her face, to her home where Croydon awaits her. In the meantime, Mac, telephoning her to arrange for a dinner date in celebration of their luck, is told that his wife has not yet arrived, and is surprised to hear Croydon's voice shouting above the butler's, another man's voice, and then a revolver shot. Dashing home, Mac finds his wife staring angrily at the wounded Croydon, who, infuriated at her discovery of his duplicity, and at her defense of Mac, shoots the latter before he (Croydon) dies. When Mac, as the supposedly jealous husband, is accused of killing his partner, Constance tells in court of Croydon's betrayal of her trust as her motive of revenge and pleads guilty. Mac and the wounded servant finally revived from their unconscious state, assist the police in rounding up Croydon's accomplices in his illegal financial manoeuvers, by their story of the telephone conversation and Croydon's last minute visitor at the Hunter's home before the former was killed. Tempted by the huge reward offered for the revelation of the murderer, one of the accomplices sends an anonymous note to the police implicating Scott, another one of the gang, with whom Croydon had refused to share the results of the Amalgamated Steel embezzlement.

After Constance is exonerated, Mac writes a letter to his lawyer arranging a divorce, instructs his secretary to allow no one in and to close all doors, and after a long stare at the representation of death in the picture above his desk, "The Four Horsemen", puts his finger on the electric wire connected with the dictaphone. Not wishing his death to be called suicide, so that Constance and his son, Bobby, may obtain the insurance, he is smiling triumphantly at his ruse as a salute to Death in the picture, when Constance, telephoned by the secretary, rushes in. Although they have now lost everything, she pleads to be allowed to turn over a new leaf with him and Bobby, who cries out as Mac collapses from the strain. When he recovers, they kiss tearfully, and Mac, pushing all papers from his desk, says, "The slate is wiped clean. We'll start again."

INDULGENCE

WHEN Bette Hanson, wealthy young schoolgirl, wants anything, she is immediately given her desire by her parents—whether it be a car, a trip to Europe, a swimming pool in her home. But when she wants Ray Thompson, she finds that Connie, her friend, likes him too, and when Ray continues to pay attention to Connie at parties and auto rides to the country, Bette forms a bold plan. Visiting him at his apartment, after she has told her mother she is going to do some research work at the school, Bette offers him her caresses freely, so that when Ray suggests an elopement, she happily accepts and promises to meet him at the station the following night. The next day, realizing that Mr. Hanson will disown his daughter should she marry underage, tries to postpone the idea, and Bette weepingly leaves him. The following week, when Ray inform Bette of his proposed visit to the city for business purposes, she packs her things after he leaves; and he resigns himself to her company when he finds her in his car on the day of his departure. Accosted by his mistress, Helen Chanin, Ray brings Bette to an inn owned by his friend, Peter Jarvis, and with a wink to the latter, tells Bette that she will be well cared for there. In the meantime, Connie, having seen Bette entering the train at the town depot with Ray, furious at the latter for his infidelity, and loyal to her friend, informs Mr. Hanson (who is at that moment discussing a good lead in stocks with his secretary and future-son-in-law, Arthur Hollingsworth) of this; and the father, agitated, hastens out after leaving a card of his city whereabouts—Peter Jarvis—with Arthur.

Arriving at the inn, after telling Peter of his troubles, Mr. Hanson is pushed into a dark room where he is told a girl will entertain his worries away. Just at this moment, Arthur arriving with Mrs. Hanson, is warned to keep the latter away from the dark room while he (Peter) gets him away without Mrs. Hanson's seeing him (Mr. Hanson). Suddenly a scream is heard and the half-nude Bette, having recognized her father in the suddenly lit-up room (for Mrs. Hanson has entered by a side entrance), rushes out. Realizing this is a house of ill fame, Arthur, hastening after her, bitterly denounces her while Mrs. Hanson breaks into sobs after glaring wildly at her husband. When she stops him from running after Bette, whom she has not seen, Peter tries to explain the truth of the situation, but is slapped for his pains. At last, Connie, coming in at this moment with the agitated Ray whose jealous girl-friend, had betrayed him to her, explains the situation. Forgiven by her parents, Bette scorns Ray's contrite proposal now, and Connie turns her back to him when he turns to her for consolation. After pummelling him into silence, Arthur kisses Bette in token of his own accepted proposal.

DISCONTENTED with her constant drudgery on the farm in the small lumber town, Alice Benton, leaves for the city to find work there. Amused by the sight of the girl carrying her irksome shoes in her hand, Teddy Bayard, salesman, who has been watching her from the train window, soon become friendly with her as her seat companion. Arriving in the city, Alice, discovering her loss of the card and the twenty dollars which Teddy had given her when he left the train at his station, bewilderedly enters a taxi upon the driver's invitation. Promised his pay should she obtain a position, the infuriated driver brings Alice to a house nearby where he recommends her for work. Tremblingly donning the decollete evening gown offered her by her mistress, Mrs. Michaels, she stares at the drunken man who confronts her in the room into which she has been pushed. Struggling away from his embraces, she flees from the house from which she is followed by Mrs. Michaels and a friend; but when Alice's screams of protest attract a crowd and a policeman, the latter disappear. Pitying the unprotected girl, Mrs. Talbot, a spectator, boarding-house owner, takes her home where she introduces her to Roy Kwist, elderly violinist of some fame. Knowing that his friend, Mrs. Wayne, a society matron, needs a maid, Roy recommends Alice and brings her to the house.

The next night while serving at the party given in honor of Mr. Wayne's birthday, Alice screams when she recognizes the latter as the man at Mrs. Michaels' house. In the upoar caused by the dropping of her tray, Mr. Wayne cuts her accusation short by hurrying her out of the house and into a taxi in which the driver, bribed by him, drives her to a lonely road far outside the city where he leaves her in spite of her protests. When in a cafe which she passes wearily on her way back to Mrs. Talbot's house, a girl steals a wallet from her drunken companion and escapes, Alice, answering the drunkard's description, is taken by the pursuing police to court where she is searched and given a short jail sentence. Just as she is being led away, Roy, whom she has notified through a policeman, enters to vouch for her character; and as the real thief is brought in, Alice is taken hy Roy to Mrs. Wayne (who, having long suspected her husband's intrigues at Mrs. Michaels' house, has obtained her much-wanted divorce). When next day, Mrs. Wayne, having been impressed by Alice's fine voice while she sang at her work, has her tested by a musical professor, a great future is predicted for her. After a preliminary training, Alice, enroute with her professor to France for further instruction, meets Alan Langdon whom she likes immediately. Returning home two years later, Alice finds herself an heiress to half of Roy's fortune which he had bequeathed to her upon his marriage to Mrs. Wayne. After making plans to bring her family to the city, Alice visits the Wayne home with her sister, Nell, who is also to study music. Passing his former residence at this moment, Mr. Wayne, asking his friend Ted Bayard, to wait outside, accosts Alice in the hall, and is just about to drag her through the back entrance when her screams bring Ted to her rescue. Happy to find her again, Ted, who has been looking for her, proposes to her; and when at their engagement party, Alice is suddenly kidnapped from the garden by Wayne and his men, he follows in his roadster from which he shoots Wayne. The next day, Alice comes to tell Ted the news of Nell's engagement to Alan whom the former has known for a long time; and as Mr. and Mrs. Benton enter, the couples embrace happily.

THE BRIDAL CROWN

Adrian Molise File No. 8477

ENTERING the house after a game of tennis with her fiance, Leon Dowley, Rea Malcolm, wealthy society girl, accepts his invitation to a dance that night. Hearing a girl laughingly announce that she had lost a hundred dollars in the game, a young man inviting his petting companion to a wild party, and another one surreptiously offering his friend a drink, Rea leaves the hall during the dance to weep in the garden; for in her newly acquired position as social worker in the slums, she has seen for the first time the barren life of poverty and hopeless denial, and the sudden contrast of her own life with theirs is appalling in its denunciation. Hastily obtaining her wrap, she returns home, followed by the protesting and questioning Leon; and when he laughs at her talk, she pushes him towards the door after she has returned his engagement ring. Entering her father's study, she tells him of her plan to enter a convent to live for charity and peace; and Mr. Malcolm argues tearfully and in vain for marriage, pleasures of travel, education, and motherhood. Told by the Mother Superior of the convent they visit the following day, that she must make her own decision, and firmly, Rea, somewhat sorry for her behavior to Leon, decides to wait. Several weeks later, while she is renting a room for herself in the slums, Rea meets Father Trenton, a young priest who has come to comfort a sick woman next door. Recalling his peaceful face, at the fox hunt the next day, she refuses to listen to Leon's words of love as they ride off together. Suddenly her horse, failing to take the fence, throws her, and while she is unconscious in her room to which she is immediately taken, she visualizes herself first as Leon's wife of the future,—a wealthy society woman with her lovely children, and a constant round of parties and parties; and then as a nun enduring the rigid self-denial of the convent,—the silence, the fasting, the prayer. Awaking suddenly from her coma, she catches a glimpse of Leon kissing Belle, a girl she has often seen him with; so that when he offers her the ring again, she spurns it as she begs him to bring her Father Trenton for her consolation. Several minutes later, as Belle and Father Trenton enter, Rea urges Leon to give the ring to the girl he best loves, and points to her friend; and while they are embracing, she turns to her other friend for advice about her entrance to a convent. Finally, well again, she is escorted by him and her father a week later to the convent which is the sister one to Trenton's monastary; and in the beautiful taper-lighted chapel several weeks later, she is given the veil of her new bridehood. Visited by Leon and Belle. she blesses their union; and returning to her cell for prayer, is informed by the Mother Superior (who has spoken to her father's housekeeper) of Mr. Malcolm's death of loneliness and a broken heart. Resolving to spend her life in repentence and easing of others' sorrows, Rea restrains her tears, smiles bravely and walks slowly to her room.

THE TOWER OF DEATH

Evangeline Loverdou File No. 9176

IN a peaceful English village stands a crumbling tower which is bought by an old man who calls himself Dr. Warling. Several days later, accompanied by a swarthy Egyptian servant, Semroun, Dr. Warling moves in bringing strange boxes. When his daughter, Venetia, worried by her father's conduct leaves her fiance, Kent Fenton, and arrives at the tower, she is terrified by the intensity with which her father forbids her the Eastern part of the tower where he has his laboratories. There Dr. Warling believes he can prove his ability to make an Ape talk, act, and think like a man. Semroun, secretly in love with Venetia, is the only one who has access to the laboratories beside the doctor, and the Egyptian takes a fiendish delight in prodding to fury the Ape, Mozo, which Dr. Warling has brought from Africa.

Troubled, Kent Fenton arrives at the village and finds Venctia trembling and afraid of her father. They avoid each other's eyes when strange cries and voices are heard at night. Soon the village is aghast at the finding of a corpse of a young man without a head. Police vainly seek for the murderer and panic settles upon the town as they uncover another corpse —a girl with the head missing.

In his grim laboratories, Dr. Warling is experimenting on the heads of his victims, trying to transfer to the Ape's head the brains of a man. He only succeeds in maddening the Ape, who utters strange cries, one day, when he sees Venetia and Kent walking together. Semroun gives the Ape the idea of killing Kent so that he can have the girl.

Meanwhile Dr. Warling, having destroyed the two heads during his experiments, needs two more but it afraid to attempt another murder because of police vigilance. Venetia, inadvertently hears her father tell Semroun that he is going to kill Kent. Her screams make the Doctor lock her up lest she reveal all, and Kent desperate because he cannot find Venetia appeals to her father and is told if he wants to save her he must sacrifice himself. Warling gives Kent three days to render his decision but tells him if he reveals anything to anyone he will never see Venetia again.

To Inspector Post, a friend of Kent's, sent to track the murderer, Kent finally tells all and they go to the Tower. Kent will tell the Doctor he is ready for the sacrifice, and meanwhile the Inspector's men will search the Tower.

Semroun's proposal to Venetia to free her if she will marry him is refused, and vengefully the Egyptian persuades the Doctor to sacrifice his daughter first. But Semroun falls into the Inspector's hands and Kent in the half-dark is mistaken for Semroun by the Doctor who is putting his daughter in a strange box. As Kent strikes him, the falling body releases the Ape's door and as Kent frees Venetia, Mozo jumps on him. In the struggle a weird liquid is released from a smashed test tube. Inspector Post sees the smoke and arrives in time to shoot the Ape, who is carrying the helpless Kent in his arms. Kent immediately snatches the unconscious Venetia and they escape. Suddenly they remember Dr. Warling and Semroun, but it is too late. The whole tower is in flames! Venetia opens her eyes and cries, "Kent!" and together they turn from the Tower of Horror.

THE VEIL BETWEEN

B. H. J. Robynson File No. 9517

THE story begins on a ranch in beautiful Colorado. The Mother a college woman and for sometime before her marriage connected as head of the department of a large midwestern college finds life out of her natural sphere and station only a brief episode of love and glamor, but on the day at which our story opens June 3, 1911 a new vista of glory breaks for her in the birth of a blue-eyed golden haired girl. Dimples, all dimples and a smile that was heaven, little crowing gurgles the Mother's litany. No sweeter rosebud ever blossomed, nothing else in the world so precious—surely nothing could ever take this new glory from her.

One, two, three years quickly fly as the precious one, called Frances, learns to toddle, wearing the first little shoes so proudly—Puppies and kittens and horses are her only playmates until one day seen only by her own eyes there is "Ciel" an imaginary playmate, very real and her constant companion. Now a break comes, the ranch no longer pays and the Mother, Mrs. Worth must put her shoulder to the wheel by going back to teaching. This made necessary a move to Denver.

Frances begins kindergarten and with children for companions "Ciel" is gradually forgotten as the years slip by. Vacation comes and a little car takes Mother and daughter, now just two pals, into Colorado's gorgeous mountains. Camping alone, meals cooked over a fire and glorious dips into an icy stream.

Young womanhood and ready for college. Oh! the agony of a first separation made bearable to the Mother only by enormous week-end packages for Frances and her friends and stolen happy visits together. A year of college passes, reports of excellent grades—Frances barely sixteen, leading her classes but a tired nervous girl. Now a business offer in the South for Mrs. Worth, the very thing—a long ramble together in the little car with Frances the chauffeur.

Slender and frail like a flower yet no fear of anything, dark nights or mountain roads held no terror, a steady head and hand made her a perfect driver and her smile broke down all traffic rules from the hardest of blue coated policemen. It seemed she never tired, each night a different town, a hotel, a bath, pretty clothes, a dance on the roof garden then bed and in the morning off again till finally Kentucky was reached and a cozy old fashioned home found with a great fireplace and a sleepy cat dozing on the hearth. New friends dropping in often carried Frances off to shows and parties while Mother reads waiting for returning footsteps on the porch, the ringing laugh, the happy voice that always thrilled.

Now comes a night when the step is not so quick, the laugh so gay, there is a headache not mentioned and a careless reach into a dresser drawer for aspirin but instead unnoticed two forgotten tablets of poison. A night of agony, of horror, of terrible fear—All useless, everything failed and little Frances made another journey and alone.

Utterly crushed, not knowing how she still lived on Mrs. Worth plans to take her own life and join that precious one. Then words from whence she knows not seem to penetrate her hrain—"Nothing ever dies—nothing ever dies. It would be murder—you could not be with me—My Mother a quitter! No, no not that." And the Mother promises—"Sweetheart, Frances darling, I do not know how I know but somehow I do know, that some where you are living and now as always, you are my incentive and some way I will carry on."

Weeks and months follow when through earnest study and concentration Mrs. Worth seeks to have that inner vision opened which all should have but most have lost through struggle for the material. Suddenly it comes and at last she senses the lovely presence of her precious girl who overjoyed at having finally made the contact, portrays to her Mother the reality of life as she now has come to know it, the law of universal love that alone can govern all things. Beginning with that night of horror she erases the terror of it from her Mother's brain by showing that death may be a glorious thing. Surely it was for Frances for on that last night old friends, long since lost awhile now found again, waited to greet and welcome her into the beautiful home of her Grandmother, no longer old but lovely as at maturity. Every detail is pictured of the magnificent, natural home with its gardens filled with birds and flowers, even the old Collie, she had had on the ranch as a child and "Ciel" the spirit child that was her playmate who like herself has grown to beautiful young womanhood. She meets her brother Edward, of whom she had never heard because of his passing on through premature birth, now a young man two years her senior. She is shown schools and sanatoriums, the latter not for healing bodies but minds confused through coming over in ignorance and after lives ill spent. Through marvelous glasses she looks down through a vista of clouds to lower planes seeing the tragedy of suicide and those sent over by capitol punishment, contacting the reality and difficulties of such as these little dreamed of by those on earth.

Life now to her became so wonderful, far more grand and real than any she had known before. A great reception is planned for her as though a debutante. The gorgeous reception hall of her Grandmother's home is crowded and she is being presented when across the floor, as though drawn by a magnet, a splendid youth with hands extended and waiting for no introduction reaches her side saying "Frances this is Tom." A burst of music and together they drift amongst the dancers across the floor out to a moon-lit balcony overlooking lawns and a great lake dotted over with sail boats. Here he tells her of marriage as it is there—the perfect union of two souls, each the counterpart of the other. Friends for awhile then companions, work together and love eternal.

Frances with lovely dreamy eyes turned to his, lips parted in a smile of joy yet mingled with a bit of sadness, whispers—"Take me to my Mother." Together they drift over the lawns down through space, two misty figures going down to earth and now by the Mother's side whisper their story into that inner ear so lately attuned to theirs. A great happiness fills the Mother's very soul. Her little sweetheart, safe and happy, life going on for her and she, the Mother, glad as she always knew she would be when the right man came along. Mingled with a wonderful radiance shining forth from her happy face there is a gleam of the old mischievous twinkle in her great blue eyes as Frances drops a last loving kiss on her Mother's hair and with a ripple of her dear gay laughter whispers, while she and the boy drift away, "Good-night Mother dear—I must take my man now and go home."

THE DESERVERS

James Cox File No. 8108

PEOPLE wondered why Jim Farley, an industrious faithful husband suddenly became a drunkard. But only Jim knew how much his second wife, Lucy Miller, and her family, had influenced him toward this step; for when he had invested all his money in the saw-mill, his father-in-law, wishing to have the place in his own name, stirred up discontent among the workmen. And when George, Lucy's young quarrelsome brother, killed the foreman in a drunken brawl, it was Jim who took the blame, saved him from the deputy, and lost his entire investment in the business. With a five hundred dollar reward on his head, Jim left for a distant town, and was recalled by Lucy, who wanted more money, and who feared his attentions to other women might be her financial loss. Carefully hidden at her father's house, Jim discovered that the latter, anxious for the reward, was planning to turn him over to the sheriff. Luckily escaping in time, Jim found work as a foreman in a lumber camp in another state where he freed himself from his drinking habits and managed to save a large sum of money; for although he was the father of several children, he had forgotten his constantly nagging wife and them in his love for Clare, a daughter of the lumber camp's owner. Returning from a secret meeting with her late one night, he passed the bookkeeping office of the camp, where a robbery was taking place; and when his enemy, the thief, Peter Rawley, had knocked him unconscious, he placed incriminating documents in his pockets, so that his accusation was certain the next day. Having heard from a lawyer in his native town that he had been freed of the charge of murder, Jim escaped thence, as he was being escorted to prison. Having heard of his friendship with Clare through a brother who had forced Jim to give him work at the camp, Lucy not only nagged him for this, and increasing sums of money, but influenced his children against him. Having learned of Jim's innocence in the murder charged against him, through Lucy's brother, Clare sent out a detective to George's place of work! and it was his confession which freed Jim in the trial he was undergoing in court.

As the years went by, Jim moved from town to town, now working in the coal mines, now on the railroad, now at a mill, afraid of his demanding wife, and constantly longing for Clare,—not knowing her part in establishing his innocence. Wherever he went, his wife and family, including father and brothers, followed, living on his money and in the home he had provided for them. When one of his daughters, in a fit of temper, goaded him with reminiscences of his camp robbery about which she had heard through Peter, one of her beaus, Jim questioned him one day; and after a fight, forced the confession from him. Accompanied by his lawyer friend, and the unwilling Peter, Jim returned to the camp to free himself of his guilt; and realizing Clare's faithfulness and assistance in his need, Jim asked her to marry him, promising to obtain a divorce. Bought by the sum of money he offered her and the family, and now the sole owner of his house, Lucy consented to this arrangement; but after meeting Clare and seeing the gifts he had given her as his new wife, Lucy balked. Anxious that his marriage be valid, Jim offered her his entire fortune, which she readily accepted. Assisted by Clare's father, Jim and Clare lived prosperously in their home in Florida where they had waxed wealthy because of the sudden boom there.

THE DOCTOR'S MYSTERY CASE

Mary Riley Stafford File No. 8040

SENT by his railroad company to sketch the scenery through which their trains pass, Darnell Dykewell finds himself in his native town where he meets a former school mate, Dr. Daniel Deerwood. After a chat with his friend at his luxurious apartment, Darnell is still unable to discover why Dan has so suddenly given up his social pleasures and become such a recluse. Entering the florists the next day to buy some lilies for his sister's wedding, Darnell, noticing a card bearing the name, Lethea Glendenning, care of Dan Deerwood, is told by the proprietor that no one has ever seen this woman at the doctor's house, although flowers are sent there often. At his home that evening Darnell notices the stricken look on Dan's face when he reads an article in the gossip column about his secret mistress. Visited more and more often by curious women, Dan finally gives up his practice and returns to his sister's home on Palatine Hill, where his sweetheart, Anne Lindsey, sees him one day during a supposed business trip out of town. Suspecting his fidelity, she persuades Darnell to visit the house secretly and discover any intrigue in which he may be involved. Passing the house, Darnell is mystified by the sight of a beautiful woman lying as if dead on a couch surrounded by flowers and candles. Several weeks later, entering through a French window unobserved, Darnell speaks to the girl; for he has heard of Dan's departure for the city where he has taken up his practice again. Under his artist's pseudonym, Darnell becomes friendly with the girl and her mother. After he has made a picture of the girl, Darnell, realizing that she is in love with him, and wishing to be loyal to Dan, decides not to see her again. Visiting him in the city the following week, Darnell connects Dan's sudden disinterestedness in everything with a letter signed "Lethea". That night, when the visiting Anne exclaims over the picture which Dan had bought at an exhibition, Dan, surprised to hear her mention Darnell's name as the author, hastily wraps it up and rushes from the house. Suspecting another woman as the recipient of the gift, Anne follows him, accompanied by Darnell. Arriving at the house, Darnell, upon meeting the girl whose name he does not yet know, outside, proposes to her, and they plan to elope that night before Dan arrives. However, when the girl comes back with her valises, Anne demands an explanation of her affair with Dan; the latter, arriving on the scene, tries to stop the girl from entering the car with Darnell; and the latter is just about to hasten away in dismay when he sees the girl kissing Daniel, when the latter explains everything. Lethea is his sister, who, terribly ill from an automobile accident, and in fear of disfigurement, he had treated in seclusion here, away from her city friends. Daniel, formerly pledged to secrecy until she was cured, is kissed by Anne in forgiveness, while Darnell happily embraces his lovely bride-to-be, Lethea. And the picture for which Lethea had longed, and which Dan had bought to comfort her for the loss of her unknown friend, smiles down upon them.

THE LAW PROVIDES

George P. Kershey File No. 9260

THROUGH the secret arrangement of his father, Ted Loring, a brilliant but excitable law student, currently in disgrace through a fight at a prom, gets an opportunity to redeem himself by working in a New York law office. Hard work wins him an appointment in the District Attorney's office and he scores frequently, but finds Ed Norton, a criminal lawyer, a difficult opponent. Once Ted manages to convict Pink Tite and Bob Gish, the former a notorious dope peddlar. At the same time Ted finds his interest in Jean Reynolds, Pink's beautiful moll, growing, and when he discovers that Ed, too, is attracted by Jean, the fight between the two lawyers grows. Ed worsts Ted in a case and when he congratulates Ted on his work, Ted mistaking his really sincere admiration for sarcasm strikes the older lawyer. However, repenting, he helps him to his feet and from then on Ed leagues himself with Ted, offering to give evidence against many criminals whom he has formerly helped evade justice. When Ted marries Jean, he sees in the eyes of Glenna Sornson, the D.A.'s daughter, evidence of her love for him, and soon he realizes that he has only been infatuated with Jean and spurred on by the competition Ed offered.

When Pink completes his sentence, he seeks Jean out immediately and when Ed happens upon Jean in Pink's arms, his contempt causes the ex-convict to shoot Ed in the back with Ted's gun. Jean and Pink calmly exit together and when Ted discovers Ed's body, he is arrested for the murder. The old feud between the two lawyers is brought up, and deserted by Jean whose alibi is that she was in the office of Jerry Kahn, a divorce lawyer, Ted is convicted and sent to prison while his parents and his sister helplessly turn from the court.

A model prisoner, Ted escapes during a jail break and in a box car joins up with another ex-convict who turns out to be Bob Gish. Bob, although he had been framed by Pink in the interest of a lighter sentence for turning state's evidence, does not bear a grudge against the lawyer who sent him up, and together Ted and Bob become embroiled in the San Francisco underworld. Ted, distrusted by the gang leader who realizes Ted's interests are with the law, goes to warn a Chinaman who is on the spot. The Chinaman, before Ted can explain slashes Ted's face, but when Ted tells him why he has come, saves Ted from the police sent after him by the gang leader. Scarred now, Ted cuts all traces with his former life, his identification cards having been left on the body of a man mangled by a freight car back-up.

Meanwhile in New York Pink, with Jean at his side, rises to the throne of czar of the underworld and baffles the police utterly.

Ted and Bob are apprehended by a detective with a long memory but Chief Sornson finally frees them to catch Pink. A few days later the pair join the underworld and after several weeks learn who the chief is. After a gun battle, the police get Pink, Jerry, Jean and the rest of the gang. Jean, seriously wounded, reveals Ted's innocence and on the expiration of her short term clears the country, while the others get the chair.

Ted automatically pardoned, has his scar removed by a plastic surgeon and is seen about town with Glenna Sornson, while the other couple dining with them is Ted's sister and Bob Gish, who finally reveals that he is a prominent scion, who refused to free himself from the meshes of the law at the expense of revealing his real identity and disgracing the family name.

HAPPINESS PREPAID

Irene I. Rene File No. 9101

AT the suggestion of his publisher, Garwood Hamlin, young author of several best sellers, decides to spend a few weeks at a mountain hut away from the dizzy round of speakeasies, and try to write another book. On the way he stops off at a pitiable hut for water to fill his automobile radiator and as Marshall Milton rails bitterly, Garwood senses a story. He learns that ninteen years ago, Marshall had graduated from Harvard, married a girl who trusted his theories that two could find happiness away from the rest of the world. Soon, however, they had both become embittered by the realization that even in a mountain hut money was necessary to comfort, and with the coming of their baby, Gerry, and the gradual breakdown of his wife's health, Marshall had changed from an idealistic youth to a brutal miser. Now in a sudden fury Marshall offers to "sell" his daughter to Garwood for twenty-five dollars. Shocked, the young author prepares to leave, but as he sees the lovely young Gerry bent under a basket of laundry, he silently counts the money into Marshall's hands and accepts the girl who is forced by her father into the stranger's car. For miles Garwood drives without saying a word while the girl sobs at his side. At length he stops at a small town and buys clothes for her. As she gradually loses her sense of fear under his kindness, Gerry learns that she is to receive a regular salary in return for keeping house for Garwood and keeping him from drinking.

Once when Gerry sets the table, Garwood looks up at her and his eyes darkening, pulls her into his arms. Her cry of fear awakens him to a sense of her helplessness and releasing her he says gently he'll keep faith. Under Garwood's training, Gerry develops and from her he receives much material and helpful suggestion for his novel. They discuss the motivation, the psychology of character and when Garwood's novel is finished they celebrate with a special party for two. On his trip into town for supplies, he brings her a necklace of pearls and promises to return as soon as he has sold the novel.

In town Garwood meets Jean Hamilton, who had turned to Joe Malone when Garwood left town. Under the pretense of needing his help, Jean inveigles the unwilling Garwood to her apartment and once there, he stays. A friend tells Joe that Garwood is back, and Joe, disgruntled leaves for the mountain hut at which he and Garwood used to spend their vacations. He is startled to find Gerry there, reading Garwood's latest book, and as she explains her presence he infers she is Garwood's mistress. Charmed by her naivete, he makes advances which she resents, and Joe subtly insinuates that Garwood has tired of her and so left. However, when he enters her room that night he finds she has fled, and Garwood, learning that Joe has gone to the mountain hut, leaves Jean and hastens to Gerry, only to find she has fled. Loosing a tirade against Joe for frightening her, Garwood conducts a despairing search. Even her father's hut, however has been abandoned. Scorning the contracts that await him, Garwood searches for the girl he loves and at length traces her through the pearl necklace, which her father has sold to a pawn broker. Gerry, stripped of clothes and money by her father, is accused of being Garwood's mistress and turning upon her father she reminds him that all her life he has spoken about happiness without ever speaking of the price which has to be paid in advance. Now she is going to be happy. Miles away, Garwood stops his car, takes Gerry in his arms, and tells her her payments have been made. Will she take a chance at happiness as his wife, please?

WHAT YOUTH DARES

AT parties and at teas Tillie Reel's country house and the intriguing serial story of "Frozen Windows" and its anonymous writer, are the chief topics of conversation. The boys who have never noticed her before suddenly become attentive. She looks more sophisticated in her more attractive clothes, and the idea of her visiting a mysterious patron at her new house, render her more fascinating. Where does she get the money? People whisper. She sees herself being surreptitiously stared at at the opera and in restaurants. At a party one night, her best friend, Sybil, jealous of Leslie's attentions to Tillie, throws his engagement ring at him. When the latter is seen offering it to Tillie, Sybil organizes a group to follow Tillie to her country home after the party and reveal her rich lover. After Tillie has broken away from Leslie's embrace and has returned the ring, she escapes; for the next part of her story, "Frozen Windows" has yet to be written. From her window she notices the group outside and flees through the back door. She is on her way to her mother's when a sudden storm forces her to the shelter of a nearby empty house. Here comes also George Fitz who as an invited guest of Sybil's brother, is on his way to her home.

Tillie screams as she collides with him in the darkness. In the excitement of discussing the famous "Frozen Windows" with the handsome stranger, she forgets her half written serial and pencils on the mantel piece. After deciding that the only way to conclude the book is to have the hero take the girl by force, the two leave the house, for the storm has cleared. George who has noticed the manuscript, however, hurries back; and noticing the name, realizes that this is the girl he has loved ever since he had read her work. Tillie tries not to show her surprise the following week-end when at Sybil's engagement party,—(for Leslie, having bribed her brother to leave them alone in the rumble seat one night, has been forgiven) she meets George. She announces her engagement to Earl Ames, who has done this on a bet that he would discover everything about her country house escapade through this ruse. George, hearing this, threatens to break her contract with her publishers (whereby she is not to make known her authorship of "Frozen Windows") by revealing her writer's identity if she does not consent to marry him. Earl, whose appetite has been whetted by the competition, lowers at them; so that Tillie, to avoid trouble turns away after daring him to kidnap her. After reading her serial the next day describing the kidnapping on the day of the heroine's wedding, George has an idea. After several weeks of running about town with Jane, to avoid Earl's suspicions, he arrives to witness Tillie's wedding. While Sybil's brother who is best man, worries the groom into a nervous state in the next room, Florence chats with the bride about her wedding clothes. Tillie somehow looks less anxious as she notices Sybil and Leslie secretly drive up next to the house. When Jack goes to the bedroom to telephone for more flowers, Florence suddenly faints; and Tillie who rushes in at her scream, is pushed by the boy through the window to George's waiting arms. While she is being married to the latter, Jack explains to the furious Earl that in the dark he thought he was pushing Florence through the window. Her time of secrecy up, Tillie confesses her identity, and kisses her husband at the minister's as the excited buzz of surprise goes around. Florence takes the gaping Earl outside to the car to comfort him, while the couple are congratulated.

FORTUNE'S ERROR

PACKING up the picture which he has just painted, Eugene Montell bids his admiring wife and daughter, Adele, farewell and departs for Paris to enter it in the exhibition under the name of Louis Aduot. Hastening towards the academy, he is run over by a taxi, and Hortense Renaudin, a counter-espionage agent for the French government, leaving her automobibe to help the unfortunate one, collides with Edward Lorraine, a wealthy American art connoisseur, who is rushing in the same direction. After Eugene has been taken to the hospital, Hortense hurries home to comfort her young son, Eustace, with whom she is planning to return to her ancestral home when she obtains the money from Peter Cavour, (an Italian counter-espionage agent) for the important documents she is to give him. In the meantime, informed of the papers which have been found in the picture of the unconscious man at the hospital, the police prefect sends detective Cornelli to get the picture, the papers, and to arrest Eugene. The latter, having lost his memory as a result of the accident, unable to identify himself, is sentenced as Louis Aduot, to five years imprisonment in the Guianas; and Edward, reading of the event in his hotel in Cairo where he is vacationing, and recognizing the picture, hastens to Paris to buy the picture which had interested him from the first, and to inquire about the artist. After paying the security for the picture, which is not to be sold until the artist's release, Edward departs from the prefect's office for the southern coast of England which is the picture's background. On his way to a friend's house in the small town, Edward meets Adele returning from school and falls in love with her when she directs him to the village. Hastening home, Adele tells her mother excitedly about the handsome stranger and about her new Italian professor, Peter Cavour, whom all the girls are in love with; and her mother, in turn, sends her upstairs to their recently arrived boarder, Hortense, who, having stolen certain important papers from the French government office, has come to deliver them to Peter. Completing this mission in the garden the following night, Hortense hides as she notices Cornelli, sent by the government to watch her, staring at the house. Accosted by Edward, a fellow boarder at his hotel in town, Cornelli tells him his suspicions; and the former, hurrying to talk to Hortense whom he has recognized as the woman at the accident, stops to overhear Peter making love to the protesting Adele. Thinking that Hortense and Peter are using the innocent girl as a means of communication, Edward continues on his way to warn Mrs. Montell; but finding neither her nor Hortense home, returns to the beach to make a copy of Mr. Montell's picture which he has taken with him. When Adele, behind him, cries out and questions him about her father as she notices the picture, Edward tells her the story of the accident. While she is telling this to her mother that night, Edward and Cornelli witness Hortense's fury when Peter, realizing that the ports are watched, tries to return the papers, after deciding that he will not return to Italy as he had planned. Cornered by Cornelli, Peter is arrested while Edward at the house, forces Hortense to confess to placing of the papers in Eugene's picture. Freed, after she has exonerated Eugene, Hortense retires to her native home with her son, while Eugene who has regained his memory as the result of a guard's blow, returns home to greet his happy wife and Adele and her fiance, Edward.

BARITA

Diana Hughes File No. 9565

IT was a sultry day in July when Lieutenant Edwin Thorburn arrived in Bombay from England. Tired from his long sea voyage he was perturbed at being informed that he was to continue his journey immediately to Burma where he was to train a troop of Indian Sepoys. In a jogging bullock cart, the young Englishman finally managed to fall asleep, and after midnight the guides halted for rest. Awaking at dawn, the Lieutenant gazed in wonder at the massive castle of the Rajah Rajendra Kumari. On the balcony facing the lake the Princess Barita reclined upon a silken couch. Fascinated, Edwin waited until she arose and proceeded alone towards the Temple. He whistled softly to attract her attention. With a startled glance she drew her veil about her face and asked what he was doing there. Terrified lest death would be meted to both if observed she beckoned to him to follow her behind the Temple. Edwin seriously vowed that no harm would come to her. At length he begged her to lift her veil. Princess Barita raised lustrous eyes to his as she told him the custom of her country forbade any man to see a woman's face until after their marriage. However, an instant later she removed the filmy lace and blushed under his admiring glance. With a swift intake of breath Edwin kissed her. Heedless of her protests he whispered he loved her, but she disengaged herself, murmured she must go, and ran hastily back to the castle.

A year later, after vain journeys back to the vicinity of the castle, Edwin received an invitation for dinner to the Viceregal Lodge was directed to take a private letter from the government to the Rajah Kumari. With beating heart Edwin entered the castle. While waiting he saw the Princess peering from an enclosure and almost revealed his excitement to the grim-visaged Rajah. That evening, unable to see more of the lovely girl, Edwin returned sullenly on horseback. As he neared the sacred well a rustling noise made him draw his revolver but to his amazement he perceived the slender figure of the Princess Barita who shyly explained that she belonged to him since she had unveiled her face at his request. For the first time Edwin learned that she was the daughter of the Rajah. She pleaded with him to take her along but he explained gently that it was impossible. Even if she absconded women were not allowed at the cantonment. Disappointed, her lovely eyes became filled with tears. Edwin carried her under the shelter of dense shrubs and kissed her. Realizing his intentions she struggled, but was unable to resist his ardent caresses and kisses which sapped her will power. Hours later, Edwin regretted his position. Tenderly he promised to return for her as soon as possible. In the meantime the daughter was missed and the alarm raised. Suddenly through the darkness, gleaming eyes indicated they were at the mercy of a tiger. As the creature leaped Edwin's revolver barked twice and the great beast fell dead. A moment later a gigantic eunuch found them and as he shouted the mate of the tiger sprang upon the ebony figure and dragged the still body into the forest. Princess Barita explained to her parents that she had been within the Temple. Edwin rode swiftly back to the cantonment.

Two months passed and Princess Barita wept in solitude because her father was arranging her marriage to a neighboring Prince and her condition would soon be discovered. Edwin returned one night and waited beside the sacred well. When the Princess came he held the unhappy girl in his arms, kissed her wet eyes and told her he had decided to become a Tea Planter and wanted her to go with him. An arrangement was made with Reverend Anderson to meet them in Calcutta to perform the marriage ceremony. Hours later the Princess' disappearance aroused the castle, but she was safe with the husband of her choice.

ROAD TO HELL

Leroy Victor Cleveland File No. 9338

IN rebellion against the conservative conduct expected of her as the wife of the newly installed minister, Lila Hartley begins going out with a fast crowd when her husband is busy with Church activities. Michael sees the members of the Ladies Aid in whispered conversations that abruptly terminate as he approaches and knows that they are discussing him. Then, one night, Lila returns home unnaturally gay, and Michael realizes she has been drinking. When he remonstrates, she laughs hysterically and reminds him that when she first met and married him he was a human being, now he is just a stilted puppet of respectability who must answer for his every action to the critical congregation which metes out a pittance to him. They quarrel violently and when Michael is called to the bedside of one of his flock, Lila flippantly advises him to have a good time and if it's any consolation to him while he is watching a man die, she will be home this evening. Shocked at her levity, he passes a hand across his aching brow and hurries out. A sudden paroxysm takes old Benton a moment after Michael arrives, and Michael returns home earlier than he expected. He is transfixed as he sees a man hurry out of his house, but Lila is apparently asleep when he comes in and Michael dreading recriminations says nothing. The breach between them widens and once Michael finds a college pin on his wife's bedroom floor. When he discovers Lila is to have a child, he is powerless against the knowledge that the baby isn't his. Lila taunts him, urges him to expose her before his flock, but Michael turns away.

He is conscious of the sympathetic understanding in the eyes of Mrs. Marsters, a woman whom the community respects—and who is wealthy. When she gives a party, everyone goes. Ted Andrews, Lila's betrayer, forces a kiss upon the beautiful and wealthy Mrs. Marsters. Michael entering as Diana is struggling, interferes and from then on Lila accuses Michael of being in love with Diana. Her nagging drives Michael to distraction and when Lila dies in child-birth condemning Michael, sickened, the minister goes back to his drinking to forget his unfaithful wife and the hard looks of his congregation who have lost faith in a minister whose marriage was so unhappy. Asked to resign from his position, Michael ceases caring about himself and takes the path to dissolution. At length seeing a notice in the paper he comes to a banquet during which his successor, a friend of Ted Andrews, is to be honored. Unshaven and ill, Michael cuts a pitiful figure, and Ted has him thrown to the street. Diana Marsters thereupon, braving the whisperings of the small town gossips, follows Michael, hails a taxi and brings him to her home where she sends for a doctor and nurses him back to health.

Michael tells her she should have left him where she found him, that he has even been arrested for vagrancy and he has given up life as too hard a battle. However, when the townspeople turn upon Diana, Michael who has liked her tremendously takes courage to ask her to marry him. He promises to make good, and Diana loving him, holds him close. It is Diana who puts Michael's case before the bishop who agrees to talk to the disgraced minister, and having faith in his redemption reinstates Michael in a new parish. It is soon discovered that Ted Andrews and his recommended minister are defrauding the parish, and the congregation begs Michael to return, but he refuses, preferring his smaller but appreciative flock where Diana and he find happiness.

LOVE SEES AGAIN

O. M. Fenichel File No. 9128

ENCOURAGED by June Rode to think that her mother is hopelessly old-fashioned in her ideas, Elaine leaves school to take a job with the Mayflower Company where June also is employed. When Elaine is introduced to the dapper Edward Sheldon she readily understands why June has been so enthusiastic about the handsome man who has been attentive to her. June leaves the city to accept a better position elsewhere and Sheldon and Elaine begin to see a great deal of each other. Though her widowed mother, whose life is centered in her only daughter, objects to this friendship, Elaine accepts the many gifts he showers upon her, confident that his attentions are sincere. Several times when they are out somewhere together she feels that they are being shadowed but Sheldon, whom she now calls Eddie, laughs her fears away. Then one night she looks up from their table at the Merry Boys' Club to encounter the gaze of a determined young man who has been frankly staring at her. Despite Eddie's frown he cuts in and dances with her. At the end of the number she leaves him without giving him her name as he insists.

Eddie never mentions marriage but talks of all they will do when his ship comes in and how he will overcome her mother's dislike by his generosity to her and one night in a moment of madness, Elaine yields to him. When Eddie is called to the Company's home office in California, he promises to marry her immediately upon his return. Beyond several brief notes which tell her only that he is too busy to write and begging her not to worry she hears nothing from him. A visit to her physician confirms her fears that she is bearing Eddie a child. Unable to communicate with Eddie who has given her no forwarding address and who has warned her not to trouble the branch office with calls, she hesitates to tell her mother of her trouble. When she answers the door one evening she finds the insistent young man who had danced with her at the Merry Boys' Club several months before. Somewhat embarrassed he asks to see her alone and then takes the picture of herself which she has given to Eddie from his pocket. From his questions she learns that the notorious criminal Duke who has just been apprehended by the police has confessed that Edward Sheldon is the master-mind behind all Duke's exploits, and that Sheldon uses a female accomplice. When the police raided his apartment they had found this portrait. However when news of Sheldon's arrest in California was transmitted to New York, June Rode had given herself up as Sheldon's accomplice. In reply to her query he tells her that he is a reporter and that when he saw her picture he recognized her as the girl he had been trying to find since that night at the club. It had been identified by June who did not know that Eddie had been playing with her former friend. Now Elaine must tell her mother who gallantly stands by her. The shock of what she has gone through however tell upon her and her baby is born dead. Meanwhile her reporter-friend, Fred Nelson proves his loyalty and when she has regained her strength he invites Elaine and her mother to spend some weeks at his parents' farm. There Elaine slowly recovers her former zest for life and when news that Eddie has been killed in a jail break comes to her she shudders to think how easily she has escaped. And when Fred proposes to her that together they should try to forget all the past, she joyfully accepts knowing that her mother smiles upon this love affair.

AN his annual trip to the High Hills in search of gold, Steven Harte, while camping with his horse, Silver, and his dog, Pal, meets Waunee Hill, a beautiful but hungry squaw. As the weeks pass, she prepares his food, mends his clothes, and finally becomes his partner in the Red Rock mine to which she has led him. Several months later, while she returns to her people (so that her child may be born among them), Steve returns to town to negotiate with eastern capitalists for the development of his mine. After they have visited the mine and made their huge investments, Steven, now the wealthy manager, buys new clothes for Waunee and Goldie, the child. Steven, however, forgets Waunee and his child in his love for Viola Swift, the flirtatious young woman whom the financeers bring with them on a later visit. Realizing his urge for the white woman, Waunee leaves him with the child, and returns to the Reservation, after she has warned Steve about Viola's interest in his money. Steve is in despair; for the child screams and Viola knows nothing of infant rearing, and refuses to undertake the responsibility. However, after Steve has brought Kate Dunne, a nurse, from town, his supervision of the mine and his wooing of Viola can progress more smoothly. No sooner are they married than Steve begins to notice Viola's attentions to the camp men. So that he eagerly complies with her request for a luxurious city home; and while she is devoting herself to hunting expeditions, parties, and rides with her friends, his work at the mine,—which now boasts several buildings, an automobile road, telephones,—keeps him in ignorance of the gossip concerning her escapades with men. When the cook mentions a particularly wild party to him one night, Steve hires a young detective who disguises himself as the new maid, Allien Berg, to watch her doings. Allien constantly refuses to attend Viola at the bath, and further earns Viola's dislike by her spying ways. She hastily throws away a cigar the following night as Stan Lee, Viola's lover, rings the bell. She sees him enter Viola's room after she has been given permission to retire early. Berg thereupon calls Steve who hastens down to throw the trembling lover from his closet hiding place, through the window. After he denounces his wife by contrasting her with the ever loyal Waunee, Steve orders her from the house. Berg and Steve smile as looking through the window, they see the fleeing Stan collide with a stutteringly angry policeman. The latter blows his nose and gives him a passage way when the half-nude man tells him the bath house is his destination. When Viola for the first time, before her departure, informs Goldie that she is not her true mother, the little girl questions Steve. Anxious to see Waunee again, for his own sake as well as for the child's, Steve rides to the Reservation with her the next day. Waunee is overjoyed to learn that she is to be Steve's partner again. She will learn the ways of his people, and as soon as he is sure of his love for her, she will marry him. His head drawn forward by Goldie's hand. Steve kisses her; and Waunee leaves her home in blushing happiness while her tribesmen grin at each other. Several weeks later, completely Americanized, Waunee is married to her partner amidst the cheers of the camp and town visitors.

"ANOTHER cot there", commands the overworked doctor of United States General Hospital No. 22 as he brings in the wounded Gilbert Hawley on a stretcher. When the handsome boy calls her ma and winks at her first in pain and then in delight, the new nurse, Cynthia Wyler immediately loves her new delirious patient. As the weeks pass, Gilbert, suffering from shell shock, often upsets the entire ward by walking in his sleep at night in search of his ma. His constant talk of the Kentucky mountains where he lives prolongs his feverishness; until, his life at a very low ebb, he is taken among the porch patients for more air and freedom. Several weeks later, he is well again, and clamours continually to be allowed home, for his favorite nurse and friend, Cynthia, has been transferred to another ward. Finally when the doctor is examining him in the treatment room one night, Gilbert overwhelms him with a blow, dons his white uniform and attempts to make his exit. However, he notices Cynthia struggling in the arms of one of the younger doctors with whose aid she was preparing the supplies for the wounded. After punching the doctor, Gilbert is led back in disgrace by the hospital matron, while Cynthia is transferred to another hospital. Gilbert thereupon pretends to be delirious again,—pulls off the men's covers at night, makes weird bird calls to frighten them, walks around on all fours barking like a dog, and finally infuriates the matron by wheeling his cot into her room one night. With the aid of a visitor's car where he has hidden, he eventually reaches the hospital where Cynthia is working. The latter, however, thinking that Ma is his wife—for so the hospital authorities have indicated it on his record—shuns his attentions. When she discovers that the sick man whose cot he has been found in, has been secretly shipped to the other hospital as an exchange for himself, she orders his discharge.

On the day of his departure Cynthia coldly ushers into his room a buxom woman accompanied by a pretty young lady. When Cynthia in spite of his protests departs, Gilbert tries to push the two women out, and sulks when they insist upon helping him dress. In the meantime, the unhappy Cynthia returns to the Red Cross House to tender her resignation, pack her things, and return home to say "yes" to her parents' choice, a middle-aged, stuttering minister. But Gilbert has become violent,—has hastily undressed himself and thrown his valises from the window. They fall on the head of the chief doctor who is visiting the hospital. His mother rushes to fetch Cynthia at the Red Cross House, but forgets her mission in the eating of the hot cakes the nurse offers her there. When the impatient Gilbert arrives there, he finds everyone gaping at his relative who is dexterously flipping the pancakes, dipping them in syrup afterwards, and quickly eating them. After he has explained that the pretty girl is his sister, Gilbert forces a passing minister (who is on his way to comfort a dying man) to marry them. When the doctor arrives to pummel the culprit, the latter departs with his bride in the chief's car for the Kentucky mountains.

THE CALL OF LOVE

THE tumult of a drunken brawl outside the Arcadia Dance Hall soon draws a large crowd. When Mrs. Young recognizes one of the combatants as Joseph Austin, her daughter's friend, she turns away with a shudder. At home, Alice, who has persisted in meeting Joe in spite of her mother's protests, now promises to break the friendship. The evenings are lonely for Alice in the days that follow, until she is finally tempted to accept the invitations of Amy, one of the other salesgirls in the department store where she works, to a party. There she meets Victor Wright, a notorious drinker and gambler of the Arcadia. Alice, impressed by his wealth, accepts his invitations to parties and theaters, but continues to refuse him her companionship at the Arcadia; for she still loves Joe and hesitates to arouse his jealousy. When one evening, Victor boasts of his new girl, Joe, whose letters and telephone calls to Alice have been intercepted by Mrs. Young, now visits the latter in person to warn her. Mrs. Young however, treats him curtly and refuses to listen to him. Her warning to Alice concerning her conduct with men, and her choice of friends, comes at the same time that Victor, having met the vivacious Harriet to whom Joe has introduced him, decides that Alice is too tame. So that on Christmas Eve, the latter finds herself without the promised appointment. The bustle of the department store girls hurrying away for their "dates" makes her even more despondent. Remembering her mother's illness, she now takes a short cut home. When she meets Joe outside his office building, she eagerly agrees to celebrate the holiday with him. At the Arcadia, though suddenly smitten by her infidelity to her mother, she continues to drink and smoke. In the meantime, the frantic Mrs. Young is telephoning everywhere for Alice. Suddenly she is accosted by her gangster husband, Ira, whose brutal treatment in the past had forced her to leave him. As usual, he demands the custody of his daughter, and strikes his wife when she remains silent. Suddenly he sees the note which one of the neighbors, having taken Alice's telephone messages earlier in the evening (when Mrs. Young was out shopping), has pushed under the door. He rushes away to the Arcadia, and Mrs. Young drags herself to the telephone to warn Alice. Learning from the proprietor that Alice and Joe, both intoxicated, have left for a wild ride with some other people, she drops, both from relief and shock. After a halting prayer that Joe protect Alice, Mrs. Young breathes her last. In a murderous mood, Mr. Young returns to harm his wife, but finding her dead, is overcome by remorse and horror. Anxious for her sake, to save the girl from peril, he hastily traces her, with the aid of the Arcadia proprietor, to a roadside inn. Here, Joe, who has been trying to force his attentions on Alice, has a sudden feeling of repulsion for himself. The girl is fine, one whom he loves sincerely. Taken home by Mr. Young, Alice goes to Joe's arms for protection and love, while her father weeps. Mr. Young and Joe make a vow never to drink or gamble while Alice prays that her mother may know of this. Alice feels her mother watching over her during her marriage to Joe several days later.

THE TURNING POINT

Mrs. J. B. Meador File No. 8379

THE most popular girl in town, Mary Ellen Johns, stares dazedly over the cliff at her wrecked roadster. When Jack Graves, a newly arrived architect passes by, he takes the shaken girl home. After frequent visits and letters exchanged on his trips abroad, he proposes to her; and her whispered "yes" sets him to planning a home for themselves. A year passes, and Jack, disappointed that their first child is a girl,—instead of a boy to inherit her father's estates is absent more and more from home. When he returns home suspiciously drunk one night after a supposed conference, Mary decides to follow him. At his office the next night she is told by the superintendant who is closing the place for the evening that Mr. Graves has gone with his friend, Grace Faraday. Mary weeps as she recalls the rumors she had once so often ignored about Jack's love for this girl who had jilted him. She buys herself some new clothes, refurnishes the house and tries to pay more attention to her husband instead of to Dorothy, her child. But Jack merely grumbles at her extravagances. Ill in health, Mary constantly refuses to return home at the urgings of her father who has visited her home after he has heard of Jack's attentions to Grace. Finally, goaded to despair, Mary swallows her pride and rushes to Grace's hotel to denounce and threaten her. There she meets Thomas, Grace's husband who loves her immediately. She returns home without telling him anything. In spite of his protests she refuses to see him secretly; and when she notices him staring at her house often, she invites him in one day to warn him against her husband's jealousy. In the meantime, Grace, seeing a chance for a divorce in the gossip she has heard about their seeing each other, mentions it to Jack. The latter, infuriated, packs his things while Mary weeps, and leaves her after negotiations have been made for a divorce. While Mary is comforting the heartbroken and surprised Thomas, Jack and Grace are killed in a collision;—for in celebrating their freedom, they have become drunk; and their abandoned kissing in the car had thrown Jack out of the wheel control at a road crossing. The years pass happily and swiftly; and just at the time that Tom and Mary are quietly married, Dorothy, home for a vacation from college, falls in love with Bruce Faraday, Thomas' commercial artist son, recently returned from his European study. Learning of his mother's affair with her father, from Nancy Benton, the mayor's daughter who is in love with Bruce, Dorothy returns her engagement ring. She is ashamed. Seeing her note and ring, Bruce follows her in time to save her from an accident on the ice. After a long seige of pneumonia, Dorothy says "yes" to Bruce. They are married after they have visited the graves of Jack and Grace; and Mr. and Mrs. Faraday smile happily to each other.

A WOMAN'S LOVE

Eugenia Polluk Maxymow File No. 9235

FLATTERED by the attentions of the serious Dr. Alexander Maliszewski, whom her father, himself a doctor of note, held up to her as one of the coming men in the field of medical science, Ann Therese found herself married to him before she was actually aware of what had happened. But in lonely Korszow where he took her to live so that he might carry on his numerous experiments unmolested she realized that she had nothing in common with this grave, unsmiling man who spent all his days in his laboratory and even at the dinner table seemed still to be dwelling in yet untrodden realms. In the company of her child, however, she found her only pleasant occupation and romping with two-year old Zigmond in his sunny nursery she forgot the loneliness of the huge country estate. Sergy Zaycou, come to take over the management of an estate for which the preoccupied scientist found little time, met Ann Therese on one of the first nights of his stay when he came at the invitation of his employer to take dinner with them. Her charming manner and wistful smile won him immediately. Dr. Maliszewski, arousing himself from his own thoughts, heard them eagerly discussing riding and suggested that perhaps Sergy Zaycou could accompany Ann Therese so that she might resume her riding. The suggestion was joyfully accepted by Ann and by Sergy who merely smiled his acceptance. During the following days a new lightness was evident in Ann Therese and when Eugenia, the housekeeper, who rejoiced in her mistress' newly-found happiness, commented, she brought tell-tale blushes to Ann Therese's cheek. But other people were also noticing and one of these, Cecilia Szyk, the maid, saw a means of easy money if she could find definite proof to place before the master of the house. When the Doctor left to attend a convention in a distant city Cecilia determined to watch carefully. Eugenia came upon her stopping at the parlor door preparatory to entering. Both knew that Sergy and Ann Therese were in the room but the housekeeper, concealing her terror for her mistress, sent Cecilia to fulfill an errand in another part of the house and the girl had no choice but to obey. Then one day as they were coming from a walk in the woods, Ann Therese glanced up at the sound of leaves being trampled and recognized Cecilia's fleeing form. Sergy entreated her to go away with him so that their love could know fulfillment but Ann Therese stubbornly refused. However when her husband's telegram announcing his return was handed to her by a covetously smiling Cecilia, she determined that she would herself reveal her love to her husband and since in the pursuance of his career the baby would only hamper him she would take Zigmond with her.

But a strange Dr. Maliszewski who did not hurry off to his laboratory after brusquely kissing his wife arrived home. Ann Therese wondered at the sudden interest he manifested in her and in his son. However when she attempted to tell him of her plans something in his eyes stopped her. Then one day he told her that he was a victim of his own experiments, that one of the animals he had used for his experiments had bitten him and sent a fatal germ into his body. His time on earth was limited and from then on he was going to devote himself to his wife and child whom he now realized he had sadly neglected. Even the heartless Cecilia could not doubt Ann Therese's unflagging devotion to her husband in the days that followed and even she could not torture a dying man with stories of his wife's suspected faithlessness. For a while after Dr. Maliszowski's death Ann Therese thought only of him and their young son but after a time memories of the happiness she had hoped for with Sergy returned and she finally answered one of his numerous letters and allowed him to come and see her. At the sight of him thoughts of all that might yet be surged up within her and she consented to marry him and with him and young Zigmond try to forget the past in a place far from lonely Korszow.

CIRCLE OF FOLLY

Walter Deppe File No. 8391

A MUSIC composer himself, Paul recognized in the brilliant playing of the young pianiste, a beautiful woman with the same overpowering love of music that he felt. He discovered that she was studying at the conservatory in Dresden, Germany, and arranged to meet Martha. For a long while he dared not confess his feelings to her but at length as they walked through the moonlit park, he seized her hands in his and impulsively gave utterance to his love. With the blessings of her father, the young people left to find happiness together in a little chapel in Lucerne, Switzerland, untouched by the conflicts of nations and the struggles of the rest of the world. Paul's music won acclaim for him and content with her family, Martha retired from the professional world and played only for her husband and her children.

It was just this detachment from the world that led the little family to grief, for when Anne, Paul's cousin, arrived from the United States to visit the famous composer, she brought with her a sophistication against which Paul had not been innoculated. From the first Anne made no secret of her love and admiration for the young musician and he, at first distant, soon fell a victim to her skilled flattery. Once when they had all arranged to go to a fete in another town, Martha became ill and unsuspecting urged them to go without her. Since the boys were anxious to travel on their bicycles, Anne and Paul were left alone in the car. On the way Anne asked Paul to stop and weeping, she told him she loved him so much she couldn't go on. Paul, responding to the nearness of her young body, tried to make her see the impossibility of such an arrangement, and when they arrived late, the boys accepted the explanation that Paul and Anne had set out later than expected. However, when Paul heard them mention it to Martha and saw her suspicion ignited by the incident, he wished fervently that the disquieting Anne had never arrived. It was agony having her around, feeling her nearness and knowing he could have her if he wanted, and at last Anne went. Martha was different thereafter but when Anne began sending letters to Paul and one was delivered into Martha's hands the open break occurred. Drying the tears that welled in her eyes, Martha sent him to Anne and got her divorce. Dazed by her sending him into her rival's arms, Paul soon comforted himself with the thought that at least Anne loved him and within a few weeks he arrived in the United States. He had, however, considerable difficulty finding Anne, and when she saw him and laughed at his bewilderment, he felt despair. He thought wildly of suicide, but Anne, a dilettante, soon grasped the enthusiasm of the press over some of Paul's recently imported music and amused at his gravity, she married him.

From then on Paul knew no rest from remorse. Now that he had Anne, thoughts of Martha beset him constantly and when he sent for the two boys he was led by their bitter remarks against Anne's extravagance and shallowness to slap Werner. He realized only too well, however, the truth of their statements, when Anne ran off with another man, telling him she was arranging for a divorce.

Broken and thinking only of the happiness he had forfeited, Paul's musical success was empty for him. Then he learned that Martha was to give another concert in Europe after all these years. In the audience Paul writhed mentally at the disfavor with which her performance was greeted and as he let himself into her dressing room he saw her give way to her despair. Gently he gathered her in his arms and together they promised to help each other regain what they had lost.

PROFESSOR QUACK

A. Strafello File No. 8420

SCREAMING his health talk on the valuable minerals to be found in vegetables, professor Monteray stops now to place his assistant, Neil Jarvis, in front of him to receive the missiles thrown, now to answer such questions as, "How about a kiln and truck for the spinach iron?" or "Do minerals build things as brick do." Misunderstanding the professor's statement, "Potatoes rich in potassium salts," one of the crowd, removing his stockings, places his toes in a pail filled with water and salts. Everyone laughs when Neil holds newcomers up with a water revolver as he demands money for the bottle of the Professor's medicine handed to them. The growing crowd jeer and throw their money at the Professor who in between sentences, kicks Neil for winking at girls in the crowd, throwing pebbles down fat ladies' backs, and for tickling Phoebe Delson, the gaudily dressed show girl whose ogle attracts the men. Suddenly in the midst of his speech, noticing Warren Rothschild, a booking and publicity agent who is his friend, approaching them from the corner drug store with Norma Monteray, a graduate of finishing school, now visiting her friend here, the Professor motions wildly to him to take his daughter (who does not know his trade) away. Thinking he is beckoning to him, Neil tries to assist him by shouting to Warren through his megaphone. Crowning him with his megaphone like a dunce, the Professor suddenly dons a large Indian mask, and begins to draw "before and after" pictures on the blackboard nearby in illustration of the potency of his medicine. When a woman in the crowd at this moment overhears Norma's disdainful request to be taken away from the vulgar rabble, she pushes her rudely; and Neil scolding her is punched in the face by the woman's husband. The Professor, who has been pointing to Norma as a robust example of his precious medicine, jumps from his platform to quell the disturbance, for the police guards on the fair grounds are looking questioningly in that direction; and Phoebe, infatuated with the handsome Neil whom she has often gone out with in the various towns where he has booked places for them, jealously rushes to push Norma away. But Neil, in love with Phoebe, follows her to dissuade her; however, forgetting this mission, he gapes recognizingly at the beautiful Norma. Opening his mouth to shout his revelation to the Professor, he loses his utterance when the latter pushes a potato into his mouth, and when he chases after the running Norma trying to get the potato out and tell her of her father's identity, the latter follows to bring him back. With Phoebe, Warren, and the crowd in pursuit, Neil is soon caught; and when a policeman, thinking Norma is an escaping thief, accosts her for arrest, Neil offers him the potato he has just wrenched from his mouth and a bottle of the Professor's medicine. When Norma protests weepingly, Warren pushes the policeman out of the way, and just as the latter raises his club to retaliate, the booing crowd begin to assail him with bottles of the professor's medicines and the vegetables the latter has brought with him in illustration of his lecture. Catching them deftly in the meantime, the Professor, Neil, and Phoebe sell them quickly to the amused spectators. However, noticing a group of mounted policemen approaching them, the crowd swiftly disperses while Warren, Norma, Phoebe, and Neil hide in between two trucks. The crowd, in the meantime, noticing Neil kissing Phoebe and Norma kissing her father and then her new fiance, Warren, begins a kissing orgy; so that when the screams of the girls attract the searching police to their hiding places, the professor and his company make a dash for their truck, and drive safely away through the frightened horses of the police and through the screaming and laughing crowds.

THE YELLOW DANGER

Opal Thomas File No. 8346

CROUCHING against a huge barrel on the dock, Reporter Dick Lane watched with growing suspicion as the cloaked figures unloaded a small boat. Through the fog he could barely see them, but he was on the trail of a sinister opium ring. For a long time these men were suspected of the illicit traffic, but nothing could be proved against them. A moment later, the boat had pushed off and the men hurried down the narrow streets with Dick behind them. Trailing them around the winding coolie quarters, Dick stopped in bewilderment before a blank wall. His quarry had eluded him. Every moment was filled with peril here for the white man, but as he hopelessly gave up the search the faint cry of a woman reached him. With drawn gun he broke into a shop, searched for a secret stair case and ascended. The stillness of death hung over the place and as he lifted a curtain he stifled an outcry. Lying upon a bed was a lovely Chinese girl, strangled to death but a few moments before. Feverishly he searched the room and discovered a note of warning from one Yoy Ting to the murdered girl, Ming Toy. Dick pocketed it and left.

In his room, Dick found his friend Jack drinking glass after glass of rye. He hated China, he said, and didn't care if he never handed in another assignment. However, when Dick sobered him up and recounted the events of the night Jack agreed to see the story through. For days Dick and Jack watched the docks and then on Friday of the following week, about mid-night, Dick clutched his friend's arm and pointed to the men he had seen before getting off a small tug. Following them, the two reporters entered a cafe and seated themselves close behind. The music, dancers, and girls about, prevented Dick and Jack from catching more than brief snatches of the conversation, but as Dick heard Yoy Ting, he knew he had his men. They heard too about a ship leaving at twelve the next night and the following evening the pair hung around and when two of the men got shore leave for a few hours, Dick and Jack silently felled them and took the sailors' places. Hiding in the ammunition room to prevent detection, Jack got in trouble stealing a drink. One of the sailors cried out, recognizing them as white men, but before he could call his fellows, he was knocked out. Jack promised to stay away from liquor after that, and when the boat landed on a small island, the Americans were astounded at the opulence of a palace set back in the woods. Investigating, they found barrels of opium in the cellar, but suddenly the lights snapped on and after a desperate struggle, the two men were captured. It was when they were brought before Yoy Ting that they gasped. She was a beautiful white girl! Yoy Ting pretended approval of the tortures devised for the spies, but later she let herself into the room, unbound the pair and informed them that they were the first white men she had seen since her father and mother had been captured by Chinese bandits. They had both died of privation but Yoy Ting had been brought up by Lee Foo, the leader and had become the blind for his activities. Yoy Ting gave each of the men a gun and when Lee Foo directed their torture, the adventurers shot their way out, captured Lee Foo, and took Yoy Ting back with them. Lee Foo who had had Ming Toy, Yoy Ting's one friend, killed because she knew too much, had a large reward on his head. The opium ring was broken up, and Jack and Dick sailed for the states with the latter's wife, once Yoy Ting.

MARCHETA

Mary M. Hays File No. 8201

CALLED from the garden where the young giant Rolof has been telling her of his love and singing the song, "Marcheta", to her, the lovely young Mexican girl presses a fleeting kiss on Rolof's lips and goes inside. Her father, Alverado, has been trying to get control of a mine owned by a Don Juan, but has had no success. However, when the greedy eyes of Juan measure the slim body of Marcheta, he agrees to sell his interests in return for Marcheta. Stunned by the suddenness of it all, Marcheta learns that within a few days she will be the bride of Juan. Distractedly she communicates with Rolof who immediately induces her to elope with him that night. Escaping when all is dark, Marcheta is caught up by her lover and until dawn they ride. At length they stop in a little Church, are married, and are triumphantly coming out together, when Marcheta's eyes widen with fright at sight of her father and Juan hastening toward them. Before she can cry out Juan empties his gun in the body of Rolof who pitches headlong on the ground, and Alverado seizes his fainting daughter and throwing her across his horse takes her home.

For days Marcheta remains in a coma, and as she opens her eyes, she moans that she doesn't want to live without Rolof. Despite her cries that she is already married and will not believe her bridegroom dead, the avaricious Alverado continues to make plans for his daughter's marriage to Juan. Alverado engages a famous troupe of musicians for the days of feasting before the wedding, and Marcheta remains listless until one of the musicians plays a strain of Rolof's song, "Marcheta". Trembling Marcheta opens her latticed window, and for a moment, so strong is the illusion that she cries out, "Rolof!" But an instant later she realizes that the player is much older than her Rolof. Wonderingly she questions him about the song and learns that in his travels this Rosetti had picked up a boy, badly wounded and so ill that his memory had completely fled. Only broken snatches of the song "Marcheta" seemed to bind him to the past. Crying out with joy, Marcheta questions Rosetti further and learns that he too had recognized the resemblance and had pinned a vague hope to the fact that Rolof might be his own son. But the blank mind had imposed an insuperable barrier. Marcheta begs Rosetti to bring the boy to the marriage ceremony. Rosetti is late and Marcheta suffers agonies but at length the singer comes in leading the vacant-countenanced Rolof. Juan, drunk as usual, does not notice the entrance but Marcheta silently implores Rolof to recognize her and as he stares at her struggling with the clouding veils she sings his song, "Marcheta". With a mighty cry he remembers all and before the astonished guests, he clasps his bride in his arms. Juan, realizing at last something is happening turns and see Rolof. He cries, "You!" and struggles to unsheath his knife. Rolof flees with Rosetti and Marcheta but they are trapped. Throwing off pursuer after pursuer, Rolof locks with Juan and he dodges Juan's thrust. The drunkard falls against the wall killing himself with his own knife.

Later, Rolof proves he is Rosetti's son and the half-brother of Juan who had defrauded him of his rightful inheritance—the mine, which Rolof turns over to Marcheta's father; while he, his bride, and his newly found father ride toward happiness.

THE FIGHTING ROMANCE

Elma Rivoli File No. 9174

TRAVELING through Euralia, the country of her birth from which her mother has taken her as a child, Elsa's car breaks down in the mountain passes just outside the capital. Her signal is heeded by General Szaincrox, a general in the Euralian army. As they drive to the city he remarks upon her striking resemblance to Princess Zona, the affianced bride of his beloved Euralia's ruler, Prince Arthur. Reluctantly she falls in with his plans that she take the place of Zona whom the populace is eagerly awaiting until Zona can be recovered from Count Fasdetch's marauding band who hope to throw the country into revolt when the story of the kidnapping is learned. Elsa plays her part well but she and Prince Arthur fall in love with each other. But even as he kisses her he tells her that he must for reasons of state go through with his marriage to a bride he has never even seen. However when General Szaincrox announces that Zona is safe and will be at the capital on the morrow he must keep her with him somehow. That night Elsa awakens to hear somebody moving about her room. Before she can make any outcry she is gagged and bound and driven to a distant villa. There her abductor, Count Fasdetch tells her that he has been retained by the Prince to get her to this villa of his where he can have her while at the same time he marries Zona. She allies herself with the Count in his plans to make Euralia a republic when he assures her that she can at the same time revenge herself against Arthur's duplicity. Arthur, in response to a note from her comes to the villa and is immediately surrounded by Count Fasdetch's band. Arthur sneers at Elsa's readiness to believe ill of him so easily and calls upon the Count to allow him a fair fight. In the duel which follows Arthur vanquishes the Count's best swordsman. As the latter falls, gripping his side, the Count's men seize the prince and imprison him in the cellar of the villa. Though Elsa realizes too late that she has fallen into the wily Count's trap he forces her to do his bidding by threatening to harm the Prince if she refuses. Dressed as the Princess who is now safely in the Palace she goes to a notorious club and restaurant so that soon the people are protesting the future Queen's extravagance. These people he rallies under his standard. Elsa then appoints a meeting-place at a point in the mountain passes where she promises to give her information about the Prince. The Princess escorted by General Szaincrox, keeps the appointment but instead of Elsa whom only the General knows, they are surrounded by a group of men. Against this band their small retinue has no chance and though the rest are permitted to go unmolested Zona is taken prisoner. Count Fasdetch pretends to rescue Zona from his own men and after securing her loyalty for the new government which he proposes to establish, escorts her safely to the border.

As rumors of the Prince's disappearance reach the populace revolt spreads. Elsa allows the Count to think she is succumbing to his advances. At a dinner in his rooms she succeeds in making him drink himself into a drunken stupor. Outwardly calm, though her knees are quaking, she goes by the guards who know nothing about her except that she has been working in league with Count Fasdetch and so allow her to escape. She leads the Prince's men back to the villa and the Count and his followers are captured. Elsa rushes down to the Prince and loosens his bounds. Now that all misunderstandings are cleared up Arthur declares he will give up his kingdom to marry Elsa since he cannot go through with his marriage to Zona. Elsa refuses to allow him to sacrifice everything for her. However the General tells them that Elsa is a worthy queen for Arthur. Elsa's resemblance to Zona is explained by the fact that they are sisters. Letters from England had just ended a search of years and informed him that the girl's mother, humiliated by her husband's many love affairs had taken her youngest daughter and run away to England. Arthur, happy that the girl of his choice will be welcomed by his people enfolds a radiant Elsa within his embrace.

INDIAN BRIDE

George R. Rogers File No. 8292

IMPULSIVE and reckless, Tom Martin runs away from home attracted by the promise of the Great West. However, his money gives out when he wanders into a gambling house. However as he is standing about, he sees Dick Randall protesting that he has been cheated. Tom sees three sinister looking gamblers close on the defenceless man, and throwing caution to the winds Tom goes to his aid. They have a great struggle and both are thrown from the gambling house. Feeling that they have scored a moral victory, they shake hands. Dick tells Tom he is looking for someone who can manage a team of oxen and is willing to travel West, and the young adventurer signs up.

The westward trek begins and during a windstorm the oxen refuse to move. Tom gets out to cut a bramble branch. He tears his face, his shirt and his arms on the thorns but the oxen still refuse to budge. Dick comes to Tom's aid and with a simple gesture manages the stubborn beasts. In his efforts, however, Tom has lost his hat and amid the laughter of the other travelers, the boy accepts the apron given him by the cook. All through the trip Tom stands the laughter at his aproned head. The storm does not let up, however, and soon a herd of buffalo fleeing before a prairie fire come charging down on the frightened caravan which forms a circle of the wagons and fires into the lowering doom. Shot after shot is fired but the buffalo come on, until at length they swerve and the pack follows a side trail. Most of the party has been killed and as Tom aids his friend, a tribe of Indians follow the buffalo. Suddenly one of the buffalo charges down on Dick. Tom comes to his friend's aid and is badly gored but he kills the buffalo. The lone survivors of the brave band, Tom and Dick are carried, still unconscious to the Indian's camp but Dick lives just long enough to bequeath his possessions to Tom. Hovering between life and death for weeks, Tom is aware of the tender ministrations of Bluebird, a lovely Indian maid. His eyes follow her as she moves about his tent, and when he is well enough to get around, he takes her gently in his arms and tells her of his love. Tears fill the lovely eyes of Bluebird as she tells him she is soon to be the squaw of the son of the chief. Tom is dismayed for in the weeks of his helplessness, it was the stalwart Red Arrow who had been as a brother to him. Loving Bluebird as he does, Tom will not take her from his friend and in his tent he broods. The night before the wedding, however, the Crows attack the tribe and flee leaving among the dead the gallant Red Arrow. The settlement is plunged in despair, and it is Tom, now able to get around once more, who organizes a group of warriors and avenges Red Arrow's death. The Chief, admiring Tom's bravery treats him as if he were his own son, and in a colorful ceremony, Tom marries Bluebird and takes her back to his own people. The lovely young Indian girl is accepted by Tom's people and with the gifts of the Indians and the fortune Dick Randall had left him, Tom buys a ranch and finds happiness with Bluebird.

THE NEW FRIEND

THE Honor Council was meeting on the case of Alice who had been caught coming in after hours three times; but Pansy, thinking of the telegram from J. W. inviting her to the State game was not paying much attention. A sharp reproof brought her back to the present where the girls were seated around seriously discussing an infringement of the Board laws, and it was Pansy who pointed out that even if it were true that Alice didn't like college and was only sticking it out because her mother insisted and her stepfather made her miserable at home, they, the Honor Council had no right to free an offender. The girls filed out of the room with less noise than usual, and a momentary pang seized her as Alice came in to hear her sentence. Pansy saw her fingers tighten on the back of the chair as she was put on bounds for the rest of the semester. It was strange that she Pansy, who never went on dates, should be ordering the lovely Alice who had more than she could possibly fill, not to go out any more. As Alice's footsteps pattered emptily down the hall, Pansy thought of J. W. She had only met him once and he had invited her to the game. She knew though he would never see her again. She'd have nothing to say to him, she could never keep the handsomest man on the campus interested in her. He met her at the station and Pansy blushed as he beamed down on her. Panic seized her as she remembered all she had ever read about how to draw out a man, and she laughed self-consciously at his jokes. The campus was alive with students, all attractive, and Pansy smiled at an infinite number of people who greeted her. At the stadium a dark cloud settled down on her as she wished that it was Alice who was here, Alice who would enjoy all this. When the game finished, Pansy raised widened eyes to J. W. and asked if he wouldn't mind if she rested a while before dinner instead of going on to the club. J. W. was tender, certain they'd make up for this at the dance, but Pansy wasn't so sanguine. She knew she'd flop. Then as she entered her room she apologized for intruding on another girl. The girl turned quickly. "Alice," Pansy gasped, "I'm so glad you came." "Glad!" Sinking on the bed Pansy chattered about how she'd been miserable about the penalty, miserable about J. W. Alice listened to it all, then promptly set about helping Pansy. She threw up her hands at the idea of Pansy wearing a black satin with her coloring and insisted on changing dresses. Even Pansy was startled at sight of herself in Alice's orange velvet and she sighed aloud at the necessity of having to report Alice when they returned. Armed with the line Alice gave her, and the assurance that J. W. had told her date that Pansy was the most beautiful girl there, Pansy flirted, danced, took a mad ride with J. W. at four in the morning, and at lengh the weekend was over.

But on the train back, Pansy knew she had to report Alice. It didn't seem fair after all Alice had done for her, but there was honor to be considered. Alice came in while the girls were chattering and her admission that she had been to State over the weekend drew a shocked silence. It was Pansy who cried out that Alice could break all the rules she wanted to but if she were going to boast she ought to pick something plausible, because she, Pansy was at State and should certainly have seen Alice. Alice's eyes met Pansy's across the room. "And I hear," she said, "that you were a complete success."

ONE WILD NIGHT

JANET noticed her father's frown as she gaily acknowledged the introduction she had forced her father to effect between her and his business caller, Fred Adams, notorious man - about - town. When Fred left, her father pinched her chin teasingly and reminded her that he didn't want her coming to his office and meeting bad people. Janet laughed at that, but when she left she had the money she wanted to buy a new coat. As she reached the street Janet turned in surprise to find Fred had waited for her. He drove her home and she promised to accompany him to a party the following night. However, when her father learned with whom she had made the appointment, he was annoyed. He didn't like Fred, said he was not to be trusted, and for the first time in Janet's life she found her father ordering her not to see a man. Piqued, Janet answered she was nineteen, old enough to select her own friends. Because she thought her parents very old-fashioned, for her mother, to whom she appealed, claimed her father must know whereof he spoke, Janet decided to show them she wasn't a child. Thereafter her meetings with Fred were arranged without the knowledge of her parents who believed her safely asleep in her room, while Janet was being taken to the shadier places about New York. Fred was enjoying his seduction and planning a gradual breaking down of Janet's resistance. Her naivete amused him, and he smiled as her attitude began to change from spectator to Broadway hilarity to a gradual lowering of standards and finally, under the spell of the abandon everywhere about, Janet agreed to take one little drink. Fred watched her through narrowed eyes and as she shouted and danced merrily, he felt she would yield. But Janet wasn't ready to go. She took another drink and another, and instead of remaining gay she began to feel very ill. Dragging her outside in annoyance, Fred took her in his arms, but she passed out. He drove her about, but despite his efforts, she became so ill that Fred, now really worried took her home.

Meanwhile Janet's father, at a Masonic meeting had suddenly become ill. A young Dr. Roland Grey diagnosed acute indigestion and took the very sick man home. Janet's mother wrung her hands but when the maid was sent to wake Janet, they discovered her absence. Mrs. Walton was distracted and as the young doctor worked feverishly over the patient, Fred Adams rang the bell, delivered the limp figure of Janet into the hands of her astounded mother and staggered back to his car before she could speak. Dr. Grey found himself with two patients and when Janet recovered sufficiently to realize the gravity of her father's condition, she was overwhelmed with remorse. For nights she worked with the tired young doctor who found himself admiring her in spite of himself. Mr. Walton recovered and the young Doctor continued to call. Sitting together in Dr. Grey's roadster one night, he asked her an important question, and as his lips met hers, Janet whispered, "Yes."

THE GATHERING

Margaret P. Murray File No. 8131

DISCOVERING that the old house, Home Acres, on the huge farm near whose gate they met secretly, was burning, Dorothy Alden and Erwin Mason, two young lovers, went to look at this place of memories before they found another place. Suspecting Erwin's too smooth city ways, Mr. Alden had forbidden his daughter to see him; but Erwin's urgings and her love for him had prompted her to suggest Home Acres as their weekly place of meeting. As the two gazed, a moaning froin the heart of the fire drew them nearer. An Indian rose out of the fire and stared at the desolate waste which had once been food, water, and shelter for his wandering tribe who left only mounds, arrowheads and axes to posterity. Suddenly, pushing the old Indian and his wigwam into the darkness, a tawny-haired, dare-devil Royalist arose. His ears cropped for his English patriotism in the colonies, his hair flew about as he told of his fleeing from persecution in England where a bloody civil war was being waged to restore the debonaire Charles II to the throne; and peace had been his in the first rude hut he built here away from the tumult, but a sudden arrow through his heart now told the end he had found. His voice grew weak as he told of the stream he had named Bear Run in honor of the time he had killed a bear there; but his cry of "Hurrah for King George" was stifled by the ringing voice of the pioneer woman who now rose out of his dust. The Royalist's rude shack gave place to a stoutly built cabin as she spoke of her covered wagon travels from far off Virginia with her husband to found a home and family in the wilderness. As she told of her dead children, two crosses rose whitely to view from the hillside, and other children sprang up to corroborate her tale of much housework and fieldwork done. As they stood with their arms entwined, the daughter, Anne took up her mother's words with the story of her own life with her husband, Robert, in the cabin made comfortable by his improvements and by the clearing of the forests before it. While he had planted the trees for the orchard, she and the children had planted gaily colored flowers, and had later gathered them and the orchard fruits. As the family grew, the house had grown in size and loveliness; for birth christenings, marriage celebrations, parties, and successful harvests, brought jollity and love here. The tread of hungry men in from the threshing, of children home from school still remained on the stairs down the very cellar where the preserves and meats were kept. Following the loving pair to their grave in the garden nearby, the entire gathering knelt before it; and as the house finally crumbled, they too crumbled into the earth.

As the two disappeared last, the radiant tear stained face of Anne recalled to Erwin's mind the sight of his mother's hard, selfish face. What mattered the letter he had written her callously agreeing to leave his country love for the wealthier girl she had chosen for him? Here in the girl's face next to him he saw the patience, the kindliness, the motherhood of another Anne. As the last flimsy partitions of the house fell, the original cabin stood exposed, and its hearthstone, at which lessons of life and love had been well taught, glowed as Erwin turned to propose to his beloved. As his words "We shall rebuild this home for future glory" were heard, the figure of the benignant Anne rose to bless the embracing couple. And the others rose for the last time to gaze with renewed hope at the departing couple.

ISLANDS OF DESIRE

Vanita Shelton File No. 8291

DICK came to the South Seas to paint, and remained to forget friends, family and home in the beauty of his lovely young model, Armida. He saw her for the first time dancing in the moonlight, and as he approached she darted into the woods in fright. Later he found her, convinced her that he intended her no harm, and falling in love with her charming ingenuousness, married Armida. For three years Dick lived happily with the little native and his pictures reflected his idyllic existence. But when their child was two years old, Armida died. Dick was disconsolate, and a letter from his parents, caused him to pack his paintings and take his baby back to New York.

In the artistic world Dick's strangely beautiful paintings caused a furore, and his poignant romance was accepted. Little Carol won the hearts of Dick's parents and no reference to her origin troubled the lovely child. However, soon Sue, who had married another man when Dick left for the South Seas, came back from Paris, divorced and anxious to win back the distinguished artist who had once cared for her. By her sympathy and admiration for Dick's paintings of Armida, she gained his attention and at length triumphed by marrying the lonely artist. Her own child, Terry, about the same age as Carol, resented Dick's daughter and made her miserable. At length Carol persuaded her father to let her stay with her grandparents, although she concealed from him Terry's taunts about her birth.

Terry, meanwhile was exerting her charms to capture Bob Kerby, the "big catch" of the social season, and felt she was winning over the other debs until Bob met Carol who was visiting her father. Instantly the playboy capitulated before Carol's slim loveliness. Terry, infuriated, waited until a big dance and then while Carol was dancing in Bob's arms, called out loudly that Carol was only a half-breed. Bob stared at Carol who had assumed that everyone knew her story, and with a fierce look left her standing alone. Stunned by his boorishness and the suddenness of it all, Carol ran from the floor, fled to her roadster and drove furiously. Tears blinded her eyes, and suddenly her car skidded sharply over a turn and catapulted down an embankment. There Carol was found, unconscious, by a young doctor who rushed her to a hospital and sent for her father. Bob, conscience stricken came to see Carol and tell her that in spite of her birth he loved her and was willing to marry her, but Carol patted his hand and smiling at him wistfully told him she was sorry but she didn't love him. Meanwhile the romance of Carol and the young Doctor Brown developed and all during her convalescence he called, enjoying too a friendship with Dick.

Sue and Dick were divorced, never having been happy together and Sue went to Paris with Terry who tried in vain to induce Bob to forget Carol. It was Dick who suggested that Carol and her young husband visit the South Seas and the trio wandered over the beach where Dick had been so happy with his Armida. When at length Carol and her bridegroom returned to New York they left behind them Dick, who found happiness with his painting and his dreams.

BOG CASTLE

WHEN a business friend of their father's suggests that they live at his country home while he sojourns in Europe for a year, the poor Macduffs are glad to accept. Delighted with the many luxurious rooms and the garden, Jean and Muriel, the two oldest girls, plan a house-warming party. When Jean, on her way from town where she has been purchasing things, realizes she is being followed, she rushes forward, and arriving home, finds the family in a similar state of nervousness; for the strange sounds of walking feet and muffled sobs have been heard again from the apparently deserted attic. By the time the evening of the party arrives, the guests as well as their hosts, are imbued with this fear; and hearing voices in the bushes, Muriel and her sweetheart, Jim, with whom she has been walking in the garden, hear, "Now's the time; I'll meet you in the attic", and suspecting trouble, hasten toward the house. When they are held up by two men on the road to the house, Muriel, escaping, runs to call aid while Jim fights for his life. Hearing footsteps, the men flee, and Jim finds himself facing two grim revolvers in the hands of two other vicious looking men. When they search him, he stares dazedly at the huge amount of money and jewels they have taken from his pockets, and in the midst of his protests he notices the sudden disappearance into the darkness of the beautifully gowned woman who had been with them. Cursing, one of the men starts in pursuit, and when Muriel is seen hurrying towards them with Mr. Macduff, the other two push Jim ahead of them; but shot at by Macduff's gun from the back, the two run off. Arriving at the house, they find the guests gone, and Jim is just about to call police headquarters when the noise as of a scuffle is heard from the attic. Leaping up the stairs, Jim finds the beautifully gowned woman in a faint and her persecutor, one of the hold-up men escaping from the window. While Bob, Jean's sweetheart pursues the bandit, Jim and Muriel remain to attend to the woman, who upon being revived, screams, "my fortune, my fortune". While Jim tries to quiet her, Muriel goes downstairs to the closet underneath the stairs—now a linen closet,—to get some bandages, for the woman has been shot. Her muffled cry of terror stops the woman's explanation, and hastening downstairs, Jim is just in time to prevent the man who had been hiding in the closet from kidnapping Muriel.

At this moment, Mr. Macduff arrives with the other bandit, and upon seeing him, Jim's gangster immediately shoots him—an act which brings a score of other men out from their hiding places in the bushes. But Mr. Macduff has also brought the police with him, and the gangs are soon arrested. At the tea table that evening the woman tells her story. The wife of Macduff's business friend who had given them the house, she had come, in response to a mysterious note, to investigate the jewels and money hidden in the house. Threatening to kill her if she said a word, the men she had found at the safe had tried to take her with them when they had met Jim with the loot which a rival gang had evidently stolen before them, and left with him (for fear of discovery by the approaching gang). At the court, the gangs confess that they had tried to frighten the Macduffs out of the house so that the way might be easier for the stealing. Offered a reward both by the police and the woman for his fine work in the rounding up of the gang, Jim accepts that and the kiss offered by Muriel.

ILLY treated at home by her step-mother, young Gayle Marlin elopes with Ned Delmar, her childhood sweetheart who has been an aid in her school work and a constant visitor to her home. Their happy honeymoon in Washington is marred by the news that Mr. Marlin who had assumed the entire responsibility of his company for cutting down expenses, had died of an overtaxed heart. Her grief somewhat allayed by Ned's devotion, Gayle contributes the small sum of money her father has left her to his small salary as a clerk, for renting an apartment. About five years of hard work—Gayle, the efficient housewife, the hostess at bridge parties, teas, and Ned, zealously studying banking,—they finally move into a small home of their own; and when Ned brings home a beautiful car one day, Gayle begins to dream of a baby to complete their happiness.

Planning to meet Ned at the bank one day so that they may do their Christmas shopping together, Gayle insists that he take the car although the streets are dangerously icy; and she is heartbroken when she is informed of the accident which completely crippled him. Returning home from the hospital where she had spent a wakeful, tearful night at his bedside, Gayle consults the president of the bank about a job; and after renting the house, and selling the car, accepts the job as stenographer with Mr. Stevenson, a friend of his. Although the hospital doctors had agreed that Ned could never walk again, Gayle never gives up hope of some day taking him to a famous New York specialist; and goes to work cheerfully each day, leaving Ned with his sister, Sybil, or his mother, both of whom are glad to soothe the impatient man. Very often he is alone, and when in spite of the food and magazines Gayle surrounds him with at these times, he is still cross and unhappy, she hires a housekeeper (who soon leaves for the latter reason).

In the meantime, Mr. Stevenson, immediately liking Gayle when she had brought in his mail one day, insists that she do all his secretarial work; so that it is not long before they are dear friends; especially when Mr. Stevenson offers his sympathy for Ned, (whom he thinks her brother), and when Gayle, (called to take some important dictation at his home) learns of his invalid wife, especially then is this friendship strengthened. Reading of a famous spine specialist one day, and discovering that his charge is two thousand dollars, Gayle goes to Stevenson for help and advice; and in his luxurious apartment, realizing her overwhelming love for him, she yields to him. With the money he has given her, Gayle brings the fretful Ned to the New York hospital where his operation is successful. After weepingly confessing Ned's relationship to Stevenson, Gayle pleads forgiveness, and his assurance that he will always think her a fine woman and that she owes him nothing (for she is to return the money, if she wishes, after five years), lightens Gayle's heart as she returns to Ned. After several months of happiness, Ned, back in his former bank position, having seen the check in Stevenson's name, Gayle had cashed there, accuses her of infidelity and is just about to beat her when Stevenson arrives to tell of his loan and of Gayle's constancy. When their baby is born several months later, the Delmars are happy to hear of Stevenson's marriage to a girl he had met in his European travels immediately after the death of his wife, and the Delmars find joy together in their child and in forgetfulness of the past.

HER GLORIOUS DREAM

Lugarda Henningsen File No. 8123

HAVING put her two young children to bed, Stella Dart decides to take a walk around the quiet street where she and her husband, Kent, a broker, live happily. Recalling her poverty of other days when she had been a waitress during the day and gone to high school at night, and her constantly bickering household, Stella glances reassuringly back at her comfortable cottage; and blissfully remembering again her first meeting with Kent at night college, she is just about to turn back when she sees her husband kissing the hand of a woman seated in a luxurious car on the corner. In the days that follow, Kent's continual absences from the dinner table for vague "business conferences", increase Stella's suspicions; but when at the home of her best friend, Norma, whom she has come to ask for advice, she notices Kent's cigarette case on the dressing table of her newly arrived cousin, Phyllis, she keeps her silence. Meeting a Robert Cornwall at a gala party one night, Stella, deserted by Kent who has been devoting himself to Phyllis all evening, walks with Robert in the garden; and just as the latter agitated by the sight of Phyllis kissing Kent, hurries off, Stella picks up the note he has dropped in his haste. "Meet me tonight; Kent is yielding." The note signed by Phyllis suddenly brings light on the situation to Stella; and realizing Robert's relationship to Phyllis, and their conspiracy to harm Kent, Stella sets out to win him and learn more from him. In the meantime, jealous of Phyllis's exeessive attentions to Kent, Robert quarrels with her, and hastily reveals all to Stella, at the same time, giving her the telephone number which will prove Kent's infidelity.

On the way to warn her husband against Phyllis, Stella loses the fight against her doubt, and telephones, and hearing Kent's voice immediately after Phyllis has said "hello", decides not to warn him. The next day when Kent, having been told by Phyllis who wishes to marry him, of Stella's supposed intimacy with Robert, angrily upbraids Stella, the latter, after showing him the telephone number and the note found in the garden, leaves him completely confounded. Realizing that if Phyllis uses the tip on the market he had promised his company to keep secret until conditions were riper, that there will be havoc on the exchange with her heavy buying, Kent rushes out to warn her; but too late,—the next day, discovering how the news leaked out, the chief executive demands his resignation, and Kent is black-listed from all brokerage houses. Infuriated and disillusioned, Kent hastens to Phyllis's home to revenge himself, only to find a note from her announcing her departure with Robert and thanking Kent for his kindness. Not having heard of his downfall, Stella, who has spent the night weeping at her mother's home, decides to ask Kent for a divorce so that he may marry Phyllis whom she thinks he loves. Arriving at the house, Stella finds Kent in the act of writing a farewell note to her before he commits suicide. Mutually forgiving each other, however, the two decide to begin anew; and Stella persuades Kent to ask for a second chance with his company and prove his good will in his conscientious work from the bottom. A year later, Kent occupies his former position and celebrates his wedding anniversary with much ado.

THE BLACK RIDER

Clarence Feist File No. 8249

SINISTER notes of warning made the cowboys of the Bar X ranch seek more comfortable quarters, and when the more courageous of them, touched by the plight of Barbara Stanford, the young owner who was thus being forced to sell the ranch her father left her, remained on, they found themselves targets for flying bullets. Soon there was only Jake Carter, the foreman, and Helen, a maid, left; and Jake indignantly insisted on Barbara's keeping the ranch. However, when he rode into town in the hope of getting a few stout-hearted cowboys, he found himself ambushed. Fighting desperately, he at length fell, badly wounded, but as the bandits came into the open, shots came down upon them. The deadly precision with which the lone black-clothed rider directed his shooting, made the bandits ride off to safety and Jack Morgan came forward to examine the wounded man whose stalwart defense had appealed to his sense of fair play. Staunching the foreman's wounds, Morgan rode him to the Bar X ranch and turning him over to the grateful Barbara, rode into town to get a doctor.

Bob Wellford, owner of the Lazy Z ranch was just learning from his men about the interference of the straight-shooting Black Rider when Jack Morgan himself knocked at the door. Wellford ordered his men to put their guns away and with exaggerated politeness he directed the inquirer to the doctor, informing his men, meanwhile to get Morgan on his way back to the Bar X. In town, Morgan asked the Doctor to hurry to the Bar X while he had his horse shod. When, subsequently he set off alone, he was ambushed and was left for dead on the road. Recovering, he whistled for his horse and rode painfully toward the ranch. However, at the ranch Wellford had come up with his men and after failing to get Barbara's consent to the sale, and failing to win her consent to marry him, he dropped his pretense of gallantry and ordering his men to bind and gag the doctor, he had the girl at his mercy. It was at this point that the wounded Morgan drove up and with guns aimed stopped Wellford's party. One of Wellford's men tried to shoot but Morgan fired first and the others were more prudent. Morgan ordered them to leave town, knowing they wouldn't, and dazed from loss of blood allowed Barbara and the Doctor to minister to his wounds.

Morgan was not the man to yield to comfort. There was work to be done, and riding to the sheriff, Morgan induced him to enter a plot with him. Then, riding to the saloon, Morgan handed over the deed to Barbara's ranch, in a loud voice to the stage coach driver. He smiled as through a window of the back room of the saloon he saw a man hurriedly reveal the information to Wellford who was immediately galvanized into action.

Morgan took a place on the stage coach and as the expected attack came off, the bandits and law forces exchanged deadly bullets. Soon the sheriff came up with his party, completely cutting off the retreat of the bandits who, desperately fought for very life. Many were the number of dead and wounded before the bandits surrendered and Morgan, having disposed of Wellford and revealed the prominent ranch owner for the infamous scoundrel he was, rode to Barbara's ranch, where Jake and the maid set a precedent for the mistress of the ranch and one who had come to love.

ADOPTED SONS

John Matsik File No. 8063

WISHING to adopt two sons, Mr. Williams, a wealthy bachelor rides out to the park in search of some poor boys; and discovering that Stanley and Eddy, found arguing on a bench, are orphans—(Stan's father having been shot by the family when he broke his leg, and Eddy's father having been killed in the revolutionary war)—adopts them and brings them to his car. While Stan cries because Eddy has closed the door on his foot, the latter stares the colored chauffeur into a fit. At the house, delighted with the flowery lawn, Stan lovingly throws one to Eddy who answers with another, and when Mr. Wiliams, accidentally throws a brick instead, it hits his new sons who have stopped their play to ogle a passing girl. In the house, Eddy, swinging on the curtains, overthrows a servant carrying a tray of food, while Stan, sliding down the bannisters, drops abashed into the lap of Mr. William's niece, Flora, who has been reading a book at the foot of the stairs. Forgetting to lift himself up, Stan asks her name, her age, anl inclinations. Coming upon them, Mr. Williams peevishly dismisses the boys to bathe and dress. Blindly groping around for a towel, Stan gives Eddy Flora's new evening gown, and while Flora is rushing to complain to her uncle, the two boys, hiding among the sport clothes in Mr. Williams' room, array themselves in sailor suit and riding habit respectively.

Scolded, they creep upstairs to dress properly. Smiling to Flora who turns away her head, Stan drops a piece of cream pie into Eddy's plate at the latter's request, but earns only their curses when he splashes both him and Mr. Williams with the pie. Noticing Flora's grin as she stares at his hands, Eddy hastily wipes them on his napkin, and shocks the entire company when he loudly blows his nose in it. Giving them one hundred dollars, Mr. Williams sends them in quest of hankerchiefs; and while examining the roadster outside, the backfire prompts them to take out the tools to fix the tires; but finding nothing wrong, throw them away. In search of motor trouble, Stan turns back the hood, and hitting Eddy in the face, the latter pushes it back again until finally, Stan tears it off.

Seeing a machine-gunned motor-cycle in the distance, and thinking they are being followed, Stan throws the car in reverse in his effort to start the car, and throws over another car. With the fenders torn off by a street car, its lights removed by a hurrying truck, and half of its body by a train, the car zigzags its way to a race-track where, hearing the shot of the starting signal, and thinking they are still being followed, the two enter and win the race to the cheering of the spectators. Noticing the coating of dust on Eddy's face, Stan makes a mask of his napkin and wraps it around his friend's face. Puffing and furious, Eddy tears the cup from Stan to whom the judges have given it. In the fight that follows, Mr. Williams, one of the onlookers, angrily demands his car. With him in pursuit, the two speed along, and while Stan waves his fist at the retreating car from which he has been suddenly dropped, Eddy is arrested for speeding and sentenced to a sojourn in the workhouse. Having sold the cup, Stan comes to flaunt his new clothes, and accepting the position of guard offered him, taunts Eddy by offering him a rubber hammer to break his chains; but he weeps when Mr. Williams, having obtained his freedom, comes with the amorous Flora, to take him home.

YOUTH

Walter J. Drozdowski File No. 8240

ENJOYING their stolen apples, Buck and Jim Allen saunter into the town grocery store to buy the fish they should have caught for their mother that day. While Mrs. Allen regards the stale fish with a twinkle in her eye, Buck, noticing the clothes she is assorting, groans at the thought of school the next day; and Jim disgraces himself by writing the worst composition in class and by hitting Betty, the new red-haired girl, with the apple he had intended for Buck (who had been laughing at him). When she walks off in a huff after school at his attempted apologies, Jim follows her to her aunt's house where she is living for her stay in the country. Forgiven, he enters the house to find David, her visiting uncle and the teacher, Miss Broun, who has come to assist the new pupil in her work. When Betty tells him of her fine city home and her educated brother, Earl, Jim suddenly awkward, abruptly says good-bye, backs towards the door and almost falls over Miss Broun in his haste. The next day at the ball game, having lost the ball, Jim notices a strange boy putting it into his pocket; in the ensuing fight, the odds would have been against Jim if the school bell hadn't rung. Seeing Betty walking arm in arm towards him, after school, Jim peevishly runs from them.

Invited to her Hallowe'en party the next evening, Jim refuses until he glimpses the new boy flaunting his party finery down the street. At the house, after Betty and he have eaten their ice-cream on the porch, they enter the house; but when Jim turns around, Betty has gone. Followed by David and Miss Broun, everyone searches for her, and finds that the new boy has also disappeared. Found on the road by the irate Jim, the new boy Earl tells him two men have kidnapped his sister. When David departs that night to inform Betty's parents of the calamity, his kissing Miss Broun makes Jim weep for Betty; so that when from his seat up in a tree, the next day, he sees the haunted cabin at the edge of the woods, is now inhabited, he decides to investigate. After helping Betty who has been imprisoned there, to swim the moat which surrounds the house, the two escape just as the gangsters arrive. Lost in the woods, the two suddenly fall over a sleeping man, who, proving to be one of the gang, again imprisons them. After climbing out through a window, Jim runs to town to get some paper to write to Buck for help, but caught in the act, is arrested and taken home by a policeman. Knowing that David is courting Miss Broun at another town where she is visiting, Jim jumps off the train and breathlessly disturbs the romantic pair to tell his story. On their way to the cabin, their car collides with another rushing automobile the owners of which, Betty's parents, just home from Europe, are on their way to negotiate for a ransom with the gangsters, (since the gang, knowing their wealth, have communicated thus with them. While Betty's mother attends to Miss Broun, who has been hurt, Jim goes to telegraph Buck and the police, while the others hurry on to the cabin. When Buck and the police arrive shortly after, the gang is just about to tie up the two men; and while Jim is proudly displaying his share of the reward for the capture of this notorious kidnapping gang, to Betty, David gets his happy reward from Miss Broun in the answer "yes" to his question of marriage. Shaking hands with Earl as he departs with his family for the city, Jim promises to visit them every summer; and stares smilingly after the car as it glides down the road.

MISTAKEN IDENTITY

John Powell File No. 8364

DISMOUNTING in front of the Fair Chance Saloon, Jim Malone studied the markings of a jet black horse and walking into the saloon inquired who owned it. A waiter informed Jim that its owner had just slipped out of the place and as Jim downed ham sandwiches and coffee, he inquired interestedly if Jim was a ranger. Jim grinned and said nothing and the waiter informed him the town was the toughest in these parts and the owner of the horse, a stranger, one of the toughest of its guests. Suddenly there was a clatter of horse's hoofs without. Jim saw a man riding the black horse flourish a gun, and the next instant he slouched against the porch post, a bullet through his shoulder.

Raising himself with difficulty, Jim swung into his saddle crying that nobody was going to shoot at him and get away with it, and off he went into the woods in pursuit. Jim was a clever trailer but although his pony was long on endurance, he realized that the four men he was following were exceptionally well mounted. Snow began to fall and although he kept on, making his deductions about the fellow on the black horse who must be a member of a gang, he soon realized he was beaten. He drew rein, but suddenly a volley of shots fell around him. Yanking his horse behind a boulder, Jim fired rapidly at a far-off clump where the riders had ambushed him and soon the clatter of hoofs told him his assailants had fled. A note dropped by one of his quarry, initialed B. M. made Jim start. What if one of these men was Bill Morgan the outlaw on whose head there was a thousand dollar reward posted? He raced after the men and suddenly realized that they'd probably try another ambush. Whereupon he took a short cut into the woods and came out on the road over which they must pass but unmistakable prints in the snow showed him that three of the men had gone on, the fourth had turned back. Realizing it was another ambush, Jim rode back, and as a bullet fanned him, the single man dropped. Before Jim could approach, however, the man had mounted his horse and been carried away, a blood-stained trail guided Jim who followed to a cabin. Outside, his victim had fallen from his horse and was lying dead. Jim's own wounds were making his head light, and when knocking failed to bring any response, he let himself into the cabin. After a cursory search of the dark cabin, Jim kindled the fire. A low moan startled him. Bending under a bunk in the corner, Jim pulled out—a bound and gagged girl. Untying her, Jim began to ask questions when he saw her eyes rivet behind him and a voice ordered him to drop his gun Jim saw they had money in their saddle bags, for when Bill Morgan had seen Jim examine his horse, he decided the rangers suspected him. Accordingly Bill had robbed the bank and was headed for his hang-out when the storm came up. They had sought refuge in the cabin which Janet kept for her father and seeing one of their number come home wounded, had tied up the girl and waited for Jim to stumble into the trap. Bill advanced at Janet and added he wasn't sorry they had stopped, now. But as the girl shrank from his touch, Jim lunged forward. In a few moments he had covered the three with a gun and as he and Janet bound the outlaws, he explained to Janet they were very dangerous men.

As they rode into town with their catch, Janet explained shyly that the life of a ranger was too dangerous. She broke off as Jim laughed and told her he wasn't a ranger. He had wanted to buy that black horse. That was how it started.

A MAN'S LOVE

Evelyn Armour File No. 8016

ACCUSING him of insanity, Ella Peabody gazed in consternation at her brother who was telling her of the approaching motherhood of his unmarried daughter, and was begging her to assist the girl. "No, they couldn't understand," John half sobbed as they hurried down the moonlit road to his home, where both his invalid wife and the sick girl lay. After the doctor had been sent for, Ella questioned the girl who only wailed aloud in her agony and called for Harry, a friend since childhood. Fearful that she might become delirious if they didn't acquiesce, and hoping to obtain some information about the mystery from him, Ella and John immediately telegramed Harry to come. But the anxious relatives of the girl could glean even less information from Harry when he came out from Mae's room. Silencing their questions with the statement that if they wished him to best assist Mae, they must allow him to leave immediately, Harry left the house with a grim, determined look on his face.

Arrived in the city, Harry hastened to locate Frederick, the father of Mae's child, a suave, worldly person whom Mae had fallen in love with when she had met him one summer at a hotel resort near her home; so that when the man had offered her his gifts and attentions with promises of love and marriage Mae had been eager to accept them. In his position as lawyer, Harry soon acquainted himself with the family,—for Frederick he discovered, was a married man, with two children and a charming wife—through the family lawyer whom Harry knew casually. Offering to take his friend's place during his long vacation in Europe, Harry soon found his chance for revenge; for not only had he brought Frederick's wife to the point of almost nonresistant passion for him, but he was asked now to defend Frederick in an embezzlement case. When one day in a burst of confidence, Frederick confided that he was worried about his wife's attentions to some stranger in town, the irate Harry, informing him that he knew the man, threatened to expose them both in a most scandalous manner. When, fearful of his family's prestige, Frederick begged for mercy and offered hush money, Harry accused him heatedly of his former crime against Mae; and forcing a promise from him that he would settle a sum of money on her child, never see her again, and to pretend ignorance of her identity if he ever did meet her, Harry departed for Mae's home with this signed document, after he had successfully argued the case for Frederick. When Mae's letter of forgiveness reached him, Frederick was a broken man; for his wife, discovering Harry's connection with another woman, and disappointed in her elderly husband, had fled from the house with her children. Thanking her for her kindness and generosity to him, and wishing her and her husband, Harry, every happiness, Frederick told Mae of his loss, and of his future search for his family. Feeling that her ordeal was now vindicated in this hopeless wandering of the wronger, Mae devoted herself with renewed ardor to her husband and little Frederick.

SHIP'S ROMANCE

Eleanor Zuck File No. 8121

AWAKENING her with a flung pillow, Helen with mock severity informs Marie that even chorus girls have to get up sometime. As she inquires about the party, Helen smiles at the caustic comment of her more practical minded friend that romance, chivalry, plumed knights have long gone from the earth and that Helen ought to give more attention to the very wealthy Mr. Downing who needs just the slightest encouragement to buy a diamond bracelet for her. But Helen still believes in love, and as they taxi to the theater the conversation is still going strong.

However, in her dressing room, Helen reads a telegram telling her her mother is very ill in England and making immediate preparations to leave, Helen sails for Europe. At the dock Marie waves until the boat is out of sight and looks up into the amused eyes of Peter Stanley who has also come to the wharf to see a friend off. Marie drops her eyes encouragingly and the scene dissolves with Peter helping Marie into a cab.

On shipboard the first night out, Helen stands alone on the moon-drenched decks and a young man says softly, "Like a dream, isn't it?" Still lost in the beauty of the night Helen nods and for hours they stand there talking lightly. When they part, they realize they have not asked names and because it is so romantic, so unreal, so wholly beautiful, they call each other Puck and Ariel and make an agreement to meet in the Louvre under the painting of the Mona Lisa at three the day after they land and tell their proper names. For five days on shipboard, these two are utterly isolated from the world, living in a make-believe world of their own. The last night out, Henry holds Helen close and whispers, "I love you, Ariel," and she replies, "Puck, dear." Perhaps it was in keeping with the magic that the day they land they are parted by the throngs and Helen thanks Heaven they had made the Paris appointment.

Her mother, she finds, is not as ill as the faithful but worrying Susan believed. Even when the doctor pronounces Helen's mother out of danger, Susan goes about wringing her hands and exclaiming "Myohmy-ohmy," mournfully. But Susan shakes her head the more distractedly when Helen embraces her and cries, "If not for your silly fears, I should never have met my Puck."

All day Helen waits under the non-committal Mona Lisa but Puck does not come and as she wearily returns home, Helen ascribes the whole affair to the past. It had been lovely but it was over. Puck had forgotten her.

Returned to Broadway, Helen wistfully sings the number she and Puck had sung on ship-board and there is a commotion out front. When she returns to her dressing room, there miraculously is Puck, holding her close and explaining that on landing he had receeived a command to book immediate return. He had tried desperately to reach her, but could not miss the boat. His friend Peter, had persuaded him to stop mourning and come to see his fiancee, Marie in a show, and then Henry had heard his Ariel. That night both Helen and Marie learn romance is not dead.

FLINGING a negligee about her bare shoulders, June Wentworth hurries down the spiral staircase and kissing Bob gaily, draws him into the den to tell him about her trip to Paris and to inquire about his affairs of the heart. As she chatters, Bob suddenly begs her to stop running around and marry him, but when June reminds him wistfully that he is her only real friend and she doesn't want anything, not love even, to ruin their comradeship, Bob forces himself to resume the banter. Only when he asks her to see the town with him that night, do his eyes darken with pain as she gently informs him she has already promised the evening to another—to Nick. As the door shuts softly after Bob, June stares after it, then walks to the davenport and lights a cigarette. Nicholas is aimlessly wandering about the large living room when June, in formal clothes, enters and rushes into his outstretched arms. Nick's eyes absorb her figure and as June escapes from his kisses she calls lightly, "Come, let's go."

On the crowded night club floor, June closes her eyes as Nick holds her tightly, and as they dance she assures him, "Of course I do love you, more, perhaps, than I should." They make a round of the night clubs and tossing her disheveled hair, June insists she is not tight as she fits the key to her door. But as she looks uncertainly at the flight of steps, Nick picks her up and carries her upstairs. At her own door, June disappears after a tantalizing kiss and assurance that she loves her Nicki, and disgruntled, Nick leaves.

The next day, sitting on the lowered top of her roadster, June enthusiastically watches Bob play polo while Nick sitting at her feet looks only at June. When Bob joins them later Nick is cool to him, and June sliding behind her wheel drives off with the sullen Nick beside her. They swim, make love to each other on the deserted beach, and with Nick's head in her lap, June suddenly decides to invite the whole crowd for a cruise on the yacht. June finds Bob nursing a bad knee, but after some treatments of her own and pulling of his ear she makes him promise to drop his work and join her party.

On the yacht, June sighs happily in Nick's arms but when he talks of forgetting convention, she rises from his embrace and says she is forgetting her duties as hostess. Bob, being tormented by a fluffy little blonde, looks gravely at June and as June asks him why he doesn't marry, he winces. That night Nick lets himself into June's stateroom.

In his apartment, Nick puts things in order waiting for June and when she comes he assures her he loves her more than ever. He is fiercely jealous of Bob and explains that he has not completed his canvas because love for June is driving him mad. However, as they enter the living room, they are startled by the appearance of a muffled old man who at the point of his gun reminds Nick that his daughter had killed herself tonight because the baby she was having was Nick's. A moment later, Nick slumps to the floor dead.

Bob tries to comfort June but she induces him to continue his plans to take care of some Mexican mining interests. For weeks Bob awaits word from June then frantically returns only to learn that she has disappeared on the continent. Detectives finally find her in a hospital in France where she is calling vainly for Bob, having slipped while climbing a mountain. Holding June tightly in his arms, Bob claims he hasn't heard a word of what she has been telling him about her past, and she offers her lips to his.

MAID AND MISTRESS

Joan O'Connor File No. 9537

IN love with his secretary, Flora West, young Jim Barlow, office manager for the railroad company, proposes to her. After a happy western honeymoon, the two return to their luxurious five-room apartment. At Jim's suggestion, Flora gives up her position; but several weeks later, when she learns of his incurable heart disease, urges him to remain home while she resumes her office position. Henry McCoyle, her employer, admires her spirit and her efficiency and soon promotes her to Jim's original position. With her increased salary, Flora provides a doctor's constant care, rich foods, and a maid for Jim. Told that Jim needs a sojourn in the country for his health, Flora works late every night to earn the extra money. Jim returns home several weeks later healthier but still grumbling and unreconciled to his lot; so that when he suggests another maid instead of the grim old one they have had until then,

Flora is glad to comply with his request. Engrossed in a business conference with McCoyle and other railroad magnates, Flora tells Jim to telephone the employment agency for a girl, to interview them, and to select the proper one.

Thereupon he hastily calls Dorothy, a young waitress whom he had met at the resort hotel he had visited. Since she is now unemployed, she readily accepts the offer. Flora is generous in her allotment to her for household expenses, gives her many gifts, and allows her two nights off during the week. Impressed by her kindness, Dorothy, who had come with the idea of duping her, resists Jim's advances and is scrupulously honest. However, realizing her own growing love for her patient, she plans to confess everything to Flora and leave. At the office when Flora has remained late one night, she notices through the glass partition Mr. McCoyle kissing her. She does not hear Flora refuse his proposal and push him away; but hurries home to tell Jim of his wife's duplicity; for she now sees in this a divorce and her own subsequent marriage to Jim. In the meantime, urged by Mr. McCoyle, who on a past visit to her home, had noticed Jim's unusual kindnesses to Dorothy (especially helping her constantly with her housework), Flora consents to secretly visit her home that day. On the way to the house, she scoffs at McCoyle's suspicions, and lightly accuses him of jealousy and a self interest in the girl. Surprised to see Dorothy entering a taxi outside the house, with a valise, Flora rushes upstairs while McCoyle instructs his chauffeur to follow the car. Jim believes his wife the cause of Dorothy's sudden departure; and infuriated by McCoyle's friendliness to her, shoots her as she enters. Flora, wounded in the shoulder, keeps the irate McCoyle from rushing at Jim; and the latter, thinking he has killed her, shoots himself. After he confesses his love for Dorothy, he begs forgiveness and exhorts Flora to marry McCoyle. The latter leads his future wife from the room; and Dorothy steals in to kiss her beloved, whom she had sacrificed for his more loving wife, for the last time. She sees the two embracing each other, and leaves with a peaceful mien.

THEIR YESTERDAYS

Beaulah Morris File No. 9515

PRINCIPAL of a small school, Mary Ann, vital and charming young woman invites the faculty to her home to discuss new problems in organization and as they are having tea together, Mary Ann forms a warm friendship with Michael, a teacher new to the school. They share a common interest in the arts and soon their discussion of classroom management gives way to more personal problems. As they drive together and go to the theater, Mary Ann begins to wonder why Michael maintains his air of comradie. It is pleasant, but there is an undereurrent of feeling which is never allowed to come to the surface. Then one day as she enters a teacher's room she overhears two faculty members discussing Michael's unhappy marriage. Weakly Mary Ann realizes she has no right to expect Michael to tell her everything about his past but when he calls Mary Ann suddenly becomes very busy with other things and at last Michael calls to tell her what he has always found it very difficult to say. He admires her as a friend but because he was terribly hurt by his wife's infatuation for another man, he has promised himself never to remarry, never to allow himself to love another woman.

But when Mary Ann leaves during the summer to chaperone a group of students who are making a trip abroad, she writes to Michael and he tells her how much he misses her nearness, her understanding. It is a glowing Mary Ann, more charming than ever who returns in the fall, but meanwhile Michael's wife has begun to make requests for exorbitant alimony and Michael, realizing that he will not be able to support a wife and keep up his divoreed wife, pretends to Mary Ann that another woman has taken her place in his affections. As he notiees her eyes dim with tears, he longs to take her in his arms and tell her he loves her, but feels he has no right to ask her to give up everything to share his curtailed income.

To hide her misery, Mary Ann plunges into the town's social life and Michael, seeing that Fred Jason, a wealthy banker is in love with Mary Ann finds it impossible to remain on in the town and accepts an offer to teach at a University at an increased salary. When Fred Jason asks Mary Ann to marry him and she refuses, he begins drinking and when Mary Ann gets up to leave the inn where they have been dining, he promises to drive her straight home. However, the automobile crashes into another and Mary Ann is taken to a hospital, badly injured. Michael, reading of the accident rushes back to see Mary Ann, and when he is admitted to her room, he tells her of his love. Mary Ann rapidly convalesces, and Michael receives demanding letters from his former wife but discovers that she has re-married and he is free from the necessity of having to contribute longer to her support. Thus Michael and Mary Ann are married and together find the happiness for which they have longed.

GOTHAM MURDER

Mrs. Zora Penix File No. 9540

IN spite of her protests, Judge Walsh, her betrayer, now rushes Claudia Abbott, daughter of the Chief of Police, to an obscure doctor. For the thought of the disastrous effects the scandal may have upon his marital and legal existence, overwhelms him. Returning home after he has notified the hospital to which the girl has been removed, to inform him of her progress, Walsh finds her irate father awaiting him. Having recently heard of his daughter's intrigue with the judge through newspaper friends, the latter threatens to expose him to his wife. However, Walsh knows that he will never do this for fear of ruining Claudia's good name and his own position in the police department. When he mentions his suspieions of Abbott's growing friendship with his wife, Bess, the former hurls himself at him. He contains himself as Walsh is called to the telephone; and when he returns white-faced,—having just been told of Claudia's death—threatens him with his life if he doesn't leave his daughter alone in the future. A window-washer who has overheard the tumult, creeps up to the window, and disappears as Abbott leaves. The following week when the judge is on his way to attend a legal conference, he does not notice the chief's car slip out of the crowd to follow him. Caught side by side in a traffic jam, in the noise of back-firing from Abbott's car, the shot by the latter killing Walsh, is unheard. There is confusion at the conference when the crime is discovered; and newspapers and police are immediately notified of the search for the murderer. Several days later, no one sees Abbott, now a nervous enigma to his colleagues, accosted by a shabby window-washer, nor the exchange of money which passes from hand to hand. In the streets he is seen escorting the grief-stricken Bess Walsh to her home, and people speak admiringly of his efficiency and kindness. However, the clues are meager, the people impatient; and when the mayor, accused of doing nothing to stop the crime wave, begins to fear for his next election, he again has the Judge's taxi driver brought for questioning. Although the latter has previously been exonerated for lack of evidence, he is now third degreed into a confession. With the criminal record they forge, and the false evidence of his once having been convicted for a long sentence by Walsh, the jury is easily convinced. Weary of playing politics, and disheartened by his daughter's death, Abbott tells the mayor of his guilt just before the conviction. The mayor fears for his reputation should his confession thus expose the innocence of the supposed criminal; and has him forcibly detained. The window washer arrives at Abbott's office to urge him to confess, for the secret is too much for him. Bess, entering them, learns of Abbott's disappearance and his crime; and bribes the man not to tell until he is found. In the meantime, the jury is deciding upon their verdict. Public feeling runs high; and the "guilty" is almost certain. One juror however, is stubborn. Suddenly from the window he sees Abbott, who has escaped, struggling in a car with the mayor's men who have followed him. When the mayor scoffs at the chief's confession, saying that the worry over the case has made him insane, the window washer, after a struggle with the guards, rushes in. The driver and Abbott are acquitted. He resigns his position and goes home to pack his things. There he finds Bess waiting to comfort him always.

OTHER MEN'S SWEETHEARTS

Maud Collins File No. 9094

THE friendship of Ray Stokes and Max Smyth was a tradition in their neighborhood. From the time they had been youngsters at school until now when they had established joint offices as real estate brokers they had allowed nothing to come between them. Then at the party given to announce the engagement of his sister, Bess to Jim Haskell, Ray met Virginia Haskell, Jim's sister and was attracted by her charm. However he was too busy playing host to shower her with attentions and when Max who never paid particular attention to any girl drew him off to a corner and began to sing Virginia's praises, Ray naturally kept quiet. Ray knew that Max was rushing Virginia and encouraged him. When at the Stokes supper table one evening, Jim Haskell remarked to his fiancee that their engagement seemed to have launched a new romance, Ray tried to muffle his pain. Max sensed nothing of all this and anxious to have his friend share in his joy forced Ray who had no logical reason which he could offer Max to join Virginia and Max for dinner and the theatre. Ray brought Jean Davis along and since Virginia expressed to Max the desire to see more of them the four spent many evenings together. Jean had known both Ray and Max for many years and as they were coming home from one of these evenings, she despairingly confessed her hopeless love for Max and made some remark about its taking four people to make Virginia and Max happy. Meanwhile Bess fell sick and Virginia was a constant visitor at the Stokes' home where she saw much of Ray. The night that Bess passed the crisis Virginia was in the room when Ray, exhausted by the strain collapsed in tears and crossing over to him she put her arms about him to comfort him. Suddenly she kissed him and then drew away as she realized that it was Ray she loved and not Max. After that Ray seized upon Bess' need for a rest as an excuse to get him away from the city so that Max would not suspect the truth. Bess recovered her strength and watching her brother knew that something was disturbing him. Then while reading a letter from Max which was full of news of Virginia, Ray broke down and confessed to Bess. At home Virginia was hurt in a motor accident and Max who had rushed frantically to her bedside heard her moan for Ray in her delirium. When she recovered consciousness Max asked her gently whether she loved Ray and Virginia confessed that she did. Max then wrote to Ray telling him that he realized everything and that, though he wished them every happiness he was going away for a time to make forgetting easier. Ray, though not insensitive to this new proof of Max's friendship, rushed Bess home so that he might lose no moment before hurrying to Virginia.

Jean, unable to understand these unforeseen eireumstances asked Bess for an explanation and learned all that had happened. Since she understood how Max was feeling she wrote a friendly note to him, ignoring any mention of Ray and Virginia. Max returned for Bess' wedding but after he had greeted Ray and Virginia who had become engaged, he paused embarrassed. His friends were no more at ease than he. The situation was relieved when Jean came up to join the three. Max asked her to dance and thanked her for her kindness in writing to him. So that he and Ray might re-establish the old feeling of camaraderie, Max proposed that they go out together, this time with Jean as his guest. As he found increasing happiness in Jean's company he realized that the joy he had looked to with Virginia might come to him with Jean and when eventually he asked her to marry him she consented with the utmost joy. And Virginia and Jean were united in marriage to Ray and Max at a great double wedding so that the two friends again started out together on a new adventure.

LOVE WILL OUT

Karon White File No. 9049

FOR the first time Pat dared ask Molly O'Sullivan to picnic with him and as she enthusiastieally accepted, he had to remind himself that Molly was engaged to his best friend, Jack. As the moon crept into a darkening sky, Pat softly began to gather the remnants of their feast and his breath caught in his throat at Molly's loveliness. Almost without his willing it, he asked her if she wouldn't pose for one of the magazine covers he was submitting. He knew it was wrong. Molly belonged to Jack. Two years ago, when Jack got an offer to manage an airport in South America, Molly had promised to marry Jack; now Pat was in love with her. If she sat for a portrait, he'd never be able to maintain his pose of disinterestedness. Abruptly Pat rose and helping Molly into the Creeper, his ancient fliver, he drove her home. The ache to take her in his arms almost overcame him, but when Molly bent over and lightly kissed his cheek, he drove furiously away. She had no right to do that. No right to betray Jack, and make him, Pat, feel worse because he could never have her.

A few days later, Molly told him that Jaek was coming home. Pat tried to appear enthusiastic but he knew he was failing miserably and as he left Molly and clanged into town, the Creeper stalled in front of the drug store. Pat swore softly as he got out and cranked and an instant later straightened up amazed before the enthusiastie greeting of Jack Bannister, who had just arrived. It was agony driving Jack, whose red roadster had not yet been uncrated, to Molly's house, and Pat heard not a word of Jack's chattering about South Ameriea, airports, and Senoritas. All he saw was Jaek stride up Molly's walk and all he heard was Molly's cry, "Jack!"

The next day, plowing his field with a fury that was prompted largely by the thought of Molly in the arms of her fiance, Pat ducked his head as an airplane zoomed down on his freshly plowed field and Jack and Molly forced him, despite his rueful protests to ride with them. Despite his agony, Pat enjoyed himself, only to sink more deeply into despondency at the tenderness with which Jack helped Molly from the plane.

That night at supper, Pat's omnipresent kid sister exclaimed with saccharine concern about her brother's paleness and awakened the whole family to Pat's disinelination to eat. Dashing from the dining room, Pat shaved himself with dangerously long strokes until long-legged Colleen, who had loudly discussed Molly's imminent marriage, informed him that Molly was now on the telephone asking for him and what should she say. Only Molly's pleas changed Pat's growled refusal to take her for a ride that night, and as they rode into the country, Pat with his eyes glued to the road, refused the congratulatory kiss Molly asked for. Then it poured and Pat discovered someone had let the gas out of his tank. With Molly trustfully sleeping on his shoulder, he was helpless and the storm raged.

Next morning, Jack, with Myrtle Wahlgren possessively at his side, drove up, siphoned gas into the abashed Pat's tank, and drove with them into town where to Pat's incredulity the townfolk greeted the "newly-weds". When Jack offered congratulations, Pat blinked and Molly demurely explained she had written Jack to come home and help her win Pat whom she despaired of ever winning without the added incentive of jealousy. Right in the middle of the street, Pat parked to kiss Molly, and Jack's roadster banged hard into them, as he turned to kiss Myrtle.

MADE FOR LOVE

Nettie Spellman File No. 9033

WHEN Martha White saw Jack Palmer step from the train she experienced a thrill of delight that anyone who had been a friend of her dead father's could be so young and astonishingly good-looking. Jack Palmer, though now only in the early thirties, had worshipped the older man and had come now to stay with Mrs. White and her daughter until after the latter's graduation from the local high school. However, he fell under the spell of Martha's charm and soon asked Mrs. White if he might ask Martha to marry him. Mrs. White was overjoyed but before Jack Palmer could declare his love to Martha an unexpected telegram forced him to suddenly terminate his stay and return to his business in Philadelphia. For a few days Martha missed his matter-of-fact presence but at her Class Dance she danced again and again with Tom Foster, the most popular Senior of the year who until then had never noticed her existence. Rumor had linked his name with that of Patty Grant, whose name had figured in several scandals. Mrs. White recognized him as a scheming fortune-hunter when he came to call and feared that Martha who knew little of the ways of the world might be won by his collar-ad handsomeness. When a physician diagnosed her illness as one which was fatal she began to tell Martha how much she hoped that she would favor Jack Palmer's suit when he returned to propose. Several weeks earlier Martha would have listened only too willingly but now she could think only of the things Tom Foster had told her as they lazily rowed up the lake that afternoon. Jack Palmer returned and intercepted Martha one evening as she was about to keep a tryst with Tom in the rose arbor. Anxious to be off she refused his suit but promised to call upon him should she ever need a friend. Because Tom knew that her mother was unfriendly to him he had never proposed to Martha though he frequently repeated his protestations of love. Moreover when Martha accused him of seeing Patty Grant again he made no attempt to deny it but silenced all further protests with his kisses. Martha's mother died and Martha wearied by her loneliness accepted Tom's proposal of marriage, which he had not made until he was certain that she had inherited all her mother's fortune. However Tom left her alone rather often and Martha began to wonder if her mother hadn't been right about him. On one of these occasions Martha walked out alone and heard voices raised in quarreling ahead of her. She recognized Tom's voice and the unlovely tones of a hysterical woman and when she heard her own name unblushingly stopped to eavesdrop. It was thus that she heard Tom answer Patty's demand that he give up Martha by saying that he was only playing Martha for her money and that if Patty wasn't a fool they could continue the way they had been without Martha's being any the wiser. Furious with her anger at being so blind, Martha confronted the pair and after hurling fiery words of denunciation at him ran blindly back to the house. It was then that she remembered the comforting personality of Jack Palmer and she determined to write and tell him she sorely needed a friend. But as she neared her gate she saw somebody dismounting from the antiquated station bus. Hardly believing her eyes she ran up and was snatched up in the embrace of the reliant Jack Palmer who had come back to try his luck once more. And Martha's kiss answered his question forever more.

GET YOUR MAN

Mrs. Charles D. Thomas File No. 9160

AT twenty-two Anne Lancaster winced as she walked down Main Street and the promising little offspring of her former school mates cooed, "Hello Aunt Anne," to her. Her pace quickened as she neared the big stone house her father had left her, but she stopped in perplexity as her maid announced the visit of Professor Wyant, the small, spare, owlish looking English teacher rumored to be looking for a sedate girl, with money, to mother his four little children. Three minutes later, Professor Wyant was hurrying down the walk and Anne, at the window held her breath as little lame Jimmy's goat crept through the hedge, made a lunge, and butted the little man straight through the gateway into the withered arms of Mrs. Hall, a vinegary old widow.

Anne was still wondering why the Professor had called on her, when the village cut-up phoned for a date. A giggle on the party wire, however, gave away the fact that he had been dared to call. It was only when she learned that Bill Renshaw, her childhood sweetheart, had returned from law school to accept a position in his uncle's firm, that Anne realized all Waynesboro had dated her as a has-been. Perhaps it was the too great determination in offering to drive Bill to the library and too serious efforts to make their picnic together a light and joyous affair that accounted for Bill's loss of interest, Anne thought, and as Andrew Lassi, the big foreign-looking bond salesman waved to Anne in passing, a determination to try to arouse Bill's jealousy was born. Although Andrew had a shady reputation in town, Anne flirted a little, knowing that he needed only the slightest encouragement to grow ardent. Thereafter, Anne made frequent dates arranging to meet in Bill's office building and otherwise working for that slightly startled look that Bill aways seemed to show when he saw Anne and Andrew together. However, when after the third date, Andrew asked Anne to marry him, she jumped and curtly refused. Distressed by his ardent declaration of love, Anne, at length, feeling she had been unfair, agreed to take one more drive with him—in the afternoon.

That day, while driving, they passed a stalled car on a deserted road, and Anne couldn't explain her misgivings when they picked up a man and a woman. However, when they turned down a byway, Murder Lane, a place whose unsavory reputation she and Bill had joked about on their picnic, Anne started remonstrating. The next moment a heavy cloth was thrown over her head, a bandage put over her eyes, and she was firmly held. After several miles, she was carried from the car and unbound in a small hut. On the promise of silence, Anne was released and Andrew explained he wanted her to marry him. Anne saw how her contempt excited the foreigner, and when he threatened she'd be glad enough to marry him when he was through, she resorted to strategy. Within her bag were the cascara pills she had gotten for her aunt, and with forced gaiety, Anne called for the ice cream her impetuous lover had prepared for their wedding feast. Feeding him soothingly, she prayed he wouldn't notice the pills as she asked about his country. An hour later, Andrew suddenly darted from the room. Anne saw Andrew attempt to come back, fall, and finally, gasping he was going to die, he gave her the keys to his car and permitted her to return. Bill read the newspaper account of the capture of the dope peddlar, Andrew Lassi, who would have escaped a police net were it not for a baffling illness, and thanking Heaven that Anne was safe, he called to explain his uncle was offering him a partnership and could Anne guess perhaps what he wanted to ask her. Anne's heart sang as she thought she could.

ONE MORE THRILL

Louise Conde File No. 9165

"SORRY, Bill," explained Ann. "I've already accepted a prom date." "With Jack?" "Uh, huh." "Lucky stiff. Well I'll see you again." Ann smiled ruefully as she saw Bill walk dejectedy away. All through school Jack and Bill had vied for her affections, but for Ann there could never be anyone else but Jack. Bill came stag to the prom and Jack taking Ann home later told himself and the world how lucky he was that Ann came with him. But that was before the letter.

When Jack came running up the steps to tell Ann that he had received an offer to go to Paris for his advertising firm and that he thought it would be a grand idea if they made it a combination honeymoon and business trip, Ann took out a letter telling her that her aunt had just died leaving Ann fifty thousand dollars. "And that means . . . ?" asked Jack. "That means I'm going to go out and have a wild time for once in my life. Thrills, and more thrills. And no worries about anything until the money gives out. All my life I've scrimped and scraped. Now I have money." It was when Ann suggested that Jack help her spend the money, that he left. He spend her money!

Fifty thousand dollars to spend! For days Ann reveled in an orgy of shopping. Gaily she raced her roadster down long roads and laughed as a traffic policeman handed her a ticket with a lecture about the idle rich. Recklessly, Ann dressed herself in a decollete gown and drove up to a road-house. She had never seen night life before but she was going to get her fill now, and when Charles Everhard, notorious racketeer sent a note with a waiter and then joined her at her table, Ann tried to look terribly accustomed to this sort of thing. She cocked an eyebrow rakishly as Charles filled her glass again and again, and when he offered to drive her home she hesitated only for a moment. This was life! But when he stopped his car, turned down the lights and seized her in his arms, Ann knew panic for the first time. Struggling she heard him mutter, "What did you expect?" And as her hand slapped his face, he closed her mouth with a hard kiss. Somehow she managed to open the door, and fling herself from the car. She ran until she was out of breath and tears stood in her eyes as she heard her "friend's" car drive away. A taxi brought her home.

For days she thought about Jack. She saw girls she used to know look at her enviously as she drove about, but her heart ached. Months dragged by. One day she walked to the shore where she and Jack had planned their dreams. Suddenly there was Bill. "Did you know," he asked, "that Jack is coming home?" Ann felt a great lump in her throat, and when Bill, seeing it, asked if she wouldn't ride in his motor boat, she went. Seeing clouds above, Ann suggested they turn back, but suddenly the motor stopped. Hours later they were tossing on the rough sea, and Bill, white faced, was begging her to forgive him for wanting to die with her. He knew now it was a crazy notion, but he loved her.

When Ann awoke she was lying in her bed at home. Dazedly she asked the maid what happened and learned that Jack, home from Europe had learned that she had gone out with Bill, and from the tone of Bill's last letter had feared he might attempt something like that. At the risk of his own life, he had gone out and brought the pair in. Bill was home now, and Jack was waiting below. "Jack," Ann cried, "Jack." And he came.

GHOST MANSION

John F. Mauro File No. 9158

ROUSED from his reading by the frenzied barking of the dog and thinking that Walters, the butler has retired for the night, William Arlington takes a mallet from the library table and makes his way to the rear of the house to loosen the dog's chain and thus stop his barking. On his way through the kitchen he stumbles and drops the mallet and when he switches on the light he finds Walters lying dead, his head bashed in. When Renard, who with his cousin Clara had dashed from their rooms at Mr. Arlington's shouts, discovers that the telephone does not work, he goes to call the police from a near-by pay station. He accepts a lift from a passer-by and upon the driver's request changes some money for him. Meanwhile Jean Arlington returns home and finds her father and cousin standing above the dead Walters with whom she has been in love, against her father's wishes. Dr. Fitz, whom Renard has summoned when he called the police, trembles visibly when he sees the body of Walters but speedily turns his attentions to the hysterical Jean and administers a drinking potion which quiets her immediately. Sergeant Waterbury, who has arrived with several detectives and Jill, a zealous reporter, grills them all with questions. Hesitatingly Dr. Fitz admits that Mr. Arlington has frequently threatened to get rid of Walters because of his love for Jean. Arlington is arrested when the mallet found beside the body reveals his finger-prints. That night Renard, prowling about the house to find some clue which will free his father is attracted to the kitchen by a commotion. When a policeman who has been left on guard rushes after him, he flashes his light into the face of Renard standing over the form of another policeman, Norton, lying upon the floor with a knife in his back. A glove which he has idly picked up from the floor while searching Walter's room, and which he still holds in his hand, explains to the satisfaction of the police the absence of finger-prints upon the knife. Renard's motive is found when he is searched at the jail and money recently stolen from the International Savings Bank is taken from his pockets. Only Clara believes his persistent reiterations that he has changed this money for a chauffeur who gave him a lift early that evening. When Jill, the reporter shows that her flippant manner and lovely appearance have attracted him, she enlists his services to track down the murderer of the two dead men. During the days proceeding the trial Jean is upon several occasions heard to shriek something about doing "his" wishes and then only the drink which the nurse installed by Dr. Fitz gives her can quiet her. At her father's trial Jean, talking as though from afar, repeats Dr. Fitz's testimony concerning her father's expressed desire to get rid of Walters because of their love. The handcuffed Renard, present at the trial, runs to his overcome father when the jury, despite Mr. Arlington's insistence that he meant only to be rid of Walters as a servant, declares him guilty of the murder.

When Jean dies a violent death Clara, taking the bottle which contains the drink to which Jean has been the slave, confides her suspicions of Dr. Fitz to Jill. In the guise of a patient Jill secures an entrance to the Doctor's office and telling the servant he will wait for the Doctor's return pokes about in the office. As he uncorks a bottle which he finds concealed behind a long row of drugs in the rear laboratory and sniffs its contents, he realizes that it is the same medicine as that which Jean has been given. Excited by his discovery he does not notice Dr. Fitz approaching from behind and is felled before he can defend himself. Upon Jill's failure to return, Clara and a police escort force the way into the Doctor's house and finding only Allan, the Doctor's servant, question him. As he stubbornly pretends ignorance of the Doctor's whereabouts or any knowledge of the missing Jill, Clara looking through the window, recognizes Jill trussed to a chair in a room on top of the garage opposite the house. When she has freed him Jill, still stiff from his bonds, grasps her arm and rushes to the cellar of the house from where he has seen lights flashing as he lay imprisoned. With the police and a handcuffed Allan hard upon their heels, Jill and Clara confront the Doctor who is manipuating a wheel upon a wall of the cellar. As he whirls about the wall swings aside and discloses a broad tunnel at the entrance of which lie several money bags stamped with the letters I. S. B. and obviously the money which Renard Arlington has been accused of stealing. Two of the policemen return from an investigation of the tunnel bearing the body of Jameson, the Doctor's chauffeur between them and excitedly tell of an ingeniously constructed perpetually moving platform been found in the tunnel near the Arlington home. Dr. Fitz breaks down as they say that the body has been found in the tunne near the Arlington home. Turning upon Allan he berates him for drawing him into this mess and then confesses how Allan, knowing his straitened circumstances, had bribed him to give a powerful drink of his own concoction which exhausted the strength of the patient until she was ready to do whatever was suggested to her. Thus, Jameson, disguised as Walters, had forced on several occasions a secret entrance into her room, and commanded her to revenge herself upon her father for her lover's murder by testifying against him at the trial. When, on that fatal night at the Arlington's he saw Walter's body and realized that murder was included in their plans it was too late to withdraw. Realizing that further concealment is impossible Allan confesses that as the leader of Walters and Jameson he had planned the robbery of the International Savings Bank which they had effected, using the Arlington as their entrance and exit. Allan had committed the actual murder of Walters who had demanded too large a share of the money. Jameson had, however, sprung upon Norton and stabbed him when the latter stumbled upon the entrance to the tunnel in the Arlington kitchen. It was Jameson too who had given Renard the lift the night of Walter's murder and who had purposely planted the stolen money upon him. Then because he knew too much and was threatening blackmail he had murdered him.

As the police take the real culprits away a radiant Jill and Clara go to meet two innocent men who but for their efforts would have died, the victims of a wily criminal who was almost but not quite clever enough.

INHERITED TREASURE

Pete Peters File No. 9104

DISMAYED by the doctor's pronouncement that unless Betty, his fiancee, can be taken to a sanitarium she will not live many months, Richard returns home to find his mother excitedly explaining to his brother, Jasper, that after twenty years she thought she saw her husband today near the wharves. For the first time then she tells them how she had been brought up on a desert island. Turner's ship had been wrecked and in the years that followed they had fallen in love and inherited the treasure which her father had left. However, married and back to civilization, Turner had fallen in love with Julie, a night club owner, and finally had accepted a divorce and fled with the map to the treasure.

Meanwhile in a night club, Turner explains to two sinister sailors that he has come back for the map he left with Julie many years before. Julie recognizes him, gives him the map she has kept, but when she warns him against the sailors and tells him she has always loved him, Turner reminds her he left his wife and two boys for her; and goes. Julie follows and as she suspects the two sailors attempt to kill Turner to get the map. Julie and her trusted chauffeur interfere and in the struggle they are joined by Richard and Jasper who have been attracted by the melee. Julie recognizing Richard's resemblance to Turner laughs hysterically at dying in his arms and gives him the map. Meanwhile, the two sailors, routed by the appearance of the two boys have fled taking with them Turner who can guide them by memory to the island. The sailors, realizing that the boys will arrive plan to kill them and also Turner as soon as he has proven his usefulness. Turner realizing this convinces the sailors that they will need his help for the treasure is hidden in a maze. At the same time the boys are held up by a broken rudder, and as they fret in a tropic port they do not realize that the delay is saving their lives.

Turner realizes that the two sailors are progressing with their evil plans and when the boat bearing his two sons comes to the mouth of the harbor, unsuspecting the danger that awaits, Turner plays his final card. He deceives the sailors into consenting to pile the treasure on shore, leading each to believe that thus he will cheat the others, gets the sailors who compose the crew and are innocent of counter-plotting ashore, and then gathers the principals in the captain's cabin. With a half-smile he reads their leering thoughts then announces in a moment the dynamite he has set will blow them to eternity. The sailors leap at his throat, but an instant later the ship blows up with a mighty roar.

Startled by the debris, the boys go ashore, find the treasure awaiting them and near it a note from their father explaining all and begging for forgiveness. The money saves Betty's life, enables Jasper to buy a beautiful cottage for their mother and as Richard and Betty come in happily to ask for congratulations on their marriage, Mrs. Turner, unsuspecting exclaims she wishes Turner knew of their happiness and knew that she forgave him.

LIMOUSINE

Jean Rousseau File No. 9166

STRAIGHTENING up after fluffing out the pillows on sick Mrs. Decker's bed, Mary Evans is surprised to see a luxurious limousine stop before the cottage. As a strikingly attired girl walks into the room, Mrs. Decker's delighted cries of "Hilda" inform Mary that this is the almost legendary daughter who had run away to New York to seek fame as a dancer. Mary, who lives with a strict father and an old-maid aunt, Annabelle, listens entranced as Hilda tells of the gay life she leads. When her father speaks to her at the supper table she does not hear him at first and this arouses his wrath. Later she tells him of her meeting with Hilda Decker and her father, to whom New York is a den of evil, forbids her to see Hilda again. The warning goes unheeded however when Hilda, seeing Mary passing on the street stops her car and offers to take her driving. Hilda's glowing tales during the ensuing days fascinate Mary and finally she leaves a note for her father and runs away to New York with Hilda.

There she is enraptured by Hilda's elaborate apartment and accepts all her many men friends without question. It is only when Harry Goldener, attracted by her naivete and charm and conscious that she has a talent for singing, offers to feature her in his night club if she will be nice to him that she realizes. When Hilda comes in that night she upbraids Mary for refusing Harry's proposition and tells her that if she wants anything she must be prepared to pay for it. When Mary continues weeping she declares that it is about time she realized where all the money comes from that is keeping them and that she ought to earn some of her own. Shocked by this display of frankness, Mary runs from the apartment. She secures employment in a little restaurant and there meets Robert Bascoal, a struggling young attorney who comes there to eat each day. When Robert waits outside one evening and walks her home it is the beginning of a mutual love. One evening she is waiting for Robert outside the theatre when Hilda steps from a machine and sees her. She tells her that Goldener is opening a new nightclub and his proposition is still open to her. But Mary, secure in Robert's love, merely laughs at her. Robert arrives late but merely says that he was detained. Several times after that he tells her that he must take out his employer's daughter and gradually he stops calling her altogether. The news that she has inherited a considerable sum from her Aunt Annabelle leaves her untouched since Robert is now constantly with Marion Ashley, the daughter of his employer. Feeling that nothing matters any longer she 'phones Harry Goldener and makes an appointment to come up to see him.

Mary, now embittered and worldly-wise, but trying to cover her pain sings nightly for the drink-sotted crowd at the Club Evans. As she concludes her number the crowd roars its enthusiasm. And Mary sings an encore as she moves from table to table. One evening she sees Robert's familiar form at one of the tables. He is with Marion Ashley. As she stops before their table Robert looks up and blanches. But Mary keeps on, outwardly calm though her heart is pounding. She goes back and sits down with Harry but his fleshy face before her dissolves and she sees only the clean-cut countenance of Robert. Suddenly she leaves him, rushes to her dressing-room and swallows the contents of a bottle of iodine which is in the room. Hilda stops in as she is going out for her performance and finds Mary writhing in agony, and moaning Robert's name. Leaving Mary to the care of a physician who has been called she seeks out Robert at his table and in front of Marion accuses him of killing Mary. Marion, who has known nothing of Mary's existence sends a grateful Robert to Mary's bedside. Mary's attempt at suicide fails and when she opens her eyes she sees an anxious Robert there. And when he folds her in his arms all the hunger and the hurt of the past few months is forgotten.

GIRL O' MINE

Elizabeth Gallagher File No. 9100

WHEN Danny McGetrick left Ireland to seek his fortune in America he vowed some day to return and help his people. Returning years later he found Ireland at war and in fulfillment of his former vow he organized a powerful band to fight for his country's liberty. Because he wanted to know the route of the reinforcements that the British sympathizers were rumored to be expecting so that he could cut them off, Danny donned the guise of the enemy and joined their ranks as a recruit. One day Danny on the way to the Widow Reilly's cottage where he regularly met a member of his own band and reported the results of his spying saw the General of the army in which he was now serving flying by on his horse of which he had obviously lost control. Fearing what the results might be if the reason for his being on the scene were questioned Danny hurled himself at the crazed animal and though dragged along the ground stopped the horse and so saved the General. One of the General's aide's who had rushed up began to question Danny as to how he had happened to be on the spot but the General interrupted realizing that Danny had hurt his arm and then clumsily invited him to a ball at his home that evening. That night Danny left the ball and going to the library searched about the room until he found a locked desk drawer. Then using a pen-knife which he took from his pocket Danny secured the papers that gave him the information he sought. But at the sound of a step Danny turned and saw a lovely young girl who demanded his business in here. Danny, in desperation confessed that he was a spy. She, seeing the bandage on his hand realized that he was her father's rescuer and turned her head so that Danny realized that she was giving him his chance to escape.

Danny escaped to Widow O'Reilly where a wake was being held for one of her sons. When she realized the danger that he was in she removed the corpse from the coffin and hid Danny there until the officers who have been sent after Danny have gone on their way. Then Danny came out of his hiding place and gave the news contained in the dispatches to the member of his band who had regularly been carrying messages from him to his own troop. The two guards, however, unable to find Danny and attracted by the merriment which they had noticed before returned unexpectedly and found Danny preparing to leave. He was taken back to the enemy camp and imprisoned in the barracks where Nell unknown to her father visited him in prison. When Nell learnt that Danny was to be shot she realized that she could not give him up and so she confessed her love to her father who refused to countenance the affair. But just as all seemed hopeless news arrived that Danny's band, through the information secured by him had cut off the reinforcements so that Danny's troops were victorious and Danny as victor could demand the hand of the fair Nell. And Danny celebrated the victory by marrying Nell, the girl of his choice.

TOO MANY RACKETS

Edward Rushford File No. 9171

DAVID BRENNER leaves the penitentiary where he has been serving a brief stretch for robbery determined never to return. His family and friends believe that he has been away on a business trip. Through Mildred Jennings, a friend of his sister, Jane, he secures a position in her father's establishment. David hears his father constantly bickering with Jane because she insists on seeing Jack Lasher. Mr. Brenner, a watchman at the docks, maintains that the trucks which leave Jack Lasher's warehouse look queer. Jane flares back that he is only transporting the produce from his storage warehouse. Jane and Jack are in constant attendance at a local night club which the police, watching for their opportunity, expect to raid. When Mildred teases David to take her there one night he consents and when they see his sister and her friend they form a party. They exchange partners to dance when the police rush in upon them. As the lights go out Jane grasps David's hand and leads him out through a back entrance. When she assures a worried David that Mildred is safe with Jack who knows all the secret exits, David realizes that Jack is the owner of the notorious club. However Mildred and Jack are arrested but Jack's henchman, Tony posts bail for them and they are released. When the headlines shout the news all over the town, Mildred's father who holds David responsible for Mildred's arrest fires him. Since David knows now that his father's suspicions of Jack are correct he attempts to warn Jane to give up her friendship for the racketeer but the wilful Jane has been too flattered by the attentions of so celebrated a figure as Jack Lasher and refuses to give him up.

One night David goes down to the dock to see his father. He hears him shout as he nears the warehouse where he is usually stationed and as he runs up sees him suddenly crumple up and fall. Seeing a man dash behind a truck David dashes after him having first taken his father's gun from the ground near the dead man. In the warehouse he finds Lasher barking out staccato orders to his men. David waits until the men have received their orders and driven away in their trucks and then covers Lasher with his pistol. As he tells him that he is getting even for the murder of his father David shoots Lasher. The police arrive and arrest both of them. Lasher implicates David in his bootlegging ring when he tells the police that David shot him because of an order he gave. However he cannot deny the killing of Mr. Brenner and is sentenced to the chair. Jane, thoroughly chastened, tries to make Lasher admit that David never took orders from him but this he refuses to do. Therefore, despite his intentions, David is taken back to prison until Lasher, repenting at the moment before he is led away to his doom, frees him by his confession. A freed David is met outside the gates by a happy Mildred and Jane whose taste of another life has proved so tragic.

RUSTLERS' TRAIL

Clifford Riley File No. 9163

THE elder Baldwin's weakness for cards was common knowledge in those parts, but it wasn't until Jose de Malpass came that Gerry Baldwin's father lost his head. The shrewd Malpass let Baldwin win just enough so he couldn't quit the game and then substituting a marked deck, proceeded to take back his losings. In a few hours Baldwin, dangerously surrounded by Malpass' men was signing over his ranch to cover his debts. Shaking, he brushed the deck accidentally, and as his eye caught the tell-tale markings, his hand flew to his gun. An instant later one of the other gamblers shot Baldwin through the heart without drawing his pistol from its holster, and fled. When the sheriff arrived, Malpass' men agreed that Baldwin had been a sore loser and when he brandished a gun, one of Malpass' men shot him in self defense.

A few hours later, Malpass rode up to Gerry's ranch, showed his note of ownership and ordered the stunned lad to clear out. Grief-stricken over his father's death and certain that the story was untrue, Gerry stood his ground and Malpass' fist shot into the boy's face. A moment later Gerry was fighting against the three greasers and with a battered face and a heart dull with grief, Gerry was evicted from the ranch that had been his father's. Jogging along on the bony horse that Malpass had given him, Gerry scarcely noticed where he was going until, about sundown, a bullet creased the crown of his hat. Bending low in his saddle, Gerry awaited his would-be assassin and uttered an ejaculation as a very personable young lady rode up with gun cocked. Gerry explained that he didn't realize he was trespassing, but Leona Morris ordered him to ride before her to her father and explain to him. Morris, having known Gerry's father, patted his shoulder sympathetically and finally suggested he could use a man, riding fence.

From the first Gerry had trouble with one Kirby who, after learning Gerry's name, proceeded to pick aguments with him at every turn. A few nights later while on duty, Gerry noticed that the fence had been cleverly cut and did some investigating on his own only to lose the tracks in some rocks. When he spoke to Morris about it, however, he learned that the ranch owner was being slowly bankrupted by the continuous rustling of his prize cattle. Gerry pleaded for an opportunity to catch the rustlers and after a stormy encounter with the quarrelsome Kirby, set off in secret to watch the cattle. Some few hours later, the boy was startled by the stealthy approach of Kirby and Malpass and he smiled grimly as Kirby said he was going to get the boy out of the way before he discovered that he, Kirby, had killed the elder Baldwin. For hours, on foot, Gerry trailed the four rustlers headed by Malpass and Kirby and waited at the mouth of a cave into which they had driven the cattle. Gerry felled Malpass as he came out and after a desperate battle overpowered Kirby. Then bottling up the cave, Gerry sent for the sheriff, brought the culprits to justice. And with the restoration of Morris' cattle and the possession of his own ranch again, he returned to court the pretty Leona Morris.

MAGNOLIA BLOSSOMS

John A. Jones File No. 9161

EVER since their childhood days when reluctantly he spelled the word which she missed, Jerome Jackson has been in love with Mildred Sanglon, the Doctor's daughter. But since he is only the son of struggling farmers no one but his mother suspects his secret love for the girl in the house with the magnolia blossoms. By working doubly hard on the farm and studying alone until far into the night Jerome manages to put himself through the State Normal School and secures a position as school-teacher in his little town. It is common knowledge that Mildred is engaged to Earl Grant, a boy of fine family but a wastrel and a bounder. Riding by the village store on his horse one day, Jerome stops to exchange greetings with some of his friends when Earl's horse, frightened by the town's first automobile, lunges forward, pulling the buggy with it. Jerome spurs his horse, chases after the runaway horse and stops the panting animal. As Mildred stoops over Earl, Jerome makes his getaway unobserved. Encouraged by his mother he perseveres in his studies, and the money for pursuing his law career upon which he is determined comes when he chases some thieves whom he overhears plotting to steal the one hundred dollars Seth Coleman has just given to the Doctor. The thieves when arrested turn out to be notorious crooks for whose capture a reward of two thousand dollars is offered. The whole town soon buzzes with Jerome's success when he returns and is taken into partnership with Mr. Bell, one of the oldest and most esteemed lawyers in the state. Jerome defends Mr. Ransdell who has killed the man who ruined his daughter and caused her to commit suicide and so impassioned is his plea and so fervent his manner that the jury frees the aged man. His cup of happiness is complete when Mildred comes up after the hearing and offers her congratulations. He sees her home and accepts her invitation to step into the house. As she passes him a tea-cup she drops her eyes at the look she beholds on his face. Encouraged by the flush which spreads over her cheeks, Jerome tells her of his love for her. Shyly she admits her love but adds that she cannot break her promise to Earl, her betrothed, for she is the only one who can control his recklessness. Secure in the knowledge of her love for him, Jerome exultantly promises to persevere and win her.

Suddenly all thoughts of love are relegated to the background when America declares war upon Germany. One of the first to enlist, Jerome joins the army taking with him a carefully pressed magnolia blossom which Mildred has given him as a parting souvenir of their love. In France several months later Jerome learns from Floyd, a boyhood friend, that Earl, who is also in the division, has been left in No Man's Land during the raid. Daringly Jerome creeps back into the field where guns roar and bombs tear up the earth all around and drags Earl back to safety. Then Jerome is captured and for a long time is interned in a German camp. Returning home after the Armistice Jerome finds his mother dead and Mildred still determined to stick by Earl who has said nothing of his rescue by Jerome and who is again sinking himself in dissolute pursuits. Then one night Jerome's phone rings and he is summoned to the Wellman mansion where Mr. Wellman has just been slain. The caller is Earl's mother for Earl is accused of the murder. Hastening over before the police can arrive Jerome finds the dead man's stepson and Earl quarreling as Earl accuses the fellow of trying to frame him for this murder. Though this is actually the case the boy tries to carry off his plan and sails into Earl with his fists. In the struggle the gun goes off and Earl is slain. With Earl's fate no longer dependent upon her, Mildred is free to marry the man of her choice and after a short period wedding bells peal out for a radiant Mildred and a blissful Jerome whose perseverance has once more brought him victory.

THE VARIABLE SEX

Mary Brusgulis File No. 9259

AS the toastmaster reads each telegram of congratulations to the bride and groom, the guests assembled about the festive board applaud enthusiastically. But when the letter from Charlie's uncle telling him that the first son born to the newlyweds can claim twenty thousand dollars as a gift from him, Charlie looks at his bride shyly, and they carefully fold the note. Two years later, Charlie's wife dies in childbirth, and the doctor tries to comfort the stricken father by telling him what a fine baby girl he has.

Eighteen years pass, and Charlie stares dully at the note from his lawyer telling him he has paid every cent of his obligations but is now penniless. With trembling fingers, Charlie smoothes his wife's wedding dress, and the slim child, Lola tries to solace her father, telling him they have all life together. Her father shows her the wedding dress for the first time, and out of it falls the note about the son. Lola realizes then what a disappointment she must have been to her father, but he assures her she has been a constant joy. At length, however, Lola exclaims excitedly that she will dress as a boy and they will go to collect the money. When they arrive, however, and Lola, now called John faces the puzzled scrutiny of the butler, Adolph, they learn that the uncle has long since died and his fortune has been inherited by his adopted son, Frank, who says he will give the money if John can prove he is entitled to it. The shock of the interview proves too much for Charlie, who becomes very ill and soon passes on leaving John alone. Frank, sympathetic, offers John a home with him as a sort of brother and Lola, already falling in love with Frank, is finally induced to remain.

Some time later, Frank tries to induce John to come to a night club with him and when John says he can't dance, Frank tries to teach him. As Frank compliments John on his grace, and says with his smooth skin he would have made a lovely girl John breaks away; but when he learns that Frank is going out with a girl he intends to marry John consents to come along. John pretends to be very drunk and goads Helen into revealing her sharp temper. Frank is annoyed and brings John home, but when Adolph tries to undress the supposedly drunk John, he receives a terrific kick and a severe admonition from John. Frank smiles at this and accepts John's explanation of having almost strangled one of Helen's clinging friends who begged John to kiss her in the garden. John simply didn't like girls.

While they are dining together, John and Frank are invited to a garden party during which a prize is to be given to the prettiest girl in the whole country. Lola, dressed in her mother's wedding dress wins after having explained her presence in the house to Adolph who caught her slipping out, by saying she was one of John's friends. Both Paul and Frank are smitten, but Lola gives her time to Frank, then vanishes from his arms after he has kissed her.

The next day Frank finds a lace handkerchief he had restored to Lola when she dropped it, and finding John putting away the white dress, he scolds him for masquerading as a girl. As a result of his love for John, Frank hastens his wedding to Helen, who wants his money. John and Frank quarrel because the former won't consent to be best man, but the day of the wedding, Lola, upstairs dressed in her mother's wedding dress screams. Her cries bring Frank to her room, and gasping at her loveliness, he scolds John only to be convinced at last she is really a girl. The wedding joins Frank to Lola, and Helen disgruntedly leaves with Paul who had been aiding her to catch the wealthy Frank.

COWBOY CODE

Fermina Salatto File No. 9268

WRINGING the hand of his father who has come to see him graduated from Medical school, Bob happily outlines his plans for opening up an office; but when his father worriedly explains that rustlers' raids are making deep inroads in his cattle, Bob sets aside his doctor's practice and patting his father's shoulders says that he is coming to the ranch for a while to see about catching the bandits. Accompanied by Buddy, a bowlegged cowboy, Bob rides into the sheriff's office and asks for a deputy badge. The sheriff, having known Bob since he was a child, gives it to him and as Bob is leaving the office, a white haired cattle man rides in excitedly to report another attack by the rustlers. The man adds that he shot at a fellow on a white horse but the whole gang got away. Getting the general direction, Bob rides off with Buddy. At a distance in the forest, they come across a beautiful girl sobbing as she vainly tries to staunch the wound in a man's shoulder. Buddy excitedly points toward a white horse nearby, but Bob orders the cowboy to keep silent, and advancing toward the couple he kneels at the side of the wounded man, sends the girl for cloth and water from the nearby hut, and deftly bandages the injured shoulder. With Buddy's help, Bob carries the wounded man into the house. When Marion thanks the stranger for saving her brother's life, Bob looks at her for a long minute then telling her Jack will be all right, he rides away with the astonished Buddy. Bob assures the cowboy that the wounded man can't get away, and in order to see more of Marion with whom he has fallen in love, Bob comes to attend her brother daily. Jack regains his strength, but is suspicious of the stranger who has never told them his last name. Bob gives orders that Jack is not to leave the house, but when he finds Jack exhausted on one of his professional visits, and learns, moreover that that night the rustlers had made another raid, he exposes to Jack that he will turn him over to the law unless he gives up the gang. Worriedly Bob tells Marion of her brother's affiliations with the rustlers, but Marion refuses to believe Bob in the face of all evidence, especially since Jack denies everything. Angered, Bob rides away.

However, when Buddy learns that the rustlers are going to ride into an ambuscade, Bob decides he can't let the brother of the girl he loves fall into the trap and rides to stop Jack. Jack refuses to believe Bob's warning and when he draws a gun, Bob flings it from his hand, overpowers Jack, and binds him to the bed to keep him from following. Then Bob rides to join the sheriff's party. He arrives in time to round up the gang, but Pete, the leader of the gang, who has shot Bob's father in order to escape, flees to the mountains followed by Bob. On top of a mountain the two meet in a fierce hand-to-hand battle, during which Bob escapes the plunge of the rustler who falls down the mountain side and is killed. Upon his arrival home, Bob finds Marion and Jack, whom she has released, rendering first aid to his father. Jack reforms and Bob marries Marion.

DOCTORS LOVE

E. L. Huginin File No. 9244

IT was Tommie Rathburn, fiance of Lucille, the oldest of the Herrity girls, who swung up the rectory walk loudly heralding the arrival of a new young doctor and slyly advising that here was a great catch for some enterprising young lady since a wife was a hallmark of respectability for a young medical man. Gay chatter filled the Herrity rectory after Lucille and Tommie had walked out into the garden and when Harry Goddard, the young curate who had thus far eluded the matrimonial intentions of all the young ladies in town, arrived, a new zest was given to the conversation. It was while they were discussing a trip to watch a cricket game in a neighboring town that the jovial Dr. Brown arrived to introduce his young assistant, Dr. Taylor Hynes. Lucille seemed upset for a moment but quickly recovered herself and before the two doctors left to continue their rounds, Lucille had extended an invitation to the new doctor to join them in seeing the cricket game. While the others watched the exciting game, Lucille and Taylor dropped back and in low tones discussed their last meeting. The previous year they had met while Lucille was staying with a cousin in Kniepfield. Only an interne then, Taylor had hesitated to tell Lucille of his love, and she mistaking his reserve for indifference had returned home without leaving any message. Now Taylor exclaimed they would seize their happiness, but Lucille disengaged herself from his impulsive embrace and informed him gravely that she had given her word to marry Tommie and she couldn't break it. Taylor tried to make her see that she was letting an absurd code ruin the happiness of three people, for eventually Tommie would suffer too, but Lucille was firm. In the months that followed, Taylor astounded the flu-stricken town by his incessant labors and the poor blessed him for his charity, but only Taylor and Lucille knew how each suffered. Esther, Lucille's sister flirted with Taylor whenever possible and as a result convinced Harry Goddard that he was losing a very precious young person. It was Lucille who was called upon to help them plan for their wedding while Tommie growing tired of Lucille's refusal to set a definite date for their wedding one week off, threatened to break it off altogether. Wearied, Lucille got up to watch Taylor pass in his car on the way to a patient. Hidden by the heavy drapes she was unnoticed by Alice and Tommie who entered together, and before she could declare her presence, Tommie informed Alice that he had all but asked Lucille to give him up and she had just sat there. Lucille almost grew hysterical as Tommie took Alice in his arms and explained he realized since Alice came back from college that it was she he loved but had kept up appearances with Lucille.

That night Lucille gave Tommie's ring back and a week later Alice announced her engagement. She and Esther were to be married with a double wedding in June. Realizing that Taylor would never speak unless she did, Lucille slipped out one wintry night and was ushered into Taylor's warm den by a servant. As she warmed her hands at the fire, Taylor entered and with a cry of disbelief, crushed Lucille in his arms. After all it was Lucille who was married first, for she eloped with her young doctor.

A NIGHT'S LODGING

Rose Rak File No. 9294

RUNNING through the storm, already a little late to her job as an evening waitress, Mary Martin bumps into a shabbily clad woman. Mary helps the woman who is badly shaken by the unexpected fall, to her feet and escorts her to the depot a few blocks away. Anxious to lose no further time Mary rushes through the rain-drenched, deserted streets. As she dashes across a corner she is hit by a car and hurled underneath the wheels. The driver of the car, Jack Farley, has not seen this girl make a dash for the opposite pavement in time to stop his machine. Anxious and harassed he drives her to the hospital where Dr. Mathews assures him that with skilled medical attention she will live. Jack reports the case to the police, telling them that there is nothing on the girl to reveal her identity. Though the police declare the incident an accident for which he is not to be held responsible, Jack takes it upon himself to see that the girl has the best care and sends her flowers frequently. But on the same night as that on which Jack reports the accident Mr. Nicols, owner of a large jewelry store excitedly phones the police concerning the theft of a valuable diamond necklace which has disappeared that afternoon. The only clew he can give them is the word of his clerk who saw a young girl run down the street and walk away in a very friendly manner with an older woman whom she had thrown down. Police speedily linked the two cases and when a weakened Mary insists that she can give them no information police decide that the mysteriously disappeared woman was Mary's accomplice and made her getaway with the necklace. Jack visits Mary and comforts her, assuring her of his faith in her innocence.

Meanwhile in Melville, a neighboring town, the woman whom Mary helped goes to the orphanage to seek some trace of the twins she has left there twenty years before. Joan Robinson, shabby and worn at forty has paid dearly for that wild night in which she had heeded the drunken compliments and pleadings of the handsome stranger and spent a night with him at a cheap hotel. He was gone when she awoke the next morning but the twins were the result of that night and unable to keep them she had given them into the care of the orphanage. Now she stands pleading before an obdurate matron who will tell her no more than that the boy and girl were taken into separate homes and adopted by parents whose names she cannot divulge. Her wistful request for employment wins her a temporary job in a department store. Coming home one evening she scans the local newspaper and reads of the victim of a street accident being held in connection with the jewel robbery. Amazed she realizes that the mysterious woman who is supposed to have made away with the necklace is herself. Though she knows nothing of the matter she gives herself up to the police and is present as a material witness at the trial when Mary is recovered sufficiently to attend. Mary tearfully protests her ignorance of the robbery. Jack Farling gasps in surprise as she mentions August 14, 1904 as the date of her birth and in answer to the lawyer's questions tells that she is the child of foster parents, now dead. She persists in her story that she knows nothing of the woman she aided that stormy afternoon. Jack Farling, before whose father Judge Farling, the case is being tried, corroborates Mary's story. As he, smiling puzzledly, relates that he too is a foster child and that his birth date is the same as Mary's, Joan Robinson, seated near the lawyers' table, gasps involuntarily. When, as the next witness, she faces the Judge to take her oath she suddenly starts and falls forward in a swoon. Reviving consciousness she answers Judge Farling's query by telling him that Jack and Mary are her children and, looking at him intently, that he is their father. As the realization of all that she is telling him dawns upon him, he confesses that though he had meant the things he had told her that night in the hotel, he was engaged to marry a socially prominent girl the following week and there was no other choice but to leave before she awoke. When an excited Nicols rushes into the Judge's chamber with his clerk's confession, Judge Farling, widowed for very many years, takes Joan into his arms and secures her consent to become the avowed mother of his children.

BREAKS THE DAY

Regia Sheppard Townsend File No. 9364

THE prospect extended by Harris Derbyshire of going to the Indianapolis automobile races appealed to Lowell Seabright, private secretary to the president of the furniture company, Mr. Adams. Explaining to his wife, Barbara, that Harris had made arrangements for them to hitch-hike, Lowell asked her to stay with her mother for the weekend. Harris was to meet Lowell in their hotel room after the races, but about an hour later he arrived, flushed with drink, and mumbling about a second hand car he had bought. They had missed the car that was supposed to bring them back, and Lowell who had to be back at work Monday morning was glad enough to take the wheel. He turned to ask Harris how he happened to buy a car, but Harris was asleep and Lowell drove through the night. Just before they reached home, an automobile containing three Indianapolis policemen stopped them and to Lowell's amazement, he heard the officers pronounce the car stolen and Harris explain that Lowell had produced the car with the explanation that he had bought it. Angrily Lowell argued the point, but Lowell, alone in his room waiting for Harris could produce no alibi and Harris' word was accepted. Adams expressed his sympathy to his secretary when the sentence was pronounced, but Lowell's greatest blow was having Barbara exclaim, "But why did you do it?" and walk out of the courtroom with her mother to whom Harris was describing exactly how it all happened and how he didn't know what had gotten into Lowell.

In the months in prison, Lowell rationalizing, realized that Harris, son of a wealthy attorney, had always been favored by Barbara's mother, and that Harris must have resented Lowell's winning of the lovely, shallow Barbara. But it remained for Harris to boast about his trick, while in his cups one night. Adams, informed by one of Harris' confidantes, started immediate action, but Harris, realizing what he had said, had fled town and a petition secured Lowell's release. His old job was waiting for him, but with the taint of prison upon him and the awareness of Barbara's desertion, Lowell accepted only a letter of recommendation from Adams and went on to New York. However, unable to find work, Lowell found himself reduced to starvation and with a feeling of unutterable shame, he took his place on a bread line. His eyes held those of the girl who handed him his soup, and a strange elation filled him. That afternoon, with the first food in days in his stomach, he applied for a position as secretary and got it. Fearful lest he lose the girl, Lowell at length took his place on the line of destitution again and felt like a beast. But as she nodded almost imperceptibly he downed the pang and returned to his job. A few afternoons later, Lowell winced as he saw the girl walk into his employer's office and was introduced as Wilray, his daughter. Wilray's eyes blazed in recognition, but later when he explained simply he had to see her, she told him the incident was closed. It was Wilray who prompted her father to have his secretary do work at home and she taunted him with her nearness, but Lowell astonished her by his apparent coolness and at length, driven to it, Lowell explained to his puzzled employer the whole situation. Ruthven communicated with Adams and discovered the truth of Lowell's assertions and also that Barbara on her way to Reno had been killed with Harris in an automobile accident. Adam's wire to Lowell urging him to come back as a partner in the business was shown to Wilray, and in her uplifted lips, Lowell read his answer.

WOMEN DON'T KNOW

Mrs. Margaret Carber File No. 9339

AS she looks up, flushed and panting, to thank the rider who has stopped her runaway horse, Madge Du Verle recognizes the handsome instructor who has been ardently watching her as she rides by the Academy on her way to the bridle paths. Encouraged by his mother, the owner of the Riding Academy, to believe that their widely divergent social status is no barrier, he spends many hours in Madge's company. Madge visualizes the family's consternation should they learn of her new attachment and not realizing that it is only the romantic aspect of the affair that has made her so excited, she cajoles Martha, the chauffeur's wife, to let them meet in their cottage. Quickly forgetting Jim Westley, whose friendship both their families have taken for granted these many years, she consistently refuses to see him so that her evenings may be free for the light love-making in a worried Martha's living-room. Soon after his engagement to Dot Long, prominent heiress, is announced, Charles Du Verle, his face pale with anger confronts his father and irrately shows him an item in one of the scandal columns of a newspaper which mentions insinuatingly Madge Du Verle's many appearances with a boy of no social position. Her father's fury as he arbitrarily demands that she cease seeing Jack unless she wants the Long family to break off Charles' engagement to Dot only increases the number of her rendezvous with Jack.

Mr. Du Verle, determined to break the match, comes to the Riding Academy and confronts Mrs. Lyons, alone in the office. With a sneering smile she listens to him accuse Jack and herself of being fortune-hunters. Mr. Du Verle blanches as she brazenly tells him that though he spurned her love when they were themselves young because she was only the daughter of one of his poorer clients and was left penniless because of ill-advised investments, her son will at least be his son-in-law. Madge and her son are in love and nothing can come between them. She scorns his offer of money to take her son away and laughs immoderately at his sudden furious departure. Coming home late one night Charles takes his car to the garage himself and as he passes by the chauffeur's cottage, he sees through the window Madge pillowed in Jack's arms. When Madge refuses Jim Westley's invitation to make a foursome with Charles and Dot at a night-club, Charles warns the scornful Madge to stop seeing her riding-master boy-friend if she knows what is good for both of them. Jim goes with Charles and Dot anyway and when he is tight from the drinks he has had mumbles something about Madge's cruelty to him. A queer light gleams in Charles' eye as he suggests that they fix "that riding fellow" for good and all. None too sober himself he drives his car home at a mad speed after first dropping Dot at her home. Jack hears his name called as he passes the garage after leaving Madge alone to find her way to the house from the cottage as is their practice. Walking in unsuspectingly he is hit by Jim and as Jim and Jack fight, Jim's blow suddenly sends Jack backward. As he falls his head hits the sharp edge of the bumper of Charles's car. Leon, the chauffeur, attracted by the noise of the scuffle, finds a miraculously sobered Charles and Jim bending over the dead Jack. The doctor's evidence corroborates their story. Madge, when she sees the frightened and remorseful Jim, realizes in a flash of horror that her sympathies are with him rather than with the dead man. As she vainly strives to comfort the hastily summoned Mrs. Lyons who is weeping bitterly at the tragic outcome of her plans for revenge, Madge turns her eyes to Jim and makes a mute plea for forgiveness. And Jim's suddenly radiant smile holds the answering hope for a brighter and a happier future.

GIRL ACROSS THE AISLE

Gertrude M. Kreisel File No. 9310

WHEN Betty entered the Church and saw a man sitting in her pew she quietly took the seat across the aisle, but all through the service, she could feel his eyes upon her and as she left he approached and apologized for having taken her place. Politely Betty informed him it was quite all right but as he started to say more, she was gone. The following morning at the Mill, she was called to the Manager's office and informed that she was to be employed henceforth as secretary to one of the new partners. When Betty, straightening her new desk, looked up as her new employer entered, she flushed in recognition of the stranger of the day before, and he explained to the Manager that he had met his secretary before and was quite sure she would do.

In the days that followed, Betty learned a lot about Larry Hill. The most important thing to Larry was that he was in love with a girl he had met at college, Joan. His father, annoyed at Larry's interest in writing, had bought a partnership for his son in the cotton mill, and had cut off his allowance with the instructions that henceforth he would make his own money. Larry was miserable because Joan had refused to marry him until he had made good and often Betty would look up from her work to find Larry staring unhappily out the window. It was more than pity that made Betty break dates with Roy, who for the past year had been coming to the point where he was ready to ask Betty to marry him, in order to go out with Larry and see that he forgot his unhappiness for a few hours. Once as they walked together through the autumn woods, Larry told Betty he had never felt so comfortable with a woman before. There wasn't the necessity of having to make pretty speeches to her. She always seemed to understand. Betty bit her lip as she thought of Joan to whom Larry made pretty speeches and when Larry asked shyly if she'd like to see the book on which he was putting the finishing touches, Betty eagerly assured him she did. It was Betty who retyped the whole long novel, and her suggestions which made Larry enthusiastic over the way it was turning out. At home her sister advised her to be very sure of Larry before giving Roy up, but when Roy asked Betty to marry him, she found suddenly that she didn't want to.

Working long hours with Larry and whipping him to his duties when he tended to grow lax, Betty saw Larry's confidence in himself mount, and as the mill began to reflect his new suggestions, Larry, in an outburst of enthusiasm asked Betty to help him furnish a cottage. Soon he would send for Joan. In her purchases, Betty would forget that she was furnishing a home for another woman, and Larry grasping her hands told her she was the perfect secretary. Betty smiled grimly. But when Larry finally wrote to Joan asking her to be his wife, and she refused, Larry sank into a fit of despondency. Betty found him in a drunken stupor and all night she stayed with him to prevent him from carrying out his threat of suicide. The next day Betty realized that small town gossip had attacked her. Proudly she ignored the cuts of her former friends and going about her duties as if nothing happened, sent off Larry's manuscript to a publisher when she found he had thrown it into a waste paper basket. Meanwhile, Larry sobered to the realization that he had ruined Betty's reputation hailed her before a Justice of the Peace and had a marriage performed. A few weeks later, however, Larry's manuscript was accepted for magazine publication and as he chattered with sardonic humor of how Joan would feel, Betty realized that she had never really won Larry from Joan. Facing him squarely, she told him their marriage was a farce. He didn't love her, and when Joan telegrammed that she was on her way to congratulate Larry, about whose marriage she had not heard, Betty told Larry that she would give him a divorce. At first incredulous, Larry refused, but when he saw how Roy suffered each time he saw Betty, he told himself that perhaps Betty would find happiness with Roy and he could have Joan. Joan accepted the idea of Larry's divorce after the first shock and posed with him for photographs for the press. She examined Betty critically and implied what she thought of a girl who would seize a man on the rebound. For the cottage she had only contempt, and the idea of a small town made her wince. Betty saw Larry's eyes follow her, and turned away. Even when Larry left for Wheeling where his family and Joan lived, and said he was making arrangements for the divoree, Betty knew she still loved him, and refused Roy's consolation.

A month later, sitting in the little Church where she had first met Larry, a tear splashed from her brimming eyes and as a hand closed softly over her own, she looked into the suffering eyes of Larry. When the service was over they slowly left together and oblivious of wagging tongues about, Larry begged Betty to take him back. He had been such a fool. Joan..... "I know," said Betty, and together they entered their little cottage.

BIG SHOT

Joseph Lipson File No. 9373

SECRETLY in love with Claire, Joe could see how hurt she was that Bob didn't leave off talking to the man in the big red roadster when she drove into the garage. As he filled Claire's tank with gas, he could see her eyes brim with tears. These days Bob wasn't as attentive as he used to be. "Thanks, Joe," she said, "tell Bob I was here," and rode off. Joe could hear Louis, who had gone to school with him and Bob, explain to his impressionable younger brother that rum running was the only business with profits these days, and when Louis left, Bob said, "Maybe we ought to get into it, Joe. Look at Louis. A car, money." Joe's arguments held Bob down for a while, but when they had to give up the garage because big chains of garages were competing and offering expensive modern equipment, Bob began talking rum running again. Joe argued that they'd manage somehow, legitimately, but Bob was discouraged.

One day Joe came home excitedly with the news that he had gotten the X Oil Co. to lease them one of their garages. They had a new product and if they worked hard there would be money in it. Bob was unenthusiastic. He would come in for an hour or so, draw out some money and leave. Joe tried to stimulate business by personal contacts and slowly saw his garage taking hold on the public. Once or twice, Claire waved in passing, but Bob was never there. Then, one day, Bob appeared briefly, and when he left Joe discovered that he had withdrawn the entire account at the bank. All the bills were coming due and if he failed to meet his obligations under the terms of the contract, Joe would have to give up the place he had so carefully built up. With a sinking heart, Joe explained why he couldn't pay and the president of the company grasped his hand and said they'd been watching him. They had faith in him and would give him an extension of time. Joe worked day and night to make good while Bob, having left in Louis' car that morning, acted as pilot for the rum runners. He would ride a car ahead of the liquor trucks to see that the road was clear of state troupers. Soon Bob had money to burn, and expanding, went into the liquor business on his own.

Meanwhile, Joe seeing Claire alone asked her to have dinner with him one night. Their friendship grew, but Joe realized that she was still in love with his brother, whom she thought to be an importer, when he asked her to marry him. Then Bob came back in a big car to impress the town. Joe warned him to be careful, but Bob snorted and claimed that Joe would never get anywhere. Small town living and small town women. Joe flinched. That was all Claire meant to Bob, but when Bob saw her and realized how desirable she was, he invited her to a roadhouse. Forgetting her date with Joe, forgetting everything except Bob's return, Claire went. But when Bob seized her in his arms, she suddenly realized that he was a stranger to her. Struggling, she gasped as Joe entered and as Bob ordered his brother out, Joe quietly said, "Claire is going with me." Bob struck out, but Joe dodged and left with the sobbing Claire. Alone, Bob realized for the first time that he had lost Claire, and that it mattered to him. But one of his men came in and told him there was a load waiting to be brought in and Tony, the driver, was too drunk to ride. With a curse, Bob explained he'd take the wheel. Driving like fury, he heard troopers fire at his wheels, but taking a desperate chance he didn't stop. A wheel exploded and the powerful car smashed up. Bob died before help could reach him, and at home Claire softly asked Joe, "Does that offer of marriage still hold?"

STREET LIGHTS

Mrs. Grace White File No. 9361

WHEN Mrs. Brown who had taken her from the Orphanage beat her until her body was covered with blood, and then, pretending to be bringing something to soothe her aching body, gave her salt to apply to the open wounds, Mary McBride determined to run away and try to find the Miss Johnson who had befriended her when the Browns had been their neighbors. Her shaved head, which Mrs. Brown had insisted npon as she bitingly remarked that orphans didn't need to be attractive anyway, aided Mary when, disguised in boy's overalls, she made her getaway that night. Entitled to her services until she was eighteen, the Browns had Mary traced to the Johnson home at which a weary and bedraggled Mary had arrived after many lifts from kind-hearted drivers. Though Mary was sure that the detective flashed his searchlight directly into her frightened face where she hid behind the coal bin, he told Miss Johnson that the kid had probably had a tough time of it and he hoped that she wouldn't be found. However, Mary recognized that the Johnsons could not afford to keep her indefinitely and, answering an ad in a local newspaper, secured a place as assistant to a dressmaker. Mary aided Mrs. Allison with fancy sewing which she had learned from the nuns in the convent attached to the orphanage and was a maid of all work. One of the boarders whom Mrs. Allison took in to make both ends meet, a Bob Hogan, frequently gave Mary his shirts to mend and tried to attract her attention. When Mrs. Allison left her in charge of the house one night, Mary thought it was the slovenly cook knocking upon her door for some instructions and was surprised to see Bob Hogan enter. Pretending he had come for his shirts he sat down upon the bed where Mary lay, clad only in a thin nightgown. Still ignorant of the ways of men with women, she spoke pleasantly to him but suddenly she found herself struggling in his arms and when his lips pressed close to hers, she wildly bit his lip. Cursing he ran from the room and Mary saw one of the other boarders looking through the door. Unable to confront any of them or to face Mrs. Allison again, she left the torn fragments of her nightgown and a slip of paper bearing Bob Hogan's name in Mrs. Hogan's bureau drawer as the sole explanation.

Walking dejectedly away from an employment agency an attractive woman stopped Mary and telling her that she was just going up to the agency to hire a girl, offered to teach her to be a fortune-teller in her tea room. Mary accepted the offer with alacrity and though she wondered at the many men present in the evenings, she was happy in her work and paid little attention to the men who were always trying to entice her into joining their gay parties. Miss Satti, the proprietor, remarked about Mary's new beauty when she began dressing herself well with the money she earned. That night two of the men at the cafe paid her marked attentions but though she heard them bargaining with Miss Satti about something she did not trouhle to find out what. Several nights later Miss Satti came to Mary's room carrying huge ribbon-wrapped boxes which, when opened, revealed flimsy underthings with her two admirers' cards. Miss Satti told her to try them on and when one of the men knocked and entered the room, she winked shrewdly at him and vanished. As Mary drew a wrap about her he came closer and held her in his arms. Her desperate struggles only seemed to give him new strength and finally she became limp in his arms. When she regained consciousness she was lying on the bed and the man was gone. Dazedly she dressed and made from the house. An arm pulled her quickly back as she attempted to dash under an approaching trolley. An aghast "Mary McBride" made her look up to recognize one of the girls she had known years ago at the Orphanage. Stella took her home and through her she obtained a position as companion to a wealthy widow. Several years passed during which Mary shut men out of her life. Then, looking bewitching in dainty chiffon, Mary walking in the garden, saw the handsome stranger who had picked up some packages for her as she was getting out of her employer's machine. As he told her how he had watched and loved her for four years while she worked for his aunt Mary realized that she could still hope for kind and gentle love. But refusing to risk their happiness she confessed her tragic story to him when he proposed to her. Gently Jock drew her to him and as he kissed her promised to erase the bitterness of the past with the tenderness of his love.

AT THE END OF THE ROAD

Lo Ella Johnson Carney File No. 9358

AS a little boy, playing at cops and robbers in Brandt's brick quarry on the outskirts of town, Martin Wallace had hoped some day to work for Thomas Brandt. Leaving high school to get a laborer's job at the quarry, he had proved so diligent a worker, that now, at twenty-five, he had been made foreman. Not only did this mean that he had achieved one of his earliest wishes, but it was the encouragement he needed to propose to Laura Brandt, his employer's daughter.

The first few happy years that followed the marriage of Martin and Laura, were marred by the death of Thomas Brandt. Laura was his only child, and Brandt, knowing Martin's ability, willed him the brick quarry. From this time on, something changed in Martin Wallace. No longer did he stop to play with his little daughter Claire, but devoted every minute of his time to his business. Every day, even Sunday, he sat in his small, stuffy office, figuring, figuring how to increase the profits, and reduce the cost of operation. His astute business sense guiding him, he contrived to squeeze from his workers every possible ounce of work at lowered salaries.

With Martin so different from his former, genial self, Laura found herself growing more and more estranged from him. Claire, their fast-growing daughter, knew her father as a person whose every action was guided by stern rule. Even though his wealth had increased enormously, his desire for power did not lessen.

But the injustice of Martin's actions was felt elsewhere than in the Wallace home. One evening the laborers, rebelling against their low wages, and increased working hours, came to Martin's home, demanding that he hear out their grievances. But Martin, who regarded them merely as machines without human feelings, refused their request, and even threatened to discharge them and hire new help. Laura, shocked by her husband's callousness, quietly announced to him the next morning that she was going to take Claire with her to New York for an extended visit. Still angered over the "insolence" of his employees, Martin made no objection, and Laura and Claire left him, alone in the depressed atmosphere of an empty house.

As the months passed, and Laura heard no word from Martin, she despaired of ever returning to him. Meanwhile, Martin began to feel the effects of the business depression. As construction work all over the country slackened, he spent long hours in his office, trying frantically to save his business. But he was powerless against the downward forces of trade, and one morning he awoke to face the fact that his quarry was idle. His all-consuming interest in life gone, Martin felt for the first time the utter shallowness of his life. There was nothing left for him, and he at last became aware of how he had helped in destroying the happiness and security of his workers.

In her heart still loving her husband, Laura returned with Claire six months later. Stopping at the quarry to ask for him, she found him to her amazement, helping his employees, and listening sympathetically to their troubles. Guided by a new hope and faith, Martin began life over again with his wife and his daughter.

THE GILDED OYSTER

Clifton S. Wady File No. 9359

THE wealthy summer residents of Song Island, among them John Freeman, the retired orange grove king and his niece, Beatrice, were absorbed in watching the work of young Clyde Hart, and his assistant, busily engaged in raking oysters in the rocks along the shore. A heated argument had evidently been under way, for Clyde was heard to exclaim angrily, "But I'm not going to do this all my life. Some day I'm going to live with those people as one of them." He beckoned so confidently toward the watchers, that Dan Montell, lawyer, and financial adviser for the Freemans', was moved to tease Beatrice with the remark that Clyde was just the kind of man she always said she liked—earnest, diligent and ambitious. As he finished speaking, Clyde, who had raked in an unusually large haul, and had pryed open the top oyster, held aloft in his hand a lustrous silvery pearl.

Excited by the good fortune of Clyde, and spurred on by a dare from Dan, Beatrice invited Clyde to dinner. Arriving at the Freeman home that evening, Clyde intended to present Beatrice with the pearl, which symbolized for him all her loveliness and charm. At the first moment alone with Beatrice, Clyde offered her his gift, but she, misinterpreting his awkward gallantry, called in her guests, among them Dan Montell, who ridiculed Clyde's gesture. Painfully humiliated, and crushed by their scornful laughs, he rushed from the Freeman home, leaving the pearl on the table. Dan Montell, by this time more than half-drunk, slipped the pearl into his pocket, unnoticed by the others. Later that evening, John Freeman called in Dan to give an account of his investments of the Freeman fortune. With Beatrice's confession that the "oyster boy," as Dan had sarcastically named Clyde, had aroused her admiration and respect still ringing in his ears, Dan entered Freeman's study in an ugly mood. During the angry conversation that ensued, the conviction that Freeman suspected his crooked speculations slowly made its way through Dan's drunken brain. Blinded by rage, and fearful of discovery, he picked up a decanter and crashed it down on Freeman's head. As the aged man, mortally wounded, dropped to the floor with a dull, sickening thud, Dan's legal cunningness awoke in him one all-compelling thought—to throw the suspicion on someone else. Having carefully wiped all fingerprints from the decanter, he placed the pearl under a fold of the dead man's coat.

The next morning Clyde, all his high ambitions gone, had sold his boat to a rival oyster trader, and had begun to work for him as a common employee. As he raked among the rocks, two sober-appearing men approached him, and announced quictly that he was wanted for the murder of John Freeman. Clyde, stunned by this statement, demanded to know what evidence pointed against him, and was told that a pearl, known by the island residents to belong to him, was found on the scene of the crime. Realizing that he had left the pearl with Beatrice, Clyde maintained a stubborn silence in the face of all questioning.

Clyde's guilt, believed in by all the islanders, proved a torturous problem to Beatrice. Only too vividly did she remember that the pearl had been left at her home. Seeing that her "Oyster boy" refused to defend himself, she promised Dan that if he would use his legal skill in proving Clyde's innocence, she would marry him. The irony of the situation, and Beatrice's promise appealed to the lawyer, and he used all his energy and cleverness in building up a case of circumstantial evidence. Arriving at court intoxicated, Dan presented so bitter, so impassioned a plea against the injustice to Clyde, that he broke down and confessed his own guilt. Cleared of all charges, Clyde came again to Beatrice, and this time stayed.

THE ONE FOLLY

George R. Paluso File No. 9303

AS they dress in the locker room after the last football game before their graduation from high school, Huntley Jordan slaps the shoulder of Jack Downey, whom he strikingly resembles, and with bright eyes looks forward to their conquest of Mt. Sinai. Realizing that for once Jack doesn't share his enthusiasm, Huntley questions him and learning that Jack will have to put aside thoughts of college for financial reasons, goes home thoughtfully. That evening after an interview with his wealthy father, Huntley calls Jack to his home, and Mr. Jordan tells his son's friend that he has decided to invest in his future. He will lend Jack money to go on through school. Joy makes Jack inarticulate as he wrings the hands of Huntley and his father.

Professor Gilmore coming home about one o'clock one morning sees a boy slipping into the dormitories and indignation swells within him at the infringement of rules. At the same time, Huntley tiptoes through the corridors and makes his way to the room where Jack is waiting for him. Jack excitedly reminds Huntley they have the big game with Sycamore tomorrow, and they mumble signals and discuss their plays together before dropping off to sleep. The next day at the field, however, Professor Gilmore points out to the coach Jack, who listens dazedly to the question about his being out the night before, and when, thinking of Huntley, Jack doesn't deny the charge, he is ordered out of the day's play. However, when Mt. Sinai is losing 6-0, the coach begs the Dean to permit Jack to play, and working their signals with Huntley, who believed that Jack had a sprained side, Jack carries the ball to win 7-6. At the victory dance Jack misses Huntley and finds him in conversation with a white-faced girl. Later in the dorm, Huntley admits that he's sunk. He has gotten the girl in trouble and he dares not marry her at the risk of being disowned by his straight-laced father. Huntley asks Jack to try to make a cash settlement, but when Jack lunches with the girl she turns hunted eyes to him and explains that her love for Huntley has turned to hate, but she is desperate at the thought of her child being fatherless. Leora refuses the money and Jack, realizing that his interest in the girl isn't entirely a product of his friendship for Huntley, asks her to marry him when Huntley's father recommends him for a position in New York with a radio corporation. Jack telegrams to Huntley who has gone on to Law School that he has gotten married but doesn't say to whom.

Several years later, Jack is seen working far into the night upon an invention to eliminate static and Leora and the baby tug at his sleeve trying to induce him to get some sleep. Worn out, Jack jumps up one night with a glad cry and swinging the astonished Leora about shouts, "It works, it works". The newspaper publicity brings a congratulatory telegram from Huntley, who at the death of his father has inherited a fortune and has made good as a lawyer. Huntley, coming to see them, is astonished at finding Leora Jack's wife and despite the friendship between them, Huntley looks wistfully at Leora's child and realizes it is his own.

In his office his distraction is interrupted by a wild-eyed girl who begs him to induce her betrayer to marry her, and as Huntley persuades the young foreigner, he sinks back in his chair at the irony. Then getting into his car he drives blindly through the night and as visions of Leora come before him, his car plunges through a fence. Dying he smiles feebly upon Leora and Jack who have come together, and he tells them he has left a trust fund to their child. Jack holds Leora close as the sunlight streams into the little hospital room.

WILD IRISH

WHEN Molly, Officer O'Reilly's daughter, sees a gang of boys upset Izzie, the vegetable man s baskets, she helps to calm the excited little foreigner down and picks up his fruit for him. Then, because she doesn't want to delay her beloved dad s supper she races down the street and arms laden with packages flies into the arms of a man getting out of a long black limousine. Tony looks admiringly at the slender girl, and as his hands travel over her shoulders, Molly cries out and struggles to free herself. A forlorn looking fellow, passing, hits Tony, and Molly, looks back over her shoulder to see the boy who helped her outstretched on the ground. Quickly she kneels on the ground and sees a lump on his head whcre a blaekjack had hit him. She is bandageding his head when her father's big steps sound down the street, and when Molly explains briefly what happened, Officer O'Reilly insists on bringing the lad in to dinner. Molly, preparing her father's favorite Sunny-side-ups is so excited, that she drops a dozen eggs and they all laugh as they enjoy the scrambled eggs.

Learning that the lad is out of a job, Officer O'Reilly himself finds an opening for a hard working fellow and Jack becomes a frequent visitor at the O'Reilly home. When her father comes home all worn out, Molly learns that he is trying single-handed to break up a gang of racketeers who have recently invaded his territory. Molly warns him to watch out, but he chucks her under the chin and tells her he's not afraid.

The following night Officer O'Reilly stops in at Jack's place for a moment to ask for congratulations since it is his birthday, and Jack, who has been invited to the surprise party to be given to him, smiles. A moment later, an automobile backfires and Jack rushes to the door to see Officer O'Reilly slump down to die in Jack's arms. A revolver has been thrown beside the dead man. The street is deserted and when Jack is found trying to revive the dead man he is arrested for murder. Molly's doorbell rings and when another policeman gives her her father's eap and night stick, she sinks to a chair while the crowd of merry-makers, not suspecting, rush out to "surprise" Officer O'Reilly. At the trial Molly refuses to believe Jack guilty, and when he is sentenced to the chair, she clings to him and weeps, feeling if she had enough money she could win a retrial for Jack. Therefore, when a night club owner offers the bereaved girl a job, she accepts. The first night, Tony, the man into whose arms she had run, sees and admires her. He offers her anything she wants if she will come to him, but it is not until every attempt to help Jack has failed and he is to be led to the electric chair, that Molly accepts Tony's offer, hoping thereby to get enough money to help her get a personal hearing with the Governor at the State eapitol. She is admitted to Tony's house and as she waits for him desperately, she overhears one of his friends telling him he's crazy to play around with Officer O'Reilly's girl the night before Jack goes to the chair. Suddenly it all clears up for Molly. Tony's limousine in the neighborhood, the gang her father was trying to break up, and she races madly to the street, phones headquarters, and begs them to hold up Jack's execution. On Molly's lead, the police trap Tony, and Jack is freed after his march to the chair has begun. Dazed by his unexpected release he enters the warden's office and as Molly flies into his arms, he understands the power of love.

SONG OF THE MACHINE

Sigvald Jonathan File No. 9389

AS Dave Clark and Vic Jacobs come out of the football locker room, they proceed to the former's dormitory, engaged in a heated discussion of social problems. Vic has been offered a position as instructor of Social Scicnce and Dave has taken a position with Mills Incorporated. The two idealistically discuss their theorics of correeting current ills.

The ticker hums. Business prospers. Dave is advanced, but his demands that his superiors recognize human problems as well as concentrate on immediate production and distribution, fall on deaf ears. The machines slow down. The market crumbles. In the inner sanctum of Mills Incorporated the directors meet and worriedly discuss the market crash, the lessened demand for products. Dave is sent for to report upon production and is ordered to cut down labor. He remonstrates, but as the directors turn disinterestedly from his impassioned defense of his men who need jobs, Dave goes. The directors overlook his insubordination because they need him. Machines are at a standstill. At a civic meeting Dave addresses workers whose pinched faces reflect their wants. The next day the directors call him to account. Once too often he tries to stir them, and his resignation is requested. Slowly he returns to his apartment, and when Vic calls the two clasp hands warmly. Vic is here to prepare a paper upon economic conditions and Dave smiles ruefully as he reminds Vic about his theories. They have cost him his position now. Together the two men visit the Mill district. They see discharged workers listen with growing attention to radicals. At a social service station, Dave watches a pretty young girl manage the distribution of clothing to the needy. In Helen Warner, daughter of a prominent family, the pair find an interesting ally. Dave promises to send down some odd clothing.

The directors of Mills Incorporated huddle over a newspaper predicting labor agitation in the Mill district and they agree that what is needed is one of them to talk to the agitators. However none agrees to risk his own skin and at last they communicate with Dave Clark. Vic takes the message and when Dave returns and shaves painstakingly, Vic shrewdly guesses that something else is on his friend's mind. He is right. It is Helen. Dave gocs to the relief station and after several minutes of evasion asks if he may call for her after her service to-night. He proceeds to the Director's meeting, agrees at length to try to talk to the men, and returns for Helen. At a table in a night club, these two discuss conditions and when Helen learns Dave's plan, she is suddenly frightened for him. She proposes that he use strategy and disarm the erowd by speaking from a radical plank lest he be mobbed. With Vic wielding a board in a manner suggestive of football days, Dave cries above the radicals, gradually making the workman desist hurling stones and convincing them that things will take a turn for the bettcr.

Dave is re-instated at the Mills, puts through his own program, and soon the maehines begin to hum again. Educational talkies and recreation rooms are provided for the emancipated workers, and Vic is sent for to lecture to the new man. Outside, Helen is waiting in her car for Dave, and as they drive through the city and he tells her of the new regime, he asks her to be his wife. In the shadow of a giant skyscraper, they embrace.

THE UNDEFEATED

G. Freeman Naugle File No. 9362

THE first time Robert saw Sally Morrison, daughter of the owner of the mines in which he was working to pay his tuition at State college, was when he saved her from the upraised wrench of Mark Sogue, one of the malcontents whose strike had been frustrated by the loyalty of a small group. For a moment the air held a threat of labor rising against the symbol of capitalism, the lovely young girl who had dared to come among them, but Robert's prompt interference changed the tide of feeling and Mark fled with his colleague Jim to escape the wave of feeling against them.

Some time later, at college, Sally was cheering the amazing football playing of the team captain and at the victory dance, when they were introduced and Sally complimented him upon his game, he asked her to dance. Swaying to the rhythm of the orchestra, Sally told him she felt as if she had known him for a long time. He smiled ruefully and reminded her of the day at the mine. Sally, grown suddenly serious, asked him about conditions and for an hour Robert outlined his theories until, embarrassed he broke off. Thereafter, the pair were inseparable, but when Sally wrote home about Robert and told that he was the boy who had saved her life, her mother was scandalized at the thought of her daughter wasting herself upon a mine worker. Mr. Morrison laughed away his wife's misgivings, claiming that he gave the lad credit for working in the mines to put himself through college. Meanwhile, unrest was current among the colliers and in the preoccupation with grumbling workers, Sally's problems were forgotten.

For Homecoming day in Montrose, Sally and Robert returned together. The night before, held tightly in his arms, Sally had promised to win her parent's consent to their marriage, but in the cold light of day Sally was not so sanguine. She knew only too well her mother's innate snobbery, and even with her father on her side there might be insurmountable difficulties. As they approached the Morrison house, Sally cried out at the sight of Mark and Jim hurrying from a back window. Dashing in pursuit, Robert heard the warning locomotive whistle and realizing that the two miners would escape on the train before he could catch them, he cut across down the hill and leaped to the top of the train as it passed below. Hanging on, Robert edged his way across the box cars and as he heard the two below, he prepared to attack only to duck suddenly as the train entered a mile long tunnel. Then suffocated and exhausted, he felt the train slow down at a small station. Realizing hopelessly that the bandits would probably escape as soon as dusk descended, Robert uncoupled two of the empty freight cars so that the bandits within would not suspect they were not moving with the others, and racing for the sheriff, Robert ran back. The bandits, surprised, drew guns, but hurling himself upon them, he disarmed them and as the sheriff took them in custody, Robert discovered they had stolen Mrs. Morrison's family jewels. It was the recovery of those more than anything else that reconciled the dowager to her daughter's fiance, and with Robert's aid, Mr. Morrison for the first time restored friendly relations with his agitated miners.

LEADING LADY

Marie A. Betit File No. 9334

VIVACIOUS and talented, Ruth Mead ignores the conservative counsel of her older sister, Mary, whose childless marriage has left her dour in spirit; and when Mary forbids her to go out with Roger Williams, a man about whose past she knows nothing, Ruth leaves home and elopes with Roger. Having severed all relations with her sister, Ruth soon discovers that her husband is a gangster and the night her baby is born, Roger's body is found after he has been taken for a ride by his gang. Broken in spirit by her husband's cruelty, Ruth refuses to see the body and when she finds herself destitute, she decides to leave her baby on her sister's doorstep, knowing that Mary will be grateful for the child.

In the succeeding years, Ruth's talent as a singer wins her a position on the variety stage and she returns to claim her child only to find the former home occupied by new tenants and no clue to her sister's whereabouts. The detectives she hires fail to locate the family. Sometime later when she is playing in Philadelphia, Ruth faints in recognition of her sister and her child, June, in a theater box, and the manager hastily sends other players to fill Ruth's place for that performance. As she rcsts against the wings, Ruth decides to kidnap her child but that night when she approaches the house with two confederates she sees through the window that June is very happy as she sings for a guest of her foster-father's who vigorously applauds the girl's talent and urges that June's voice bc cultivated. Realizing that her own theatrical life ean afford her daughter no such happiness, Ruth leaves with her two helpers, sacrificing her own longing for her daughter's well-being.

Some years later, retired from the staff and married to a retired lawyer, Jack Milton, Ruth is troubled only by the thought of her daughter. Jack's son, Paul, who adores Ruth falls in love with June in whom he sees a counterpart of his stepmother. He shakes his father's hand vigorously as he asks for congratulations over finding another woman like Ruth, but when he mentions June's name Ruth faints. She has never told her husband about her former marriage, and pleading illness, she does not attend the wedding fearing lest her sister recognize her. Her coolness toward Paul's bride astonishes her husband but he ascribes it to ill-health. At the same time Ruth is being harrassed by black-mail notes and at length she agrees to deliver the sum demanded. The man, one of Roger's friends, believing she is completely at his mercy tries to attack her and Ruth shoots him with his own gun. At home, fearing she has killed him, Ruth is about to shoot herself when her husband breaks in upon her, takes her in his arms and asks her why she didn't confide in him. She had dropped the ransom note and Jack had found the man shot, called the police, and had him locked up for the several charges for which he was wanted. The excitement prostrates Ruth, but when she recovers she finds her sister and her child smiling down upon her and she finds they have forgiven her, knowing all. In her husband's arms she finds peace with her daughter near.

SINGED WINGS

Mary Louise Rodgers File No. 9301

ON the train taking her back home from a visit in the West, Ella is conscious of the admiring glances of a fellow passenger, but it is not until the night when she stops over in a little wayside station to make connections that she meets Selby. It happens when the flimsy hotel catches fire and Ella panic stricken as she realizes the flames are cutting off all escape, is rescued by Selby. Her gratitude to her rescuer is touching, and when she invites him to visit her in Virginia any time he happens to be near, he holds her hand for a long moment as he thanks her.

At home her mother is aghast to learn about Ella's terrifying experience, but when a few days later Selby arrives, begging forgiveness for having so soon taken advantage of Ella's invitation, Mrs. Jordan, at first warm in her reception of him, begins to distrust him as he storms Ella's heart. Before Selby leaves he begs Ella to marry him, and when her mother voices her own misgivings in pointing out that Ella knows nothing about this young man save that he helped her, Ella tries to summon reason to the case. But when Selby tells her he eannot remain longer, and asks her to choose between his love and her mother, Ella, hesitates until her mother's distrust of Selby and her statement that if Ella marries him she will be disowned, sends the girl into the arms of the man she loves.

At first gloriously happy in the luxurious apartment her romantic young husband provides, Ella begins to wonder about his source of income. Then Selby gives her a diamond bracelet and the description of the jewels with an account of their robbery in the newspapers reveals to Ella that her husband is a thief. Disillusioned she packs her things, but Selby draws her into his arms and raining kisses on her pale lips promises to give up crime if she will remain. Selby's love making is torture to the girl, and some weeks later when he slips into the house and hurriedly divests himself of a bloodstained coat, shc shrinks from his embrace. A manhunt begins in the city for the burglar who killed a noted public benefactor, and Selby's wild eyes betray him to his wife. He is escaping when he is captured by the police after a bitter struggle, and subsequently sentenced to life imprisonment.

Ella accompanied by her faithful colored maid buys an old estate in the south and changes her name to Winsloe. One night a neighbor, Mrs. Billings becomes ill and Ella offers her help. A strong friendship springs up between the two women, and Mrs. Billings fondly hopes for a match between her son Edward, an artist studying abroad and Mrs. Winsloe whom she assumes is a widow. And when Edward does arrive he fails to direct his horse and takes a spill as he passes her in her garden. They both laugh and their romance soon grows beyond their direction. When Edward kisses Ella for the first time, she withdraws from his arms and tells him he must never do that again and that she cannot marry him.

Then Selby breaks jail and tracing Ella tells her how he has hungered for her. She manages to put him off with a bribe but that night he returns and kisses her madly. Edward finding Ella struggling interferes but Selby shouts that Ella is his wife. A knocking at the door reveals the police have trailed Selby and as he jumps from the window he is shot dead by the officer of the law. Tenderly Edward takes Ella from the scene and in his arms she finds peace.

STUDENT KILLER

R. R. Shorney File No. 9309

AS the policeman dropped to the ground, Gunman Clayburn pocketed his pistol and fled down the rear alley. With a jerky nod to a sinister figure at the door he passed into the basement of a shabby house. As he passed the gang assembled in the front room he motioned Spike and Hench, trusted followers, into his office. Matter of factly he told them of his thirtieth killing and placing them in charge of the gang's rum-racketeering, he told them that he was going out of town and lay low for a while. Clayburn selected as his place of retreat a small college town in the East, where he was certain police would never think of searching. Moreover for the six months in which he had to stay out of Chicago he determined to play the role of the ordinary college man of twenty-two whom he resembled despite his notorious record.

While eating in the College restaurant he looked up into the sparkling eyes of a lovely co-ed seated opposite him. Very soon Roy Clay, as he called himself, knew that Dottie was an art student and was using the little money her mother had left her to put her through school. To enlist her sympathy Roy told her that he had been brought up in a Boy's Home and was working his way through school. They met again at school functions and a friendship which speedily developed into love began. He worshipped Dottie's charm and wholesomeness but she answered these compliments telling him that he wasn't so bad either, even though she did make him bashful and shy. And Dottie puzzled over the ferocity of his reply as he almost apologized that it had to be he that she loved. Then without any explanation their idyllic love affair terminated with Roy's sudden disappearance. Using her last resources she broadcasted a plea to Roy to get in touch with her no matter what had happened.

With his collar pulled up about his face, his hat over his eye Roy slouched through the streets which were deserted except for occasional clusters of people listening outside radio stores to the wild broadcast of a championship fight. Stopping for a moment with one of these crowds he heard the announcer, as the bouts were halted during the rounds, read Dottie's plea for an absent Roy. As the crowd laughed at the unexpected announcement, Roy groaned, slouched deeper into his coat and walked away. Chicago police would have been stunned to see this man they so anxiously sought. So intent on his own thoughts was he that he did not even see the approaching car as he crossed the street. A screech of brakes, a blaring shout, and Roy lay under the wheels of the car. Detective Snyder and his shadow, the reporter Wells, walking by, saw the suddenly gathered crowd. As they pushed their way through, the police-officer recognized Gunman Clayburn. They rushed him to the hospital and on the way promised to give a crumpled note that he took from his pocket to Dottie whose address he gave. Dottie's comment when she read it, that he was always sorry it had to be he though she couldn't understand why brought an explanation from Snyder who realized that she was no gunman's accomplice. As she fell upon the sofa weeping she understood Roy's reluctance to admit his love. However she had to give the dying man the last few moments of comfort and with the detective and reporter she raced to the hospital. Tremblingly she fell upon her knees by the bedside and as the hardened Snyder and Wells outside the door wondered that the man who had killed so many men should have lost his heart to a girl, Dottie tearfully planted a kiss upon the lips of the dying Roy.

THE DISCONTENTED WIFE

Ernest E. Hatin File No. 9342

IN the unhappy bickerings of his own mother and father, Stan had seen enough to make him think twice about asking a girl to marry him, but when he met Julie everything else seemed to be forgotten. Lonely and working hard at the mill, Stan found happiness in just being with Julie and spurred on by his eagerness to make her proud of him, he spent all his spare time learning how to repair cars in the local garage, asking no payment for his work. When he attained proficiency and the garage owner, Wally, gave Stan a position, it was to Julie that Stan ran with his good fortune. And a few weeks later, Stan and Julie were married. They were supremely happy until Stan was offered a partnership by Wally and under the stimulus of Stan's ideas the garage grew and coined money for them. From then on Julie was insatiable in her demands. Stan wanted to invest the money, but Julie sulked until he agreed to take a larger apartmest and a maid to help her entertain her friends. It was those friends who kept Julie out nights and made her cry for more money for clothes and entertainment while Stan worked late. Stan remonstrated and once Julie went away for a few days in a fit of anger. Loving her, Stan took her back without questioning her statement that she had been with one of her school friends, but when she discovered she was going to have a baby she blamed Stan because now she would be tied down. For months she was testy and ill-tempered, resisting all Stan's enthusiastic plans, and when the baby was born, Julie complained because she had wanted a boy and gotten a girl. A hired nurse cared for the child, and Julie resented Stan's fondling the child, claiming he never gave her any attention when the baby was around. Goaded, Stan reminded her that he never saw anything of her these days, she was always busy with a party or dance. On the baby's third birthday, Stan planned a little party just for the three, but when he arrived home laden with refreshments and a cake with candles, Julie explained that Sally was having a bridge and she had accepted for them. Stan put down the delicacies he was holding and looking deeply into Julie's eyes told her that if she left tonight for another one of her parties, they were through. For a moment Julie hesitated, but she had to see Will Berkley again, and so she went. Stan stared at the slammed door for minutes, then he had his party with little Beth. When dawn came up and Julie had not yet returned, Stan had the nurse pack Beth's clothes, sold his share in the garage to his partner, and leaving an allowance to be paid monthly to Julie by the bank, went to Chicago with the child. There he opened a garage and began work on a new car part which he sold to a Detroit Automobile concern. A telegram informed him that Beth was sick at home, and chartering a plane he found the doctor advising that the child's mother be sent for. Julie wept as she saw the little figure lying on the bed and Stan's heart ached as he saw how she had suffered. Later, when he took his wife and child home, Julie told how she had eloped for one mad night with Will and returning had found everything closed to her. There at Beth's bedside, with the child smiling at them, they forgave each other.

SERIAL NUMBER

M. Alberts File No. 9337

A FEW days after Corbrim Dayton arrived in the small town of Barkton he stopped in the corner cafe and noticing that one of the waitresses was eating alone in a corner he joined her and asked if he might eat with her. When he finished, a man standing a few feet from the entrance blocked his path and ordered him to stay away from that girl. Corbrim went home.

A few days later, in a poolroom, a big fellow claimed that Corbrim had brushed against him on purpose and when Corbrim laughed at his reminder to stay away from Miss Farrel, the waitress, and said, "You too?" the big fellow began to choke Corbrim. A swift uppercut left him outstretched on the floor, and as Corbrim brushed his hands and walked out his friend excitedly informed him that the man was Heidringer, who owned the poolroom. Unconcerned Corbrim proceeded to the cafe where, while having supper at Miss Farrel's table, he learned from her that the Farmer's State Bank had been robbed. Outside Corbrim saw the man who had spoken to him first and Miss Farrel told him that Beene was owner of the cafe. She had gone out with him a few times but he had gotten drunk and since then she had refused all his invitations.

On his way home that night Corbrim was attacked and beaten by Deene and Heidringer in a dark alley and ordered to leave town. That same night Corbrim Dayton disappeared.

Two weeks later a stranger came to town, spent a few minutes in conversation with the pretty waitress, Miss Farrel, and later had a conference with the sheriff. A few minutes later Heidringer's poolroom was raided and the stranger asked the sheriff to hold Heidringer until his return. He then proceeded to the cafe and found Miss Farrel struggling in the embrace of Louis Beene. The stranger's automatic halted Beene's rush upon the intruder and producing an arrest warrant, the stranger led the cursing cafe owner to the sheriff's office. Miss Farrel accepted the invitation to come along and testify against her attacker.

It was the sheriff who informed the sullen pair that the stranger had evidence to convict them of bootlegging, and the stranger smiling at the discomfiture of the pair removed several ingenious disguises, the while explaining that he was Corbrim Dayton. Miss Farrel it developed was Mrs. Dayton, and as Corbrim chatted easily he demanded the wallets of the fidgeting pair for examination. Dayton took some bills out of each wallet and handed them over together with a slip of paper containing serial numbers to the sheriff who noted the resemblance. Dayton explained when the bank was held up the cashier slipped a few bills from the top as he handed them over. Mrs. Dayton, checking up the bills Beene had left in the cafe for change checked up on the consecutive numbers. The sheriff congratulated Dayton upon his wife, and Dayton chuckled happily. Weakly Heidringer asked, "Who the ---- are you two?" and they answered they were special investigators sent by the government to look into the crime in the small town. With a wave to the two handcuffed prisoners, Dayton exited with the woman they had both admired.

RED MAN'S PREY

Mrs. Augustine Frederick File No. 9375

EVER since Anne Bauer could remember she had hated and distrusted the Indians who occasionally came to buy provisions in the little town of Manson, Texas. Her father had come to Texas in the late 1850's with a small band of German immigrants, and had started a farm several miles from town. Anne's hatred was shared by all the colonists, and when, in 1864, a young school teacher from the East, Glenn Mitchell, came to Manson with plans for teaching the Indian children, and helping to civilize them, the settlers merely laughed at his efforts.

Despite her inherent dislike for the red man, Anne was moved to help Glenn Mitchell in every way that she could. Patiently, she listened to his ideas, without revealing that she thought his efforts futile. The afternoon that Glenn's school was opened, Anne came to town, and helped him explain to the few Indians that were interested enough to come, the purpose of his school. Toward nightfall, she started walking to her home, leaving Glenn still struggling with his pupils.

About four miles from town, the quiet of the evening was shattered for Anne, by the clatter of hoofs, and riding directly toward her she saw a band of savages. There was no chance for escape, and in a moment the horsemen surrounded her, tied her to the saddle of their leader, and were off across the plains. For seven long days, they rode thus, stopping only at night to make camp, and to torture Anne mercilessly. On the eighth day, the party finally alighted at an Indian village, and Anne realized that her last opportunity to flee had been lost, when she saw, stretching to the horizon, endless, barren plains.

For nine months, Anne was held captive by the tribe, and was made to dress in Indian garb and paint her face with their crude paints. She was treated as a servant by the squaws of the tribe, and was forced to carry wood and water, drive and care for the mules, and tend the papooses. During this time, she was subjected to continual beatings and inhuman treatment by her captors, and the children made her the victim of their cruel pranks. If Anne had felt hatred before for the red man, it was mild compared to the loathing that now possessed her every thought.

One spring evening, while she was minding the children, she noticed a lone rider coming toward the village. The Indians were busy with supper, and did not notice Anne's joy when she discovered the rider was Glenn Mitchell. Cautioning her to show no sign of recognition, Glenn made his way to the village chief, and casually mentioned that he heard the chief had a white girl in his tribe. Wary of the white man, the chief at first denied this, but when Glenn began to bargain in terms of money for the purchase of the girl, the old Indian agreed to sell her for twenty-five dollars. Beckoning Anne, who was struggling to conceal her happiness, Glenn placed Anne on his horse, and a few hours later, the two reached a trading post. There it was that Anne first learned of Glenn's long search for her, his inquiries at every Indian village in the state, and his subsequent discovery of her whereabouts. From the post, they journeyed back to Manson, and a month later, as man and wife, they travelled eastward, hoping to forget their sufferings at the hands of the savages.

SILENT LOVE

Patrick J. Craig File No. 9399

RETURNING from the suburban home of his dear friends, the Stuart Hastings, Judge Lawrence, the youngest magistrate in the city, found himself unable to forget little Stuart, Jr. On his way to court the next morning, he decided that the Hastings led very beautiful, peaceful lives, and if he could, he would find someone who would help him follow the same path to happiness.

One week later, the seven-year old son of the Hastings was struck down by a woman driver, and the case, strangely enough came before Judge Lawrence. Annette Drake, the offender pleaded not guilty, and the Judge was determined to make her case an example to other reckless drivers. But when Miss Drake, young and very lovely, came to court, Kevan Lawrence was strangely moved by her beauty, and realized, that of all the women in the world, Annette Drake was the one girl he could love.

Sensing with a woman's intuition the Judge's weakness, Annette made every possible effort to win his affections so that he would recommend clemency to the jury. More and more was the young judge drawn toward her, and the evening before the case ended, he was preparing his instructions to the jury. His heart told him to urge the jury to be lenient, but the vision of crippled Stuart rose before him, hardening his feelings toward Annette. The next morning in court, Annette was dumbstruck when she heard Kevan hint to the jury not to be swayed by the beauty of the defendant, but to render a verdict that was just, and fitting the offence. The jury returned a year's sentence in prison for Annette, and she left the court, darting a look of venomous hatred toward Kevan.

As Annette's term ran its course, Kevan knowing his hopeless love for her, swamped himself in work, and his court became famous for its fair trials. But the success of his labor did not appease Kevan, and he could never forget that Annette hated him immeasurably.

At the end of the year, Kevan, worn out by overwork, booked passage for Europe. The day Annette was released, he went to her home, hoping to learn her plans, but she refused to see or speak to him. Heartbroken, he left for Europe, staying in his cabin all during the voyage. Yet, despite the fact that he had ruined his chance for happiness with Annette, Kevan was still convinced that he had acted fairly.

In London, learning that Annette was staying at a nearby hotel, he again tried to visit her, but his phone calls went unanswered, and his letters were returned. Feeling that she must still despise him, and realizing that he would never be able to tell her of his love, Kevan planned to sail for home, where he hoped he could forget Annette. Annette bought a ticket for the same boat, and the night of the sailing, they left their hotels in taxis. Kevan's driver, bewildered by the fog, crashed into Annette's cab, and Kevan, rushing out to see if the occupant was injured, found Annette huddled up in a corner of the seat. He expected her to turn on him in fury, but at the sight of the man, whom she had grown to love during her prison term, all of her defenses that she had built up so carefully, crumbled. Then it was that Kevan learnt of Annette's love for him, and her avoidance of him because she felt he must hate her. The two, overjoyed, continued their way together, and Kevan at last, found his much-dreamt-of happiness.

THE TURN OF THE LANE

Mrs. Ada Crow File No. 9341

PITY for Earl who threw himself at her feet and buried his face in her lap when she informed him she did not love him made Myrtle consent, finally, to marry him. Often she winced under his caresses but always she reminded herself that she had pledged loyalty to the man who was her husband. It was Dr. Richards, their neighbor, who gravely informed Myrtle that he felt it his duty to tell her her husband was a very sick man, and Myrtle was filled with a great fear for her unborn child. When she accused Earl dully of having kept his knowledge from her, he admitted it was true, but he loved her too much to risk losing her. Wildly he begged her to remain on and care for him, and Myrtle, to whom life had lost its meaning, consented. As she worked in the vegetable garden, near Dr. Richard's fence, she could feel his eyes upon her, expressive with sympathy. Often he spoke to her and Earl looking on suspiciously from the house accused his wife of loving another man. Earl now took a peculiar delight in tormenting Myrtle and one night, some time after the sickly baby was born, he struck her. In fear of his ugly temper, Myrtle ran from the house and as she stumbled along the road, the lights of Dr. Richard's car picked her out. Gently he drew her into his car and as she sobbed, he drew her into the comfort of his arms.

When Earl again lost his temper and mentioned the doctor, Myrtle denied nothing, and when he shook her and asked her why she didn't refute it, she said softly, "It's true. I'm going away, Earl." Like a madman Earl begged her then not to leave him. Wildly he begged her to help him, that he couldn't live without her, and at length he held out to her the hope that in the city, away from a love that must never be, she would find solace with her husband. For the sake of her child, then, Myrtle sold the little home and after a simple farewell to the Doctor who saw it was useless to plead their love, she left. Myrtle found a position soon, but Earl claimed always he was too late to get a job. He began drinking now, and Myrtle could do nothing when sullenly he reminded her of her misconduct, of how good he was to her to forgive her. The baby, always sickly, became worse, and when Myrtle opened her little bank to get money for a doctor, she found that Earl had squandered it all. For hours she waited for his return, hoping there was something left, and when Earl came in there was a hunted look in his eyes. Not until the police came and arrested Earl for having killed a woman in a hotel room, did Myrtle realize how low her husband had sunk.

The newspaper report of the trial brought Dr. Richards to Myrtle's aid, and as he asked her why she hadn't sent for him, he saw how weak she was and how the baby was suffering. Through his patient ministrations, both were reclaimed to health and a year later, after Earl had paid the supreme penalty to the State, Myrtle was joined in marriage to the man who had always loved her.

THE MAN ON THE HILL

Emma N. Bassett File No. 9360

FOR two weeks, Dr. Alan Semple had shared his small cottage among the hills of Arizona with two people: Vera Crosby, and Sam Manson. The doctor's nearest neighbors, the Waltons, politely called them guests, but Vera, a former circus daredevil who had a shattered spine, and Sam, once a well-known vaudeville headliner, but now seriously ill with an incurable disease, felt that their stay with the doctor would not be very long.

Since the vicinity was practically uninhabited, Dr. Semple devoted all his skill to his guests, subjecting them to severe discipline and diet, in the hope that perhaps he could make their pain a little easier. Drawn together by the common bond of suffering, Vera and Sam attempted to cheer each other. But the monotony of their existence, coupled with a secret belief in the hopelessness of the doctor's efforts, threw a dark shadow on their meagre share of happiness. Their only comfort was in being together.

Another week passed, and Vera and Sam were desperately bored with the sameness of their lives. They sat in silence one evening on the porch of Dr. Semple's cottage; Vera, dreaming of the glamour and excitement of circus life; Sam, vividly recalling the intoxicating applause of many audiences. The shrill ring of the doctor's phone broke through their thoughts. A telephone call was so rare an occurrence, that the doctor knew something unusual must have happened. He answered the phone, and heard the troubled voice of Walton explain that his wife was very ill, and could the doctor come at once? Only for a moment did Dr. Semple hesitate. To leave the invalids without proper care was not wise. But Walton's hysterical tone convinced him that his duty lay toward Mrs. Walton. With a parting admonition to his patients to follow his usual instructions, the doctor hurried out to his car. Vera and Sam, left alone, were excited by this unexpected break in their routine. Fired with a strange eagerness for one more taste of their old life, they held a party.

Until dawning, the small cottage rang with the noise of their efforts. Sam danced for Vera, his breath coming in choking gasps; Vera clapped her hands in accompaniment, singing hoarsely all the while. In the midst of their pitiful attempts, a stranger entered the room, and begged them to go with him to an old man, suffering from exposure, who was lying on the crest of a nearby hill. Although utterly exhausted, the two gladly followed the stranger, as if drawn by some invisible force. Eagerly they pressed up the steep, white road to the summit, half-hidden by clouds.

As the first morning light spread over the hills, the doctor, driving back from his night-long vigil, fancied he saw three shadows outlined against the sky. The vision faded, and he drove wearily up to the cottage. There, on the porch, in chairs drawn close together, were Vera and Sam, their faces turned toward the hill, over which their souls had passed.

SHE STOOPS TO CONQUER

Mrs. Edings W. Wilson File No. 9258

PACING up and down the porch Kenneth Long raged at his wife Janet who meekly watched him from the hammock. That mouse-like, faded Janet should want to take the place of the striking Miss Vernon, his secretary who was leaving to be married! Why, the idea was ludicrous. When he pompously informed his still silent wife that she had her job cut out for her in her home and that was her place even though her son had gone away to college, she jumped up and in an unusual burst of courage blazed that she knew Kenneth's weakness for blondes and that it was only because he wanted another Miss Vernon about the office all day that he wouldn't have her. Well, she was through being his housekeeper and if he didn't want her at the office he wouldn't have her at home either. And with that she flounced out of the house. Though this was not what he had expected Kenneth exulted in his new freedom, away from a drab Janet.

Janet meanwhile had plans of her own. Kenneth, opening the stack of letters which had come in response to his advertisement for a secretary, came upon one written on blue stationery, the scent of which was quite heady. The writer, a Miss June Le Noir begged the privilege of a personal interview, stating that she had lost her previous position when the partners dissolved their business. That same evening, in the dining-room of the local hotel he saw a dazzling blonde and assuming a nonchalant air, he ascertained from the head-waiter that she was a Miss June Le Noir, a newcomer to the city. Hastening back to his office he wrote arranging an interview and when the sophisticated Miss Le Noir made her entrance he speedily hired her. How was he to know that plain Janet had made the rounds of the fashionable shops, told a flashy manicurist to stain her nails a ruby pink, and then purchased a wig of blonde hair combed in the most approved modern manner? Or that, knowing where he was likely to dine, she had purposely planted herself in his direct line of vision?

June, as her employer was soon calling her, was as efficient as she was attractive and Kenneth soon was proposing that she marry him as soon as he could secure a divorce from his wife. Upon her consent he wrote a curt note arranging a meeting at the South Battery. After the perfectly groomed June, Janet in her long shapeless garments and with only powder obviously rubbed into her face, was particularly uninspiring. Kenneth impatiently demanded that she give him his absolute freedom since they had outgrown each other. Telling him that she had never refused anything to him, she promised to divorce him. Moreover she returned her engagement ring to him and laughingly told him to give it to her successor. Several hours later the woman Kenneth knew as June closed her eyes at his request and at the given signal opened them to find Janet's ring upon her finger. Innocently June asked all about his first wife. Kenneth winced as she remarked that since her initials were those of his first wife's whose full name had been Janet Lee North the engraving of the ring must have pained him. Murmuring some disparaging criticism of Janet he quickly turned the conversation. As she kissed him good-night she told him that on the next evening he would meet her mother who was anxious to know her future son-in-law.

As he turned to greet June's mother when she entered the room the next evening he encountered the smiling gaze of the mother-in-law he had known for twenty years. Turning to June to demand an explanation he saw her calmly removing a wig from her head and as Janet's brown hair became uncovered he realized that June and Janet were the same. And as he enfolded her in his embrace he promised that from henceforth on Janet could be June as much as she wished for he would no longer force her to be just Janet.

THE TELALL

Robert O. Blake File No. 9291

A CONFERENCE in one of the gangster headquarters of a modern metropolis reveals considerable agitation over the activities of a Mystery Man who has been frustrating various illicit plots. By some unaccountable means, pictures have been obtained of racketeers in the very act of extorting hush money from city officials, and robbing stores. A system of counter-blackmail has been working and despite all the secret plans made to catch the Mystery Man he seems able to anticipate all underworld moves. Harry Carlotta, gang leader, is contemptuous of the fears of his confederates and proposes a plan to bribe the District Attorney whose investigations have been growing too hot for comfort.

As the District Attorney leaves his office for lunch he is handed a note by a boy. It warns him of a plan to bribe him and advises him to have protection at his house. Sure enough the plans are executed and the gangster who had produced a gun and threatened to shoot unless the D.A. signed a paper promising to drop charges (the paper to be used for blackmail purposes) is arrested and his confederates locked up with him.

Meanwhile, Peggy Morland, angered by the assurance of Ben that his brother, Jack, whom Peggy loves, is still busy in his electrical shop, and has left orders not to be disturbed, accepts an invitation to go dancing with Harry Carlotta, whom she has met while reporting for a city newspaper. As she enters a night club, she is startled at finding a white-faced Jack waiting for her, and when he begs her to come home with him, she refuses and asks how he knew she was coming here, nobody else heard her make the arrangement. Jack flushes and Harry looks at him in a sinister fashion, ordering him to go. The result is that Jack knocks Harry out as he is forcing kisses upon the frightened Peggy, and Peggy weeps as Jack drives her home, assuring her of his love. When she persists in questioning him about what has been occupying his time, he tells her it is a secret, but should anything happen to him he has left a note for her and his brother Ben which will explain everything. Peggy is frightened, but Jack reassures her. However, Harry bent on revenge, suspects that Jack may be the Mystery Man and has him kidnapped as he is entering his house. Bound and gagged, Jack is carried to a lonely shack, and tortured in a futile attempt to extract from him his secret.

Peggy worried over Jack's failure to call her, communicates with Ben, and thoroughly worried, the pair open their letters, find directions to a secret room back of the electrical shop, and there find Jack's Telall, an instrument which flashes on a screen scenes covering the entire city. There are lenses which can be focused on any given spot, and an attachment to report sound. Excitedly, Ben and Peggy direct the instrument to search for Jack and at length locate him. With infinite caution they proceed to the lonely shack and together lift the unconscious body of Jack from the torture chamber. They drive him to a hospital, and before he is able to walk he secretly sends for those officials who can be trusted and proposes to the startled leaders a plan to run all the knaves out of office. Pictures of all manner of crimes are published until so many have been prosecuted that the others flee town. For once the city is rid of graft, taxes are thereby reduced, prosperity sets in, and Jack, leading Peggy to the altar, destroys his one Telall, saying that it is too hazardous an instrument to have around, but explaining that if the city, which is now honoring him, ever requires another, he will create one.

FLAMES OF FAITH

Bertha Cook File No. 9256

AS they stood huddled together watching the leaping tongues of flame rage through the Baton Rouge hotel where they had been making their stay, Mr. and Mrs. Nelson noticed one of the chambermaids vainly trying to quell the tears of a weeping two year old boy. The frightened girl readily yielded the child to Mrs. Nelson and told her that the child's mother had been one of those trapped in the burning building. The Nelsons were on their way to their new home in west Texas and as soon as the legal formalities could be completed, they resumed their journey with their newly adopted son. The previously childless Mrs. Nelson treasured the little night-shirt with the embroidered "W" on its pocket which the little Win had worn the night of the fire. Though they were adoring parents they did not wish to conceal the truth from him and on his sixteenth birthday revealed to him that he was an adopted son. If Mrs. Nelson had feared that Win's affection for them would lessen, she was quickly reassured for Win now felt gratitude in addition to the love he had always felt for his foster parents. Moreover he was deeply appreciative of their reason for telling him, that he might avoid any trouble which someday might arise. Meanwhile he continued his pleasant adolescent existence, happy in the companionship of Rosemary Ross and Sidney Owen. The three shared their every thought and activity immune to their family's many witticisms about what would happen when they grew up.

When it became necessary for the boys to choose their prospective fields of life work, Sidney decided upon a medical career and his attendance at medical school out of town left Rosemary and Win who had cast in his lot with his father's business, alone. Rosemary knew that both boys were in love with her and confessed to her mother her confusion since she thought herself in love with both boys at the same time. At a dance to celebrate Sidney's homecoming Win drew Rosemary through the open garden door and as he laughingly protested that he wanted to beat Sidney to it, asked her to marry him. Swayed by the glamor of the garden in the moonlight and the fervency of his plea Rosemary consented, sure that Win was the one she loved. But when she accepted a stunned Sidney's congratulations later in the evening and lightly assured him that they were still friends, she was not quite so certain. However in the excitement of preparing to be a June bride she forgot her first doubts. Then one evening the Rosses were at the Nelson's home, happily basking in the young folks' happiness. Rosemary in another corner of the room was teasingly demanding that Win make all his confessions of his former life. Mrs. Ross looked up as she heard Win's suddenly sober tone. Startled, she heard him tell a laughing Rosemary who was amused at her future husband's most serious confession, that he was only a foster son of the Nelsons. As she strove to conceal her overwraught state, she recalled in an almost blinding flash the frequent comments people had made of the resemblance between Win and Rosemary. When Win and Rosemary joined them and repeated the story Mrs. Ross asked Mrs. Nelson if she had any idea of Win's real identity and Mrs. Nelson sent the maid for the shirt Win had worn so many years ago. Both the Rosses gasped as they beheld the tiny garment in the maid's hand and since Mrs. Ross collapsed in tears Mr. Ross explained that Win was undoubtedly Rosemary's brother. At Rosemary's birth Mrs. Ross had become very weakened and had sent their young son, in the care of a trusted nurse, to her sister's home in Louisiana. For all these years they had believed that he and the nurse had perished together in that disastrous hotel fire. The joy in the reunion was somewhat dulled by the thought of the tragic marriage that had unwittingly been planned. But Win, attempting to lighten the situation by jocularity, wrapped Rosemary in his arms as he told her that now the field was clear for Sid and if he had lost a wife he had also found a sister and as Rosemary rejoined that a wife was much easier to find they went to call Sid.

THE MARRIAGE CIRCLE

Rachel Franklin File No. 9269

ABOVE his partner's shoulder Walter Keene saw the girl whose picture he had found while helping Ernest get the studio ready for that evening's party. She was dancing with Ernest Gray and as soon as he could evade the entwining presence of the little blonde girl with whom he had been, he dashingly cut in on the pair. As the drunken hilarity of the evening progressed Corinne Gordon listened more and more eagerly to the suave Walter's words of suddenly flamed love. Soon the two of them were in his car driving along at a breakneck speed to a Justice of the Peace that Walter knew somewhere in Jersey. Corinne's mind was still befogged at the unexpected turn the evening's entertainment had taken and she failed to notice that the necessary preliminaries to the marriage ceremony were miraculously eliminated. All Corinne had known about him was that he was exceedingly handsome and that the little nothings he whispered sent a surge of love through her entire being. But after the first hectic weeks when, in a moment of brutal frankness, he told her that they would have to stay with her parents because he could not afford a home and when he continued to lie lazily abed of mornings neglectful of his job, she realized with a sudden flash of insight that that was very little upon which to base a happy married life. Corinne became a nagging wife in her efforts to rouse him to his responsibilities and in her steadfast refusals to go to theatres and gay night clubs each night. When he finally told her she was "too quiet" and left Corinne heard nothing from him until almost a year later when she tremblingly ripped open a letter she had just received in which she read uncomprehendingly that she was not really his wife and that she had better forget him. She paid a visit to Ernest Gray at whose fatal party she and Walter had met and from him secured Walter's home address in Denver. Walter was astounded when he answered the doorbell to Corinne's ring and almost refused her admittance. Though his mother knew her son's evil nature she was stunned to be confronted with a woman claiming to be his wife on the eve of his marriage to one of the city's prominent debutantes. Yet she could do nothing against this son who taunted a weeping Corinne and insisted that she had known as well as he that their marriage had been a hoax. Unable to face her parents with this shameful confession Corinne went to an aunt in Chicago. When Walter, whose mother had spoiled his approaching marriage by telling the girl of Corinne, tracked her here he found her being squired about by Roy Pennington, wealthy broker and target of aspiring mothers' fond desires. Corinne, returning from a party one evening found a smug Walter taking his ease in her apartment. At Corinne's refusal to receive him as her husband he threatened to expose her to Roy. Telling him that he was through meddling in her life, she snatched a revolver from a table drawer and shot Walter.

Feeling that she had alienated Roy from her forever she told the jury how Walter had duped her and how she had followed him and begged him to marry her. As a sympathetic jury declared her Not Guilty Corinne fell weeping into her aunt's arms. Outside the court they were met by Roy who told Corinne confidently as they walked away that he loved her enough to forgive and forget all.

TO-MORROW'S WIFE

Mrs. Ted Nicolay File No. 9292

ABSORBED in the romantic tale she is reading under cover of her arithmetic book, Mary Lou does not realize her prim sharp-faced school teacher is standing over her until the story book is snatched from her and she is ordered to stay after school. A moment later, Joel makes a loud noise and he too is ordered to stay in. He flashes a triumphant grin at Mary Lou and the long hours in the quiet schoolhouse don't seem half so burdensome with Joel sitting near. Later, as he carries her books for her, Mary Lou stumbles, and Joel bandages her knee with his handkerchief. As she admires his skill he tells her someday he is going to be a great doctor, and she is going to be the doctor's wife. Blushing she leaves him at her gate but as she enters the door she sees a crowd of people and with a cry of terror discovers that her mother and father have both been killed when their car stalled on the railroad track. Dazed by her bereavement, Mary Lou huddles miserably in a corner while the townspeople, undecided what to do with her, agree at length that the best place for her is the orphanage.

Scrubbing hard floors and washing clothes, Mary Lou tries not to break down and when Beth, a rebellious older girl who has frequently escaped before, asks Mary Lou to join her in flight, Mary Lou refuses. However, when after slipping out to bid goodbye to Joel who is leaving for Medical school, Mary Lou is severely punished by the cruel mistress, she reconsiders her decision and in the dead of night she and Beth slip away from the grim walls.

Landing in New York, Beth immediately communicates with friends, but when Mary Lou learns that her friend isn't going to work to support herself and Mary Lou doesn't have to either, she shakes her head. Despite Beth's pronouncement that she is a fool not to enjoy the good things of life, Mary Lou searches with increasing desperation for work. But everywhere references are required and starving Mary Lou stops outside a restaurant. Suddenly her arm is grasped by a well-dressed Beth, who hugs her and seeing her friend's hunger invites Mary Lou to come up to her apartment for a bite. As she is eating, the door is crashed in by policemen, and Mary Lou seeing the hand of Charley, Beth's friend, go to his gun, stops him from murdering a policeman. The bullet catches her shoulder and in the excitement Charley and Beth escape. Mary Lou is brought before a judge as an accomplice of the gang, but she convinces the judge of her innocence and when he learns her story he offers to give her a chance working in his own house. From the first, however, she is treated more like a daughter than servant by the middle aged couple and when Charley gets the idea of kidnapping Mary Lou and holding her for ransom, the judge and his wife are as upset as if Mary Lou were their own daughter. However, the newspaper accounts of the story help Joel, who has graduated as a doctor and has vainly tried to trace his childhood sweetheart since her disappearance from the orphanage, to locate her. He offers his services when Mary Lou, dazed by ill-treatment at the hands of her kidnappers, is returned home. As he speaks to her gently, she starts up and with a cry of "Joel!" she throws herself into his arms, while the judge and his understanding wife discreetly leave the two who have so much to say to each other, alone together.

DEPENDABLE JOAN

Mabel Casto File No. 9270

JOAN rose from her books cheerfully as she greeted Jack and informed him that her room-mate whom he had come to see was as usual out dancing. Settling himself to wait Jack confided his love for Anita to Joan whom he had known for years and through whom he had been introduced to the blonde beauty, Anita. The honk of a horn was heard as he told Joan, somewhat unconvincingly, that he wanted Anita to have gay times and didn't mind her going with others since he couldn't afford to take her. Joan excused herself as Anita breezed into the room and glibly commenced telling of the lovely time she had had. When Jack proposed marriage to her, she wistfully pouted that she couldn't be expected to wait until he had made a career for himself though she did like him lots. After graduation from college Joan's studious efforts were rewarded and she accepted a post as a school-teacher in the university town. Jack found frequent encouragement when he visited her apartment and spoke of his aspirations as a singer. Joan smiled twistedly when he told her that she was the best pal a fellow ever had and in the next breath raved over Anita, who, from her home, wrote him occasional letters. He failed utterly to notice Joan's tear-filled eyes when he seized her and kissed her exuberantly the night she told him that she had hired an old piano upon which he could practice. Joan's dark beauty flashed upon him suddenly when he took her to the Kit Kat Club one evening but the vision of the vivid Anita came before him and extinguished the quiet beauty he had noted. Familiar with the proprietor, Joan introduced Jack as a potential singer and her suggestion that he sing for the guests was accepted with alacrity. Somewhat haltingly at first but gaining confidence from Joan's unfaltering smile, Jack sang some of his own compositions and was given an enthusiastic burst of applause. From the position which he was immediately offered at this club, Jack attracted much attention and soon was invited to be the featured singer in a large Kansas City night-club. As he joyfully told Joan of his success and bade her goodbye he added that the mother whom he had always worshipped and adored was coming to make her home with him. Wishing him all the happiness in the world, Joan shut the door upon his retreating form and threw herself upon the sofa, convulsed in tears. She buried herself in her teaching and absorbed every bit of information about Jack's amazing success. Before she could answer the door-bell one evening, she looked up from the papers she was grading to find Anita, with an affectionate smile of dismay that she should still be the same quiet girl of college days, standing before her. Radiantly Joan told her of Jack's marvelous luck when Anita confessed that she had long ago stopped the correspondence with him. Anita smiled her surprise and casually inquired where Jack was now singing. She refused Joan's invitation to stay telling her that it was imperative that she return home the next morning.

Jack was singing a sentimental ballad when his heart missed a beat as he encountered the gaze of Anita. His senses swam with all his old love for her as she bewitchingly told him that she had come to renew their slumbering friendship. His mother recognized the selfishness in the girl of her son's choice but said nothing. However Anita herself displayed a furious temper when he casually included his mother as a member of their household when discussing plans with her. Realizing the shallowness of her love he bade her a peremptory good-bye and turning on his heel, left her forever. Anita shrugged her shoulders as she entered the elevator lift. As he blurted out his agony to his mother, the figure of Joan suddenly stood comfortingly before him and he realized how dependent he had always been upon her sound counsel. Catching the next train he breathlessly presented himself before Joan and pulling the bewildered Joan into his arms begged her to keep him from ever making a mess of his life by becoming his wife. Happily Joan nestled in his arms content that things had worked out well for her after all.

HELD

James Wall File No. 9217

THE robbery that had occurred that afternoon at the bank in which Dick Rayburn was employed was naturally almost the sole topic of conversation between Dick and Agnes Brown when he came to call that evening. In their excitement they did not notice a man watching them from the window as they spoke nor did Agnes notice that, as Dick drove his car away, a figure jumped upon the running board and, keeping him covered with a gun, ordered Dick to drive to a lonely cabin in the woods. When Dick failed to appear at the bank next day, Agnes alone refused to believe that he was in some way linked with the robbery of the previous day. But, though police combed the state, they could find no trace of the bandits. Though her cousin Louise tried to cheer her, even Agnes' faith in Dick began to waver as the months passed and no word came from him. Then one day Agnes pulled her car into the garage, and, as she lifted her eyes from the wheel, she looked into the muzzle of a gun. Ordering her to make no outcry the man forced her into his own waiting car and, before her family could be surprised that she still had not returned, had driven a blind-folded Agnes away. The ransom note which her father received did not make her wealthy father suspect that the kidnapping was in any way connected with the bank robbery, now almost forgotten. Louise, however, showed the note to Bill Clark who had been begging her to marry him for some time and promised to say yes to his perennial question if he would find Agnes. A determined Bill betook himself to the region in which the kidnappers had specified a meeting-place for a later date. Chancing upon a fresh water spring, Bill hid in the bushes, knowing that, if anybody occupied a cabin in these woods, they would sooner or later have to come here for water. And, when two brutish-looking men finally appeared Bill, hiding behind trees and crouching in bushes, tracked them to a weather-beaten cabin.

Meanwhile, when the bandage was removed from Agnes' eyes, she found herself lying on a bunk in a bare and shabbily furnished room where she was left entirely alone. Through the thin partition she heard groans from the next room. Searching her person frantically for something to open the lock upon the door which refused to yield to her careful attempts to move it quietly, her hand touched the pin at her neck. She quickly removed it and, after several moments of tinkering about, succeeded in sliding the lock open. In the darkened room she could discern a form outlined upon the bed, and, as she bent over it, she was shocked to recognize the features of a battered Dick. Dick knew, he told her, that they were in the hands of the bank robbers who had imprisoned him to throw the police from their trail. As they heard footsteps, Agnes went back into her room. Peering in from a window of the cabin, Bill saw Dick and realized that he had stumbled upon the clue to the vanished bandits' whereabouts. Instead of risking his life alone against the bandits he prowled around to watch for a chance. He saw two of them leave in a car. Dick meanwhile, seeing his opportunity when his guard relaxed his vigilance, had overpowered him from the rear and after gagging him with a strip torn from the bedclothes, had changed clothes with him. Then pulling the watching bandit's cap over his eyes, Dick sauntered from the room into the presence of Ted Jones, the leader of the gang. Jones hardly bothered to look up as Dick entered the room but gave him some directions about pulling out from there with the bank haul that night after ol' man Brown forked over the ransom money. Knowing that the money was in the room, Dick commanded Jones to stick 'em up and turn over his own gun. As Jones made a move to hand over the gun he suddenly struck at Dick. The noise of the two men struggling came to Bill and he dashed in. Against the two of them Jones had no chance and he soon surrendered. With a rescued Agnes and a securely bound Ted Jones, Bill and Dick waited for the return of the other two gangsters who upon their return walked right into the waiting Dick and Bill's guns. With the stolen money safely piled into Dick's car which Bill had discovered in the woods behind the cabin, the rescued and the rescuer returned home and sent the police to take the bandits. And as a victorious Bill claimed his reward from Louise, Dick and Agnes followed their example and met in each other's arms.

WHITE MAJESTY

Helen Kantor File No. 9272

EYES sparkling with joy, Zsofi ran into the house waving the letter which had come all the way from her Aunt Fanny in America. Knitting her brows, she read the invitation to come and visit, and Miska, watching her from the threshold smiled at her eagerness. It was difficult to conceal from everybody the love he felt for Zsofi. Ever since his arrival three years ago, when Zsofi's father Kovacs had given him employment in his smithy, Miska had longed to declare his feelings, but Zsofi always cautioned him. Later, perhaps, when her father would be more kindly disposed.

That evening after supper Gabor Sipos, the village school teacher called on Zsofi and when, after a dull hour, Gabor finally took his departure, Zsofi could scarcely conceal her relief. The gay vintage festivities were just over when Zsofi and Miska returned from a visit to the newlyweds, Mr. and Mrs. Boros. Miska stopped still in the middle of the road and reminding Zsofi that she had promised to marry him in the autumn, exclaimed that tonight he would ask her father for her hand. Zsofi trembled, but when after supper Miska spoke his mind, the smith rose with lowering brow and struck Miska heavily upon the chest as he ordered him from the house for his temerity. Zsofi piteously interceded, but her father stormed and raged, and her mother led her gently away. Thereafter Miska, stopping with a friend, Lajos, the shoemaker's son, saw Zsofi frequently in the streets but dared not speak to her lest Kovacs beat the girl; and Zsofi's cheeks lost their bloom. One snowy day a small boy ran up to her with a note from Miska asking her to meet him in the forest that night. Zsofi was so happy that night that Kovacs remarked already his daughter was beginning to forget that Miska. But when Zsofi slipped out of the house and ran into Miska's arms under the gently falling snow flakes he told her that he was going away—forever. They could never have each other and it was purgatory seeing each other so. Together gravely they vowed never to marry anyone else, and as Zsofi ran from him sobbing, Miska picked up her forgotten shawl and burying his face in his hands sank to his knees in the snow. Spring came again, but when Gabor asked for Zsofi's hand and she refused the advantages of marrying the school teacher, her father stormed at her until her mother helped her leave home and accept the invitation of her Aunt Fanny in America. Zsofi's heart sank as the yellow haired woman in the purple dress kissed her, and took her through the customs to her home in New Jersey. Always there were people younger than her aunt in her house, laughing and drinking, but Zsofi felt alone and shut off. Then one day Stephen, a pale young man whom her aunt was going to marry, found her alone in the library. A moment later Aunt Fanny's strident voice ordered Zsofi from the house. She forgave Stephen but not her niece, and Zsofi at length found work as a hand-sewer. One night sewing under her little lamp in the top back room where she lived, she heard cries and looking up saw flames everywhere. Escape was cut off, and as she stumbled to the window a shout went up from the street. A young fireman ran up the burning stairs and jumped with her to the waiting net.

Weeks later Zsofi left the hospital and inquired when she could return to thank the fireman. It was snowing when she entered his room and there miraculously was Miska. He had, he told her as he smoothed her hair, gone back to the little village to find it desolated by war hoardes. Lajos had told him that Zsofi had gone to America and was safe with her aunt, but the aunt had known nothing about Zsofi and Miska had taken what employment he could. Held close in Miska's arms, Zsofii looked out at the snow and Miska softly asked her to marry him.

BRIDE OF THE KING

Mrs. Agnes Shorb File No. 9233

THE King's illness aggravated the need for an heir and as soon as he was recovered a delegation of courtiers presented themselves before him and told him that for the good of the state he must choose a bride. Finally King Orinco yielded to their persuasions and agreed to bring a queen to the throne. Accordingly the nobles brought princess after princess before the King. Each of them was lovely and fair and King Orinco did not know whom to select since he had no feelings for any of them. He betook himself to the garden where he could be alone to determine his choice. Through the gate he saw a peasant girl bending to fetch water from the spring by the wall. He was attracted by her courteous and shy manner when he asked for a drink and without revealing his own identity he learned that her name was Grace and that she was the daughter of a humble water carrier. The King announced to his assembled nobles that he had chosen his bride and ordered his coach so that he could go forward and bring her to his palace. To their consternation he stopped at a poor cottage instead of one of the neighboring palaces. There he invited a bewildered Grace to come with him. While the people cheered outside that the King had made so democratic a choice, Grace and King Orinco were married at a very elaborate ceremony.

However Count Foillon, a noble at the Court had wanted the King to choose his niece so that he himself might become a powerful factor at the Court. When his plans failed he vowed revenge, and when the Queen gave birth to twins, a young Prince and a Princess, he found the means. Pretending that Orinco had sent for the children, Foillon had a trusted guard take the children from Grace who was always eager to do her husband's bidding. Then Foillon told the King that his children had been killed by the kidnappers and hinted that there must have been some reason for Grace's ready acquiescence to the guard's demands for the twins. When he confronted Grace and demanded an explanation of her conduct, she could only answer Orinco that ignorant of Court manners, she had only done what she had believed to be his bidding. And since her presence reminded him constantly of the missing children she left the Palace and went back to her old home. Meanwhile Foillon had brought the children up as his own and when they were grown and the King was seeking a new bride because of the nobles again Foillon presented his supposed daughter. The unwitting Orinco chose the girl as his Queen. According to custom Grace was called to wait on her successor at the marriage ceremony and as she stood beside the prospective Queen the remarkable resemblance was noted. As Grace turned away she saw the young Prince who was the masculine counterpart of his sister and suspecting the truth suddenly halted the ceremony. Acting upon intuition she accused Foillon of this diabolical plan for power and revenge. He broke down and admitted the truth. Grace and Orinco and their two children were thus reunited after many years of suffering and tribulation.

WRONG LOVE

Amon Kirby File No. 9255

IT was at the Grand Central Station ticket office where they were both getting tickets for the same little Western town that Jimmy and Ramon almost came to blows. Resenting Ramon's insolent stare at his fiancee, Winoa, Jimmy with difficulty restrained himself and on the train trip across country the two men eyed each other with unfriendly glances.

Several weeks later when the outdoor life had strengthened Jimmy considerably, he was tramping through the woods alone, when the sounds of struggle made him go to the rescue of an Indian upon whom three white men were raining blows. Infuriated by the unequal combat, Jimmy threw himself into the fray, and as he routed the white men he recognized the leader as Ramon Tankerton, the man from New York. Carrying the Indian, Lone Pine, to his hut, Jimmy nursed him back to life and learned that Ramon had found out that Lone Pine had made a fortune from oil lands and had, under the guise of friendship betrayed the cultured red man. When Lone Pine had discovered his loss, he had come to demand restitution and were it not for Jimmy's timely arrival, would have met death at Ramon's hands. In the intimacy of the hut in the woods, a strong friendship was born beween Jimmy and Lone Pine and Jimmy confided to his red friend, his love for Winoa. Meanwhile, Ramon, enriched by his ill-gotten fortune returned to New York and when he saw Winoa entering her hotel, one day, recognized her as the girl to whom Jimmy had bid goodbye that day at the station. Intending revenge upon Jimmy for his interference with the murder of Lone Pine, Ramon arranged to crash his car into Winoa's, and by his supposed gallantry win her friendship. Thereafter Ramon was the most attentive of admirers, and to Winoa whose social activities had ceased when Jimmy left for the West upon his doctor's advice, his flowers and theater invitations were a welcome change.

Accordingly when Jimmy, entirely cured, arrived home and kissed Winoa happily, it was to find her disturbed by her inability to choose between Jimmy and Ramon. Once at a night club to which Jimmy had taken Winoa, Ramon cut in and Jimmy angrily asked Winoa to have nothing further to do with that man. Whereupon, Winoa, having accepted a drink at Ramon's table, angrily returned his engagement ring to him saying they were not married yet.

It was a discouraged Jimmy that Lone Pine met upon his arrival in New York. At first Jimmy didn't recognize his red friend in the stalwart, well dressed stranger extending his hand in greeting, but piercing the disguise, Jimmy cried out a welcome. Lone Pine told of having shadowed Ramon to New York and when he learned that the woman whom Ramon was escorting about was Jimmy's Winoa, the Indian sympathized in silence. Shadowing Ramon constantly, Lone Pine saved Winoa from Ramon's designs upon her when she was giddy from the drinks with which Ramon had plied her, and when Ramon, playing his final card, had Winoa kidnapped and ordered Jimmy to bring the ransom money in person, it was Lone Pine who broke through the door, having taken an adjoining room, and after a terrific stuggle silently hurled Ramon through a high story window. While Winoa, clung to Jimmy and begged him to forgive her, Lone Pine wished them happiness, and revenged upon his betrayer, returned to the Great West.

THE GRIM SHADOW

Mary M. Hopkins File No. 9271

ALWAYS a firm believer in heredity as the determining factor in the molding of one's character, the letter from his dead mother which the priest at St. Vincent's home gives him on his twenty-sixth birthday convinces Max Semple that despite the lack of any evil tendencies evidenced until now, he is irrevocably destined to a life of evil-doing. Semple, reared in the Home, has become the trusted secretary and protege of Charles Rogers, wealthy broker who moreover encourages Semple's love for his daughter Amy in preference to that of Felix Strong, the scientist. Max Semple, knowing that Amy and Strong are in love, has until this time kept silence but when the letter informs him that his father's drunken excesses have caused his mother's early death he resolves to forget his earlier scruples and win Amy by fair means or foul. Though his father is not named in the letter Max finds the half of a broken wedding ring which is his sole clue to his identity. Strong leaves on a long expedition to the frozen Arctic regions and Semple intercepts his letters to Amy and pretending to console her gradually convinces her that Felix is dead. Yielding to her father's entreaties to forget her grief she marries Max whom Mr. Rogers takes into his business as a son and partner. However the thought that Felix may someday reappear upon the scene torments him and he seeks relief in the company of Iris Vaughn, fiancee of Parker, Mr. Roger's butler. Fascinated by the attention of this wealthy man she does not know that he is already married. Max, meanwhile salves his conscience with the belief that his delinquencies are part of his heritage. At a cabaret with Iris one night Max gets into a drunken brawl and shoots a man who attempts to quiet him. As Iris, fighting like a wild-cat, holds back the two men who make a dash for him, Max gets away. With Amy and their child he flees New York and after several months of hiding from justice they drift to a lonely mountain inn in California. A brutish inn-keeper, Le Moyne comes into their room through a secret panel connecting this room to an adjoining room but his attempt to rob Semple are foiled when Max throws him to the ground and makes him his prisoner. Semple has during these months become more and more depraved and the isolated inn offers him a hideaway which he is determined to use. But while struggling with Le Moyne the broken ring which he always wears swings suddenly from his blouse. Semple notes the suddenly leering expression upon Le Moyne's face as he ripped the ring from the chain and stunned by the realization that this was his father, he leaves it with him and goes from the room.

Filled with loathing and disgust for Max, especially when he sends East for Iris, Amy steals some money from him and with the child, escapes to the railway station but she is brought back by Max. But Iris, when she arrives and learns that Max is a married man and seeing his degenerate state, allies with Amy. Meanwhile Parker finds Semple's letter to Iris and thus brings information of his missing daughter and son-in-law to Mr. Rogers, who is talking in his office with Felix Strong, just returned after an absence of many years, when the excited Parker bursts in. Strong goes to the inn and disguised as a peddler secures an entrance and with the aid of the two women locks Semple into his room until Rogers and Parker can arrive with the police. However, Semple, through the panel in the wall, enters Le Moyne's room and steals a box he believes contains gold to aid him in his escape. Some distance from the inn, he feverishly breaks the box and finds only the two halves of the broken wedding ring which seem to Semple to justify his evil life and a letter for "My wife, if she ever returns." Breaking the seal he reads that Le Moyne had replaced his wife's child which was born dead with that of a lodger who had died in child-birth that same night. With everything fallen to pieces about him Semple shoots himself.

Back at the inn Iris and Parker are reunited and Felix Strong and Amy at last find happiness together.

Erlamond McMillan File No. 9232

ECHO UNDERWOOD returning from the bank with ten thousand dollars and some valuable jewelry, stopped in at her mother's home in an attempt to lessen her grief over the loss of her son Tom, Echo's oldest brother. Her mother had been passionately devoted to Tom, and in hoping to distract her mother from her sad thoughts, Echo recounted every incident of the day, telling her mother that she was about ready to move into her new home, and had just gotten the money to pay for the house. Sending Echo from the room on the pretext of some trivial errand, Mrs. Rogers, her mind unbalanced by the loss of her boy, and embittered by the crazed thought that Tom had nothing while Echo had everything, took the jewels and money from Echo's purse and hid it in a secret compartment of a curio chest that stood in the room. Echo, unaware of what had occurred, returned home, and when asked by her husband Forest for the money, searched her hand bag in vain, and could offer no solution for the disappearance, never dreaming that her mother might be involved. Stubbornly refusing to believe Echo's story, and suspecting that she was concealing the money and jewels from him, Forest turned upon her and branded her as a thief. Echo, unwilling to live with a man who thought her guilty, left home with her little son Donnie, and returned to her mother. As the years passed Mrs. Rogers became increasingly miserly, and every night, when her daughter had retired she took the jewels and money from the chest, and counted them greedily. Although Forest died three years after she had left him, Echo never ceased to wonder what had become of the Underwood fortune. One evening, although seriously ill with pneumonia, Mrs. Rogers left her bed anxious to see her precious treasures once more. Unknown to her, she was observed by seven year old Donnie, who, when his grandmother went back to bed, removed the jewels from the chest, and hid them in the parquet panelling of his nursery floor, intending to tell his mother of his discovery the first thing in the morning. Unnoticed, Mrs. Rogers had seen Donnie hide the jewels, and she was so incensed that her heart, weakened by long illness, gave out, and she died a few minutes later. Echo was at the theatre with her lawyer, Lloyd Grayson, and when her mother was stricken, Echo's brother-in-law, Charles, and her sister, Maude, reached the old lady just before she died. They were in time to hear her mumble something about money and a curio chest, and then she breathed her last, as Echo entered the room. Getting rid of Echo the next day, the brother and sister, feeling that they had at last found out what had happened to the Underwood fortune, attempted to break open the chest, but they were prevented by the arrival of Grayson, who had come to read Mrs. Rogers' will. Suspicious of their conduct, although having no definite evidence he determined to protect Echo from their plotting.

Mrs. Rogers left Echo the chest, and Charles and Maude, seeing that they would have to act rapidly, planned to gain possession of the trunk that very evening. After Grayson had left, Charles quickly tied up Echo, and bound Donnie, telling her that if she dared to "squeal" after he and Maude had left with Donnie, he would kill the boy. Echo thought her position hopeless, but Grayson, who had gone on to the police court a few blocks away, suddenly missed his briefcase, and knowing that he had probably left it at Echo's home, called to ask. As Charles was threatening Echo, the phone rang, and he quickly lifted the receiver and then hung up. Fearing that Echo was in danger, because he heard her scream over the phone, Lloyd enlisted the aid of three policemen, and drove to the Rogers' home just in time to catch Maude and Charles who were leaving the house with the chest. Placing them under arrest for robbery, he released Echo and Donnie, who at last had an opportunity to tell his mother what was in the chest. The Underwood jewels were taken from Donnie's nursery, the money found in the chest, and Echo, eternally grateful to Lloyd, soon found that her gratitude had turned to love, and once more she started life, but this time on a foundation of trust.

THE TRUMPET SOUNDS

C. P. Kibbler File No. 9418

GOD, appearing in the air, decides to create Heaven and Earth, and on the sixth day, Man and Woman. When Eve, tempted by the Serpent, eats the forbidden fruit. and persuades Adam to share it with her, God drives them from Eden, and the two turn from Paradise, sorrow and shame filling their souls.

It is the time of Noah, and everywhere the people are committing grievous sins. God, revealing to Noah that he intends to destroy every living being, sends Noah out to preach repentance. Noah goes first to the home of two lovers, who are leading debauched lives, but his preaching is scorned and unheeded. As Noah and his family, obeying the word of God, enter the Ark which Noah has built, a roaring torrent of rain pours over the land, the raging waters of the sea rise, and the two lovers are swept to destruction. After floating for many months, the Ark lands at Mt. Ararat, and Noah and his family see the rainbow that signifies that peace has returned to the world.

It is 2218 B.C., and in the palace of a mighty ruler of an ancient city, a lovely woman is urging her lord to build a tower that will reach up to Heaven. Enamoured of her beauty, and burning with a desire to accomplish so magnificent an undertaking, he, together with the people of his city, begin to build the tower. Thousands of men die from the terrific strain of the work, but still the tower rises towards the sky, until God, angered by the vanity of Man, destroys the tower, and ruler and his mistress are crushed by the stones.

Centuries later, two lovers, living in Sodom, are leading sinful existences. Sorely troubled by the widespread evil in the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, God appears to the good man Abraham, and reveals to him that unless ten righteous people are found, both towns would be annihilated. His angels having searched in vain for the ten righteous, God burns the two cities at sunrise, and again the lovers suffer death.

It is 1490 B.C. in Egypt, and Moses, guided by God, is leading his people into the promised land. In his band are the two sinners. moved to repentance, who are following him with hearts full of gratitude. This time the lovers escape destruction, and together with the followers of Moses they reach the Promised Land, and offer up prayers of thanksgiving.

In the little town of Bethlehem, lives a husband and wife, their happiness shadowed by the news that their leader Jesus has been crucified. But one morning, to their humble cottage, come three women, their eyes filled with wonder, to tell them that the Saviour has risen from his tomb. Joy filling their hearts the couple run with the multitude to the tomb, and marvel to see Jesus ascend into Heaven.

Deeply moved by the story of the Ascension of Christ, Margaret and Larry leave the church, and return to their apartment in the busiest section of the city. All about them they see evil—their neighbors are continually preparing endless rounds of drinks; their friends never cease to strive for social recognition, even at the expense of hurting others; their business associates, outwardly genial, do not scruple to cheat to gain their own ends. And as the couple begin their midday meal, still pondering on the words of the minister, a long silvery call of a trumpet echoes through the room. It resounds through all the streets of the city, and the people rushing out of their houses, see God with the Angels above them in the sky. Those who have led good lives are caught up into the air, but those who have followed evil paths, are taken from autos, trains, dinner tables, theatres, and plunged into a sea of fire. There is much wailing and moaning, on the burning earth, but above in the heavens, there is deep rejoicing.

COLLEGE GIRL

Mrs. L. M. Bower File No. 9420

RETURNING from college during the Christmas vacations, Anne Hill boarded a train that would take her to her home town in six hours. She settled herself comfortably with a book, and reflected that her life had been very regular and unexciting. After riding four hours, she suddenly felt the train jerk to an unexpected halt. She looked out into the night, seeing nothing but utter blackness. The conductor came through the train, announcing that due to some engine trouble the train would be forced to stop for two hours, and that if the passengers wished to alight, they might. Although the place that the train had stopped showed no sign of habitation, Anne glad of the break in the journey, got out, and decided to explore the surrounding country. With no thought of fear, she walked down the narrow road that lead away from the train, and after ten minutes' brisk walking, she reached a shabby, wooden house. The first floor was dimly lighted, and Anne, warming to the adventure, resolved to investigate. In response to her continual knocking, a middle-aged woman came to the door. To explain her presence, Anne told her of the train delay, and then inquired whether the woman could possibly give her a bite of supper. The woman replied affirmatively, and Anne entered the dismal house.

A few minutes later, Anne was heartily partaking of a meagre fare. She had just about concluded that there was nothing mysterious about the house after all, when above her, she heard an eerie, scraping sound. The owner of the house, anxious to divert Anne's attention from the noise, rattled the dishes loudly, and coughed unnecessarily. But again the noise was repeated, followed by heavy footsteps, and a dull thud.

This time Anne could not hold back her curiosity. The dreary house, the strange character of the owner, the ghostly noises, the footsteps—all convinced her that something unhealthy was taking place. Sending the woman to fetch her some water as a pretext, Anne slipped out of the room, and tip-toed to the foot of a rambling staircase. After she had ascended a few steps, she stopped, a shiver of terror going through her. But she had started, and she was determined to finish, and mustering up her courage, she continued up the stairs. Pausing at the top, she saw three doors. A repetition of the scraping noise, guided her steps towards the farther door. Bravely she opened the door, expecting to see almost anything but the sight that met her eyes. There down on his knees before a large trunk, was a pleasant-looking young man, trying to open the trunk. In answer to Anne's question as to what he was doing, he seemed startled, and answered: "I'm trying to open my trunk, and I seem to have lost the key. I board here." Anne smiled in secret relief, and then had a brilliant inspiration. Taking her college locker keys from her purse, she bent down, and tried each one. The last fitted, and the trunk snapped open. The young man almost howled with delight, and just then the two, still kneeling before the trunk, heard the far-off whistle of a train. Anne hastily got to her feet, and rushed out of the room, but not before calling out that her name was Anne Hill, and she lived in Hamilton. The young man rushed out after her, and the last thing she heard him say was: "My name's Ken Martin." And as she ran toward the train, she felt sorry that her adventure had ended so quickly. But the promise in Ken Martin's voice, told her that perhaps it had just begun.

THE UNBROKEN SPELL

Mrs. Mary Clouse File No. 9436

EVER since they had been childhood playmates in the little village on the Scotch seacoast, Mary Branden, and John Lawton had loved each other. But Robert Branden, Mary's father, had once been convicted of poaching, and although he now led a respectable life, Mrs. Lawton, the most influential woman in the village, was determined that her young son should not marry Mary. At an early age the boy showed a talent for painting, and seizing this as an opportunity to separate the two sweethearts, Mrs. Lawton sent John to school in London, where cousins of the Lawton family saw to it that the young boy met many young women of his own social standing. One of these new friends of John's, intrigued by the idea of knowing an artist, exerted all her charm to win his affections. John was young and naive, and soon Cynthia Wells was proudly announcing her engagement to John Lawton.

Meanwhile, Mary, not satisfied with her position as clerk in a draper's shop in her home village, and wondering what had happened to keep John from writing, made plans to come to London. Mrs. Lawton, learning of this, came to her son, and under some flimsy pretext, coaxed him into a quick marriage with Cynthia. Mary, arriving in London, learned of the marriage of her former sweetheart, and without revealing to John her presence in the city, firmly decided to find a way of earning her living. Naturally intelligent, she was able, in a few years, to advance to the position of secretary to a distinguished lawyer, who specialized in divorce cases.

As the years passed, and Cynthia Lawton saw her husband remaining as only a second-rate artist, she became discontented, and when a rival artist, attracted by her beauty, implored her to run off with him, she fled with him to Spain, leaving the distracted John to visit the divorce lawyer's office for advice. Encountering Mary, he felt once more his old love for her burn anew, but he was not free to speak. Moreover, he believed himself but a mediocre artist, and hesitated to ask any woman to share life with him, because of his failure. But Mary, who had never ceased to love her childhood friend, realized that if she continued to see him, it would only make matters worse. Cynthia, returning from her little adventure, and anxious again to be safe with John, quickly appraised the situation, and when she learned that John was determined to divorce her, she poisoned his mind against Mary, by telling him that Mary was going to marry her employer. John, heartbroken, left England for Italy, anxious to be away from all his memories. At first he did not paint, but the old urge reoccurring, he began to paint Mary as he remembered her, but in the costume of an Italian peasant. Slowly he began to realize that this was his best work, and that all he needed was an inspiration to bring out the artistic powers which had been lying dormant within him. The painting was accepted by the National Gallery in London, as a work of real merit, and John longing to see his one treasure again, returned to London, and went to the galleries. Mary, who had read and heard of John's masterpiece, visited the gallery, and stood astonished before the painting, recognizing herself as the subject and the spirit. Thus John found her there, and learned of her love for him. And, leaving with her, he vowed never to lose his inspiration again.

LOVERS ASTRAY

Lillian Lee File No. 9438

AT the second impatient jerk of the door bell, George Layton laid aside his evening paper and pipe and reluctantly rose. "Lilyan," he cried as he led the white faced girl in to warm herself at his fire. When she explained that she had come to ask him to marry her tonight, he reminded her that five months ago she had refused him because she didn't love him. Little by little George drew from her the admission that she wanted his name to protect her from herself. Like a spoiled child, she let him fix a hot drink for her and send her off to bed with the assurance that if he did marry her now, in the morning she would have it annulled. One thing she made her step-father promise her, that no matter how hard she pleaded, he was not to let her write a line to a single living person.

That night Lilyan could not sleep. Clearly she visualized the year long wait for Dick's return from the South. Upon her lips she still felt his kiss as he swept her into his arms, just last night. They had dined in a secluded corner of a restaurant and their long shared silence was broken by a tall youth who stopped to greet them. He greeted her as Dick's wife, laughing at his own confusion in remembering her as a blonde that night at the party in Dick's apartment in Mobile. Dick had blushed a fiery red, and Lilyan had risen, suffered Dick to help her with her wraps and fled from him while he was paying off the taxi-driver.

Even now Lilyan shivered at his attempted explanation and her curt dismissal. After knocking at her locked door, he pushed a note under telling her he would explain in the morning. Lilyan tossed now, but sleep would not come and she saw again the journey to her step-father.

In the morning Lilyan found a note from George who had instructed Mrs. Kane, his housekeeper, to look after "his cousin". There was a reminder that she wasn't to write. Lilyan winced under Mrs. Kane's hostility but George was unfailing in his kindness. When she had told him everything except about the blonde, George patted her shoulder and suggested they dance. The music was rotten and so was George's dancing, but Lilyan giggled as she realized how funny they looked trying to keep off the other dancers.

Nights George comforted her with bits of gossip but as Lilyan read the home papers which George subscribed to, she hardened herself against her longing to go back. Only when she read that Richard Cameron was to sail to Rio de Janerio to take over his duties with a rubber company, Lilyan's poise broke down and she wept. Just tonight George was away and as she saw Dick's face in the dancing flames, she rose and called relieved, "Mrs. Kane?" A moment later Dick stepped in the room, moving to take her in his arms. With a set face, Lilyan told him she was Mrs. George Layton and despite his credulous objections, his reminder that she was "too modern to wear a wedding ring", at last accepted her story. Then, he explained the Mobile had been his secretary. She used to help him buy gifts for Lilyan. Several times he had taken her to the theater. They had been friends, and when, to avoid the hounding of her divorced husband, she had asked him for one night to pose as husband number two, he had helped her, given a party that convinced her first husband she was really through.

Richard turned to go, but suddenly Lilyan was in his arms and as they sat before the fire, waiting to tell George, they planned the cozy fireplace they were going to have.

WINNING SMILE

Mrs. G. Hoffman File No. 9441

WHEN Lenore Slater's father remarried five years after her mother's death, Lenore made every effort to get along well with her young, and very attractive step-mother. Lenore was just eighteen, very charming, and noted for her winning smile. But in spite of her attempts to be pleasant to the woman who was taking her mother's place, Lenore felt that she and her step-mother could never really be friends. Anxious to please her father, whom she loved dearly, Lenore, nevertheless, was convinced that Diane Slater and she would never agree, and one evening she quietly announced that she would like to go out West to her mother's sister's home for a long visit. Her father, understanding Lenore's real reason, was terribly disappointed both in his daughter and in his beautiful wife, whom he had been so proud of winning. Despite her father's pleas that she stay with them, and Diane's perfunctory urgings, Lenore left for Montana, looking forward to a happier life with her Aunt Louise. As for Frederick Slater, the departure of his daughter caused a certain sadness to awaken in him, and he began to blame Diane for driving his daughter away from her true home. Aware that she had really done nothing to cause the girl's antagonism, Diane maintained a silence whenever the subject arose, but the dislike she had for her husband's daughter grew stronger as she saw Lenore as the cause of her frequent quarrels with the husband whom she really loved dearly.

Meanwhile, Lenore, learning for the first time how to love Nature, was extremely happy on her Aunt Louise's ranch, and began to believe that she would never return to her Eastern home. An acquaintance with the son of a neighboring ranch owner, only intensified this feeling, for Dick Walden was for her all she had ever wanted in a man. But Dick, although happy with Lenore, ached to come East, and try his own hand at business. Reluctantly Lenore saw him go, and supplied him with a letter of introduction to her father, in the hopes that Mr. Slater would help Dick in his career. Promising to return to Lenore as soon as he had made his mark, Dick travelled eagerly toward the East, and in a few days stood before Mr. Slater and introduced himself. Kindly disposed toward the young man, since Lenore thought so highly of him, Frederick invited him to dinner. Diane, still smarting under the delusion that Lenore had caused bitterness between herself and Frederick saw in this handsome, young man an opportunity to hurt Lenore. Exerting all her feminine charms, she set out to win Dick away from Lenore. Cleverly she contrived to meet him frequently, and gradually the beauty and the sophistication of the older woman completely ensnared Dick, and he stopped writing to Lenore, and could think only of Diane.

As Diane and Dick were dining together in her home one evening, a phone call from Frederick's secretary told her that Frederick was seriously injured in an automobile accident. Completely forgetting the presence of her young admirer, Diane's heart called out to Frederick, and she rushed out of the room, and drove wildly to the hospital. Lenore, anxious about Dick's welfare, had arrived from the ranch, and reached home just in time to learn of her father's accident. With Dick she reached the hospital shortly after Diane, who was kneeling at the bedside of her husband, hysterically mumbling her love for him. Moved by the sincerity of her step-mother's anguish, Lenore turned with open arms to Dick, who at last knew that there was no one for him but Lenore.

THE MOTZA COLONY

Sidney Petrushansky File No. 9442

PEACE ruled the lives of the Malkin family, who had settled in a small Palestine colony, with their daughter Vanya, and their young son, Joseph. Vanya was happy in her work as school teacher in the little school built by the village, and Joseph, only twenty, was already preparing himself to become a scholar, and a leader of his people. To the contented Malkin family, it seemed impossible that the Arabs, whose village was but a short distance from the Jewish colony, could ever become hostile to them, for their relations were distant, and yet not unfriendly. But the English government officials, suspecting that the Arabs might at any time rise against their neighbors, sent a corps of soldiers to the village, and stationed them there to protect the fourteen families living here. Nevil Harding, the head of the group, instantly attracted by Vanya's quiet charm and dignity, contrived to meet her accidently every morning as she went to open the school. Offering to carry her books, he learned to await with great anticipation their all too short walk through the sleepy streets in the first hours of the morning. Vanya, knowing how her parents would disapprove of her acquaintance with a man not of her own faith, did not speak of Nevil, but she could not keep from growing more and more attached to him as the days went by. Only Joseph knew of their meeting, for he had seen his sister laughing and talking with the young soldier; but he forbore to speak of it to his parents, feeling that it was of little consequence. But to Nevil, Vanya was everything in the world, and every day his love for her grew stronger, as he saw that she, too, was drawn to him. They never spoke of their feelings, knowing the differences that separated them, but they could not crush their love.

The duties of the soldiers guarding the little settlement were very light, for the Arabs were to all outward appearances, exceedingly friendly. Nevil, grown impatient at his lack of activity, and realizing that if he stayed longer, he could not conceal his love, asked that he be sent back to England. On the day that he was to leave the village, the rest of his squad were called to report to the head officer in a neighboring colony. Nevil, feeling that he had to say farewell to Vanya, determined to go to the Malkin home. Just as he reached the doorstep, the Arabs who had been waiting for this opportunity for an unexpected attack, swept down over the hills, and poured in through the town gates. With lightning speed, Nevil shouted warnings to the families, commanding them to barricade their homes with furniture, sacks, and anything they could lay their hands on. Meanwhile Joseph, who had been walking near the rear gate of the village, quickly fled toward the neighboring town, to call back the soldiers. Nevil and the brave townspeople put up a valiant fight, but Mr. and Mrs. Malkin were ruthlessly slaughtered and many of the older people stabbed and killed, before the troop, summoned by Joseph, arrived and drove the Arabs back to their own village. It was late evening before peace was restored, and a sorrowful group, consisting of Nevil, Vanya and Joseph, followed the cars bearing the bodies of the dead to the cemetery. Now if ever did the young girl need Nevil, and a few weeks later the two sailed for England, leaving behind them young Joseph, who refused to leave his people. And Vanya and Nevil, although anxious to forget the scene of their sorrows, knew they would soon return to help him carry on his noble work.

THE TIDE TURNS

VAN married Mary because she was different—sweet and unspoiled. But when he rose rapidly in the business world, and Mary remained the conscientious, encouraging helpmeet content to remain in the background and bring his pipe and slippers to him evenings, Van resented it. Other men in his position had smart wives but when Van tried to encourage Mary to join bridge clubs and meet him in town to go to night clubs, she scolded him tenderly for trying to make her over. It wasn't that Van didn't want children, he did. But as long as they had no babies, he didn't see any reason to stay in.

The night that Mary made an earnest effort to entertain business associates Van brought home, he was shamed by her spending most of the time in the kitchen. Van assured her they could afford a maid, and beside Sally Norton, who played an excellent game of bridge as Van's partner, Mary seemed unforgivably dowdy. Even her freshly marcelled hair seemed all wrong. But when the Nortons had left and Van found Mary weeping over the way she had failed him, Van comforted her, remembering charitably how good the dinner was and how she had tried. Still it bothered him that Mary wouldn't go into an exclusive hotel to dine, but insisted they have a table d'hote dinner where the food was good but inexpensive.

A few weeks later, Van, after a particularly big business deal decided that they ought to get a car. Pridefully he drove it home but when he entered the house to surprise Mary, he found her waiting excitedly to tell him her mother was ill and she had to go to her. Van's climax fell flat and when Mary, wrapped in her own worries, asked him why he had spent so much at such a time upon a luxury, he drove her to the station and omitted his usual kiss.

At the office, another annoyance awaited him. His efficient secretary, Miss Ayres had gone back to the husband from whom she had been separated because of her extravagance. With lowering brows, Van called an agency and when the very pretty Leora applied, Van hired her. All day he was disturbingly conscious of her presence, and when Mary called long distance to tell him that her mother's condition necessitated her remaining on, Van finished his dictation in a blue funk.

After a lonely evening at home and a cold dinner, thoughtfully prepared by Mary, Van returned to the office. Looking down at Leora's crossed ankles, Van invited her to take the rest of the afternoon off and be ready this evening to go with him to the Aladdin. Leora liked his car, she liked his dancing, and she made Van feel important. In Mary's absence, Van lived in a world of glamor. Suddenly he realized, as he read Mary's telegram telling him she was returning, what he had done. He made out a check, gave it to Leora, and considered the incident closed. Leora, however, was not so easily to be put off. Startled by her demand for hush money, Van sold the car to give it to her. When Mary returned, he was more amenable to her ideas of economy. Then Leora came back. She wanted more money or else she'd tell Mary. When Van refused, Leora raised her voice and Mary walking in said, "I don't think you have to pay, Van. You see I know." Leora made a hasty exit, and Mary, held close in Van's arms added, there would be three of them soon. Mary might be old fashioned, but Van never knew how his wife was going to react. Take Leora for instance. But Mary was waiting to be kissed and Van stopped talking.

UNMASKED TRUTH

Mrs. H. A. Harris File No. 9445

AFTER Aline's road show went on, life seemed more drab than ever for Zelda in the small town. Eagerly she would look forward to the cheerful letters Aline sent regularly from New York and in each of them was the assurance that if Zelda ever decided to come to the theatrical mecca, her beauty would win her recognition and fame. Zelda, teaching school day after day in the small town, never guessed how much loneliness there was behind Aline's cheerful letters, never guessed that all Aline had to keep her up in New York was her correspondence with her former school mate, Zelda, and with her make-believe lover, a soldier on the island of Nipan.

It was only after the school board reluctantly informed Zelda that the small town parents didn't utterly trust so lovely a young school teacher and her services would no longer be required, that Zelda, looking over Aline's last letter asking why Zelda didn't come to New York, suddenly asked herself the same question. Trembling, Zelda walked down the skyscraper-lined streets of the great metropolis, and as she stopped perplexed before the shabby boarding house that Aline had said was a great modern hotel, Zelda pressed the bell button. The landlady looked curiously at Zelda and informed her she was just in time. That morning Aline had died of pneumonia. Shocked and upset, Zelda learned that Aline had lived entirely in a world of dreams. She had never gone out and lived for her letters. At the suggestion of the landlady, Zelda took a small room in the boarding house where Aline had lived and after several weeks of futile searching for work sat forlornly at a cafeteria counter slowly sipping her rations for the day—one cup of coffee. A young man watched her closely and Zelda smiled feebly as he asked, "Dieting?" It was Tim who got her a position in his firm and Zelda's gratitude to him was touching. But soon Tim's irrepressible caprices began to prove wearing. No hour was too late for him to call Zelda or come over with a party of people. Gay and irresponsible, he thoroughly disapproved of so beautiful a girl as Zelda being so quiet. Often the landlady spoke to Zelda about Tim, warning her she couldn't have such goings-on in her house, and hastily explaining that she knew it wasn't Zelda's fault and that nothing actually wrong went on, but so much noise.....

Meanwhile at Nipan, a small group of soldiers comprising a standing army were stationed. At each mail the men eagerly rushed for letters and Laurie turned away disappointed at not receiving his regular letter. The men twitted him but Laurie stoutly defended Aline, refusing to believe she was fickle as they said. When day after day passed without word from her, Laurie worriedly applied for leave. As his boat disembarked the soldiers mocked his anxiety and Laurie told them stoutly that he would bring back his wife. Arrived in New York Laurie too was startled at finding the sumptuous home Aline described a cheap boarding house, but when he learned of the death of the girl he had come to marry he was inexpressibly shocked.

That night Tim had come to Zelda's room. Zelda seeing that he had been drinking heavily tried to get him to leave but Tim shouted that after all she owed something to him for getting her her job. As he lunged forward and pressed his mouth down on hers, Zelda tried to put him off and when he persisted she lifted a paper weight as he bent her back over the table telling her how much he loved her, and brought it down over his head. Startled at seeing Tim drop heavily to the floor, Zelda fled from the room. Dashing down the steps she made for a cab which was just drawing away and as she yanked open the door, she looked up to see a man hunched in the corner. Apologizing she started to withdraw, but as he saw tears brimming in her eyes, he solicitously offered to bring her where she wanted to go. Bitterly Zelda cried she didn't care where she went, she just wanted to get away. Laurie smiled grimly, and in silence they rode until Laurie suggested they have something to eat. Scarcely caring what she did, Zelda accompanied him and soon he told her of the girl he had come to marry. Before long the two who had been so miserable were smiling together but when Laurie offered to take Zelda home, thinking of Tim she shuddered. It was then he asked if she wouldn't come with him as his wife to Nipan. Feeling she could never go back to work feeling obligated to Tim, and remembering the weary months of job hunting, Zelda consented. But once they were married, a great constraint fell over the pair as they realized how reckless their marriage had been.

Then Zelda's employer called up to find out why she didn't come to work. Her landlady reported she was missing and suspected Tim, who had been seen coming from Zelda's apartment that morning. Foul play was suspected from the signs of struggle in the apartment, and Tim was held. When at last the New York newspapers reached Nipan, Laurie was startled at finding Zelda's picture and the account of her death. Zelda made immediate plans to return to save Tim from persecution and Laurie, suspecting that Zelda loved Tim, promised to free her, claiming he had no right to her. As she packed, feeling she had failed Laurie, Zelda found Aline's picture and realized for the first time that it was Aline Laurie had come to marry. When Laurie came to bid her goodbye, Zelda suddenly started to cry and forgetting the other man Laurie took her in his arms to comfort her. Together they went back to New York to free Tim, and together they returned to happiness on Nipan.

GAY and irresponsible, Adele Rheinhart ignores the advice of her husband, a physician, and when her baby is born dead as a result of a drinking orgy, she weeps against Rheinhart's shoulder, fearing because she will never be able to give him a child now, that she may lose his love. The nurse, Mary Brown, who has been in love with the doctor since the days of his interneship,, softly withdraws from the room. When Adele suggests that they adopt a child, Rheinhart enlists Mary's aid so that the child may be his own, and, she heedless of all save her love, consents. For a year she goes away, then, returning to the hospital she turns the baby, Fred, over to the Rheinharts, relinquishing all claims upon him.

Years pass. Rheinhart, killed with his wife in an airplane crash, has never told his son who his mother really was, and Fred, interning at the hospital where Mary is now head nurse, is already attracting attention by his skill. Arriving hurriedly for an emergency case, Fred asks for Molly Wilson, and when he learns that she is resting after twenty-four hour duty, shouts, "Tell her I want her. She'll come." Molly groans at being disturbed, but when she learns it is Fred who has sent for her, she goes. Fred smiles as she enters and when the patient has been wheeled from the room, he pats Molly on the shoulder saying, "Good girl." Molly looks after him adoringly, but when he remarks jocularly that she can get some sleep now, he won't be needing her until he gets back from his honeymoon, she suddenly feels faint. Anxiously he tells her she looks as if she isn't well, she really needs a vacation. But Molly smiles with an attempt at brightness and goes.

Some weeks later, Molly tells the head nurse she is leaving. Miss Brown looks at her sharply and asks what Dr. Rheinhart is going to do without her, and as her sharp eyes detect tears welling in Molly's, she comforts the girl. Watching her son with a mother's fixity, the head nurse has been only too conscious of Molly's love for him, and she has fought against her own longing to warn Fred against this society marriage. Now, suddenly, moved by the desperation in the young nurse's face, Mary tells the girl her story. As Molly looks into the lined face of the head nurse whom the other girls have always regarded as a hapless old maid, a tenderness for Mary supplants her own thoughts of suicide. At Mary's suggestion, Molly takes a long rest.

When Fred comes back to the hospital he is dismayed at finding Molly gone. Between his wife's demands and his sense of loss without Molly who has always anticipated his wants at the operating table, Fred loses hold on himself. He makes diligent inquiries after Molly, and Mary looking on, bites her lip to keep from speaking. Vera, Fred's wife, who had been one of the popular debutantes of the past season, is absorbed in the social round and resents bitterly her husband's duties. Teas, bridges, dances, claim Vera and when Fred receives late calls, she rants at him. Frequently she flares up and orders him to choose between her and his infernal surgery, but Fred quiets her with expensive gifts. Once Vera intercepts one of Fred's calls and learns that he is blaming himself for losing a case because he has been distracted by the inefficiency of his nurses. When Vera hears him demand that Molly return, she faces him coolly asking, "Just who is this Molly?" Exasperated, Fred explains she is a nurse, just a nurse, but Vera uses the name Molly as a weapon, accusing Fred of going to see that woman, when he receives calls from patients. Meanwhile, Mary, realizing that her son's marriage is anything but satisfactory to judge from Fred's harrassed expression, communicates with Molly and the two are held by their common interest in the young surgeon. However, Molly dares not return to work near the man she loves until she learns that Mary has fallen and injured herself severely. Then, worried, she communicates with her friend's son.

At this time Vera, finding other men willing to give her the attention that Fred's work keeps him from lavishing upon her, asks him to give up surgery. She has enough money, she says, and Fred, troubled by his own inefficiency, gives her no answer but refuses to accept any more cases. A call from the hospital tells him that Mary Brown needs him, but he waves it away saying she can get another surgeon. It is only when Molly, fearing Mary's death, comes in person to get him, that Fred wavers. Vera hearing Molly's clipped explanation that Mary is his mother and she wants him, utters a hysterical laugh and tells Fred it is all lies made up by that woman. When she sees that Fred is going, she cries that she has long known his demand for Molly masked a personal feeling, and if he goes now, she will divorce him. The door closes.

With Molly beside him, Fred again feels his old power and when Mary recovers, she smiles upon the two young people together. Fred finds his wife has fulfilled her threats and has gone to Reno with some friends, but standing beside Molly and Mary, he feels only a great exultation.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE

Max Lechner and Bella Mostovoy File No. 9231

AS the District Attorney questioned each witness trying to prove to the jury that she was guilty of the crime, Mrs. Coster relived the happenings of that fatal night. Proceeding as was his custom to the club after leaving his wife at their home after the show Mr. Coster had found Randolph Breen's frat pin lodged between the cushions of the car. When they arrived at the club Mr. Coster asked his guest, Dr. Steward to excuse him and returned home almost immediately. The chauffeur had dropped him at the door and when he came into the kitchen his wife who was the cook had told him that Randolph Breen, Mrs. Coster's childhood sweetheart was with her upstairs. They heard Mr. and Mrs. Coster quarreling, and at the sound of a shot went up the stairs and found Mr. Coster lying dead and Mrs. Coster half-dazed in a corner of the room. Police, summoned to the scene had found a gun in a far corner of the room from which the bullet was fired that killed Mr. Coster. Mrs. Coster's fingerprints and a second set of prints were found on the gun. The second set and prints on the window sill proved to be identical. Mrs. Coster shook her head in disavowal as the lawyer told the jury that she had obviously committed the crime to shield her lover who had escaped through the window. Called to the stand in her own defense Mrs. Coster told how Randolph Breen, knowing that her husband would go on to the club, had called and when the maid admitted him wild-eyed and disheveled, he told her of the collapse of his financial ventures which would have aided them to get away. When he had waved a gun and threatened suicide she had taken the gun and put it on her dressing-table. Frightened by the sound of a car stopping near the house, she hid Breen. After learning that this was not her husband as she had believed, she succeeded in letting him out unnoticed by anyone. However she had prepared for bed before hr husband arrived and showing her Randolph's key accused her of seeing Breen against his expressed wishes. Enraged he had lifted his hand to strike her when a movement of the drapery covering the entrance to his room had halted him. Lifting a table statue he went to investigate when a burgler sprang upon him. As she watched the men rolling upon the floor she saw the burglar gain the upper hand, realizing that she had to act fast in order to save her husband from being strangled, she seized Randolph's gun and standing above the men as they grappled she had put her finger upon the trigger to fire at the intruder. The instant she pulled the trigger she felt strong arms about her, and was flung into a corner and the gun was hurled out of her hand. When next she opened her eyes Flynn, the chauffeur, and his wife were already in the room and her husband was dead. However the jury agreed with the State's Attorney who accused her of killing her husband who stood in the way of her love for Breen and who in addition had left her a tidy fortune. Trembling, Mrs. Coster heard the foreman declare her guilty.

Breen, meanwhile, certain that Mrs. Coster was innocent had enlisted the aid of a lawyer who was familiar with the members of the underworld, to track the burglar Mrs. Coster had told of. Learning that Big Pete was no longer shadowed by his brother, Baby Face, they bribed Tony, Pete's henchman to tell him what he knew of Baby Face's disappearance. But Pete who had heard of Tony's treachery walked in upon the meeting with drawn gun and when Tony tried to escape shot him. As he lay dying upon the floor Tony retaliated and reaching for his pistol shot the gloating Pete. Pete answered Breen's frantic pleas and confessed. He told how he and his brother, well aware of Coster's habit of going on to his club, had planned to rob his wife of her jewelry as she returned alone from the show. With their car parked at the side of the house, Pete had waited underneath a ladder while Baby Face concealed himself in Mrs. Coster's room. He had seen Mr. Coster return home earlier and at the sound of a scuffle had climbed up the ladder in time to see Mrs. Coster level a revolver at his brother's back. His attempt to stop her from shooting failed. However when the gun had gone off into his brother's back, he had hurriedly lifted him and escaped through the window as he had come. To prevent detection he had tossed his brother's body, tied in a sack, into the river. Experts filled in Pete's story and explained that the bullet which had killed the burglar passed through his body and lodged in the heart of the man with whom he had been grappling.

Randolph Breen and Mrs. Coster, now Mrs. Breen left for a distant country to seek their happiness together.

TOO heavy for romance, Kate applies herself to helping other people and although her mother urges her to develop her remarkable voice for stage purposes, the ridicule to which she is constantly exposed deters her. At length, however, she goes to Carolina to help an aunt, and because she dares not appear at the dance in town, she offers to run the telephone exchange which her cousins, Donna and Mabel manage. To help her while away time, the radio is moved near the switchboard, and she sings to the jazz music.

At the same time Roscoe Bedell, a tremendously large salesman arrives in town, but realizing that girls do not enjoy dancing with a man of his size, stays at home in spite of the bright chatter of his friends, Cohen and Marks, who are anticipating a big time with the telephone operators. When Roscoe calls a number he hears the radio and starts talking to Kate. She sings for him and Roscoe fancies her to be a beautiful girl. He offers to send her candy and when she hastily objects he promises flowers. That night when Donna and Mabel arrive home, Kate is dreamy-eyed and at the suggestion of her cousins she begins a strenuous diet; while at the hotel Roscoe offers Cohen and Marx a dollar for every pound which he loses.

The next day Kate groans as the corsetiere fits her into a "straight-jacket" and as she looks at the salad, and buttermilk she tries to persuade herself that she couldn't eat any more anyway. Running along the road she sinks exhaustedly on a park bench making room for the equally fatigued Roscoe who in rising tilts the bench and deposits her in a heap.

That night waiting in vain for the promised flowers, Kate suddenly calls the delicatessan and orders a tremendous meal; while Roscoe dejectedly sitting in a darkened movie jumps up as the hero's gift flowers remind him of his own neglect. Racing madly from florist to florist, Roscoe discovers every place is closed and with a dog yapping at his trousers, Roscoe picks roses from a beautiful garden, rushes back to his hotel, and urges the bell hop to bring the flowers to Kate and tell her to call him.

The delicatessan man arrives with a succession of trays and as she tells him it isn't for a party, it's all for her, two tramps waiting nearby decide to get a free meal. The next moment the bell hop arrives with the flowers and Kate joyously calls "Lonesome" Roscoe, only to ask him to hold the wire as the tramps enter. One of the tramps decides to rob the coin box and they push Kate into a phone booth. Meanwhile, Roscoe, worried by the long silence, suspects trouble and sends the bell hop for the police while he enters in time to frustrate the tramps and turn them over to the police. With difficulty he extricates Kate from the narrow booth and as they gaze at each other happily, the pair fall to Kate's meal with joy in their hearts. Donna and Cohen, and Mabel and Marks enter to congratulate the pair who are through with dieting forever, and while Roscoe beats time with a chicken drumstick, Kate sings, "I want to be happy."

OLD Hazel looked sharply at Sue and cackled as she realized that the two years in boarding school hadn't changed Toby's daughter. Ever since Sue's mother had been killed when the roadster in which she was fleeing with one of the money-loving idlers from the nearby beach resort had been driven over a cliff by Ann's lover, old Hazel had helped Toby bring up his daughter to hate the rich, and the two years at school had only confirmed Sue's realization that she belonged to the Devil's harbor fisherfolk. Racing across the sandy beach, Sue found her father buttoning his slicker as the storm came on. A strange dread filled Sue as her father's kindly form disappeared into the night, and in the fire she seemed to see again that horrible night when Joe West had caught her on the cliff and would have forced himself upon her if not for the arrival of old Hazel. A knock on the door made Sue jump and as she opened the door the storm swept in chilling her. But it was only John, a little twelve year old asking Sue to take some of the croup medicine to Sylvia Pratt's and tell her that the witch woman couldn't come tonight through this storm. It was John's admonition that he had seen Joe West that made Sue take the road.

Terror seized Sue as she sped along the dark road. Suddenly two lights glared through the night. A roar, a screech of brakes, the sound of a body being hit, and Forrest Deyoung knelt beside the still little figure he had run down. Days later, Sue opened her eyes to find Forrest and a doctor bending over her. Only a severe shock, the doctor was saying, could restore the girl's memory. In the days that followed Sue, whom Forrest called Spray, endeared herself to the boy and to his aunt, and Forrest, feeling keenly his responsibility for Spray's injury, postponed his marriage to Beth Rickey. From the first Beth resented Spray, and seeing how the girl had captivated every man in the gay set, Beth announced that she wouldn't marry Forrest until he got rid of that girl. It didn't matter to her that Forrest's aunt, Mrs. Howard adored Spray, and Mrs. Howard prayed her nephew would get over his infatuation for Beth who, to fix her hold on Forrest, refused to let him return the money she had pressed upon him when his father faced bankruptcy. Beth hoped that Al Townsend, whose unsavory reputation was widely spread, would take care of Spray when she invited them together to her house party, and when Beth, intoxicated and bare of shoulder made a flying leap into Forrest's arms, Spray, to hide an aching in her heart accepted the drinks Al offered her. When Spray passed out and Forrest scolded her, Beth pretended to be very sick to get her fiance's attention. BOOMERANG

Sarah Hall File No. 9401

BECAUSE her beautiful mother had died bringing her into the world, Olive's father hated her. In a few short years he burned out his brilliant life in gambling, drinking and drugs, and Olive, left alone, was given a home with the kindly lawyer, Mr. Brant, who had known and loved her parents before her. In the eyes of the young girl, however, there was always a hunger after beauty, a longing for travel and knowledge, and when Mr. Brant found her watching the blossoming trees through the window, he gently reminded her that he wanted the letters out as soon as possible. When, therefore, while taking her guardian-employer's dictation, Olive came across the affairs of one Clayton Loring, a dying client, who rebelled against having his family fortune revert to a dissolute cousin and wished the services of a woman of good character who would, for half a million dollars marry him upon his death bed, Olive begged Mr. Brant to recommend her. Brant's arguments were unavailing and at last Olive stood at the bedside of Clayton Loring and through a dim haze heard the words that made her the wife of a man who did not open his pain-wracked eyes to look upon her. Alone in the big dining room that night, Olive sat while the contempt of the servants lashed her. Even the doctors, telling her that Loring, relieved of the fear that Peter Santley, his cousin, would inherit his money, had dropped into his first untroubled sleep and might recover now, seemed to sneer. It was with eagerness that Olive, free to pursue her own life according to the terms of the marriage contract, took her mother's maiden name and called herself Mrs. Carson.

On the continent a legend sprang up about the beautiful young "widow" who had seemingly unlimited funds. Countless men laid their hearts at her feet, but Olive, bound by a self-contempt, followed a restless trail. The joys of travel, of masculine admiration, all that she had longed for previously seemed tasteless for she had sold her right to fall in love, and when, back in New York, Olive was introduced to Clayton Loring, through a mist she heard her hostess say, "You two hermits should find each other interesting." Loring was polite but diffident and in Olive was born the resolve to win back her own self-esteem through making the man who was her husband love her. For once the icy wall of impenetrability which Loring had built up was broken down by a woman's beauty and charm. Under the warmth of Olive's friendship, Loring expanded. He told her of Peter whom he hated for his free living. Olive shivered as Loring confessed his gratitude to the woman who had taken the money which was to go to Peter, and beneath his words she could feel his scorn of that woman whom he was not even curious to see. Fearful lest if she reveal herself now Loring would turn upon her, Olive continued her efforts to touch Loring's heart, and when at last she felt she had won his love, she came to him in his hunting lodge, and held close in his arms, told him she was his wife. Furiously Loring drove her from him crying she was no better than Peter, and Olive returned to Brant.

It was at his home that Olive met and fell in love with Peter. She saw in his easy acceptance of life, his epicureanism what Loring, the ascetic, hated. Vain were her efforts to avoid Peter, and when at last, he held her and asked why she fled from their love, she told him who she was. Peter smiled down at her. But he had known that. Brant told him.

Loring, however, exulted over his hold upon them. He would never release Olive to go to Peter. Only when Peter, playing upon Loring's great obsession, offered him a signed renunciation of the Loring inheritance, was Olive's annulment granted, and as Peter held her, Olive reminded him that now they had nothing. Peter kissed her gently and added happily, but each other.

MASTER OF DESTINY

Emmett E. Irwin File No. 9055

THROUGH an alcoholic mist, Edward Lansing heard the minister give his name to Kit Jordan, and as she raised swimming eyes to his, Edward said gruffly, "There, that'll save the kid." As they walked down the steps, Edward started outlining plans for the divorce making it very clear to her that he couldn't afford the disgrace at the outset of what was to be a brilliant medical career. Kit reminded him that he didn't have to claim the child. After all it would have been just her shame, but Edward waved his hand grandly. She was a good kid; but he happened to be in love with somebody else.

Two years later a brilliant wedding saw Dr. Edward Lansing joined in marriage to Gloria Armstrong. Edward was already locally prominent as a doctor and Gloria had money and influence. Kit ...ng the baby, saw the date on the calendar and ...sudden fit of fury tore the leaf off. At the ... Edward received congratulations and drank ... glass of whiskey. This was the biggest ...ife. Medicine was important, but now he had Gloria, and as they found themselves alone at last, he brought his lips down hard on hers.

Edward found his wife's money and influence rapidly expanding his practice, but Gloria lost her temper frequently over having Edward rush away from theaters and dances to his patients. Often they quarreled about it, and once Gloria urged him to give up medicine entirely, she had enough money for both. Edward stared at her incredulously. That was all it meant to her. That night she locked her door against him, and Edward drinking more now than ever brushed away the counsel of another physician after Edward's advice in a consultation had saved a baby's life. His quarrels with Gloria now were wearing him down and when Edward received a hysterical call from Kit begging him to save their baby, Gloria, furious because another evening was going to be spoiled, told Edward if he went to his patient, he would never see her again. Science was useless where the child was concerned and Edward comforted the stricken Kit and slowly returned home. A note from Gloria told him she was on her way to Reno for a divorce. For days Edward remained drunk and when the speakeasy proprietor called a doctor, Edward was sent to a sanitorium. Broken down in mind and health, he didn't respond to treatment, and when Edward's wife refused to answer communications, the sanitorium officials anxious to have their patient die away from the institution sent word to Kit whose address they found in Edward's pocket.

Kit it was who took the dying Edward in hand, reminded him of the career he had wanted so, and took him to a small town where an uncle's care rehabilitated Edward. Taking a new interest in life, Edward tried to practice medicine again, but small town gossip lashed at Edward and Kit when Gloria's divorce notice showed only too plainly that Edward and Kit were not married.

At length in a small western town where the doctor drove to his patients on horseback, Edward, now re-married to the faithful Kit, pulled himself from despond, and as a little fellow reached for the doctor's hand and proudly showed he could walk again, Dr. Edward happily entered his cabin where Kit awaited him.

SINNERS IN SCARLET

Pearl B. White File No. 8311

BECAUSE she sympathizes with the rebellion of her brother Ed against the petty passions of their small town, Ethel Hall sends him to Medical school, paying for all his expenses. At this time Tom Skinner, a promoter, arrives with his daughter May, and soon impresses the townspeople, largely through the skillful exploitation of May's beauty. On one of Tom's frequent trips out of town, he is discovered by an infuriated farmer, making love to Blanche, his daughter. The farmer compels Tom to marry the girl and take her with him. This Tom does under a fictitious name, and pretending satisfaction with the arrangement, Tom brings his wife to a hotel. After several days he leaves her on the pretense of business, giving her enough money to keep her from suspecting his plans. A few days later, he phones telling her that he is accepting a lucrative offer necessitating his traveling about the country for several months, and with a last protestation of his love, Tom leaves Blanche forever.

During this time Percy Wright, a young surveyor comes to Alton and falls in love with Ethel whom he meets at an ice-cream festival. May Skinner, however, is also attracted to Percy and her father promises to help. Under high pressure, he induces Ethel to purchase Florida lots, accepting in exchange a mortgage on her property as well as most of her savings, and at the same time hires men to intrigue Ethel into compromising situations in order to turn Percy and the citizens against her. Although Percy, unexpectedly called from town, misses Ethel's embarrassment, the worthy citizens' tongues are set wagging and Ethel finds herself being snubbed by her former friends. Tom forecloses her house, and in order to exist Ethel takes an old shanty in the suburbs. Bewildered and hurt, she becomes a recluse, addressing envelopes for a mail order house for a living, and concealing from her brother her misfortune. She works long hours and refuses to see even the grocer, for whom she leaves orders in an outside box.

Meanwhile Blanche, about to have a baby has desperately set out in search of Tom. Late one night Ethel, wearily typing the eternal envelopes, sees a girl outside, obviously ill. She is helping her in when a Dr. Phillips, passing through the town, stops his car and renders aid. Blanche's baby is born and the Doctor leaves after advising Ethel how to care for her patient. Blanche confides in Ethel and begs her to hold her baby until she finds her betrayer, and so bitter has her experience made her that fearing someone may steal her baby before she finds Tom, Blanche binds Ethel to promise never to let the child out of her sight or reveal its parentage. However, Ethel's friends, believing they may have wronged her come to visit and shocked by the baby's presence leave after she refuses to defend herself. When Percy returns, May tells him about Ethel's disgrace. He refuses to believe but when he comes to her, so hysterical is she that she believes he too is one of her traducers and she drives him away. Nevertheless, Percy does not turn to May, and when Ed comes home, May tells him that his sister has been disgraced by Percy. Everywhere Ed hears people talking and he denounces Ethel who begs him to listen. The citizens order Ethel to leave town and Ed, drink-crazed, goes gunning for Percy, only to miss him and shoot Blanche. Tom has worked upon the mob-consciousness of the worthies until they descend upon Ethel; but Blanche, being carried wounded to a hospital keeps crying for her baby and reveals she has left the child with Ethel. Percy and Ed rush to Ethel's defense, and Tom is revealed as the real culprit. Using his own arguments the mob turns upon him, but Ethel stops them, remits his sentence to support of Blanche, and as she is leaving with Ed and Percy discovers that the land Tom had sold her has doubled in value because it is needed for a certain development. Percy takes her from the bigoted small town forever and as his wife she finds happiness.

FAST MONEY

Nick Bertill File No. 9311

IN the dark alley, Tony walks into a man, apologizes and hurries on. Reaching his room he examines the wallet he has picked from the man's pocket and curses as he discovers it is empty. From his pocket he withdraws a much read letter from Mary Allen, a clerk in his father's shop. She writes that his father is at the City Hospital, and his mother is very worried about her son Tony, despite the fact that he has such a nice butcher business in New York. "Why doesn't Tony come home or send money? Money. Where is Tony going to get money? He walks outside and as he sees the great figure of Roy Sisk, detective from the Dudely Agency, Tony begins whistling. Roy, Dudely's yes-man has been pinning his hopes of distinguishing himself upon the capture of Tony and feels it is only a question of time before he catches him in the act. As he taunts Tony now, Tony laughs at Roy and calls him a chump. Only fear of being waylaid by the crafty little Italian keeps Roy from knocking the smaller man down. Tony walks on, his thoughts occupied with the fact that at home they think he's a Big Shot. Then he sees a big imousine stop in front of Mike's cigar store. Robert Randall, editor of the News looks around nervously before he asks for the usual cigarettes in the red package. For a moment, Tony pauses to use the cigarette lighter, but in that moment he has lifted the editor's wallet, and in an attempt at nonchalance, orders the same red cigarettes. Mike looks at him sharply then gives him the pack. A moment after Tony has left the editor discovers his wallet containing two thousand dollars in bills marked for a headline news story has been lifted. His impulse to call the police is nipped by Mike's reminder that a scandal will follow about the doped cigarettes. Fuming, the editor proceeds to the Dudely Detective Agency, and Tony, looking up from the apple pie he has exuberantly ordered at the discovery of the two thousand dollar haul, sees Roy grinning down at him. Tony thinks fast as the big detective gloats over his capture and distracting the dull-witted fellow for a moment with a dropped pie plate, Tony slips the wallet into the detective's pocket and submits to being searched. Tony waves gaily to the astounded detective, and then proceeds to shadow Roy, who proceeds to a speakeasy and orders a beer. Tony pales as the detective pulls out the wallet and stares at it in amazement. In the same pocket is the package of doped cigarettes. Throwing a quarter down for the untouched beer, Roy goes on home to ponder what to do with the money and as he fingers it avidly, he laboriously composes a note to the editor crediting himself with the marvellous recovery of the wallet. Meanwhile Tony waits breathlessly on the ledge and as the detective succumbs to the effects of the doped cigarette he has smoked while writing the letter, Tony noiselessly enters the room, recovers the money and proceeds home. A half-hour later, his hat at a rakish angle, Tony buys a ticket for his home town. His mother weeps over him, his father tells all the neighbors about his marvellous boy, and Tony goes out to find Mary Allen.

THE FOX

Carl C. Schomaker File No. 9446

IT is the brilliant exploitation scheme of the press agent of the Dale city theater, that "The Fox", magician extraordinary, break into the vaults of the new bank. The bank president, convinced of the practical value of having his vaults prove the first to foil the famous magician, consents to the advertising stunt. To the consternation of the bank officials, however, "The Fox" effects his entrance and packs the theater that night. Paulette, his assistant, looks troubled as "The Fox" applies his Mephistophelean make-up, and even as he kisses her tenderly, she tells him she doesn't like the idea of rousing municipal wrath just for publicity. At the performance that night, police seize "The Fox" and charge him with the theft of thousands of dollars from the safe. The master magician is lodged in jail and when Paulette comes to see him he rails against the stupidity of people who believe he would steal money with the spotlight of publicity upon him. Any fool could have walked off with the funds. As his indignation grows against the stupidity of the city authorities, he resolves to go into crime for a livelihood.

That night he breaks jail and within a few months the newspapers of Dale run frenzied headlines about the latest criminal activities of the notorious "Fox". Again and again he commits sensational robberies only to elude the baffled police. Paulette, alone, knows where the hiding place of "The Fox" is and as he shows her about the weird mansion he has built, she begs him to give up this life. Gently "The Fox" reminds her that he is still a fugitive from justice, and Paulette, scorning his mansion with its trick door that works like a vault combination, its windows opaque from without, yet provided with mirrors that reflect everything outside, warns him that she is through with him. He lets her go, but regretting it, he is so upset, that that night he falls into the hands of the police for the first time. They surround him in a barn, but when they break in, the elusive quarry has flown. Paulette, travelling to fill a vaudeville engagement sighs heavily as she reads of his latest escape.

However, when to the town of Dale comes Vest, a notorious Chicago gangster, who allies himself with the gang running the crooked Elite gambling Casino, his first payroll hold-up during which he coll bloodedly shoots down a clerk, is attributed also to "The Fox". This is the first charge of murder to be attributed to the former stage magician, and as fresh outrages occur, "The Fox" realizes police nets are tightening about him. He proceeds alone to the Casino, and after discovering that Vest is the gunman who is muscling in, he cleans up the bank by discovering the trick of the tables. He leaves hurriedly and a bullet grazes his ear. When Vest's men follow him, he has disappeared but realizing that he has been tracked, he prepares in his own house to make his escape.

Paulette, meanwhile, reading that "The Fox" whom she still loves, is being accused of murder, realizes he is not guilty of that and comes to plead with him to escape. He tells her he cannot get her into his mix-up with the sinister Vest outfit, and sends her away. Paulette, worried about "The Fox" decides to get police protection for him feeling he will be able to prove his innocence. With a sardonic smile "The Fox" admits Paulette and the police to his mansion, and tells them they are on time for an interesting adventure. Paulette realizes for the first time how quixotic her plan was when the police seize the man she loves, but before they leave, "The Fox" calls the attention of the police to the arrival of Vest and his gang, armed with machine guns. As the police cock their own guns, "The Fox" and Paulette vanish through one of the secret passageways, and when Vest's gang has been rounded up the police turn to the handcuffed "Fox" and discover that for the last time he has escaped them—with Paulette.

As the car speeding "The Fox" and Paulette through the night hums on, Paulette raises brimming eyes to her lover who reports "The Fox" is dead. Born is a respectable citizen—and husband.

THE MASQUERADERS

Minnie Fagan File No. 9422

BORED with the gaieties of Paris and finding that he can no longer compose music with his old fire, Ramon takes the advice of his manager and goes to a small Belgian town to rest. As he finds his nerves relaxing under the simple regime of pastoral life, he is touched by the loveliness of Margarite, daughter of the Mayor. He startles her as she is running across a field, and as she pauses, poised in flight, he murmurs, "Diana." "Diana?" Margarite laughs delightedly at the musician's error, "No, Mar-gar-ite." Amused, Ramon tells her the story of the beautiful chaste Diana. In the moonlight they are both affected by the glamor and love awakens. Margarite's family, awed by the honor being bestowed upon them, happily spread the news to the townsfolk who chatter good naturedly about the progress of the distinguished romance. There is to be the annual masquerade, and as a climax, the Mayor plans to announce the engagement of his daughter to the great musician. Margarite sews long hours upon her Diana costume, copying the design from an illustration Ramon has given her, while Ramon guilelessly purchases his domino costume at the local costumer who confides to Margarite what her lover is to wear.

However, Le Fontaine, Ramon's manager arrives to find how his plan is working and finds Ramon so absorbed in love that he has composed nothing. Ramon only shakes his head as Le Fontaine reminds him of his music, and when he admits that music is seething within him, Le Fontaine urges him to set it down now. At length Ramon sits down and amazed at his own creativity loses all sense of time. Le Fontaine, gratified, shrugs his shoulder as he sees Ramon's costume laid out, and bored as the hours pass, puts it on and joins the masqueraders. Margarite's entrance causes a murmur of approbation, and Le Fontaine, startled by the masked girl's beauty, dances with her then leads her into the garden. Believing the domino is Ramon, Margarite returns his kisses and upon this scene the astounded Ramon enters. He knocks Le Fontaine down and turning upon Margarite tells her what a fool he was to believe her different. "Diana," he sneers, and tearing up the music he has composed he returns to Paris.

To Margarite the sympathy and curiosity of the townspeople is alike unbearable and she flees to Paris, hoping that Ramon may discover the truth. Her money gives out and she takes work as a waitress. Celebrated locally as her beauty is, it is not Ramon, but Le Fontaine who finds her. Because Ramon had set to work anew and embraced Le Fontaine whom he assured had saved him from believing too recklessly in the goodness of women, his manager has withheld the explanation. Now Le Fontaine, recognizing the beautiful girl, finds himself falling in love with her, but soon learns that Margarite is anxious only to hear about Ramon, about his successes and his music. At length, before Ramon's big concert, Le Fontaine tells the disillusioned musician the truth about Margarite's supposed faithlessness, and in an exultant spirit, Ramon composes a musical drama which he calls, "Margarite." It is his expiation for his iniustice and he prays that Margarite may hear it. At the same time, Le Fontaine invites Margarite to Ramon's concert and in the tumultuous applause that greets the premiere of "Margarite", Le Fontaine brings the two lovers together. As he closes the door behind the two embracing young people, he shrugs his shoulders and turns his attention to the new waitress, who takes Margarite's place.

COUNTRY HOUSE MURDER

Harry von Lieth File No. 9435

WITHIN the office of John Baker, prominent broker, his stenographer Joan Bondon was demanding $50,000 to keep quiet about their affair. Her slim ankles swung from the desk as she coolly gave him two weeks to raise the money. The publicity of her suit, as she reminded him, would mean his ruin.

Baker taxied home in a blue funk and his wife, kissing him as he opened the door, noticed his perturbation. After eighteen years of happily married life, it was difficult to tell Helen about this girl. He even suspected she had been intimate with his partner, Williams, but that didn't help him. Helen listened quietly then said it might be a good idea for her to meet the girl. John was doubtful about the outcome, but under Helen's sympathetic management, he arranged a weekend party inviting his partner and Mrs. Williams, his assistant George Bartley, the Bondon woman, and Walter Sawyer, his life-long friend and legal adviser.

The Baker home was a massive structure built upon a high isolated hill. The guests arrived but from the first there was a hostile feeling in the room. After supper Baker, Williams and their wives played bridge while Sawyer looked on. On the other side of the room Bartley and the Bondon girl talked in whispering tones. When Baker suggested they all retire early to prepare for a hike the next day, everyone looked relieved. Sawyer commented upon a storm which seemed imminent and about midnight the rain descended in volumes. A crash of lightning was followed by a muffled scream and two shots in swift succession. Everyone ran into the hallway. "Where's Joan?" cried Bartley. In her room they found her lying in a pool of blood. Sawyer ordered everyone downstairs for questioning. It was impossible to summon the police, reported Baker. The telephone wires had been knocked down by the storm and no car could travel the muddy roads. Williams worriedly admitted under Sawyer's questioning that he had had a gun but it had been stolen from his drawer. Each of them claimed to have been asleep until the shots were fired. The only others in the house were a maid and a butler. At 4:30, after futile query, Baker suggested they get some sleep.

The next morning when Williams asked Mrs. Baker where her husband was, she said John had gone down to see if the storm had flooded the basement. The butler sent to call him shrieked, "'elp! 'elp." Baker's body was still warm. A bullet through the back of his neck had killed him. Sawyer quickly disproved Bartley's theory of suicide by snapping, "No man would shoot himself in the back of the neck." The automatic at Baker's side was the one Williams claimed had been stolen and Sawyer charged him with the murder giving as the motive the fact that although the Baker Brokerage had live accounts, Baker never seemed to make money. It was obvious the accounts had been tampered. While they were having dinner, the butler, mud-splashed, came in with four uniformed policemen to whom Sawyer entrusted Williams. They missed Bartley and he was found hanged in the garage. In his clenched fist was a note admitting the murder of Joan Bondon, with whom he had been unrequitedly in love. Bartley further testified that he had killed Joan with William's gun which had in turn been stolen by Sawyer who killed Baker with it. Having seen the butler leave for the police, Bartley had taken the easiest way out. Sawyer, lighting a cigarette admitted the truth, explaining that it was he who had stolen $20,000 from the firm. With Baker dead and Williams held for the murder he would have been free. He hadn't expected the Bartley-Bondon complications. Sawyer was lead away, and Williams and his wife left on a second honeymoon to Europe to rest up.

PAPER LOSSES

William J. Starace File No. 9439

AMBITIOUS young Len Parker, automobile mechanic, decides to give up his Indiana position and seek opportunities in New York. He receives a letter of introduction from Judd Winstead, owner of the general store, and in the metropolis accepts the position of chauffeur to Arnold, Judd's brother, a wealthy stock manipulator.

One day while driving Winstead's young daughter, Katherine, he hears her ridicule a friend who has married an obscure clerk, employed at her father's bank. The friend laughingly warns Katherine about being too sure of her own immunity, and Len jerks the car forward.

With the crash of the stock market, Arnold Winstead suffers severe losses but decides to accept paper losses on his large holdings in Latham Steel rather than sell at current prices. However, his optimism in the recovery of the market leads him to virtual ruin and he is compelled to dispense with the services of his servants, preferring to adopt new standards of living rather than sell even now. Katherine secures a clerical position but after a severe illness is advised by the doctor to rest and goes to live with her uncle in Indiana. There she again meets Len Parker, who has returned home to open a small automobile repair shop. Once Len offers Katherine a lift home during a storm and as he carries her from the car to her porch, both are strangely moved. Katherine becomes very friendly with Len's mother and sister and realizes she loves him by her eagerness to hear about him. However, Len, remembering only too well his consciousness of class distinction in New York, spends his spare time with Ray Winter, one of the popular girls in town.

With Judd Winstead's financial aid Len buys a second hand racing car and reconditions it to enter in the 100 mile race at Indianapolis. When the car is tried out at the track and shows winning possibilities, Judd is approached in his store by crooked gamblers who, attempting to fix the race, offer him a bribe to withdraw. Upon his refusal, they steal into Len's shop and pour six boxes of tapioca into the car radiator.

Early the next morning Judd and Len tow the car to the track, and Katherine, who has been looking forward to the race, is forced to tend the store when her aunt is suddenly taken ill. During the forenoon, a little boy comes to buy candy and Katherine, seeing him drag several tapioca boxes strung together, behind him recalls having sold the boxes to two strangers who had inquired whether the tapioca thickened while hot or had to cool. Now she recalls hearing her uncle speak about two men who tried to bribe him and when the boy tells her he found the boxes behind Len's garage, she makes furious efforts to communicate with her uncle and Len. After consulting with her aunt, she closes the store, speeds to the track and finds the race already in progress. Len's assistant is already perturbed by the rapidly rising thermometer, when Judd gets word to Len who takes time out to clean the cooling system of his car. Len wins and while thanking Katherine for what she has done for him, Len realizes how she has changed. He asks her to marry him and she accepts only to receive news from home that her father has been able to recoup much of his fortune by a merger of Latham Steel during a market spurt. Len offers to release Katherine, but she calls long distance, tells her father she is bringing Len home with her, and adds quickly, "Not as a chauffeur—as my husband."

TENNIS TEA

Phoebe Knight File No. 9398

WHEN Walter teaching Ninon how to ride his bicycle, let her roll down hill and found she had broken her wrist in falling, his heart sank. Afraid to take her to any other doctor in town lest the gossips realize that he, the up and coming young bank clerk, was having an affair with one of the despised miner's daughters, Walter at length trusted the discretion of Doctor Madison. Ninon whimpered softly as the doctor's skilled fingers set the broken bone and seeing the large grey eyes look trustfully into the bank clerk's, the doctor felt a pang in realization that his own youth had long fled. Then, seeing Ninon's interest in his garden, the doctor invited her to pick as many flowers as she wanted at any time. The arrangement worked beautifully. Ninon came to the doctor's garden to find an excuse to be near Walter, and the doctor enjoyed having youth about his house once more. Only Walter, assuring Ninon while he kissed her closed eyes, that as soon as he got another raise he would marry her, worried. What if anyone suspected? Once Doctor Madison, touched by the girl's trust of her lover, warned her, but seeing her swift withdrawal of confidence, he withdrew his paternal attitude, fearful lest the lightness and gaiety to which he had grown accustomed, be removed from his house.

Then, one day, Ninon realized she was going to have a child. Timidly she suggested to Walter that they set their wedding date soon, but Walter dazedly informed her it would mean his job. He couldn't do it. Couldn't she do anything? Ninon dragged heavy steps home and as she set the table, her father's searching eyes made her wince. Under the fury of his attack, Ninon crept from the house and as she walked slowly toward the lake, Doctor Madison, returning from a late call, found her. Before his blazing fire, she wept her shame, and he asked her softly if she would marry him. "You'd do that for me?" she asked incredulously, but the doctor was quick in his assurance that it wasn't entirely for her. "You see," he said, "I love you," and winced before her astonished, "You."

All Hartley buzzed with talk of the doctor having to marry that miner girl, but when the baby died, the doctor seemed more affected than Ninon. Nothing seemed too good for Madison to lavish upon his pretty young wife, but he winced before her unconscious reminders of the difference between their ages. It was some weeks before the first invitation arrived for the doctor's wife. Madison excitedly coached her for the Tennis Tea, but it wasn't until Ninon's questioning about exactly who was going to be there, that Madison realized his wife was looking forward to seeing Walter again. Suddenly he felt old and alone, and realized what a fool he must seem. The hands that were outstretched to embrace her dropped to his side. He didn't need her caution not to smudge her make-up.

At the tea, Ninon was dazed by the hostility of the townspeople. To the matrons she was "that woman" and when they laughed at the flowery dress her husband admired and gave her no opportunity to employ her carefully practiced manners, she sat there, a forlorn little creature. But it was Walter's cut, his brief, "We've met before," that made her rise suddenly. Oblivious to the murmurs of the other guests, she made her apologies and softly entering the darkened room where Doctor Madison sat alone, thinking, she put her arms about his shoulders and the warmth of her embrace made her husband look at her with shining eyes.

TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE

(TRADE MARK)

VOL. VI JUNE, 1933 No. 3

TO OUR PRODUCER AND WRITER-FRIENDS THROUGHOUT UNITED STATES AND FOREIGN COUNTRIES

NEW YORK CITY negotiates by far the majority of all stories utilized in Talking Pictures today, and our new department thus enables adequate representation in this field.

We maintain a staff of experts who are second to none. Whether it be work of synopses, technical working continuity, criticism, revision or typing, you may rely upon work of integrity at all times.

The necessity for legal protection through copyright is very evident. Proof of this is demonstrated almost daily in newspapers throughout the country. The Library of Congress at Washington is maintained for that purpose. Reliance upon the common law is unwise. No honorable author or producer desires to become involved in burdensome litigation, and copyright protection is protective insurance, by registration, against that substantial expense. The producer is thus protected against any unfounded claims of authorship, as well as the author himself.

TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE reaches only the producers and our clients. It is not on public sale. No advertisements are accepted, it being our purpose to keep it a strictly professional magazine.

Our offices are available for those producers who do not depend upon staff continuity writers. Our rates for this work are reasonable and are subject to contract.

In addition to synopses herein printed, complete script is submitted to suitable producers where in our judgment such submission is advisable.

Free copy of publication is sent to each author whose story appears herein.

Producers will find it extremely useful to retain TALKING PICTURE MAGAZINE in their files for a future emergency, in event that their present needs are supplied.

THE FORKED ROAD

John Texiera, Jr. Drama File No. 9457

NOT unconscious of the admiration of his secretary, Betty Saunders, John Warrel, young broker, finished his dictation and suggested since it was late that Betty come to dinner with him. As they danced to the excellent orchestra, John learned that Betty had been on her own since the death of her parents had left her alone in the world. He admired her spunk, but Betty warned herself against John's flattery.

Within a few months, John's successful speculations brought him recognition in the financial world and when one of his clients, Peter Weeden introduced Nora Rogers, John felt his heart describe a somersault. Nora adjusted her furs and leaned across the desk as John lit her cigarette. She smiled fascinatingly as she explained that she had inherited some money and had heard that John could make it bring rich returns. Flattered, John assured her that he wasn't infallible, that the stock market was entirely a gamble, but under Nora's honeyed persuasions he expressed his confidence in being able to do something for her. Some weeks later, Nora came to the office. Scarcely noticing Betty, Nora advanced both arms outstretched to John, and as he showed her that her money had already doubled under his direction, Nora looked at him with shining eyes. After several moments of badinage, Nora asked John if he wouldn't be her week-end guest at her summer home. There John met members of society and with Nora to recommend his business acumen, John won new clients. His own fortunes were in the ascendant through the increase in business and John began golfing with Nora's friends to the neglect of his own business. Frequently now Betty had to make important business decisions and John, tired from a night of dancing with Nora, would come in cross and ready to criticise everything.

Dancing at a country club with John one night, Nora asked him about her stocks. John's reassuring reply made Nora tweak his ear gently and tell him how wonderful he was and when, in the moonlight, John asked her to marry him, she consented.

The next morning John could scarcely sit still so happy was he and Betty turned away as he confided to her that he, John Warrel, risen from nothing, had captured one of the most beautiful society women as his fiance. However, as Nora's escort, John found less and less time for his business, and when some of his investments began to slide, John had to break a date Nora had made for him to work late at the office. Uncomplainingly Betty remained on and when at twelve o'clock, John recalled she hadn't had supper yet he insisted that she come out for a bite. An enterprising newspaper man, seeing them together wrote in his gossip column that the fiance of Nora Rogers had been seen dining with a pretty brunette. Nora was furious, and when John assured her Betty was his secretary, she continued to sulk. Then, calling for him at his office, Nora found him in conference with Betty and her cutting remarks caused Betty to resign. John remonstrated, but Nora kissed him and he yielded.

Without Betty to take charge while he took Nora to parties, John's business collapsed, and when the stook market broke he was utterly unprepared. For three days and nights John worked over his accounts while Nora fumed. Nora's stocks were worthless and blaming himself, John spent his personal fortune to repay her. He was broke, but Nora had lost nothing through him. The telephone rang. The gossip columnist wanted John's reaction to Nora's elopement with Peter Weeden. Slowly John hung up and Betty entered. She wanted to know if the old joh were open. John smiled bitterly. There was no old job, and as Betty drew near, John stretched his arms for her and asked her if she'd take a new job —as his wife.

THE WINNING GAME

Augustine Williams Drama File No. 9624

THE Kid had come to Pratt with a reputation as an athlete. High school victories had heen snaps for him and he was all set to make a big name for himself. The day he went out for the track team he could see gratitude in Coach Askin's eyes and with a smile of confidence, he received the shrewdly worded praise of the Pratt mentor. But the Kid found he had a lot to learn, and the coach frequently lost patience with him for his self-assurance. Once Askins lost his temper. Like a lash Askins' words cut the Kid as he informed him that the first lesson a player had to learn was the team came first! Flushing, the Kid looked up and saw that the prettiest girl he had ever seen was listening. For a moment the Kid felt he would strike his coach, but Askins slapped his shoulder and as he greeted the girl familiarly, the Kid went on to the locker room. From the window he saw Willis, a star athlete join the girl and go off arm in arm with her. Still red from the scolding, the Kid heard one of the other track men discuss the progress Willis was making with Askins' cute sister, Bette.

It was several weeks before the Kid met Bette, and she looked at him curiously remembering her hrother's abuse, but later as they danced together, Bette told him he'd find out the coach was a grand fellow in spite of his ruthlessness. The trouble with Vic, Bette explained, was that he never stopped to reckon costs. When he set his mind on a goal, no sacrifice was too great. Before the Kid could answer, Willis found them and claimed his dance.

During his freshman year, the Kid managed to distinguish himself, but the following year he was kept out of the most important events by an injury. Meanwhile Willis was forging steadily ahead and between him and the Kid a rivalry existed for Bette. Willis had one advantage. Parentless, he was inheriting a fortune on his twenty-first birthday. He could take Bette to places whose prohibitive prices barred the Kid, and more than once resentfully the Kid felt that that was why the coach favored Willis—because he could provide well for his sister. Looking at him, the Kid magnanimously admitted, there was nothing wrong with Willis. Rich, handsome, his money usually made a clear path for him, whereas the Kid had to fight every inch of the way.

When Coach Askins informed the Kid he was too light for the weights, and too slow for the dash, the Kid gritted his teeth. Reluctantly it seemed, Askins admitted that the Kid could try the mile race, but he wasn't built for it. Determined to show them, the Kid practiced until the college took notice of him. He saw Bette wave cheerily as he started, and confidence born of hard practice welled within him as he planned to hit his stride in the last lap. But soon his legs wobbled, and with a grunt of dismay, the Kid saw others break the tape before him. Dejectedly, he decided he was through, but Bette ran to him later and told him he couldn't quit now. He had to show them. The Kid suddenly realized them meant her brother and Willis, and the next weeks were so intensive that the day of the big meet with Farley, the Kid knew his reputation was well known. He had only to prove himself. Then when both teams had piled an equal number of points, Coach Askins approached the Kid and asked him to set a terrific pace to throw Farley's runners off, so that Willis could win. Dazed, the Kid started to protest but Askins said briefly, "It's the only way." Willis won. Slowly the Kid dressed. He was a failure. Well Askins had never liked him and he had used his position to eliminate him from his sister's consideration. Outside Bette was hopping up and down as her hand found the Kid's. "Vic has something to tell you," she said. Through a fog, the Kid heard Askins say he had been asked to recommend his successor. He was going on to a bigger college. How would the Kid like the job? The Kid saw Bette nod her head energetically. Bette!

THE ONE DESIRE

Mrs. Emanuel Traylor Drama File No. 9862

AS a child Mary was always aware of the difference between her mother and the mothers of the other children. Often mothers would snatch their little ones away when Mary came near and once some of the older children taunted her with the fact that she had no father. When Mary, weeping, asked her mother what they meant, tears streaked a grotesque course down Mrs. Louchet's painted cheeks as she folded her daughter close and told her that she wouldn't have to worry about that any longer, they'd leave town the next day.

Years of scrimping followed. Mary noticed how her mother seemed to age, but now Mrs. Louchet's cheeks were free of the harsh paints and a closer friendship existed between the two. As soon as Mary was old enough she left school and applied at a city hospital for training as a nurse. Meager as her pay was she sent most of it home to her mother and her days became filled with joy for at the hospital Mary met Dr. More, a rising young physician. The first time Mary worked on a case with him, he smiled at her efficiency and said, "New, aren't you?" Thereafter he asked that Mary work with him on his cases and a friendship sprang up between the two. Dr. More noticed how different Mary seemed from the other nurses. The doctors were never too familiar with her and once, as she was walking through the park near the hospital, he met her, and they walked together. Before long he was telling her of his love, and as he slipped an engagement ring over her finger he held her reverently and said, "You're so pure, so untouched," and his kiss was gentle. On her first day off Mary flew home to her mother to show her the ring but a man passed her as she went in, and Mrs. Louchet's fever-flushed cheeks were once more red with paint. "Mother!" Mary cried, "Why? Why?" And together they wept. Mrs. Louchet promised it would never happen again, but a few days later, Mary had to find Dr. More in the wards and as she approached him the patient whispered, "Mary." "She was found on the streets. . . ." Dr. More hegan, but Mary threw herself upon the wasted figure and moaned, "Mother, mother."

That night Mary learned that Dr. More had gotten transferred to another hospital. "I loved you because you were so pure," his letter read, "And now I can't stand it." Tears would not come. When her mother had recovered, Mary took her to another town. Her lips twisted as she realized that once again they were fleeing.

In another city Mary found employment and her heart ached as her mother vainly tried to do penance for wrecking Mary's life. At the store Mary met Foster. He showered her with attention, but Mary was cold to him and when once he had been particularly persistent, she sought to stop him by telling him she had no last name. Smoothly Foster gathered her in his arms and told her that made no difference and as she wept against his shoulder his lips bent to her hair. Once Mrs. Louchet looked at Mary hard and she cried out at what she saw but Mary had gone too far to stop and it was not until she found she was to have a child that Mary learned that Foster had never intended to marry her—that he had a wife. Then, Mary tried to kill herself and only her mother saved her. The child died at birth but no one could save Mary until Mrs. Louchet humbled herself before Dr. More and begged him to come to her daughter. Touched, the doctor came and Mary opening incredulous eyes to see Dr. More above her, wept as he told her nothing mattered save that he loved her.

THE SILENT BLADE

Mabel J. C. Gilderhus Drama File No. 9722

VIVIAN DARE looks up impatiently from the statue she is carving to explain to Gregory Devon, her father's young business partner, that she cannot marry him because she does not love him. A few days later, the girl is informed by the police that her father has committed suicide after his unfortunate speculations have driven his firm into bankruptcy. Vivian tries to communicate with Greg but he has vanished.

Time passes. At an exhibition of her statuettes. Vivian meets Lionel Kyle, a young lawyer who falls in love with her. Happy for the first time in months, she is walking along the street when she sees a dope-crazed derelict pass and cries out in horror, "Gregory." Touched by his fever-bright eyes, she hails a cab and cares for Gregory until he is himself again. He blames his condition upon her father, and when he begs her to marry him, telling her he cannot live without her, Vivian, feeling she is obligated to Greg because her father has ruined him, unhappily promises. Lionel tries to dissuade her from this step, but she goes through with it. However, married, Greg soon makes frequent trips to the underworld where he can obtain dope from Wynne, a girl who loves him. Vivian warns Greg that unless he gives up the drugs she will leave him, and Greg tells Wynne that he cannot see her again. Fiercely she cries that she will not give him up but Greg returns to Vivian's studio. When his wife tries to elude his embrace he lunges at her until, sobbing, she breaks away from him and runs into the street. Wynne, infuriated by Greg's repudiation, follows him to his wife's studio and sneering at the carved statues, tells him he belongs to her and her people. Greg orders her to leave and Waynne picks up the knife with which Vivian has been carving a few moments before. With her gloved hand she strikes at Greg and escapes. Vivian is held for the murder of her husband. Lionel defends her but the other tenants in the house testify to the quarrel between Vivian and her husband a few moments before the murder. The janitor testifies he saw Vivian run from the house her arms over her eyes and hurry into a taxi. Vivian cries out it is a lie that she walked down the street, but when Lionel attempts to introduce the possibility that there might have been another woman, the district attorney sarcastically asserts that Lionel is trying to confuse the jury to save the woman he loves. A verdict of guilty is brought in and dazed, Lionell realizes he has failed Vivian. As she is led to her cell he promises he will continue working on the case until he has solved it, his only clue being the janitor's testimony about the taxi.

Knowing that Greg was a dope addict, Lionel goes to the slums, to the dope dens and pretending to be, himself, a derelict, tries to find out information about Greg's habits. From a fiend, he learns that Greg was friendly with one Wynne, and Lionel seeks her out. He flatters her by his supposed love and when he tells her she is too good for this kind of life, Wynne agrees to escape with him. Dressed in cheap finery she accompanies him to the apartment he has selected for them. Wynne looks about the studio and as she recognizes Vivian's statues still in their places she grows hysterical. Her confession frees Vivian. Outside the prison, Lionel is waiting and with a little cry, she runs into his arms.

THE CONSTANT FEAR

Loverne M. Compton Drama File No. 9745

EDUCATED at the most fashionable finishing schools, Judith's ambition is to be a great musician. At a dinner party, induced to play for the other guests, Judith captures the attention of Clive, a tall fine looking boy who sweeps Judith off her feet. In love, Judith is easily persuaded after a gay party to marry Clive and they elope, although she cuts herself off from her family who thoroughly disapprove of her choice.

For the first year of their married life, Judith and Clive are happy, although he shows himself less attentive than he might be when Judith's daughter is born. Then one day Clive takes Judith out on the speed boat he has bought while she was ill. In an attempt to demonstrate his proficiency, Clive upsets the boat and Judith is caught under it. In great agony she is carried to the hospital and for three months she is constantly under the influence of drugs. When she is removed to her own home, the intense pain still remains and although Dr. Layton, a young interne at the hospital has warned her against losing her nerve, Judith finds the pain unbearable. Her husband's family physician gives her codine and then hypodermics for relief. Soon Judith finds she cannot do without the drug and one day when Clive sends for the doctor he learns his wife is an addict. Turning upon the broken girl, he calls her vile names and gets a divorce. Her child is taken from her on her husband's testimony that she is unfit to care for the youngster and disgraced, Judith leaves the court. Her nerves shriek for drugs and to still the pain she descends to the slums and in the lowest dope dives of the city gets dope. To pay for the drugs she is forced to shoplift and even to sell her body. Then one day she is caught. Like a whipped animal she is taken to the police station and for three days pending trial she is locked in a cell. At first too miserable to notice her surroundings, she gradually realizes the other three women are a negress, a drunkard, and an old hag who rolls on the floor screaming for drugs. Appalled, Judith realizes this is where she is drifting and she stares hopelessly through the bars until she is led before the judge. Severely he sentences each case but Judith shudders as she sees him turn to Dr. Layton, the young interne who is doing social work. Startled he recognizes her and after a brief conversation with the judge, secures a suspended sentence for her. It is Dr. Layton who upbraids Judith's parents and awakens them to a sense of how little she is to blame for her condition. At length, touched, they take her back and under the young Doctor's care Judith begins the long hard struggle to break herself of her addiction. Layton is amazed by her courage and when one day he enters her house to find her playing the piano, he is startled by her loveliness. Swiftly he crosses the room and kisses her and as she yields to his embrace he realizes she has a definite place in his life. Weeks later, when he is offered a consulting position in a Western hospital and asks her to accompany him as his wife, Judith shivers with her old fear, but as his strong arms encircle her, she knows that with him she will be safe.

SKY RAIDERS

Michael Sposato Drama File No. 9855

WITH two hours more to go before he delivered his load of mail, Jim Davis hunched low in the cockpit of his Haviland as he tried to clear the storm. Suddenly out of the darkness of the rain-swept night three planes appeared and surrounding him forced him to land. Grounded, Jim waited helplessly, an automatic pressed to his back, while masked pilots took a small package from his plane and left him, minutes later, to get back to port and report the robbery. Back at his own airport, Joe Freeman, the super, heard Jim's story and reported it sounded mighty fishy to him. Jim clenched his fists. Years before Joe and he had been friends. Jim had been in love with Joe's sister, Clara before the war. But at Orly in the same flying squadron the two had become enemies and each time Jim Davis had triumphed. Years later, when Jim was flying United States mail, Joe had come as superintendent of the field and now he had his chance to square his score with Jim.

Under suspicion, Jim tried vainly to trace the three mysterious ships to prove his story and Joe Freeman, claiming he had his own ideas about letting a thief hang himself, ordered Jim to go out on his regular route. However, at the other end they reported telephoned orders had come that Jones, another pilot, carry the diamonds Jim was to have carried. Hours later, asleep in his bunk, Jim was awakened with the others to search for Jones already eighty minutes late. Near where the three planes had stopped him, Jim's flares lit up the wreck of Jones' plane. Freeman and the others, attracted by the flares landed, lifted the dead pilot's body into one of the planes, and just as they were searching the wreckage, a careless move caused a lamp to set fire to the wrecked plane and all damaging evidence was destroyed. Grimly Jim returned with the others, his mind awhirl.

Williams, a United States detective questioned Jim closely and Jim, stung by the suspicion cast upon him was startled to learn that Joe's sister, Clara was coming on a visit. Antagonized by Joe's warning that he keep clear of his sister, Jim started a hot retort when Clara's unexpected arrival oleared the air. Gayly Clara greeted the two and planned Jim's taking her about as he used to when he started teaching her to fly. The next day, however, Clara was cool to him and Jim bristled at Joe's admission that he had explained Jim's connection with the robbery. However, a telephone call telling that a run at a Federal Reserve bank necessitated the immediate transport of gold, caused Jim to set off with the valuable shipment. Half way the three eerie ships signalled for him to ground his plane and as he kept on, bullets spattered at him. Hard pressed, Jim saw to his amazement, a black plane coming to his aid, and as his ship landed, coming out of the spin he had taken to avoid his being picked off by the bandit's bullets, the black plane downed one of the bandit ships and the others fled. A weighted envelope brought Jim the message that he was not to mention the Samaritan ship, and wondering, Jim waved in assent. Jim noticed Joe's start of surprise at seeing him safe and later Williams took Jim aside and told his plan to capture the sky raiders by announcing a run with a fake sum of $200,000. Williams' government men, heavily armed, were to ride in the mail pit. A note on his pillow told Jim to leave immediately but as he rode he realized there were no men in the cockpit as Williams had planned and when the three ships shadowed him, Jim realized the game was up. Bravely he tried to shoot it out, but he grew faint as bullets slashed his legs and shoulders and then suddenly the black ship was there. Jim's head felt light as the bullets beat a tatoo and three ships crashed to the ground. With a great effort, Jim pulled himself from the wreckage and drew out the pilot of the wrecked black plane then fainted as he saw—Clara Freeman. Later, in the hospital, Jim looked into Williams' eyes and followed him into the room where Joe Freeman was dying. Joe confessed he was the organizer of the sky raiders and dying he won forgiveness from Clara and Jim. Later Clara told how she had been sent by the government to investigate seeretly. She had suspected Joe ever since he had returned from Orly, bent on revenge upon Jim. And with her head against Jim's shoulder, Clara promised to resign from the service to become his wife.

ANOTHER DAWN

Mabel C. Stewart Drama File No. 9854

ONLY with the greatest difficulty can Steve Norwood be persuaded to attend a musicale at the home of a friend, but from the moment he sees Edith, a lovely young violinist, he begins to enjoy himself. Eagerly he has his host introduce him to the girl, recently returned from her studies in Paris, and Steve doesn't give Edith a moment's rest until she promises to marry him.

A PLEASANT LETTER Received from Mrs. Alice Parker
PARKER STUDIO
Victoria, B. C., Canada

I must congratulate you upon the publication of your comprehensive and business-like Magazine. Indeed, when one considers the tremendous amount of labor entailed in its production, (to say nothing of the millions of hours of labor and brain work of the authors represented therein,) one realizes the vast amount of imagination and work which has gone into the making of its pages.

Yours faithfully,
ALICE PARKER

Steve adores Edith so much that he is jealous of every public appearance of hers and objects to the music lessons she gives their child Robert. She has the greatest difficulty persuading him to let her play at a benefit, but Steve bristles as Randall, a musician whom Edith has met in Paris, rushes forward to renew their friendship. Steve shows his resentment on the way home and when Edith chides him for his jealousy telling him that Randell has a child Hazel, as old as little Robert, Steve asks what that has to do with it, even a fool can tell Randall is in love with her. In the weeks that follow Edith is driven mad by Steve's jealousy, and one day after quarreling over Robert's music lessons, Edith rushes from the house hoping her fierce headache will be allayed by a long walk. On the way she meets Randall, distressed because Hazel is ill and he can't get a doctor for her. Edith hesitates only for a moment, then visits the sick child who drops off to sleep in Edith's arms. She tries to explain to Steve, but he glares at her in disbelief and before she can say a word in her own defense he tells her he is suing for divorce. Steve names Randall correspondent, and in the disgrace of the divorce trial, the child Robert, is awarded to the self-righteous Steve, while Edith, brokenly turns to go. Randall, however, persuades her to marry him and for the sake of little Hazel who adores her, Edith does. She finds surcease from the bitterness that haunts her, in teaching little Hazel to play and when Randall, always frail and too high strung dies, he thanks Edith for being so fine a mother to his child.

The years have not been kind to Steve. Remorse and bitterness have made him a crochety old man and no nurse can please him. At the advice of his physician, Robert takes his father to Atlantic City for a vacation, but Hazel, there to play at a concert, practices in the adjoining room. Her violin playing of the same pieces that Edith used to love, drives Steve frantic and shouting at the top of his voice, he orders Robert to go in and make that infernal music stop. Embarrassedly, Robert knocks at the door, and Hazel is readily sympathetic to his plea of an ill father. When she offers to help, he brings her in and under Hazel's soothing hands, Steve relaxes. He thoroughly approves of his son's choice of a girl until he learns that she is Randall's daughter. Then his sudden gust of temper leaves him breathless. Blaming Randall for winning Edith from him, he forbids his son to see Hazel any more and Hazel returns home. Edith sees Hazel's woe and learning of her love for Robert, realizes why Steve has interfered. Wrathfully she visits Steve and under her contempt he withdraws his objections. As the youngsters sit in the music room, playing their music together, Steve softly asks Edith to forgive him and with misty eyes she nods in promise of another marriage.

WHITE GODS

Grace Ellis Drama File No. 9957

MR. ROBERTS, smiles when his daughter Joan, tanned as a native by the sun, explains that she is going to a neighboring West Indian island with the natives among whom she has been brought up, to attend a marriage ceremony. As he tells her the new foreman will come in on the ship today, Joan wrinkles her pert nose and whispers, "I hope this one is young."

However, when Roberts walks down to the beach to welcome his new assistant he learns that he is drunk. A letter explaining that the man slated for the job took sick and they were sending Jim Hall in his place, recommends the boy highly as a worker but explains that Jim drinks to forget a girl who jilted him—and, incidentally, he hates all women. From the first Jim chooses a native boy rather than the customary girl to do his cooking and cleaning and threatens to lash any woman who comes within sight of his hut.

The next morning, Jim, clean-shaven, apologizes for his surliness of the day before, and Roberts, liking him despite himself, takes Jim upon the water to explain sponge diving. During working hours, Jim is not to drink since the sharks are too apt to get him. After work, it's his own lookout. The evenings Jim does not come up for his regular chat at Robert's hut, he locks himself up and goes on a tear. Joan, returning during one of Jim's spells decides to take a look at the new man and accompanied by some native girls, sees him lying with a bottle beside him. Thinking her a native girl trying to flirt with him, Jim bellows at her to leave and when she stands her ground, he reaches for his whip and strikes her. Hating him she rushes out, making the natives promise to say nothing to her father. When her father shows her another letter from his sister asking why he doesn't send Joan home to be civilized, to his surprise, Joan consents to go. In New York after the first weeks of strangeness, Joan has a glorious time, but soon, home-sick, she returns. In her New York clothes, Jim does not recognize Joan as the girl he struck and she, saying nothing, recognize their mutual growing love. Then, one day, Roberts slips into the water and although Jim dives in and kills the shark attacking Joan's father, he is too late. For two days the native drums sound their mourning. Suddenly they stop and Joan falls into her first sleep. Awakened she hears a different beat that accompanying sacrifice. In a clearing she finds Jim, whom the natives blame for all their misfortunes, tied to a stake. In native dress and speaking the native tongue, Joan pleads for the life of the man she loves and last her assurance that he is to be her husband wins them. They carry Jim into his hut and Joan sits wondering how she can tell Jim that the natives are already preparing the marriage ceremony for them. Then Jim opens his eyes and recognizing Joan now, for the first time, as the native girl he had never forgiven himself for striking, he begs for forgiveness. With a cry, Joan creeps into the strong arms, "If you don't kiss me and marry me," she says, "I'll have them burn you at sunrise." For answer he bends to her lips. The native drums beat a joyous rhythm.

THIS ONE MADNESS

Eva M. Coller Drama File No. 9822

WITH a sigh Dr. Edwin G. Thomas makes out a large check for the maintenance of his wife, Frances and as she pockets it she smiles sardonically upon the man whom the law says is her husband. Wearily Edwin asks why this farce must go on why they don't obtain a divorce and break Cleanly but Frances replies that, rising as he is in his profession, she would be a fool to accept only the alimony the court would grant her now. Besides she sees no reason for haste. She is comfortable as things are.

In the practice of his profession Dr. Thomas is cool and capable and the number of his patients steadily increases. Many women try to pierce his invulnerability but he is proof against them all until, it happens, after a late day, he receives a hurry call to Madeline Cameron's apartment. His deft fingers soon relieve her pain and she smiles wanly at him as he tells her he'll be back tomorrow. Soon Madeline is able to sit up and in her soothing apartment, Dr. Thomas finds a respite from the cares of the day. Always Madeline is soft voiced, intelligent, understanding, and believing their attraction to be entirely mental. Dr. Thomas takes her to theatres and brings her the latest books. Then, one day at his office Frances comes and her spiteful references to Madeline make Edwin's blood boil. When he comes to Madeline that night she immediately perceives that he is troubled and he confides to her about his wife. She is grave as she turns her head away and for the first time Edwin realizes with a sharp stab of pain that he is in love. "My dear," he says. "My dear." Realizing now that she loves him, his own feelings mount so that one night as they sit together, he is overcome by his own emotions and he seizes her in his arms. "No!" she cries, "No!" and rushing into her own room the door slams after her. For several moments Edwin stares into the flickering flames, then leaves. The next day a brief note from Madeline tells him she has gone to Europe to forget him, she could never be happy as his mistress.

For months Edwin suffers anguish without her and when Frances gaily comes for her monthly check she informs him coldly that she is getting a divorce to marry an aged millionaire. And what, she taunts, has become of your inamorata? But Madeline has left no trace behind and after months of bitterness and pain, Edwin gradually reconciles himself to life without her. He makes definite strides forward in his profession, reads papers before the Academy, and receives honors, but in his heart he knows that his body rebels against his celibacy.

Then one day he receives a call from Madeline. He winces and sends his assistant, but when the boy comes back shaking his head over the case, Edwin rushes to her. For hours he works over her and as she opens her eyes she smiles happily. His professional calls continue but he tries to be adamant against her attraction. Softly she tells him how she suffered without him but he tells her coldly that marriage is not in his plans now. With a little cry she comes to him, saying she can't live without him, and as his arms tighten about her he knows she is his destiny. "Our marriage," he finally manages to say, "will be different." And Madeline who has always understood him, smiles.

SPLENDID DOOM

Ellen Svala Drama File No. 9767

LONG after the ship on which Viola had left for Italy to train her glorious voice, had dropped below the horizon, Richard stood on the deck looking after it. Minutes later Adeline and Bob succeeded in drawing Richard away and the three walked down the dusty road together.

Years passed. It was the night of the party given in honor of Viola's homecooming. Bob, arriving early, found Adeline arranging the flowers. Gayly he slipped behind her and hands over her eyes said, "Guess." "Richard!" she cried, and as his hands dropped disappointedly she said, "Oh, Bob, it's you." "Don't you ever think of me first, Adeline?" She tweaked his ear playfully. "No, I'm serious. Marry me," he pleaded. Distressed she dropped her hands and as he said, "It's Richard. . . ." she made no answer. A group greeted Viola's arrival. More beautiful than ever her eyes swept the room imperiously and as Richard leaped forward, she extended one white hand. Abashed, Richard seized it and clumsily imprinted the kiss upon it for which she waited. That night Richard seemed in a daze. His eyes never left Viola for a moment. The first moment alone with her he breathed, "You are more glorious than ever." Viola smiled and impassioned, Richard begged her to keep her promise that she would marry him when she returned. Viola's fingers caressed Richard's hair, but when he sought to kiss her she drew back. "Not now," she said and Richard, worshipping her announced to the curious guests that Viola had promised to be his bride. Adeline's hand flew to her mouth, and Bob standing near, patted her hand in sympathy.

It was a mad relationship but Richard, adoring the ground upon which the variable Viola walked, was heedless of the reports of the men whose hearts Viola had trampled on. Trembling Richard entered Viola's house and asked if she would sing at the concert March the 36th. At first hesitant, Viola consented but when in his exuberance Richard tried to kiss his affianced, she eluded him. Playfully she promised to kiss him for the first time the night of the concert and Adeline who had been a silent and neglected spectator throughout slipped out of the room. A few day before the concert, Viola's eyes shone at an invitation from the Baroness Tau. So signal an honor was rare and had been won by reports of Viola's beauty. Adeline entering was distressed by Viola's determination to go. "But the concert. . . ." "What about the concert?" asked Richard entering. Viola explained she was going to the Baroness's home and as Richard protested excitedly, she laughed. "But I shall be back on time. Nothing can keep me away. Nothing." Richard was reassured. "And the kiss?" "That too," she mocked.

Dozens of tall candles illuminated the music room. The guests waited patiently but Viola had not yet returned. It was time for her number. Bob winced as he saw Adeline's eyes fixed on the agitated Richard and as the guests grew restless, Adeline stepped forward to play in the interim. Suddenly the door opened and Viola entered, hair streaming disheveled behind and her draperies leaving little pools of water on the polished floor. Silently she came toward Richard and taking his arm walked with him into an adjoining room. "Richard," Adeline cried, "Don't go." A moment later a ghastly scream rent the air. Bob threw the door open. Upon the floor Richard lay dead, Viola's lipstick red upon his lips.

A telegram from the Baroness told of Viola's death by drowning an hour before, and Bob's arm moved protectingly across Adeline's shoulder as he drew her away.

SPEAKEASY

Wesley W. Dillion Drama File No. 9967

GLITTERING in the jewels that Wally Drayton has given her, Dolores turns away from her mirror to see Wally entering her room. He kisses her brutally and while she is repairing her makeup he tells her he wants her to be very nice to his friend, Sanders who is good for several thousand dollars. Dolores' eyes fill with tears. "Wally," she cries, "you know I love you. I wish I didn't. But I won't do that." "You'll do it," he mutters, "Come!" That night in the Wharton speakeasy Wally ignores Dolores and leaves her to the amorous advances of Sanders. In disgust, Dolores leaves the table and when, her cry over, she returns, she finds to her dismay that her party has gone. All her self-possession gone, she lowers her head on her arm and sobs just as if she weren't widely known as Wally Drayton's woman. Don Wharton, proprietor of the speakeasy approaches and advises her to stop crying,—no man is worth the tears of a beautiful woman. His sympathy makes her expand and soon she is confessing that she hates herself for loving Wally and feeling that no matter what he does, some day she will return to him. Don looks at her for several seconds then asks if she'd like to work for him. She consents and soon she is receiving a high salary although her talents are limited. Once she thanks Don for what he has done for her but he tells her it's because he loves her. When he asks her to marry him, she reminds him of Wally, but he repeats, he loves her. Since Wally has left town, Dolores consents. Then one day, she sees a picture in the paper. Wally has returned. When Don comes in to kiss her, she evades him and finally admits she is going back to Wally. Dully his hands drop, and he tells her he'll be waiting for her if she ever wants to return. Wally laughs harshly when he sees Dolores has come back but when he kisses her, he pushes her from him and asks, "What's the matter with you? All your old fire is gone." Dolores looks at him and answers, "I just found out I don't love you any more." Angered, Wally tries to take her in his arms and force her to deny that, but he is helpless before her assurance. Dolores goes back to Don who receives her without a word of reproach.

However, Wally's pride has been delivered a fierce blow and determined to have his revenge on the man who took Dolores from him, he hires thugs to beat up Don and destroy his speakeasy, but Don opens his eyes to see Dolores bathing his forehead and murmuring words of love, and managing a wry smile he says, "It doesn't matter. I never did want that speakeasy. How about a chicken farm?" "Darling! Then you forgive me?" "I'd forgive you anything," he answers, "But I'd have felt very badly if you didn't come back."

THE WEAKENING DESIRE

Joseph Wittman Drama File No. 9750

SOPHISTICATED, worldly wise, Olive distrusts the happiness of her younger and more impressionable friend Ruth. To all Ruth's enthusiastic confidences about Fred with whom she has fallen in love at first sight, Olive remains cynical but when Ruth comes in flushed with happiness exclaiming joyfully that she and Fred have just been married, Olive admits that she might have been too harsh in her judgment that Fred isn't the marrying kind.

In her great joy Ruth plans a party for all the girls who had worked with her, and Olive comes over to help her. Fred, learning of the plans loses his temper and when Ruth explains she just wanted to surprise him, and stands on tiptoes to receive the kiss betokening forgiveness, Fred pushes her harshly from him and tells her the truth. He has just married her because according to the terms of his uncle's will he needed a wife. Now that he has the money he has only one desire—to gain power through the multiplying of his wealth. A wife will be only a hindrance to him and he is now ready to settle twenty thousand dollars upon Ruth and put her out of his life. Dazedly Ruth pleads her love for him. She tells him she will never hamper him in any way but he can't leave her now. Fred is gentle but firm as he tells her didn't know she felt so strongly about it but that with the money she can find happiness elsewhere. Ruth laughs hysterically and before Fred can stop her she hurls herself from the penthouse window. Wildly Olive runs down the stairs but she covers her eyes and turning upon Fred who stands as if graven of stone, she whispers hoarsely, "I'll make you suffer as you tortured her."

For weeks Fred is overcome with remorse, but gradually the need to take his mind from his guilt takes the form of activity in Wall Street. To break off from the past he changes his name and begins trading with a concentration and phenomenal shrewdness that soon places him among the big men of the Street. Meanwhile Olive has been trying to find him and when she recognizes his picture in a paper, she bides her time until she gets a position as his secretary. Fred does not recognize her, changed as she is, and Olive plans her revenge. Gaining his confidence, she is soon investing her own money in Fred's stocks, and he, enthusiastic over his unparalleled success attributes his luck to her. Fred begins to fall in love with Olive and she leads him on, withdrawing always from his grasp. Then she confers with an unscrupulous broker and arranges to inform him of all Fred's activities. Fred is soon distressed by the realization that other traders can anticipate his movements but the last person he suspects is Olive with whom he is in love. In a desperate attempt to recoup his losses, he speculates, investing all his capital in one sure tip only to see his hopes fail. At a ticker, Olive smiles grimly as she watches the progress of the stock and realizes that without ready capital for more margin, all Fred's money will be lost. On her way back to the office to gloat, she hears a street corner orator speaking upon the evil of hate and when she returns to find Fred telling her that he has lost everything and cannot ask her to marry a penniless man, for one moment Olive triumphs as she tells him who she is and how she has ruined him because of what he did to Ruth, then she breaks down. Upon her insistence, Fred uses Olive's money to cover his margin, recoups part of his fortune, and retires from the Street to find happiness with Olive.

THE EASIEST VIRTUE

Donald Miller Drama File 9931

SPOILED by the large allowance his millionaire father gives him and the adulation he wins as the football captain, handsome Jack Raymond breaks training the night before the big game and accompanies the college vamp to a party which lasts until three in the morning. The next day groggy from the effects of his debauch, Jack plays sensationally the earlier portion of the game and then fumbles consistently and gives the game to the other team. Ashamed to face his team mates, Jack goes on a drunk, quarrels with a police officer and gets himself arrested. The Judge makes an example of him and the Dean, following suit expels the boy. Stunned by his sudden disgrace, Jack returns home only to be greeted by an irate father who holds out the newspaper with its headline, "Millionaire football hero expelled from college," and tells him that from now on he can shift for himself, until he proves himself.

On the train bound for New York, Jack bitterly reviews the events of the last few days and as the train crosses the desert a fellow passenger engages the discouraged lad in conversation. Lefty Lawson finding Jack ready to dare anything introduces Jack to his friends in New York and before long Jack finds himself invited to drive a booze truck. He looks about at the hard faced gangsters and decides to decline but his exit is blocked and he is informed that he knows too much to get away. Cornered, Jack accepts with what grace he can muster. He finds himself making big money but liquor profits don't appeal to him and when he meets a former classmate Jack accepts an invitation to join the party. There Jack meets Lois Lee, another visitor from Chicago where Jim Blaine hails from, and when Jim urges him to come there, Jack looks hard at Lois and promises.

That night Jack quits but not before he is severely beaten up by Lefty Lawson who tries to stop him. His money gone, Jack rides the rails into Chicago and Jim Blaine gets him a position as a teller in the bank whose president is Lois Lee's father. The more Jack sees of Lois the more in love he is and when he tells her about his expulsion from college she forgives him. He dares not tell her of his connections with the New York underworld and one day he is stunned at sight of Lefty and another man entering the bank and making hasty notes. Suspecting they mean no good, Jack realizes if he tells what he knows he will lose everything he has built up. He arms himself with a gun and when, sure enough Lefty attempts a holdup, Jack steps behind him and orders him to put his hands up. Shots are exchanged. Jack falls wounded but in the hospital he awakens to find he has received only a flesh wound and that he has foiled a holdup which would have meant disaster to the bank. Banker Lee offers Jack a vice presidency but Jack shamefacedly confesses his former connections. The banker pats his shoulder and says he has outlived his past and the offer still holds. With his arms about Lois, Jack asks if she would like to spend her honeymoon visiting his folks.

MURDER ON THE ATLANTIC

Albert Dunne Drama File No. 9725

IN Central Park Henry Wainer, retired millionaire, sees Mary Alder, shabbily dressed little florist, pitying the swans who must live always in the same small pond. He finds Mary rebellious against her own narrow environment and when he offers, half in jest, to take Mary with him on the liner Luxury, she hesitates for a moment, then accepts.

Dressed in expensive clothes, Mary is radiant as she sweeps into the dining saloon on the arm of her older companion. Joe, a handsome young passenger whose occupation is diamond smuggling as well as murder upon occasion, is fascinated and engineers her separation from the others one night, and as they stand together in the moonlight, Mary cannot help being conscious of the difference between the young, ruthless lad and her more conservative companion. However later when Henry gently tells her that although he loves her she is to feel free at any time to leave him if she can be happier with another man, Mary realizes what a debt she owes him. The next day she avoids Joe and when he finally manages to get her alone, he kisses her violently and tells her he cannot let her go. Mary breaks away from him with a flushed face and tells him she cannot leave Henry like this. Angrily Joe reminds her that the night before, in the moonlight, she felt differently but before he can go on, Mary leaves him to join Henry who is having difficulty with one Bert Woods, a business rival of Henry's who had once plotted Henry's downfall only to fall into the trap himself. Mary's intervention prevents the two men from coming to blows and Henry tries to dismiss the unpleasantness. That night, however, after the dancing, Henry goes to see who is knocking and Bert Woods, drunk, forces his way in. He makes a foul insinuation as Mary enters from her suite, and Henry knocks him down. Kneeling beside the unconscious figure, Henry tries to restore his consciousness by forcing whiskey between his lips and sends Mary for the ship's doctor. When she fails to return immediately, he follows. Minutes later, the ship doctor pronounces the man dead and smelling the whiskey glass exclaims "Poison!"

At the inquest the full details of the enmity between Henry and Bert are brought out, and even Mary, is not fully convinced of Henry's innocence but remains staunch in her fidelity. Joe tries in vain to persuade her that she is wasting her sympathy upon a murderer, and Mary, angered, orders him to leave her alone so she can think. The boat is about to dock and Joe takes a desperate chance smuggling his diamonds in. On a tip from New York headquarters, his stateroom is searched and he is caught with the goods. Impulsively Joe reaches into his pocket for a vial, and remembering it is empty, curses and leaps overboard. As he falls he strikes his head against the keel and receives a fatal injury. The vial contains the remains of the poison which killed Bert Woods. Joe, seeing the unconscious body had entered Henry's stateroom and used the poison he kept to prevent his capture alive by the police, for the purpose of the incriminating the man who stood between him and Mary. Henry is freed and when the boat docks marries Mary who wistfully makes him promise, "No more crossings on the Atlantic.

WHO IS TO BLAME?

Ethel Clark Drama File No. 9653

WITHIN the crowded courtroom a woman's reputation is being torn to shreds by the husband who is attempting in this way to prove to the court that she is morally unfit to have the custody of her child. Hostile faces mock Carol Seymour. Only one, Dennis Murray looks on with pity. At the counsel table, Carol's lawyer, Wayne Hyland begs her to rise to her own defense, but she refuses either to admit or deny her husband's asseverations and he unable to name his wife's lover, cannot clinch his case. When the judge seems ready to give the verdict to the husband, however, Carol consents to take the stand. Her story follows:

Talented as a dancer, Carol is surrounded by admirers as she is graduated from high school but she has eyes only for John Seymour, who has a large dairy ranch twenty-five miles from town. Whereas the other boys look up to her as a young goddess, John's assured love making stirs her and when he asks her to marry him, she dances happily about. At the wedding, Dennis who has always loved Carol stands by unhappily and John grandly promises to let his wife dance for the annual festival. However, the night of the dance it is snowing and John who has already ceased to regard Carol as anything but a fixture about the house, refuses to go. Carol goes alone but on the wooden bridge the heavy truck skids and she crashes into the railing. Unconscious, she is discovered by Dennis who is returning from the festival and he tenderly revives her and escorts her home. John inconsiderate of the pain Carol is in rages about her going and drives Dennis from his house. Feebly Carol keeps up the pretense of a happy married life while the people in the vicinity, claiming that John should have married a country girl instead of a "town butterfly "encourage John in his philanderings until he is rarely home nights. John quarrels with her friends so that Carol has no friends. When, happily she confides to her husband that she is going to have a child, he thrusts her from him crying that just when he is beginning to enjoy life she is trying to tie him down. He disclaims any responsibility for the child. One night Carol begs him to stay in, but John, hair slicked back for a date with another woman thrusts her violently from him. That night Carol's baby is born. John is more brutal than ever and Carol longs for the opportunities she has to go to town and dream that her life is not the nightmare it is. In town she meets Dennis again. To the townspeople he is a playboy, but to Carol his kindness is unfailing. In love with her he begs her to come away with him, telling her he will love the baby as though it were his own. Sadly Carol refuses telling him she cannot do that. It would ruin him. Dennii laughs bitterly, saying there is no reputation she can ruin. Unable to have Carol, Dennis leaves town alone while, John, moving to town with Carol and for a while keeping up a pretense of being good to her, decides to divorce her, when the malicious gossip of his former neighbors who have always sided with him, reaches him. Dennis returns and seeing how they are persecuting Carol begs her to escape but she is afraid they will take her baby from her.

Nobody believes Carol's story and when the judge awards the baby to John, Carol rises and tortured shouts, "All right then. Will you believe this. The baby never was my husband's." The courtroom empties. Only Dennis remains. "That was a brave lie, my dear," he says. "Dennis," she cries, "Dennis!" Together they leave town and with them is Carol's baby.

I AM INNOCENT

Loyd Fletcher Drama File No. 9568

IN rebellion against the poverty of his mother, Bill leaves the small town where he is earning a pittance and promises to return when he can give her the comforts she deserves. In New York he comes to a small boarding house and warmed by the sympathy of a girl who shows him his room, he takes lodging there. At first discouraged because he can find no work, Bill accepts a position as a shipping clerk but broods over the small salary he earns. He sends most of it home to his mother and falling in love with Jane, who runs the boarding house with her father, despairs over ever being able to get married because of his poor circumstances. One night he and Jane take a walk in Central Park and in the moonlight her face takes on a new loveliness. Under the shelter of the trees, Bill lifts her face and kisses Jane gently, but he breaks from the caress and harshly starts toward home saying no word until he whispers a curt goodnight to her at her door. Jane, knowing that only money keeps Bill from confessing his love sympathizes and her father who realizes that Jane is in love tells her he is sure Bill will make something of himself some day. Jane gives a party trying to rouse Bill's dejected spirits. That night, however, as he is walking home from work thinking of Jane, an automobile draws up and a fellow asks Bill if he wants to earn some money. Bill is hesitant when he learns that he is to go into a jewelry store and ask to see some diamonds but the fellow assures Bill that he is a rival jeweler and would be recognized if he went in himself. Then things start happening. Three men, one the fellow who addressed him, come in and snatch the tray of jewels. The jeweler objects and a moment later falls dead, a bullet through his heart. Dazed, Bill tries to revive the dead man and when the police break in he is charged with the murder. His explanation is cynically accepted and he is locked up.

Jane has been restless all the evening of her party wondering why Bill didn't come and when she sees him behind bars she weeps and promises her support. She sends for Bill's mother and the two women cling together. At the trial Bill tells his story and after hours of deliberation the jury comes in with a verdict of First Degree Murder. Bill stoutly professes his innocence as he is led away and Jane and her father try every possible scheme to get a new trial.

One night a saw is slipped mysteriously to Bill who manages to file his bars and escape with a sheet ladder. He proceeds straight to Jane's house and as she scolds him for not getting out of town immediately the police come in and take the boy, still protesting his innocence, back to jail. As a result of Bill's attempt to escape, his new trial is denied and with growing desperation he faces the chair.

However, the jewelry robbers plan another haul and one of them is shot. Dying he confesses the truth about Bill's story, adding that it was he who slipped the saw to Bill but dared not confess earlier because of the close watch set upon him by the rest of the gang. Bill is freed and as a result of the case is offered a chance in a department store. Now, on the path to happiness he proposes to Jane and Bill's mother finds that she has grown indispensable to Jane's father.

STREET LAD

Ed Mitchell Drama File No. 9567

RECENTLY graduated from college, George shows no desire to settle down to work and his father, a wealthy railroad owner sends him to the town of Wade to investigate conditions there. George is diffident abou this work but his attention is captured by Peggy Reed, the daughter of a watchman on the railroad. The old man is flattered by George's visits, not suspecting his daughter is the attraction and although Peggy retreats before George's ardent love making, she is too dazzled by the life he tells her of to reason. Soon, frightened she confides to George that she is to have a child, but he coldly repudiates her, claiming that he has heard that story before. George manages to return to the city, and Peggy, realizing the worthlessness of the man she loved refuses to reveal the name of the father of her child. The townspeople scorn the unwed mother, and Peggy leaves town, unable to bear the reproaches of her parents.

Life for the next few years is a vain effort to escape the consequences of her indiscretion, and at length, the struggle proves too much and Peggy dies telling her son who his father is. Young as Jimmie is his hatred for his father is immeasurable. The youngster is brought up by his aunt in Wade who takes every possible opportunity to remind the sensitive child that he was born out of wedlock. While the other youngsters play ball, little Jimmie, always an outsider sits in his aunt's back yard shelling peas and enduring in silence the cruel taunts of his school mates. Only little Janet sympathizes with Jimmie because she is herself motherless.

Years pass and George inherits his father's fortune and pulls political strings to buy himself a judgeship. Pompous but still youthful in appearance, George makes a tour of inspection of his railroad and as he walks through the streets of Wade, he remembers Peggy and wonders what has become of her. However, when he inquires at the post office he learns that Peggy is dead and after the first shock, realizes his informer is a very pretty girl. Dismissing Peggy as a regrettable incident in his past, George turns his attention to Janet and soon his sophisticated attentions have turned her head. George invites her to come to him in New York and leaves.

Meanwhile, Jimmie has been working his way through college and graduated he returns to Janet who has promised to marry him when he returns. He finds her strangely restless and dissatisfied with small town life and he cannot understand what has come over her. At length she confesses that she loves him but she cannot bear the thought of spending her life here in Wade. Gently Jimmie asks her what else there is for her and when he learns that George is the man who has turned Janet's head, his old hatred for his father wells within him. Furiously he goes to New York but when Jimmie pleads with him not to send for Janet as he has promised, the Judge, annoyed with the boy has him ejected. Whereupon Jimmie loses his heade purchases a gun and forces an entrance to the Judge's apartment. This time he shoots his father and hysterically reveals who he is. Doubled with pain, George carefully wipes the fingerprints from the gun, urges his son to escape and tells his butler that he has shot himself accidentally. Jimmie comes to the hospital at his father's request and the dying man tells his son that in an effort to make amends he has willed the major part of his fortune to Jimmie who returns to find happiness with Janet.

Ruderick Graeme Drama File No. 9628

LING WEN grunts at the extra portion of pork and rice that his woman, Su-Ni has set before him, and feeling like iron he ploughs the rich brown earth. Soon, however, Wobi, his ox, stops and refuses to go on despite all Ling Wen's urging. Then does Ling Wen take his shovel and dig from the ground the obstruction and his eyes widen with wonder as he takes from the ground a richly carved box. There is a jingling within. It is money and now Ling Wen is rich! Fearfully he hides his treasure in a hole in the ground lest he arouse suspicion and all day he plows his field until the purple shadow steal through the sky. When he arrives home, Su-Ni comments that he is early and Ling Wen rebukes her. He looks at his two sons and his little daughter and although there is a bright sparkle in the big brown eyes of Su-Ni she knows as he does that it is disgraceful to have less than three male children. Humbly Su-Ni tells her husband that she has prayed and has taken the Magic Charm so that this time the child may be a male and she be not unworthy and Ling Wen is satisfied that it will be so. Even when he grumbles at her spending too much time at the market looking at things for the New One not yet born, he is secretly proud of her. That night, trembling lest passers-by see his treasure, Ling Wen enters the shop of a curio dealer and sells the richly carved box for twenty pieces of gold—having asked for fifty pieces of gold and been offered ten pieces of silver by the shrewd city dealer not yet so shrewd as Ling Wen. Unable to contain himself longer, that night Ling Wen. tells his good fortune to Su-Ni and gives her eighteen of the twenty pieces of gold.

All the next day Ling Wen works happily in the fields, joking with Wobi, while Su-Ni is rushing from one neighbor to the other giving out the news. Jubilantly Ling Wen credits his fortune to Wobi and when Wong Ho comes over to congratulate him, he invites him and his good wife over to celebrate the coming of the third male. When he finishes his work, Ling Wen comes home and cries out in surprise for at the door stands Su-Ni dressed gorgeously with a silk coat, a fan, red satin slippers and a ring of jade. Of the eighteen pieces of gold, Su-Ni humbly confesses she has six left for the celebration. But that night Ling Wen is secretly proud as he contrasts Su-Ni's loveliness with the ungainly fat body of Wung Ho's wife.

The next morning on waking, Ling Wen is amazed at the gathering of neighbors who have come to escort him with back-clapping and yelling to the station. Ling Wen is startled as he goes aboard the steaming monster and the other passengers roar at his timidity. But in the city, Ling Wen remembers he is the treasure finder and jingling his purse he enters the house of Hoong to order rich wares. The sound of the clinking coins brings him every deference and the attendents rush hither and yon to bring the most expensive fabrics and jewels. At last Ling Wen grandly draws forth a gold piece but the cashier whispers to Hoong who laughs loudly as he suggests that Ling Wen has drawn forth the wrong coin—an old one, rare but of little value save as a curio. Ling Wen's grandeur tumbles as the next coin meets with the same response and suddenly the politeness of Hoong vanishes as he shrieks that he has wasted the whole day upon a charlatan. He moves to throw Ling Wen out, but the "treasure-finder" runs to the street amid the jeers of the crowd. Upon the train the passengers again laugh at the bumpkin but Ling Wen thinks of his treasure and says nothing.

Sadly Ling Wen returns but as he enters his hut he sees the third male child resting in the arms of Su-Ni who smiles as she says, "Now I am worthy." Happily Wing Len goes into the fields and ploughs furiously for to-night there is to be the celebration.

ALL that evening David had warned Patty Hurst not to drink so much, and they had quarreled before he consented to allow her to drive her roadster from the roadhouse. David hadn't wanted to go in the first place, but Patty had complained about David's unsociability, and because he loved Patty too much to be able to stand by and see her sulk, he had gone. As soon as Patty started driving, David realized his mistake but before he could speak, she had run the car into a wall. Miraculously enough Patty escaped with a few scratches, but David's fractured skull confined him to a hospital room for months. It made David's head ache intolerably to read, but that and his beloved writing were all that saved him from going mad. Once in a while Patty came te see him, but when David's book, the first he had written since he had met Patty, became an instantaneous hit, and David became the subject of countless interviews, Patty came back. Asking nothing save her love, David did not question her fickleness, and when she chattered gaily of how she spent her days, David tried to hide his pain. Only when she held him in her arms and smoothed his head did he know respite from misery.

When another operation failed to alleviate David's distress and the doctor sympathetically advised him to seek a change of scene, away from the distractions of modern living, David at length agreed to sojourn briefly in Hawaii. Patty turning her engagement ring nervously refused to marry David before he went but promised to be his wife when he returned. Intending to stay just a few weeks, David suffered a serious relapse as a result of worry over Patty's failure to write, and for days on end he would lose his memory. During his more lucid periods he was aware of the faithful nursing of a native girl, Ilano, who had fallen in love with him while she was singing native music to him. It was Ilano who induced a noted visiting surgeon to operate upon David during one of his spells and when David came out of the ether he was dazed by the realization that for the first time since the accident the pain had vanished. Immediately he made plans to return to Patty. As Ilano sang a pitiful little song in farewell, David, looking into her eyes saw how much love there was for him; but he was impatient to leave. Surprised at his own lack of joyousness on the boat taking him to Patty, he regained his spirit of anticipation as he waited in Patty's home. But it was from the stumbling evasions of Patty's mother, who had been hostile to David until his book had made so much money for him, that David learned of the elopement of Patty. Rushing blindly home, David realized in the sleepless night that followed that he was mourning a dead love, and taking the next boat to Hawaii, David was disappointed that Ilano was not in her customary spot waving to the incoming steamer. Slipping into her hut, David saw her, tearful face buried in her couch, and as he softly began the song she had taught him she turned in disbelief and with shining eyes threw herself into David's arms.

CASE DISMISSED

Mrs. Le Roy May Drama File No. 9727

PENNILESS, Jane Hathaway arrives in New York and begins a long hunt for a position. Accomplished as she is as a pianist, and well brought up by the father whose unfortunate speculations had left his daughter without means, Jane offers none of the necessary qualifications to get a position and as pangs of hunger make her desperate, she mounts the steps of the Day mansion, pinning her last hope to the possibility of filling the position of companion. As she waits in the reception room. she sees an elderly man leave with a well dressed young man whose eye catches hers for a second. Jane is interviewed by Beatrice Day, once a beautiful young girl, and flushing under the insolence of Beatrice's questions and stare, Jane forgets everything in the joy of being accepted. Jane learns that her duties are to entertain Beatrice, knead her forehead when she suffers from her frequent sick headaches, read aloud, and play music for her. From the first Jane manages to win Beatriee's confidence and Beatrice's husband Marcus. the elderly man whom Jane had seen that first day compliments her upon being the only one able to handle his wife. Jane resents the way he tells her that his wife feigns illness whenever she feels she isn't receiving enough attention, but the girl soon realizes that her mistress is not the easiest person in the world to get along with.

One day Marcus brings home his lawyer, Rodney, and Jane flushes as he recalls seeing her the day she got her position. Thereafter Rod is a frequent caller. One night Jane, thinking of Rodney, is standing on the balcony overlooking the garden. Rodney, walking with Marcus, confesses he is in love with Jane but that she gives him no opportunity to reveal his affection. Coldly Marcus bids adieu to his friend and as he is going to his own room, he stops, enter's Jane's and seizes her in his arms. She is white with anger and Jane accepts his apology for his losing his head, when he promises never to trouble her again. However. Mary, Beatrice's personal maid has seen her master enter Jane's room and she trembles so when she is dressing Beatrice that Beatrice forces her to tell what she has seen. Alone Beatrice broods over her "betrayal," and masking her knowledge she watches Jane closely as she gives her the combination of her safe and decks Jane in her jewels to get the general effect. A few nights later, while Rod is over playing bridge, Beatrice sends Jane for her jewels and screams that her necklace is gone. Jane is accused and Rodney, shocked, tries to dissuade the hysterical woman from pressing charges. But Beatrice is determined to have full measure of revenge upon Jane and she has her looked up pending trial. It is Rodney, convinced that the charge is ridiculous who investigates and noticing that the maid Mary trembles on being questioned, thinks the girl is guilty. To save herself, Mary confesses about her tale and Beatrice's vengeful look. Rodney warns Beatrice of the consequences of a false charge and Beatrice tremblingly withdraws her case.

Jane, freed, tries to express her gratitude to Rod, but drawing her into his arms he asks an exorbitant fee—that she become his wife. Shyly Jane lifts her face for the first kiss of love.

POVERTY created discord in the home life of the Graysons. Nights Jerry would come home exhausted from working in the little hardware store and Elinor, having her own difficulties with the three children, forgot to sympathize. To keep herself from brooding over their forced economies, Elinor studied after the children had been washed and given breakfast and when Jerry opened a hardware store of his own, and more than ever they felt the pinch of necessity, Elinor greeted him one night with the jubilant news that she had gotten a government job in Washington. Passing a weary hand across his forehead. Jerry looked at her perplexedly asking how they could manage. He couldn't leave his store now. But Elinor was too harrassed to be stopped now. She told him she was taking the children to the capitol. Jerry winced as she added maliciously, she'd probably be earning more than he but he could send her as much as he could spare.

Jerry sent every dollar he could to his wife and children and for Christmas, after months of scraping, decided to surprise them by visiting. Arms laden with packages he mounted the steps of Elinor's house and as he stood outside the door, he was startled by sounds of revelry. Soon the door opened and Elinor, paper hat perched crazily on her head, came out on the arm of an elderly man. For a moment Jerry considered ways of escape, but Elinor saw him and grasping him by the arm introduced him to Glen Parker. She wanted Jerry to join her party, but he excused himself and finally allowed her to persuade him to remain in the library until the guests had left. Jerry saw Elinor kiss Glen but when she joined him she was very cool. Betty, the oldest of the three children was delighted to see him. The other two were happy with their gifts. Jerry realized from Elinor's explanation that Glen was letting her rent her apartment very cheaply from him, that Elinor considered Glen as one able to provide her with the luxuries she had so long wanted. That day he left. Elinor said her husband had been suddenly recalled. When she received Jerry's letter offering her a divorce if she wanted it, she accepted Glen's offer of marriage.

Jerry dejectedly sold his store and went on to New York where he began anew. For months he lived a solitary existence until Charlie Rhodes, one of his friends, induced him, once, to dine at a night club. Charlie met Vivian, a model he had once known and introduced Jerry to her friend, Mildred. Dancing for the first time in months. Jerry felt exhilarated and with Mildred flattering him. he readily agreed that he had perhaps been foolish to cut himself off from living. His store profited and when he told Charlie he was planning to settle down in a home of his own, Charlie joked about marriage. The first time he invited Mildred to his home he asked her to marry him. Later he received a letter from Elinor telling him her husband had died and she was stopping in New York on her way to visit the children who were studying abroad. Elinor winced when Jerry explained he was to be married, but because Mildred was on a visit to her aunt, Jerry took his former wife about New York. In the night club where he had met Mildred, he caught a glimpse of her in a private booth with the proprietor. He saw Elinor sail and returned to his apartment where Mildred kissed him. When he told her what he had seen, she threw his ring down. Charlie married Vivian but Jerry was lonely until the day Elinor cabled she was returning. Jerry's heart leaped as he saw her with his three grown children. It was Christmas and Jerry had prepared a party. This time Elinor had come to stay—and the children with her.

ONCE WE SANG

Lois Moody Kent Drama File No. 9856

BACK from a gay cruise on his yacht, Jerry Morgan strides up the well kept garden paths of his home. Inside he is shocked by the unwonted silence and to his dismay he learns that his father, having lost his fortune, has committed suicide. For the first time Jerry learns that there is more than pleasure in the world and when he receives a curt telegram from his uncle offering him a position as a clerk, Jerry crumbles the note, then surveying the last of his belongings being carried away to meet obligations, decides to accept. In Chicago Jerry stops over briefly and in a hotel lobby he sees William Demming fussing over his chauffeur's inability to drive the car thus intoxicated. Jerry sees him fire the reeling man and when Demming exclaims in exasperation he must have someone to drive him home immediately, Jerry offers himself for the position and is accepted.

Pleased, Demming offers Jerry a permanent position and Jerry dreading his uncle's supervision, accepts. He is strolling about the Demming grounds when he stops to watch the nurse caring for the Demming children. An immediate friendship is born between the chauffeur and the nurse and when Connie leaves on a prolonged vacation, the substitute nurses prove utterly incapable of handling the Demming youngsters. Mrs. Demming wires Connie asking her to return and offers to send her chauffeur for the girl. On the way back a thunder storm breaks and in the intimacy of the car Jerry's lips met Connie's. However, when he asks her to marry him she tells him she is terrified of poverty. She has just come from her sister's home and seen what the want of money can do to destroy love. Jerry is discouraged but Connie tells him to wait until they have accumulated more money. The Demming children leave for school and Connie is recommended to a Mr. King whose wife has recently died bringing her child into the world. Jerry is helpless without Connie but when he comes to see her she puts off their wedding day indefinitely and down hearted Jerry stops at his regular restaurant for a cup of coffee. Barbara, his waitress who is in love with Jerry offers her sympathy and prevails upon him to tell her why he is so glum. She suggests a party at her apartment, and Jerry is finally persuaded to go. In a desperate effort to hold Jerry, Barbara puts knockout drops in his drinks and Jerry is found in her apartment the next morning by Barbara's aunt who demands that he marry the girl.

Connie is appalled at the discovery that Jerry is lost to her and when her employer asks her to marry him, she listlessly consents. As Mrs. King Connie goes abroad but when a friend writes to tell that Jerry has lost his job and his wife is going out with other men, Connie makes excuses to return home. When her husband complains that he is working too hard, Connie suggests that he get a chauffeur and then gets her friend to get Jerry to apply for the position. Not suspecting that King is Connie's husband, Jerry is driving one night, after learning that Barbara is getting her divorce, when Mr. King, anxious to return to Connie whom he has not seen for a month, urges Jerry to drive faster and faster until the car is wrecked. King is killed and Jerry gravely injured. His head swathed in bandages, Jerry does not know for days that it is Connie at his bedside, but as he hears her voice one day he cries out, and she kneels beside him kissing him, and together they face a new dawn.

GUNNERS GAP

W. C. Begley Drama File No. 9107

EYES blazing, Scott Ashley refused to betray his company's business to Guy Noble, representative of a rival mining company, and as Nobel reminded him that the last person to refuse to do business with the rival interests had left town—wounded, and afraid to talk, Scott ordered, "Get out!"

A week later, in Cincinnati on company business, Scott was invited to a party at the home of the branch manager. Bored by the drinking and hilarity, Scott wandered toward his host's library and apologized hastily as he found a girl reading there. Assuring him he was welcome, the girl explained that she was employed as a governess and had been offered the freedom of the library. Scott, attracted by Peris' fragile loveliness remained to engage her in conversation and as he found his accustomed reticence vanishing under her warm interest, he painted for her a glowing picture of the West he loved.

When Scott returned to the mines it was with the promise to write regularly to Peris. For days he thought only of her. Then, one day, Guy Noble came back to repeat his threats. Scott wheeled in time to see Noble draw his gun and dodging a shot, he swung up Noble's hand. The deflected bullet killed Noble, and shocked by the turn of events, Scott found himself accused of murder. Distractedly, Scott wrote to Peris and told her to forget him, and when the case came to trial, the State built up a convincing case against Scott, producing a witness who saw the two men quarrel. Scott's account of threats and the story that Noble was hired by a rival company was deftly set aside by the prosecution, and deserted by his company, Scott, who had never made many friends preferring to spend his time alone, found himself sentenced to a long prison sentence. To his astonishment, Peris arrived, won an audience with him, and learning the circumstances, assured him of her aid. It was Peris who induced her employer to find, through the mining company, the man who had preceded Scott in his position. For months the search continued and at last Dan Hurley confessed that he had been forced to resign fearing the death threats of Noble unless he helped them. He had not betrayed Noble, however, lest he be killed. The new evidence, corraborating Scott's story won a retrial and Scott's freedom.

When, however, Scott sought out Peris, she turned from him refusing to let him take her in his arms. Scott, dismayed, told her he loved her, but Peris sent him away. Untaught in the ways of women, Scott started to leave only to turn as he heard Peris sob. With a cry he took her in his arms and she confessed she had just been informed by a doctor that she had t.b. Smoothing her hair, Scott assured her that life in the open would do wonders for her and overriding her protests he took her to his home in the mountains. For months he lavished upon her tender care and when he brought her to a doctor for a re-examination she was pronounced cured. "Now, little lady," he asked, "will you marry me?" Tears of happiness shone in Peris' eyes.

THE HOBO KID

William W. Wooten Comedy Drama File No. 9569

BAD boy of his class, young Bud receives his last thrashing for having helped little Harriet through an examination. With Harriet pledging eternal fidelity, Bud slips down the road with his wardrobe on his back and twenty-eight cents in his pocket. At the railway station he hops a train rolling about twenty-eight miles an hour and starts across the jolting box-cars. At length he seats himself comfortably upon the floor of a barn-like car only to be startled by the raucous voice of a huge brakeman who delivers himself of some tasty epithets and finally departs vowing to put the impertinent lad off at the first stop. Later, however, the train which has been speeding through the night comes to a sudden halt. Bud is thrown forward and after several jerking movements and a squealing of wheels, silence settles down. Painfully Bud lifts himself and discovers that the truss-rods of his car have given way and the disabled car has been switched to a side track and abandoned. Frightened by the hooting of the owls and other night noises, Bud cautiously walks the ties until by day-break he comes to a small town. He spends his capital upon frankfurters but the town urchins gather to jeer at his grimy clothes and Bud begins to lose his temper. A bearded hobo offers to hold Bud's sandwich while he beats the lot and thus encouraged Bud sails into the gang only to welcome the interference of the 'bo who drags him off and runs him down the road. The two become fast friends but Bud is minus a sandwich and Jerry offers a Munchausen explanation of the crumbs in his beard. Jerry, afraid to board a fast-moving train, pretends that only solicitude for the little fellow stops him and after dragging along is hauled aboard by his young pal. However, when Bud attempts to disarm the conductor who discovers them, they are both unceremoniously ejected.

Nightfall finds the pair joining a camp of hoboes who share their bread crumbs and fire. The next morning when each of them has pleaded a disability, Bud is elected to scout for food. He manages meat from the butcher by begging bones for his twenty-eight hungry dogs and seeing most of the stores are owned by one John Preston, boldly enters the grocery and orders supplies which he charges to the same John Preston. Eyes twinkling, the storekeeper confides to the startled lad that he is talking to none other than John Preston, but when Bud begins to run, he is called back and urged to take his order with him. At the camp, Bud is the hero of the day and he and Jerry soon press on.

Some weeks later, driven to desperation, Bud knocks at a cottage door and pleads for food for himself and his crippled and deaf and dumb father. So poignant is his plea that the woman comes out with six ham sandwiches and two slices of cocoanut layer cake. Bud thanks her and so too does poor Jerry who forgets his role for the moment. The indignant victim sets her dogs upon the pair who scamper off leaving the seat of Jerry's pants in the gaping jaws of one of the beasts. Pained, Jerry cuts the legs of his trousers to cover his exposed seat and pins the whole with bits of wire which are uncomfortable and finally in the center square give way. Jerry is locked up and Bud sent home after a tearful farewell to his partner.

Back home, Bud goes through school and one summer afternoon, tanned and lanky, bounds up Harriet's garden path flourishing a small town newspaper telling of the recent promotion of Jerry to Magistrate of the Police department of Dryden. Harriet climbs into Bud's Ford and the two of them visit the portly and reformed Jerry who squints at Bud then lets out a howl of welcome. Before the plenteous board presided over by Jerry's hen-pecking spouse, the former hobo does his best to discourage his pal from getting married but catching an ominous look, swallows hard and with what grace he can muster offers with great magnanimity to perform a marriage ceremony for Bud and Harriet. So it happens.

THE POSITIVE PROOF

Rubie Estella Driggs Drama File No. 9261

WHEN Richard Seymour died, he left his fortune to his youngest sister Sue, and his reckless daughter, Pearl, with instructions that Sue should try to guide Pearl's behavior. Aunt Sue was unable to influence Pearl's conduct in any way, and when Pearl arrived home one New Year's morning half sober, and unduly hilarious, she reprimanded her niece severely. Furiously angry with her aunt, Pearl rushed from the house, and walked down to the beach near her home, in an effort to calm herself. She stood looking out over the water in front of a small fishing smack that was tied to a pier, but was being knocked about by the rough waves. While standing there, she saw a huge car driving up the shore road, and fearing to be recognized by the occupants who were known to her, she hastily hid herself in the frail boat until the car had passed. Exhausted from the night's revelry, she dozed off, and to her horror, when she finally awoke she discovered that the smack had been torn loose from its mooring, and she had already drifted a few miles out on the turbulent sea. Helpless, and unable to guide the direction of the boat, she drifted for two days, until a ship that was bound for Africa, sighting the small craft, picked her up, half dead from starvation and exposure. It was only the care and skill of the ship's physician, Dr. Barker, a man about forty-five, that saved her from death. But the stormy waves that had lashed the little boat about so unmercifully, continued to mull about the ship, and when the fury of the storm increased the Maris was smashed against a small rocky island. The passengers and the crew found shelter on the island, and it was then that Pearl had a chance to think over her old life—a wasted life, utterly without aim and purpose, and selfish to the core. Resolved to change her way of living, she tended the sick passengers, searched for food, comforted the ailing, and showed so much strength and courage, that Dr. Barker was reminded of the girl he once loved, who resembled Pearl so closely.

When, a week later, the castaways were picked up by a steamer bound for Paris, Pearl boarded the ship sure, for ever, that she would never live the reckless life she had once lived. To her dismay, on the ship was John Livingston, who had met her at the New Year's celebration, and he, recognizing her, showed her a photograph that the whole party had taken. Snatching it from his hand, she tore it into minute pieces, and threw it into the sea, thus destroying the last proof that she had once been but a worthless member of society. Admiring her strength of character, Livingston was determined to win her for his wife. When the Paris bound steamer passed one headed for America, Dr. Barker transferred to it with the other passengers from the Maris, thinking that Pearl, for whom he felt a deep affection, had also gone with them. But she did not feel she was ready to return, and hiding herself on the boat, she reached Paris, resolved to help people in any way she could. Concealing her whereabouts from John, because she still felt unworthy of leading a normal life with him, she volunteered her services at a war hospital. Barker, as soon as he reached home, discovering that Pearl was gone, decided to go to Europe, and search for her. After several months of hopeless search, he returned to Paris, intending to become a staff member of a hospital. There he found Pearl, working tirelessly, and persuading her that she needed a rest, she set sail for home once more. On the boat they met John, who had almost given up his quest, and this time, when he asked Pearl to marry him, she accepted, feeling that at least she had earned the right to happiness. The day after their arrival in New York, the two men went to Pearl's home; John, to claim her for his wife, Dr. Barker, merely as her friend. With a startled cry, Aunt Sue, upon seeing Barker rushed toward him, knowing him for the sweetheart with whom she had foolishly quarreled ten years before. Realizing at last why Pearl had so strong a resemblance to the girl he loved, Dr. Barker was reunited with Aunt Sue, and a few days later, there was a double wedding at the Seymour home.

THE SECOND CHANCE

Ramona Lumbra Drama File No. 9497

TOO much spending money has spoiled Charlie Durke and his father, senior partner of the firm of Durke and Goodsend, Counsellors-at-law, despairs of his ever settling down to the law practice for which he has prepared himself. At length Charlie promises his father that after one last jaunt to Europe, seeing the world, he will settle down to business, and his father's eyes grow misty as he fondly bids his only son a bon voyage.

Back at his office John Durke discusses his boy with Goodsend his Junior partner who is secretly envious of the old man and of the youngster who is to come into the business. He bribes his cousin, Shelia, a beautiful blonde widow who is interested in just two things, herself and money, to ruin John. With the promise of five thousand dollars, Shelia makes herself very attractive to the lonely John and warmed by her interest in hearing of his son, John expands in her company. One night Shelia suggests a party at her apartment and invites Goodsend and Claire, a friend. They all have too much to drink and Goodsend escorts Claire home promising to return for John. When the others have gone, Shelia leans back against the divan and calls John to sit beside her. John does what any man would, he kisses the beautiful woman who yields to him. At first withdrawing, John sees that Shelia is not at all offended and after another drink mixed by Shelia John falls over drugged. Goodsend returns, carries John into Shelia's bedroom and withdraws. The next morning John is horrified to find himself in Shelia's room but before he can leave Goodsend knocks loudly and pretends to be amazed at finding John here, explaining that when he returned and found the door locked the night before, he thought John had left. For his cousin's honor, Goodsend insists that John marry her, threatening to expose his partner in the newspapers otherwise. Distressed John realizes the publicity will ruin him and rather than risk his son's contempt he promises to marry Shelia. However, one night he returns to his office to hear Shelia quarreling with Goodsend who refuses to give her the bribe claiming she will have enough if she marries his wealthy partner. John, to avoid a scene returns home and writes a note to Shelia telling her he knows everything and tells her he will not prosecute if they forget about the marriage. However, he does not suspect that the angered Shelia would dare, in a fury against Goodsend, give the entire story to the newspapers. Goodsend, reading the lurid details, proceeds to Shelia's apartment and as she taunts him, he murders her and the police rush in.

The shame ruins John who, unable to face his son, flees, leaving his money to his son, Charlie reading of his father's disgrace, thinks only of saving him and rushes home but although he spends most of his fortune hiring detectives he is unable to locate John and it is a graver and reformed Charlie who applies to his friend, Jim Steele, a lawyer, for work.

In Jim's office, Charlie meets June Ross who supports her mother by working in Steele's office. One hot August night June, returning to her home on the outskirts of the city finds a stricken old man at the side of the road. She stops her car and takes him home where a doctor finds the old man a victim of temporary paralysis which has robbed him of his voice. The doctor advises that the man be turned over to an institution but June insists upon his remaining and she and her mother care for the patient whose eyes thank them. Charlie at length succeeds in breaking through June's reserve but she refuses his invitations on the plea of having to return home to her mother. Finally however, she permits him to come to dinner and as Charlie enters he cries, "Dad," to the ill man who rises, the shock lifting the paralysis. John explains how he fled and at last returned home only to become ill from exposure. Charlie gets his father, from whom years seem to drop, a berth in Steele's firm and while June and Charlie plan their honeymoon, John finds happiness with Mrs. Ross before the cottage fireside.

LOVE'S WAY

Loretta Douglas Van Maren Drama File No. 9911

"BUT we're too young to get married, Ted," Patricia had said. Then, one day, Ted dressing to keep a date with Patricia had answered the doorbell and looking down into the lovely eyes of the girl who was moving in next door. Ted hesitated for one moment and agreed to help her. When, an hour later, he ran up the steps of Patricia's house she greeted him coldly, "Oh, it's quite all right about you're being late," she said. Only when he told her what time he'd eall for her to take her to the country club dance, Patricia explained that she had made other arrangements, and digging his hands into his pockets, Ted asked bitterly, "With Ralph?" Patricia nodded. Later she wept because they had quarreled and Ted, nursing his resentment, accepted the shallow hints the girl next door cast about wanting to go to the dance. Patricia bit her lip when she saw Ted enter with Ruth and her eyes misted imperceptibly as he introduced them, but Ralph drew Patricia away and later while Ted was taking Ruth home, she stretched herself langorously in his car and said, "It's so beautiful out. Let's just ride, Ted." For hours Ted rode, the wind and the silence soothing his hot face. Then suddenly the car stopped and ruefully Ted discovered they had run out of gas. In the morning when they returned, Ruth wept that her reputation was ruined, and Ted, setting his jaw allowed himself to be drawn into the marriage. Unable to face Patricia, he moved his bride to another town and months later Ruth's ehild, Jim, was born prematurely. Patricia tried valiantly to hide her grief and when Ralph told her his company was leaving for the war in a few weeks, Patricia agreed to marry him.

The end of the war brought Ralph back to Patricia and Clive, a returned soldier, to Ruth who, never happy with Ted, ran off with her child, and as soon as her divorce was granted, married Clive.

When Ted returned, he found Patricia still the same in everything except that now she was married to Ralph who was rapidly rising in the commercial world. Patricia trembled as she saw Ted and as they sat together ,Ted cried, "What fools we have been." Once swept by their emotions Ted said they were too young to abide always by the follies of their youth. They had a right to happiness still. But Patricia turned away and said Ralph's complacent little world rested on his respectability and he would never recover from the unsavory publicity of a divorce. Her place was with her husband. Only when their feelings grew too great, did Patricia go off with Ted for one glorious night to light their barren tomorrows. Gallantly they shook hands over the love that could not be. Henceforth they would meet as strangers,—and Patricia returned unsuspected to her husband. Proudly Ralph fondled his baby daughter and coming close to his wife he said, "I had given up hope. . . ."

In the years that followed Ralph beeame more and more enveloped in his business and at last, one day, they brought his body home—he had been killed on a tour of inspection of his great new factory—by a defective belt on one of his machines. Patricia interested herself in social service work and her daughter, Doris, at college sent home letters telling of Jim. It was at the graduation exercises that Patricia met Jim, but she blanched as Jim brought her happily to his mother and stepfather—Ruth and Clive. Ill, Patricia was carried to her room and sending for Ted she explained her secret—Doris was his child. For a long time they pondered over their problem and at last they determined to separate the youngsters, feeling that absence would sure them of their desire. But when Patricia learned that the children had run off and were planning to get married, she realized that her own cowardice had brought them to tragedy. Madly she dashed to stop the wedding, and Ted followed with Ruth. It was only when Ted stopped Jim from leaping through the window at the thought that he could not have Doris, that Ruth explained that Jim was not Ted's but Clive's son. That Ruth had tricked Ted into marrying her because she was going to have Clive's baby and he had left for the front. Out of the near tragedy eame happiness and as the youngsters were united in marriage, Ted softly asked Patricia if she would be his wife.

EXIT FROM MARRIAGE

Katherine McAuley Drama File No. 9763

WHEN Roy Burns' low-slung roadster breaks down fifteen miles from town, he swears loudly. After minutes of futile tinkering under the shiny hood, he begins walking down the lonely road and at last finds refuge at Crescent Oak. Curiously he watches Edith prepare supper for him, accepting his story without question. About the checkered table, Roy feels the warmth of good fellowship and as he discusses national problems with Edith's father, the weather with her mother, and books with her, he feels a great sense of peace. The next morning, Edith's father drives Roy to town in his outmoded Ford, and at his cordial invitation to return, Roy promises he will.

At home Roy resents Matilda's pique at his absence from her party ,and although Roy sends her the loveliest orchids he can find she refuses to be appeased. When he reminds her they have a dinner appointment for the evening, Matilda flashes her dark eyes and shrugging her shoulders tells him that she thought he wouldn't want to keep it and she made another date. Roy leaves, gets in his roadster and rides through the night to cool his anger. As he notices familiar landmarks he realizes he is near Edith's house and he drops in. They receive him with the same hospitality and when he invites Edith to ride with him she is so enthusiastic over his car, so grateful for everything he does for her, that Roy leans forward and swiftly kisses her. Moved by her smallness and dependence he asks her to marry him. It is a lovely bride that Roy takes from her mother's small parlor and Roy smiles as she leans her lovely head against his shoulder and cries from sheer happiness.

At first Roy is amused by Edith's excitement over his big mansion and many servants, but although she makes a charming little hostess,, Roy's friends look upon her as an outsider. Roy is unaware of how hurt Edith is, but Matilda couches her enthusiasm over Roy's bride so subtly that Roy begins to feel that perhaps he has been a bit hasty in seeking someone outside of his own sphere. Matilda earns Roy's gratitude by her supposed protection of Edith, but at the charity affairs it is Edith who is always given the most unpleasant division of work to do, and the long hours necessary to arrange details for the benefit take Edith away from Roy. Matilda is always there to comfort Roy who once more feels her old attraction. Once when she kisses him, she arouses all his old passions and Edith, coming in, sees Matilda in her husband's arms. Roy thinks nothing of the incident but when he awakes next morning he finds a note from Edith telling him she realizes she is in the way and is willing to give him divorce. Roy stares at the letter, and remembering how he has neglected Edith flushes with shame. However, before he can act, Matilda calls and when she offers her lips to him, Roy is lost. Matilda makes him feel that he is well rid of Edith, but he is not happy, and soon she loses interest in him. Once when his business—which he has been neglecting at Matilda's insistence, keeps him late, he finds she has not waited for him. The next morning when she lies her way out of it, Roy turns from her in disgust. Matilda laughs at him and when Roy tells her they are through she shrugs her shoulders and asks him why he doesn't go back to his country wife.

Humbly Roy rides up to Crescent Oak. In the garden he finds Edith and as he pleads for forgiveness, she says softly, "I knew you'd come—because I love you."

SECOND WIFE

Kathryn Smith Drama File No. 9336

DESPITE the ill-treatment she receives from Luke Clark, who more often than not reels home tipsy with drink, Mary, a frail woman worn out by too frequent child-births, will not, for the sake of the children, break up their miserable home completely. Desperately fearing this man who places a gun upon the table in plain sight and threatens them with it when they become too noisy, the children grow up hating their father intensely. Mary scrimps and saves from the money he allows her to give the children as much as she can and when Luke is away they are gay and happy together. At the first sound of his steps on the stairs, however, they become silent and anxious not to arouse Luke who is usually in a bad temper. Though she knows that Luke is frequently in the company of other women, Mary does nothing, certain that he will always return to this home which she has forced him to buy when he brought her, a young bride, to Chicago from the Tennessee farm where she has been brought up. However when she finds a picture in his room of a very beautiful woman dressed in the elaborate riding habit of the time, she becomes morbidly fearful that he will desert her for this woman to whom he has, been confining his attentions, before the son she is bearing within her is born. Overwrought and nervous she follows Luke one evening to a ferry waiting-room. As Luke lifts his hat to the woman of the picture who is waiting in the deserted room, Mary steps before him and hysterically assails him. His blow, as arm in arm he walks off with May, leaves her stunned. Next night, somewhat contritely, he bring home a few toys for the children and until the boy is born she stays at home more than is his habit. Soon however, he falls back into his old ways and indeed the children are relieved for they are constrained in his presence. Some time later he lumbers into the room to find Mary and the children giddily playing some game. Wildly he shoves them from the house, turns the key in the lock, and lies down to sleep off his drunken fit. When a neighbor takes the huddled group into her home it is too late, for Mary has contracted a cold which proves fatal.

A succession of angular and bony housekeepers who are efficient but not handsome pass through the house. The children's misery begins when Luke brings May home as the new Mrs. Clark. While she preens and primps all day Agnes and Catherine are forced to take care of little Elizabeth and the frail Dick. As soon as they are old enough May Clark makes them go out and earn a living and since the earnings of Luke, now much lessened, cannot provide her with the things she craves, she takes their meager earnings from them. Disgusted with this aggressive person whom he has made his wife and realizing now by his own suffering the torment he has inflicted upon his first wife, he makes futile attempts to side with the girls and Dick. However he does not blame them when they run away, one after another, from home and when Agnes makes a very unhappy marriage, he takes the blame upon himself. A chastened Luke finds some measure of happiness playing with Catherine and Elizabeth's children. He feels almost relieved when May, who is many years younger than he, runs off with another man who can still provide for her as she feels she deserves. Timidly he offers his children a home with him but, wishing to forget all the unhappiness they have known in the old house they refuse. However Catherine takes the grateful Luke to her home and by his devotion to his grand-children, he tries to make amends for the love he withheld from his children.

THE TWO ROADS

Mrs. Ena G. Gibson Drama File No. 9245

MARION MADISON worked hard trying to bring up her twin daughters as she knew her husband would have wanted them to be. But though Jean was an obedient daughter, always ready to help Mrs. Madison with the sewing she took in to earn their livelihood, Joan would pout and fret until her mother was almost glad to see her leave. The two girls were extremely beautiful and it was this that worried their mother most for though Jean delighted in the socials and church meetings that constituted the little Oklahoma town's entertainment Joan scoffed at them and zealously attended every moving-picture performance from which she could learn a dance step to imitate. Mrs. Madison shook her head dismayed at Joan's talk about some day being a great dancer and warned her that she was choosing the wrong road but Joan only laughed, just as she laughed at Jean's choice of Byron, an aspiring medical student as a suitor. While walking past the hotel one day she answered the smile of Bruce who, feet propped up against the railing, was taking his ease in a porch rocker. When Bruce rose to follow her she slowed her pace until he caught up with her. Flattered by the attentions of this suave New York salesman, she was only too willing to believe all his stories, and when he offered to take her back with him she eagerly accepted. For a time her youth and freshness fascinated him and he treated her to all the gay night life for which she yearned. Then one day she found a note telling her that he was leaving. After a long round of the agencies Joan secured an engagement as a dancer in a night club. Though she did not make a sensation with her dancing she achieved a certain amount of popularity.

Mrs. Madison, however, from the time her daughter had run away accused herself of failure and despite all Jean did pined away. Byron was now interning in a New York hospital and the local physician advised Jean that only her sister's return would help her mother recover. Acting upon his recommendation she inserted an "ad" in a New York paper. But by this time Joan was lying hopelessly bedridden from a fall which had injured her spine. The friends she had made while daneing in the night club speedily found consolation in new faces and when her money ran out Joan was transferred to a charity hospital. It was then that she read that her mother was ill and calling for her but she could not let them know how badly she had fared and sent them no message. Then one day the hospital doctor made his rounds accompanied by another doctor and as they bent over her bed Joan recognized Byron whom she had laughed at years ago. Byron immediately wired Jean who came to take Joan home to an excited Mrs. Madison. Jean was shocked to see how wasted Joan was but as the sisters embraced she vowed that under her devoted care Joan would perhaps regain some of her lost years of happiness.

THE FINAL CALL

G. W. Heuser Drama File No. 9480

FROM the moment he had delivered Mrs. Howard of a fine baby, Joan, Dr. Rance had been in love with her. Acting in the capacity of family physician, the Doctor had all he could do to maintain his professional air in the light of Mrs. Howard's ill treatment by her husband, a prominent Engineer, whose drunken brutalities were concealed under elaborate expressions of remorse. When his own wife died in giving birth to a daughter, Lucille, Dr. Howard for one mad moment hoped that he could some day have Ann Howard for his own, but he put the thought from him as being unworthy.

Lucille and John grew up together, but with growing misgivings, the Doctor realized that the boy was being hopelessly spoiled by his over-indulgent father. Often Ann came to Rance to secure advice about her boy, feeling as though he were closer to the lad than her own husband, but each time Rance suggested restricting John's allowance, Mr. Howard interfered and in his efforts to win his son's regard gave him large sums of money. Envied by his classmates, John soon acquired a following of sycophants and Rance, questioning Lucille's unhappiness learned that John was squandering his money on older women. Rance was wise enough to know that nothing he could say would turn Lucille's attention to another of the boys who flocked about her, and when he was called to the Howard home to treat the Engineer who had injured himself, falling when intoxicated. Rance took it upon himself to speak to Howard about not giving John the roadster the boy wanted. Howard, enraged, ordered Rance to mind his own business, and Ann hastily interposed between the two men. However, her own reiteration of Rance's advice, drew a snarl from her husband who accused her of trying to win the boy's love from his father.

John, driving home from a roadhouse, crashed his car into a stone fence, killing the girl with him instantly and seriously injuring himself. A charge of manslaughter was brought against John who, in a grave condition was brought home. Ranee saw his daughter's set face as she begged him to save John. In the instants while he prepared his medical instruments, Rance saw too, Ann's stricken look, and realized that if John died, Ann would leave the husband responsible for the ruin of the son she loved more than life. An examination of the boy showed that only superhuman efforts would save the boy who would only bring disgrace and unhappiness to his child.

Under Rance's unceasing attention, John was pulled from the very door of death. At length John slept peacefully and as Rance, worn from sleepless nights prepared to go, Ann thanked him with wet eyes for saving her boy. The efforts of a brilliant attorney, whose services depleted the Howard fortune, won for John a recommendation for clemency with a second degree manslaughter conviction and after a year at a reformatory a chastened John emerged.

Dr. Rance watched his daughter's marriage to a changed and earnest John with mixed emotions, and he repressed the ironic smile that came to his lips as Ann, arm linked through her husband's thanked Rance for his part in her happiness, for she and her husband, brought together by their common happiness in John's restoration to them, were leaving for a second honeymoon.

NAMELESS WOMEN

Edith Lawson Drama File No. 9421

PEGGY BRENT, the daughter of the police chief of a small town, was engaged to Joe Morgan. Joe, desperate because he couldn't find a position in the city, returned to his home town, and lured by the prospect of making "easy money", joined up with two gangsters. The two men, Dan and Val, revealed to him their plan to kidnap a young girl, and hold her for ransom, without disclosing the girl's name. Joe promised to watch the girl, for which he would receive ten percent of the ransom money.

In the meanwhile, Mrs. Gray, the town gossip, maliciously told Peggy that she was not the real daughter of the Brent's, but a foundling taken from the state orphan asylum,—a foundling, moreover, whose parents were not married. Heartbroken over her discovery, Peggy felt that it would be unfair to expect Joe to marry a foundling. That same evening, when her adopted parents had retired, Peggy wrote a note to them, explaining that she was going away. And then, tackling her hardest task, she scribbled a letter to Joe telling him what she had learnt. With one last, loving look toward the house where she had know so much happiness, she slipped quietly away down the state highway, with no definite plan as to her destination. She must have walked for hours along the dusty road, when suddenly she felt the headlights of a car turned on her. A pleasant voice called out to her, "Would you like a lift, sister?" Too exhausted to refuse, Peggy sank down in the front seat, and it was only then that she realized that the driver and his companion were burly-looking men. Her fears soon proved true, for the man in the back seat, who was called Val, forced her to sniff chloroform, and she awoke to find herself in a dark cave. The two men, unaware that she had regained consciousness, were discussing their plans, and thus she learnt of Joe's part in the plot. A few hours later, Joe came to guard her, and the two gangsters left. Seeing Peggy, Joe stood as if petrified, but Peggy, feigning to misunderstand the reason for his presence, threw herself upon him, and pretended that she believed he had come to rescue her. Only anxious to save the girl he loved, Joe immediately planned to leave with Peggy. They were in a cave in a wood, and the only entrance was being watched by Dan and Val. In the hope that they discover a way out, the two stumbled along the dark alleys. Suddenly, a loud crash caused Peggy to seream, and Dan and Val, hearing her cry, rushed into the oave. The crash was caused by a portion of the cave's roof falling in, and to their relief, they saw the blue through the opening. Hoisting himself up through the cavity, Joe quiekly pulled up Peggy after him, and the two ran breathlessly through the woods, far ahead of their pursuers, who had finally found the hole in the ceiling. Exhausted, they reached a neighboring town, and in a few hours, they were back in the Brent home, tearfully explaining what had happened. But when Mr. and Mrs. Brent had left Joe alone with Peggy, he knew he was not good enough to marry her, and was about to leave, intending to go to some distant city, and start his life over again. He felt he could never confess to her that he had almost become a criminal. But Peggy, knowing the thoughts that were torturing Joe, told him that she knew everything, and taking her in his arms, he vowed to spend the rest of his life proving he was worthy of her love.

LOVE MARTYR

Hattie M. White Drama File No. 9455

ALTHOUGH her father has set his heart upon Nina marrying Lewis Unrue, wealthy ship owner, Nina falls in love with Johnnie, a charming young shiphand. When Nina, forbidden to see the sailor, comes home with him and introduces him as her husband, her father's fury leaves him speechless for a moment. He orders the boy from the house but Nina goes with her husband, hearing still her father's warnings that she will rue her hasty marriage.

In Johnnie's arms Nina forgets everything save her great happiness, but soon, as expenses mount, and Johnnie hesitates to go to sea and leave her behind, Nina begins to feel that perhaps her father's warnings have been not without foundation. Johnnie searches unsuccessfully for other work and when her father, taken ill, begs her to come to see him, Nina visits home. There she finds Lewis who gently takes her hand and commiserates her upon her unfortunate marriage. Nina draws angrily away defending her husband, but her father calls him a worthless ne'er-do-well who is too lazy to find work to support his wife. When Lewis softly proffers a position on one of his sailing ships to Nina's husband, "in consideration of his fondness for her," Nina gratefully accepts. However, when Johnnie comes home and Nina tells him about the offer, and he refuses, Nina feels that everything that has been said about her Johnny is true. Angrily she tells him she is going back to her father. Johnnie pleads with her telling her the only reason he doesn't want to accept Lewis' offer is that it will mean months away from her and he couldn't stand that. Deaf to his iterations of love, Nina goes back to her father's house. When Johnnie ealls, her father says Nina refuses to see him. Taunted, Johnnie signs up on Lewis' ship and sails that night without seeing his wife again. A few weeks later Nina learns that Johnnie's ship has been sunk in a storm and Johnnie has been among the few not picked up by rescue ships. Nina is distraeted. Like a wraith she goes about her duties blaming herself for having sent Johnnie to his death. Her father consoles her telling her the fault is not hers and Lewis is ever present to offer sympathy. At length her father's illness becomes more grave and worried about his daughter's security, Nina's father begs her to marry Lewis whose love has been unfailing throughout, but it is not until she is left alone in the world and Lewis, handling her estate with that understanding and sympathy which he has always shown her, asks her if she won't marry him, that Nina consents. Grief has made of her life an empty shell and under Lewis' pleas that only she can make him happy, she promises.

Lewis married, seems strangely moody, but always Nina's thoughts are with Johnnie who had nothing to offer save love. Then one day Johnnie, gaunt and limping, returns. Nina gasps as he comes in and he seizes her hungrily in his arms. With a mighty cry, Nina detaches herself and cries, "But I thought you were dead." Johnnie's lips twist and Lewis coming in turns ghost-white. "You. . . . " In fiery words Johnnie calls Lewis a murderer. He knew the ship was unseaworthy and to kill the husband of the woman Lewis wanted, the shipowner risked the lives of his men. Suddenly breaking off his recital, Johnnie goes toward the door. Nina runs to him but he puts her from him saying gently, "You thought I would denounce your husband. No one shall know I live. You can still be happy." Nina watches the figure of the man she loves walk briskly down the path but when she turns to Lewis he is gone. Days later Johnnie comes in asking Nina's forgiveness for having broken up her home. Lewis had gone to sea in a rotten boat and it had sunk before it had fairly cleared the harbor. "Johnnie!" Nina eries in horror. "Johnnie!" In his arms she can forget.

MINISTER FROM HELL

Georges P. Kershey Mystery File No. 9451

IN the small Afriean colony the white men were bound together for protection against the blacks. When the Reverend Carl Stevens told the others he was leaving to accept the invitation of his former school friend, Hugh Newton, to preach at a Los Angeles congregation, there was a general discussion. That night Noel Manners drank arsenic by mistake. The men took turns watching at the dying man's bedside. During the Reverend Stevens' watch, Noel died and the next morning was buried.

The Reverend Stevens, limping slightly proceeded to the Los Angeles home of Hugh Newton where he was received with astonishment over the change Africa had wrought in him. His sermon was a personal triumph, but Newton resented his friend's unconcealed admiration for his daughter Sara, and wondered at the Reverend's terror of his half-wit son's tricks. A few nights later, while Newton was remarking about the occasion when he and Stevens had bought rings and promised always to wear them, he started at the realization that Stevens' hand was whole, yet during their undergraduate days, the minister had lost his index finger rescuing him, Newton. That night Newton was found choked to death, his body horribly punctured. Newton had numerous enemies among them Dr. Weller, but everyone including the half-wit Ralph Newton, proved an alibi. From the pulpit, the Reverend Stevens thundered his denunciation of murder, while Roy Starr, a young detective arrived, and moved by the grief of Sara, doubly determined to find her father's murderer. Ralph, the half-wit, suspecting Dr. Weller, who had quarreled with his father the day before, fell upon the doctor in his study. The doctor beat him off but while dragging himself to the telephone to eall headquarters broke off in horror as a fiendishly ugly man-beast wound claw-like hands around the doctor's throat and strangled him. The same punctured mutilations were found upon the doctor's body. Roy however stoutly testified that the half-wit Ralph had slipped into the house before the murder occurred. In his sermon the minister sounded a terrible note about those who would lie to save people they loved from disgrace. It was a badly frightened minister, however, who implored Roy to help him, showing a threatening note he had received from the dreaded Phantom Strangler. Touched by the hysteria of the Man of God, Roy promised to appear at the specified place himself. When Roy returned from waiting for hours unmolested, it was to find an angered chief demanding an explanation of where he had been while Ralph, the half-wit brother of Sara, had been strangled and mutilated, and his sister abducted. At that Roy lost his head. The girl he loved in the hands of the horrible maniac! Beside himself with anxiety, he explained the minister's note, but the minister, called to confirm the story, sympathized with the upset young man but explained that he knew nothing about the lad's alibi.

It was with the greatest difficulty, that Roy, learning that a spot near where he was supposed to wait to pay ransom money for the minister, had been blown up by dynamite, convinced the Chief to attack the holy man. Locked in the minister's house, Roy found Sara in a drugged stupor. As he lifted her, the Phantom Strangler, horrible to look upon, closed in on him. The police bullets glanced off the Phantom's body and Roy, raising himself with difficulty brought a chair crashing down on the head. While Roy tended the stricken Sara, the police uncovered the phantom's face and found beneath the mask the minister, a leather jacket through which nails projected, mutely testifying to his deadly strangle hold. Recovering consciousness, the maniac disclosed that the Reverend Stevens was buried in Africa; he was Noel Manners. Gently Roy led Sara away.

REINS OF LOVE

Carl Wetterau Drama File No. 9344

SENT by his newspaper editor to get the story behind the capture of John Milan, notorious racketeer, Cliff Tracy is impressed with the story given him by Ruth King who was with John at the time of his arrest. Ruth, one of the members of the Brevities chorus, had accepted the invitation of Mary Young. With Mary's friends, Ralph and John they had made a round of the night clubs. In the midst of the hilarity, an officer had produced a warrant for John's arrest and that was all Ruth knew about the case. Ruth's story doesn't give Cliff much of a story but when he comes to see her show and meets her at the stage door a friendship is born. For several months they go out together and when Cliff begins worrying about Ruth's friendship with Mary, whom he doesn't like, he asks her to marry him. Mary tries to dissuade Ruth, telling her she's foolish to waste all that beauty on an ordinary reporter, but with the show closing and the assurance of Cliff's love, Ruth accepts the offer of marriage. For a while Cliff and Ruth are very happy together. Then John Milan is freed from prison through bribery, and invited to Mary's apartment by Ralph, who is footing the bills, John asks where that cute trick, Ruth her name was, is, and Mary, casting a significant look at Ralph, explains that Ruth is married. John laughs and says, "That can be fixed."

A day or so later, when Ruth is at home waiting for Cliff's return from an all night assignment, Mary comes over and as she fingers the over-stuffed furniture, she makes Ruth feel the tawdriness of the apartment. Through cleverly worded sympathy, Mary finally convinces Ruth that she owes it to herself to have at least one good time, and Ruth finally agreed to come to a party at Mary's apartment. She is somewhat surprised to find John there but he soon dazzles her with his openly expressed admiration. As she drinks, Ruth feels it is true. She has been wasting her life with Cliff and as he drives her home she feels like Cinderella after twelve. She tells him not to call her, that she can't see him anymore, but when Mary keeps telling her how much John can offer her, Ruth, tired of waiting alone for Cliff, packs her things and goes to Mary where she is heartily welcomed. However, John is rearrested for a job he pulled and this time is sent up for a long stretch. Ruth is held as an accomplice and Cliff, learning of her distress, although he has spent weeks of anguish since she left him, works night and day to secure her release. At length he manages it, but as a result of his neglect of his duty he is fired. Ruth stands their poverty until the baby comes, then looking at her hands red from dish washing, she runs to Mary's house where she feels she will be welcome. But Mary, upset by Ralph's growing disinterest, is unfriendly and when Ralph turns his attention to Ruth, Mary drives her out. Ralph suavely gets up to follow and when Mary tries to stop him, he pushes her so that she strikes her head in falling and is killed. Dazed, Ruth phones Cliff who scoops the story of Ralph's capture, phones it into his former editor and is reinstated, while Ruth, held tightly in his arms, begs for forgiveness.

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE FENCE

Marie T. Kleine Comedy File No. 9893

BLANDLY Papa Meyer smiles as the moving van pulls up to one of the two houses on Plaza Road and moves his things in. With his arm around his wife's ample waist and his children standing around, Papa Meyer exclaims, "At last a home of our own. Peace. Quiet. Happiness." Then come the Duffys. Mrs. Meyer bakes an apple pie and ceremoniously brings it to her neighbors, but before she has crossed the threshold, Joe Duffy has stretched a cord across the floor and the good housefrau trips, her face in her confection. With crimson face she raises herself from the ground and leaves hurriedly as she sees Mr. and Mrs. Duffy convulsed with laughter.

Thereafter the Meyers have no rest. The children come in at intervals complaining of the latest diableries of the neighbors' children and the mischief-devising capacities of the Duffy youngsters seem unlimited. When Papa Meyer, his delicatessan prospering puts awnings upon his windows, Mr. Duffy comes over to complain that he is discriminating against them and as Papa Meyer places his ladder at the window nearest the Duffy house, Joe Duffy pulls out the legs, the ladder crashes against the front windows of the Duffy residence breaking all the panes, and Papa Meyer is catapulted to the Duffy flower beds. Painfully he picks himself up but Mr. Duffy grabs him by the scruff of the neck and demands satisfaction for the damage done. A cop comes running up and when it is proved by eye witnesses that the Duffy kids pulled down the ladder the complaint is dismissed and the Judge advises Duffy to administer a sound thrashing to his brats.

The Fourth of July the Duffys celebrate noisily and Joe tosses a lighted firecracker which sets fire to Elsie Meyer's dress and is hastily put out by Mama Meyer who cries excitedly. However, when Papa Meyer comes, vengeance bent, he sees Joe bending his face toward his cannon to find why it didn't explode and his warning, unheeded, Joe's face is badly burned when the tempermental cannon goes off late. The lad is rushed to the hospital but when he is released he is as obstreperous as ever and learning that the Meyers have gotten a new car of which they are very proud, he seats his brothers in the back and proceeds to drive with a grand flourish. The car gets out of hand and smashes up and the Doctor recommends that the youngsters be taken to a farm to recuperate from the severe nervous shock.

At home the Meyers breathe a sigh of relief and settle back to enjoy their home but soon the Duffys come scrambling back for within a few hours the brats had let all the chickens loose, fed the pigs green apples and destroyed everything in sight until the indignant farmer had driven them out. Back home the Duffys throw mudpies at the patient Meyers and when Papa Meyer, holding his temper in check erects a huge fence between, Mr. and Mrs. Duffy wrangle over it claiming it is a spite fence and the Meyers are ordered to tear it down. Then the Meyers move out and the Duffys grin as they anticipate the merry pace they will lead their incoming neighbors but their smiles fade as the moving vans draw up to the Meyer house and the new tenants start arriving in the dress of Napolean, Julius Ceasar, and Hamlet. Over the nameplate is tacked up,—"Private Lunatic Asylum," and the Duffys faint from the shock.

KING OF DIAMONDS

Elma Rivoli Drama File No. 9900

"RACE you to the raft, Don," Emily Thornton cried and minutes later, laughing and out of breath the two made the raft simultaneously. A moment later Don had kissed Emily and told her of his love. Slowly they swam back to shore and Emily started as she heard a bellhop paging her. In her hotel room she found her mother had fainted and later, when everyone else had gone, Emily thoughtfully read the telegram from her father telling her his business had collapsed and their fortune was gone. "At least there's that concert offer," Emily said, and her mother shook her head despairingly. Back in New York, Emily discovered that things were even worse than they seemed at first. Her father, faced with poverty, had lost all ambition and Emily grew desperate as she realized that they had to have money. In answer to Don's telegram from Bermuda, Emily cabled that she was leaving for Europe to accept the concert tour.

It was when she went to Casey, the family jeweler to sell some of her jewels that Emily found a way out. Casey was worried about the activities of diamond smugglers. The association of jewelers of which he was president suspected one George Brown, but although they had had innumerable detectives shadowing him, nobody had been able to catch him with the goods. His next sailing was on the same boat that Emily was leaving on, and there was twenty-five thousand dollars in it if she could get him. Casey felt that with her beauty she might succeed where others failed.

Emily read the passenger list carefully and contrived to meet George. At the ship's concert she sang directly to him and he fell for it as she hoped, but although he was constantly at her side Emily could find no clue to his activities. In Europe, singing, Emily achieved a moderate success and always there were orchids from George, but one night when he asked her to marry him and drew out a gorgeous diamond bracelet, Emily's breath caught in her throat. Begging for time to think it over, she returned to her room and finding a discouraging note from home telling her that unless her father could raise some money to escape being forced into bankruptcy, things would be black, Emily accepted George's ring. One night, at the theater, Emily almost fell as she found Don waiting for her. Seizing both her hands he told her he had followed her abroad to insist that she marry him, but before she could answer, George walked in and ordered Don from his fiance's room. Dully Don looked down at her ring and ran from the room. Grace tried to explain but she learned that Don had seized the next boat for home. When George came that night, Emily evaded his embraces and told him that she was returning to the United States. Seizing her in his arms, George told her he couldn't let her go and when she assured him nothing could stop her, George took passage on the same boat.

At first dismayed, Emily realized that she had her last opportunity to catch him and when he invited her to his stateroom she went. However, when he tried to kiss her she began talking irrelevantly about his perky little canary. The last day arrived, and Emily realized she had failed but suddenly she realized the canary was missing and George grew ugly as she spoke of it. Instantly suave again, he didn't deceive Emily and her telegram had Casey on the lookout for the canary cage. The customs men followed the stewardess George's accomplice who carried the bird out and in the cage they found a cache of diamonds, caught George, and gave Emily the reward. But her happiness came when Don returned to her, begging forgiveness for having doubted her and in his arms Emily found rest.

BOOTLEG

Mrs. Della Fredricks Drama File No. 9825

WHEN Zeb Potter, uncle and guardian of orphaned Glory, refused to let his little niece attend school, despite her tears and entreaties, he earned her deep hatred, and she vehemently declared to her small cousin Ella, who had come up from the village to ask her to go to school with her, that some day she would get even. The fifteen years that had passed had not changed Glory's attitude toward him, for he forced the girl to work for him on his small farm, and it was only through her rare visits to Glory that she was able to get some of the knowledge she had always craved. Suspicious of the sudden increase in her uncle's wealth, Ellen learned from some kindly neighbors that Zeb Potter was operating a still, and furnishing the town hotel with liquor. Further incensed against him for his flagrant violation of the law, Glory visited Ellen, and telling Ellen of her discovery, brought from Ellen the startling news that a revenue agent, Alden Burgess, whom Ellen had met at a school dance, was coming to the town to catch the moonshiners.

Although she could have warned her uncle, Glory, meeting Alden Burgess on the train going home, knew she would rather help than hinder this earnest young man, who, from his conversation, had evidently decided to pretend that he was coming to town for a vacation, and not to catch the offenders. At home, a deliberate insult from her uncle concerning her slowness, moved Glory to a quick decision, and packing her few belongings, she came to town, intending to look for work. Afraid that Alden would hate her if he found out about her Uncle, and yet determined to make Zeb Potter suffer as he deserved, Glory obtained a position as waitress in the hotel that used her Uncle's liquor at the soft drink counter, and took a room with Mrs. Palmer. Mrs. Palmer, widowed a few years before, had been struggling to support her two little daughters, and had been only to glad to board Glory, whom she had known since babyhood.

Meanwhile, Glory, carrying out her plan, won the heart of Alden and not telling him who she really was, invited him to drop in on her at the hotel. Glad of this return of his affection, Alden, as he sat before the counter, often seemed in dejected spirits, and although Glory knew that it was because he felt he was failing in his mission, she did not dare comfort him. Instead, she hinted to him very broadly, that possibly liquor was being sold right at the hotel bar. Quick to understand, Alden became a frequent patron of the hotel, and winning the confidence of Gus, the counter man, by his amiable disposition and his charming manners, Alden one evening casually asked for a drink of whiskey. Although he had strict order to serve no one but the recognized customers, Gus never suspected, and giving Alden a drink he was surprised to find that Alden firmly declared it was not real liquor. Annoyed by the sureness of the boy's statement, Gus retorted hotly, "It's the best liquor that Zeb Potter ever made." At these words, Alden placed Gus under arrest, and with three other agents went to Zeb's home. Meanwhile, Glory, discovering to her horror that Mrs. Palmer, unable to support her daughter had built a still, and that Zeb knew about it, and if caught, would implicate Mrs. Palmer, ran to the woods with Mrs. Palmer, and set fire to the still. By the time Alden reached her, Glory was looking at the charred embers of the still. His evidence destroyed Alden, knowing why Glory had acted to save Mrs. Palmer, and forgiving her, silenced her explanations with a kiss.

CALL OF THE WORLD

Marie T. Kleine Drama File No. 9461

WHEN Cly de Roberts, the son of Pastor Roberts, was old enough to choose a carecr, his father expected him to follow the ministry. But to his utter disgust his son firmly announeed his intention of studying dramatics so that he might some day become a great Shakespearian actor. His mother secretly sided with him, for she had seen her son in many amateur performances, and was convinced of his exceptional ability. But she could do nothing to change the pastor's opinion that the stage was not a noble profession, and so Clydc, seeing that there was no hope for him to follow his chosen profession, decided to study in secret, to prepare for the time when he should receive his first real acting role. The months passed, and Clyde anxiously and eagerly devouring every book on dramatic technique, and closely watching the gestures of all the actors he saw, at last felt certain that he was ready to try his hand at professional work. Appearing in a school play as Hamlet, he did such excellent work, that the manager of a stock company who was touring the country looking for talent, pronounced him a real "find", and immediately signed him for a year's contract. Making one last attempt to win his father's consent Clyde was unsuccessful, and left home to follow the dictates of his heart, knowing that he could never return to his father's house as long as he was an actor.

For the first few months, the stock company was amazingly fortunate, but the sudden reversal in business conditions caused people to stop spending money on entertainment, and Clyde could no longer write home and tell his mother that he was happy. Despite all his attempts to keep his company going, the manager was finally forced to disband the group in Pittsburg, and Clyde was left stranded in a strange city, without much money, and with no knowledge of any trade except acting. Just when his small savings were giving out, he found a job as porter in a large country inn outside of town. Glad of any chance he worked diligently, until one evening, one of the inn's performers falling ill, Clyde begged his employer, Mr. Bennett, to let him put on a dramatic sketch. Dubious of the result, Mr. Bennett, finally agreed, and to his delight, the patrons of the inn instantly called for an encore. From that time on Clyde became a regular entertainer at the inn, and when Helen Bennett told him that she loved him, Clyde at last felt that he was reaching his goal, especially since a Broadway producer had a contract all ready for him to sign. But Mary Lawson, one of the other entertainers who was madly in love with Clyde, was raging with jealousy, and only wanted to ruin Clyde's plans. Cleverly she conoealed some of Helen's jewels in Clyde's room, and when the theft was discovered, the guilt was laid to Clyde who could offer no explanation. For his daughter's sake, Mr. Bennett decided not to prosecute, but fired Clyde, who, branded as a thief, lost his contract with the producer. Utterly broken in spirit by this second misfortune, Clyde wandered for months seeking work, but there was none to be found. His health failing, he was eontemplating suicide, when one snowy evening, he walked straight into his parents who were attending an ecclesiastical convention in the city. Moved by the sight of his boy's pitiful state, Rev. Roberts begged Clyde to come back hime. Despondent, and cured of his early ambition, Clyde returned home with his people, and regaining his health, he taught at the local school where he met a young woman who was far more worthy of him than Helen. He never told his father of his life away from home, but Sylvia and his mother knew how near he had come to succeed as an actor, and Sylvia devoted her life to making her husband contented with his peaceful existence at home.

SOMETHING NEW UNDER THE SUN

George Westenhaver Mystery File No. 9452

WHEN George Larraby was a little boy growing up in the mountain country, his favorite story he liked to hear his grandmother tell, was of an electric storm she had once seen, in which a vivid flash of lightning had caused her picture to be photographed on the window pane through which she had been watohing the storm. His childhood playmates, Seth Pierce, Celia Grant, and Eunice Hale, also heard the story many times, but as the years passed the tale faded from their memories.

Growing to manhood, the two boys fulfilled their life ambitions by obtaining jobs with the railroad that ran through the treacherous mountain region. Both worked together, side by side, and at home their relationships were just as friendly. George was naturally attracted toward Celia, and Seth toward Eunice, but she, on the other hand, felt herself drawn to George. Seth knew of this, and gradually a feeling of dislike grew up between him and his friend, for Eunice steadily refused Seth's offers of marriage.

Even this state of affairs might have blown over, but at the end of two years, George and Seth decided to take the test to become engineers on the railroad, and when George passed with honors, and Seth was left far behind him, their friendship was strained to the breaking point. George, on the other hand felt that his promotion was all he nceded to encourage him to propose to Celia, and his joy knew no bounds when she accepted. Planning a party at her home to celebrate George's new position, and at the same time to announce their engagement, Celia invited Eunice and Seth, unaware that George felt unoomfortable in Eunice's presence, and that Seth was burning with hatred for George. The party, to all outward appearances was successful, and both Set and Eunice seemed to accept the news of the engagement with delight. George and Eunice lived on the same road, a short distance over the mountain trail, and Scth lived a few door from Celia. Knowing Seth's feeling towards Eunice George offered to take Eunice home, and Seth walked back to his cottage alone, leaving George and Eunice to fight their way home, through a storm which had suddenly blown up in the valley. Vivid streaks of lightning erackled across the sky, and the rain poured down until dawn. In the morning, discovering that Eunice had not returned home, and learning that George was last with her, Mr. and Mrs. Hale, demanded that George tell what had happened to her. George, insisting that he had seen Eunice to the door of the Hale home, was confronted with the mutilated body of the girl, found on the mountain trail a short distance from her home. Denying his guilt, he was taken to jail, and still clung to his original story although the only ones to believe in him were his fiancee and Seth. Offering to help George, Seth engaged a prominent lawyer, but the great attorney was handicapped by the lack of evidence, and despite his efforts, the boy was condemned to hang the fifth of July. Independence day, Celia, who had been morose, was urged by her friends to take a short walk along the mountain trail. Seeing a lovely flower that was half hidden behind a huge boulder, the girl bent down to pick it and suddenly turned toward her friends with a startled cry. There, photographed on the rock, was a clear piocture of Seth, knife in hand, holding it menacingly above Eunice. Calling police to the spot, who induced Seth to come with them on some flimsy pretext, they confronted him with the tell-tale evidence that that night he had waylaid Eunice just as George left her, dragged her to the trail, and when she refused to marry him, he had murdered her in a fit of rage. George, freed of all charges, returned to find forgetfulness and joy in the arms of Celia.

MIRRORED SECRETS

Michael Wishengrad Drama File No. 9498

DEJECTEDLY Jerry Lindsay, young surgeon parks his car in front of his door and as he sees his brother's wife, Edna drive away in a sedan, he enters the house. Exasperated that Bill, his brother, should appear so oblivious to his wife's extra-marital adventures, Jerry mentions the incident but Bill cuts him off with a brief, "I know," Later, Bill's child, Stanley comes home from school and gleefully asks for an account of his uncle's operations. Jerry gloom is marked as he admits that the little fellow who was run over died on the operating table. In the midst of his recital Edna comes in and under her prodding Jerry explains that the boy died after a transfusion. They had used the child's father as a donor and only after the child had taken a fatal turn did they discover that the man was the patient's stepfather. Death had come from using a different blood type. Edna holds her own child closely and Jerry can feel her contempt for losing a patient, but Bill sensing his brother's feeling of defeat steps into the breach.

Several nights later Edna cheerily calls that she is going out this evening and Bill grunts in acceptance. Passing Stanley's room, Jerry sees his sister-in-law kissing her child and again he remarks half in jest that the child doesn't resemble Bill at all. From Edna's reaction, Jerry knows he has prodded her deeply and Edna sweeps out of the room.

Again that feeling that his brother is being imposed upon overcomes Jerry, and distressed as he is, he begs Bill to rouse himself, to do something to save his marriage. Bill invites Jerry to stop meddling in other people's affairs but it is evident the next day from Edna's renewed hostility that her husband has mentioned the incident. While Jerry is explaining it is their happiness he is thinking of there is a terrific crash and rushing into the kitchen they find that Stanley has pulled the table down upon him and a jagged fragment of china has cut his jugular vein. Edna faints as she sees her child lying in a pool of blood and Jerry arranges to have the child brought to a hospital where he oan be properly attended. A transfusion is necessary and Jerry winces as he discerns doubt in Edna's eyes, remembering the other child who died. At last Edna comes to him with haunted eyes as Jerry explains briefly there is nothing to worry about, he is using the child's father. There can be no doubt about mixing types. With a low moan Edna explains that Bill isn't Stanley's father, that she had been with child when she married Bill. Now Jerry can tell Bill. As she explains dully that she fancied herself in love with a man, but discovering he had concealed from her the fact that he was married, her love had turned to hate, Jerry grasps her shoulders and cries that Bill is not to know. His happiness must be preserved.

Stanley's transfusion is a sucoess but after the child recovers it is torture for Edna who quivers under Bill's comforting gestures. At length one night she tells him what she has told Jerry. Softly he answers he has known that all along. Onee Stanley's father had boasted, while in his cups. Does Edna know that the man has died, sinee then? It makes it easier, somehow.

Several days later they are discussing Jerry's marriage to one of the nurses at the hospital, when Bill suggests a honeymoon trip to Bermuda, and in Edna's smiling substitution of a Mediteranean cruise, their first disagreement, is the positive evidence that now, at last, they are truly married.

AMERICAN MENACE

Marie Rowe Mystery File No. 9656

WHEN Frederick Shalburn, the famous jeweler, was murdered, and his store robbed, Noel Frazer, his lawyer, who had also been his dearest friend, determined to track down the guilty one, and confided his plan to Ellen Claudey, the pretty young secretary, whom he had hired the morning before the murder. Noel's offices were directly across the small court yard, from the Shalburn store, and the evening of the murder Noel had left his new secretary to finish up some work. A wowman's glove had been found on the scene, but because the store had gone up in flames immediately after the crime, there were no other clues.

Although Noel made no progress in his detective work, he did succeed in winning the heart of Ellen, and the two spent many happy days together. Yet Noel could not forget the death of his friend, and when he spoke to Ellen of it, she looked frightened, and begged him to drop the search, adding that she thought discovery of the murderer impossible. But Noel felt that the crime had been eommitted by Wally Davis, a notorious gangster, who had been suspeoted of similar crimes, although the police were unable to find definite proof of his guilt.

Meanwhile Ellen, who had seen the crime from the window, was summoned by Wally Davis to his apartment, for he knew that Ellen, who was his step-daughter might reveal his guilt. When she threatened to tell, he informed her that her brother, who worked on Noel's yacht, although the young lawyer did not know he was Ellen's brother, was also involved in the Shalburn case. Frightened, Ellen promised to keep silent, until terrified by Wally's too friendly advances, she shot him. Too upset to escape, she was caught by the police, and with Noel acting in her defense, she was tried for the murder of Wally Davis. But despite Noel's claim that she shot Davis in self-defense, she spoiled her chances for freedom, by refusing to tell why she, a respectable girl, had gone to Wally's apartment. Not knowing that Ellen felt that if she told of Wally's part in the Shalburn case she would be incriminating her brother, Noel begged her to confess, but Ellen maintained a stubborn silence. The night before the olose of the case, Noel, who knew Ellen would be convicted unless she spoke, determined to take the matter into his own hands. Suspecting that at Ellen's closed apartment he might find some evidence that would tell him why she had gone to Davis' apartment, he phoned his friend, Captain Steeve, of the detective squad, and asked him to get a master key, and come with him.

Just after midnight the two men reached Ellen's and as they were about to open the door, heard voices from within. Amazed they slipped noiselessly into the foyer that opened into the living-room, and there Noel saw the young boy who operated his boat, and two other men, Frank and Rance, known to be members of Wally's gang. Young Claudey saw Noel, but the others did not, and Claudey, who had been kept there by foree to prevent him saving his sister, suddenly changed his attitude, and began to talk about the Shalburn case. Unaware of the trap, Frank and Rance revealed that Wally was Ellen's step-father, and that he had lied to Ellen when he said that her brother had taken part in the Shalburn oase. Caught by Steeve and Frazer, the two men were jailed, and Claudey took the stand the next morning to save Ellen. Exonerated at last, Ellen and Noel were quietly wed, and set out on a cruise with young Claudey as their pilot.

ALL IN A DAY

Ella Morgan Drama File No. 9575

WHEN George Ellsworth, owner of the largest industry in town, a dye plant, announced to his daughter, Grace, that he intended to send Barry, her nine year old brother to the village school, because he wanted the boy treated like all other children, and not pampered Grace thought her father unreasonable. Passing the school one morning Grace saw a gang of unruly children tormenting a timid little boy, and when the distressed teacher tried to put a stop to their cruel sport, the children paid no attention.

Among Grace's suitors was Hugh Markham, the trustee of the town school, who had the power to appoint its teachers, but so far he had been unable to find anyone capable of handling the unruly pupils, and under the leadership of "Dinky" Logan, one of the old boys, the school remained a hopeless failure.

On a short visit to New York to attend a series of lectures, Grace met Arthur Hopkins, a young instructor at a fashionable girl's school, and although she realized that he was the man she had been waiting for, she was scornful of the work he did, because it was an easy way to make a living, since the students of his school were docile, and used to discipline. Arthur could not see Grace's view in this matter, and when she taunted him by saying that he was not a "teacher" in the true sense of the word, he lost his temper, and angrily declared that he would come to Hammod, Grace's home, and manage the school. Secretly glad because she had succeeded in arousing in Arthur just the spirit she had hoped for, Grace returned home with Arthur, and persuaded Hugh Markham to let Arthur try his hand at governing Hammod's rascals. Believing this an opportunity to lower Arthur in Grace's eyes, Hugh readily consented, and with malicious pleasure, went with Arthur to his school the first day, and generously called for him in the late afternoon, finding, as he had expected, that Arthur was furious over the flagrant bad behavior of his new pupils, and especially "Dinky's", who had taken an immediate dislike to this refined teacher from the city. The suceeding days proved a nightmare to Arthur, who for the first time in his life, was forced to arise at five thirty, trudge through the snow to his shabby school house, shovel a path to the door, light the oil stove, and then try futilely to win the attention of his class. During the day, besides having to attend to the various needs of the little children, he was continually tormented by mean pranks instigated by "Dinky." Grace was beginning to feel that Arthur, as a teacher, was a dismal failure, and when, the night of her dance, he failed to appear, she thought him inexcusably rude. But while Hugh was dancing with Grace, Arthur was making a frantic effort to find his text books, which had been taken from his locker. After hours of stubborn search, he discovered the books buried in the wood pile at the back of the school house. Vowing vengeance on "Dinky" he arrived at school the next morning, to find that youngster had forced young Ellsworth into a fight with a larger boy, who had pummeled him unmercifully. When George Ellsworth, enraged, threatened to discharge "Dinky's" father, whose work at Mr. Ellsworth's plant was his sole income, Arthur pleaded successfully for his reinstatement. The next morning a group of wonderfully attentive children listened to Arthur, for he had at last proven that he was on their side. Seizing his opportunity, Arthur held them with his fascinating stories of history, and when Grace slipped unnoticed into the room, she saw that Arthur had at last won the children's respect, and her love.

HOSPITAL STAFF

Dr. Frederick H. Howard Drama File No. 9720

FROM their first days on the same hospital staff, Frank Bulwer and David Morton were bitter rivals, because Elka Clinton one of the nurses at the hospital, whom Bulwer loved, was madly infatuated with David, who hardly noticed her. Later the enmity grew more pronounced for David, who had specialized in bone surgery gained considerable prominence as a result of his skillful operations. With Elka, who had been hurt by David's lack of interest, Bulwer planned to spoil David's career, but, both had been unable to find a means of discrediting him in the eyes of the hospital head.

When attractive Sara Jackson collapsed on the street and was brought by the ambulance to the hospital, Dr. Morton attended her. Told that she had a broken shoulder bone, Dr. Morton made the examination only to discover that Sara Jackson had deliberately lied about her injury, for her shoulder had been pierced by a bullet. When he began to write down her case as "Bullet wound," Sara implored him to conceal the true nature of her accident, and told him her story.

Orphaned at an early age, Sara had been brought up by a cousin, whose son Jim, two years younger than Sara, had been going about with a disreputable group of young men. Jim's mother, worn out with hard work and worry over her son's behavior, finally died, her last words being a plea to Sara to watch over him. Faithful to her promise, Sara, learning from a reliable source that Jim was to participate in a bank hold up, rushed down to the bank to find Jim sitting in a car in front of the bank. Although realizing that she was incurring danger, Sara entered the car, and pleaded with him not to become involved in the crime. Just as she was about to step from the car, she was hit by the bullet of a bank guard directed at the fleeing gangster. With a cry of horror, she fell back into the car, and Jim, as instructed, drove away. Having eluded pursuit, the gunman stopped the auto, and rudely pushed Sara out, despite Jim's heated protests. She had returned home, dressed her wound as well as she could, and had finally fainted in the street from the pain. Sara implored him to diagnose her case as a fractured shoulder, since the police, believing her an accomplice, had ordered all hospitals to keep a strict watch for a girl with a shoulder wound. Moved by the girl's courage and evident sincerity, Dr. Morton agreed, and aided by Vera Lake, the night nurse for the ward, managed to hide the truth from the hospital staff.

Meanwhile, Elka, discovering that David went to Sara's room at midnight, grew suspicious and told Bulwer, who, as casually as possible asked to examine Miss Jackson's fracture. His request coldly refused by Morton, he spied on Nurse Lake, and learnt the truth. Triumphant, he took his story to the chief of the staff, who denouncing David as a shielder of criminals, scorned Sara's explanation. Disgraced, David started from the room, just as Jim, who had been fatally wounded trying to evade arrest for the bank robbery, lay on a table in the emergency. The head physician, summoned to the ward, heard the mumbled confession exonerating Sara of all guilt. With the staff chief's reassurance that he would be reinstated, David left the hospital, supporting Sara with his arm. And a few months later he was again supporting her—forever.

GOOD TIMES' COMING

Maurice Thurlow Short Subject File No. 9728

WHEN George and Laurie, workers in a Connecticut mill, learn that they must work only three days a week, the two boys complain bitterly to their girl friends, who tell them, that with conditions as they are, they ought to be thankful for any sort of a job. Their pride hurt, the boys exclaim, "Something's got to be done!" And something is done, for George who is skillful at cartooning and Laurie who is sure he knows all about sporting events, decide to tour the country in Laurie's dilapidated car, and seek jobs on a newspaper, as artist and sports writer.

Bursting with confidence, the two pals wave gay farewells to their sweethearts, and drive off lightheartedly, the back of the car piled high with canned goods. For several hours all goes well, for the two boys extolling the beauties of nature, forget about the food problem. A suspicious gnawing in the pits of their stomachs urges them to find shelter for the night, and then their trouble begins. Not passing any tourist camps, the two adventurers are forced to make their own camp, and cook their own food. Nothing daunted after a restless sleep in the narrow back seat, the two set forth blithely the next morning, and at every town, confidently ask for employment at the newspaper offices. After a week of fruitless effort during which time the car breaks down at the least provocation, George, desperate, hits upon the idea of hiring a cheap room, and then parking the car on a busy street, and cartooning whoever happens to pass. It may have been a good idea, but unfortunately the subject George chooses is the portly mayor of the town, who, indignant at the ridiculous portrait which causes such hilarious laughter on the part of the bystanders, chases George and Laurie and the two take refuge in their apartment. Not daring to show themselves, they stay hidden for three days, and when finally gathering up enough courage to go downstairs and see what has happened to the car, they find that the poor flivver has been used as a playground for the neighborhood kids, and that it is now worthless. Disgusted, Laurie and George sell the car, and their typewriter, and tramp on to the next town, hope of finding jobs slowly dwindling as are their finances.

After a torturous twenty mile walk, dusty and blistered the two boys reach the town, only to find that to all appearances, it is totally deserted, for the streets are empty and the houses are silent. Too tired to question, they tramp into the nearest house, and immediately fall asleep on a comfortable lounge. When the townspeople, returning from the annual picnic find the boys they are promptly ejected, and the next night is spent at a charity lodging house, where the boys, unused to the hard beds and indigestible food, are unmercifully teased by the hardened inmates, who like themselves have found that depression is everywhere. Anxious to earn enough money to get home, the two get a one day job as street cleaners, and when a circus parade passes through the town, the boys find that their job isn't as easy as they had hoped. With the money earned, George and Laurie, board a train back to Connecticut, glad they have seen the world but absolutely convinced that when out of a job, there is no place like home, sweet home!

CONQUEST OF LIES

Cathleen Connell Drama File No. 9577

BORED by the small town of Lynton where he is staying while supervising the construction of a bridge, Barry listlessly consents to visit the high school graduation exercises for amusement. Despite himself he is captivated by the lilting dancing feet of little Margie White but when he attempts to meet her after the entertainment and finds her surrounded by all the young men in town whom she mischievously eludes, Barry gets into his high powered roadster and with a shrug of his shoulders drives off. A few days later, returning from the bridge during a driving rain, Barry sharply turns a corner and his car wheels splash mud all over little Margie. Tears fill her eyes as she views her ruined clothes and Barry stops apologetically to ask if he may drive her home. At first she refuses sharply but realizing what a sorry spectacle she presents she manages a rueful smile and climbs in beside the young Engineer. When Barry tells her he comes from New York her eyes light up for her dearest ambition is to be a star on Broadway, then suddenly she inquiries if he knows her cousin Marion who lives in New York. Barry's hearty laugh as he reminds her that New York is a very large city disconcerts Margie for a moment but she soon forgets everything save his charm, and in the weeks that follow, despite himself, Barry finds himself falling in love with "Little Girl" as he calls her. However, when Margie's cousin Marion arrives from New York, Barry looks at her and awakens to the fact that in the small town of Lynton he has entirely detached himself from his own people. Marion and her sophisticated ways are his world. Gently he tells Margie and she pretends not to mind but in the darkness of her own room she cries herself to sleep.

Believing that everyone in town is pitying her for losing Barry, Margie slips away and arrives in New York to try to make her name on Broadway. Her pretty little ways win her a chorus position and Count Ziller, who has a financial interest in the show becomes interested in her. Through his influence, Margie is given a specialty number but the night the show opens, in the excitement backstage, the Count asks Margie to marry him, telling her she is not the Broadway type. Softly Margie refuses and as her cue is given, she dances out upon the stage.

Meanwhile, Barry has been escorting Marion about and when she returns to New York she proudly exhibits to her friends Barry's engagement ring. Too late he realizes that Marion is shallow and extravagant, but he has lost Margie and he doesn't care any more. Marion insists on a dizzy round of social activities and it is she who demands that they see the premiere of "Kid Sister."

Barry's eyes are riveted to the stage when Margie dances into the spotlight, but upset by the Count's proposal, she slips. Barry is shocked by Marion's raucous laugh, but Margie quickly recovers and with elfin grace makes her error the high spot of the show. Only Marion talks loudly of Margie's fall, and Barry hurries her out of the theater, steers her through the crowd to a taxi, and closing the door, tells her he has just come to realize how close he was to marrying the wrong girl. Shrilly Marion refuses to give him his engagement ring and gifts, but Barry smiles as he tells her he wasn't thinking of that. Backstage, the producer is refusing the Count's request that Margie be fired and is offering the girl a contract for her to repeat at each performance that bit of business, but Barry announces that he won't have his wife working any more and rushes the startled Margie out of the theater. In his car, in the moonlight, Barry asks Margie to marry him, and she sighs deeply and consents.

CASTLES ON SAND

Mrs. Lou Eissler Drama File No. 9658

GIVEN to strange extremes of temper, Frank watched his children play at throwing snowballs outside the window and his arms crept about his tired wife's frail shoulders. Later, however, when, rosy-cheeked, the girls had sat before their lamps to do their home work and Elsie had looked up from her assignment book to ask her father for his background, since she had to prepare a family tree for school, Frank rose furiously and his little family cowered before his burst of temper. Only his wife could appease him as he shouted that he didn't send his girls to school to learn to pry into other people's business, he wanted them to learn to read and write and that was all. Long after her father's rage had subsided, Elsie picked up her scattered papers from the floor and piecing together her torn note books, wrote her assignment. All the cousins and aunts she had seen at a family funeral, she mentioned. Her father, she said, was brought up in an orphanage and didn't know his family. Now Frank's furies occurred with greater frequency and the girls clung to their mother who in a failing voice which never lost its gentle note, told them that Frank had recently come to town when she met him at a barn dance. He had been so handsome that everyone thought she was lucky to get him for a husband, but not once in all the years of married life had Frank told her of his people. Always he had lost his temper when she mentioned his past. Then Mary fell in love with Jim Bogans, and Frank objected to her getting married. However, when her mother finally lost her weak hold on life, Mary, accusing Frank of having hastened her mother's end, eloped with Jim. Brokenly Frank sat in his still little house until Elsie came back, and flinging herself beside the desolate figure, promised her father she would remain with him. Thereafter, Frank, as if repentant, was kinder to Elsie. That is until she met George. When Elsie came in with soft eyes and confessed she was in love, Frank bristled. But when he learned that George was a mining engineer visiting in town, Frank rose, trembling with his old fury and forbade Elsie ever to bring George home. Scarcely believing prejudice could be so unreasonable, Elsie drew gently from George's embrace and said they must never see each other again. When she explained, George laughed at her fears but Frank, seeing him, drove him from the house and worked himself into such a fury that he fell down the stairs and George helped Elsie carry him to his room. The doctor looked grave and when George looked questioningly upon Elsie she shook her head and explained that she couldn't leave him now when he was helpless. In his delirium Frank spoke again and again of the mines, of the corner saloon and of his family whom he had never mentioned. Once he mentioned Greenville, and to George, Elsie mentioned the mining town. Interested, George promised to investigate and Elsie told him of the name Rader her father mentioned so frequently.

In the Greenville paper, George advertised for anyone knowing the Raders and brought back with him Jim Rader who explained to Elsie that her father was his brother. Years ago, Frank thought he killed a man in the saloon and fled town before discovering that the victim recovered. It was his fear of discovery that made him distrust strangers. Frank slowly recovered, and with the great burden removed from his shoulders, sanctioned the marriage of Elsie and George.

SHANTY TOWN RASCALS

Jack Lloyd Adventure File No. 9627

WHEN Min Bailey, mother of worthless Bat Bailey, and self-appointed guardian of Brick Mullins and Sandy McGrew, ruefully informs the youngsters that her basket trade is diminishing, the boys determine to make money. Brick the brains of the combination, invents the happy scheme of using the family mule for hauling, and in this way the boys earn thirty dollars. Drunk with their success, they rush to a carnival, and Brick, drunk on lemonade, spends all his money and even attempts a balloon ascent, but is rescued by the faithful Min. Broke once more, they talk the carnival owner into letting them cart the smaller animals of the troupe to the next town. Frightened by an approaching train, the mule bolts, scattering the animals over the town while Brick and Sandy run for shelter.

A few weeks later, still trying to earn money, the partners industriously pick mushrooms in the nearby woods, and not sure of their purity, give some to Old Man Potter, a recluse living in the woods, who refuses all admittance to his cabin. Although the mushrooms are pure, the old man becomes ill and dies, causing remorseful Sandy to have a terrible nightmare, in which the old man reveals to him the hiding place of a treasure.

Meanwhile, the bull dog belonging to their rival Red Larrison, has badly beaten Brick's aged pup, and despairing of ever getting even with Red, Brick finds a stray airdale, Tarzan, and the dog emerges from the battle of billy goat hill, victorious. But Brick's pleasure in the dog is short-lived, for the owner, a sportsman claims the hound, but seeing the boys' grief, sends them Rangoo, son of Tarzan, who proves to be a wonderful fighter.

Still thirsting for adventure, the boys form the Pelicans, a club replete with mysterious rituals, codes and rules, but when Bat Bailey, hating the boys who have tried to turn him over to the police, breaks in on a meeting, the club house is destroyed. Meanwhile, Sandy, worried about his dream, goes with Brick to the burnt remains of Old Man Potter's house, and under the doorstep finds a jar containing thirteen thousand dollars, a bible and a small box. Hiding the jar in the ice house, until they can decide what to do with it, they find that Min, who has mortgaged her house to pay for her son's offenses, is taken to court. Offering their fortune to the sheriff, they are taken along with Min to explain the possession of such a huge sum. Dramatically, Judge Butterworth discovers that Min is the niece of Old Man Potter, and the rightful heir to the fortune, if she can prove her identity with a locket. Sending Sandy back to the house with the sheriff to get the locket, Sandy catches Bat in the act of looting his mother's shabby cottage, and triumphantly drags him to the court, where Min, sure of herself at last, reveals that he is the son of the Judge's son, left in her care twenty years before. Rejoicing in her good fortune, the two boys hug their benefactor to their hearts.

But one last adventure is in store for them. Their dog stolen by gypsies, it is traced by their friend, a railroader, to a place upstate and while there the boys decide to visit the owner of Tarzan, Mr. Benson. At his home Rangoo fights a battle to the death with his famous sire, and when the boys leave they feel that through their experiences they have gained a richer knowledge of the qualities of mankind.

THE UNFAILING DEVOTION

J. T. Clarke Drama File No. 9576

EVER since Bert Mitchell had been living with his old uncle, Harvey Mitchell, he had formed a strong dislike for his uncle's police dog, Terry. It all began when Bert was a youngster, and was stealthily engaged in stealing peaches from a neighbor's orchard. Terry, showing a remarkable intelligence, had caught him in the act, and before he could escape from the grounds, the dog had barked loudly, and Bert was subjected to the rightful anger of the owner of the orchard. When Bert grew to manhood, his animosity increased, for his uncle had a strange habit of talking to the dog as though he were a human being, and often Bert overheard Harvey Mitchell telling Terry to keep a sharp eye on Bert's actions.

At eighteen, Bert went off to an Eastern college, and during his flying visits back to his home in the Virginian hills, he saw little of Terry. But four years later, he returned, to his uncle's house, and settled down to carry on the real estate business that Harvey Mitchell had established thirty years before. At first, things seemed to be little changed, and when Bert was growing bored with the routine existence of small town life, he made an important discovery. Following Terry one day into the same peach orchard where he had been ingloriously spanked fifteen years before, he made the acquaintance of Gale Stevens, the young daughter of the house, who had just completed her course at finishing school, and, like Bert, had come back to pick up the threads of her former life. In a few weeks, the two young people found they had many traits in common; both disliked Terry who always followed them when they wanted to be alone; both found life very dull. Determining to find some excitement, the two threw themselves into a round of parties, dances and road house visits. Harvey Mitchell, who frowned on all dissipation, withdrew himself more and more from his reckless nephew's confidence, and held long conversations with the faithful Terry, which only intensified Bert's hatred for the dog, who seemed to share his master's disapproval of Gale and Bert. Ignoring the frequent admonitions of her easy-going father, Gale, imperious and haughty, continued to go out every evening with Bert, and never returned until dawn had risen over the nearby hills. Harvey, despairing of ever changing Bert's wild habits, ordered Terry to keep a strict watch on the heedless youngsters. Obeying his master's orders, the dog caught Bert one evening as he was about to sneak out of the house, and meet Gale, with whom he had planned to elope, and so escape forever, from all the unwelcome advice of their elders. Furious with the dog for so spoiling his plans, Bert decided to "fix" Terry, and the very next night he contrived to put some poison in the dog's food, and stayed with Terry long enough to see that he tasted it. This time, when he stole from the house, to meet again Gale and elope, there was no one to apprehend him. Speeding away in Bert's high-powered roadster, the two sweethearts drove recklessly along the treacherous mountain road, and suddenly crashed into the embankment, when Bert turned the corner too sharply. Meanwhile Terry suspicious of Bert's sudden generosity, had only tasted a small portion of the food, and had left the rest untouched. Although affected by the poison, Terry, discovering that his charge had escaped him, shot down the road, and soon reached the elopers, who were lying unconscious by the car. Stopping only long enough to pick up the blood-stained hat of Gale, he bolted back to Harvey Mitchell, aroused him, and just as Bert and Gale were brought back to the houes by a hurriedly summoned ambulance, the dog collapsed, weakened by the effects of the drug. Fortunately, Terry had not eaten enough of the poisoned food to be seriously harmed, and a few weeks later, when Bert and Gale had fully recovered, a wedding party was held at the Mitchell home, with Terry as the guest of honor.

SELL SOMETHING SIMPLE

Francis H. Carlson Comedy File No. 9477

FRANK, an unsuccessful hosiery salesman, meets Corvin, a good looking young music salesman, who likewise has not been highly welcomed by his customers. Desperate, the two decide to combine their trades, and Frank, the brains of the partnership works out a plan, whereby he expects both of them to increase their sales quota enormously. Frank's idea is to have the both of them call on a client; then, Corvin is to amble over to the piano while Frank is busy speaking his piece about the wonderful silk stockings, and idly pick out a tune, singing in accompaniment. The customer, who invariably is charmed by the handsome young salesman's talents, buys the music, and also signs for the stockings before she realizes what she has done.

In high hopes the two boys set out bright and early the next morning, anxious to try their scheme, and sure that it will prove successful. Luck seems to be with them, for the first home they come to belongs to a charming young lady, Ardis, and moreover the door is invitingly open. With superb nonchalance, Frank and Corvin walk right into the living room, and before the astonished Ardis has a chance to wonder who they are, Corvin seats himself at her baby grand piano, and begins singing in a merry voice. At the same time Frank, without giving Ardis an opportunity to ask questions, bursts into a flowery sales talk about his hosiery. Won by the charming manners of Corvin, and completely dazed by Frank's rapid chatter, Ardis buys both the hosiery and the sheet music, neither of which she needs particularly.

Elated by their glorious success, the two boys feel they have done enough work for one day, and return home with intentions of going out the next day. Meanwhile Ardis, discovering that the stockings rip on the least provocation, and that the sheet music has blurred and indistinct notes, vows revenge, and tells the story to her girl friend, Olive, who lives directly behind her home, in a small bungalow.

The next day, the two high-powered salesmen, still full of self-confidence, visit the street on which Olive lives, and finding her door opened are amazed at their good fortune, and instantly walk in. Olive, recognizing them from Ardis' description, greets them pleasantly, and Corvin looks around for a piano. To his dismay there isn't any, and the two boys begin to think their scheme is going to fail, when Olive, who can hardly keep from giggling, graciously offers to take them to a friend's home, where there is a piano. She takes them into Ardis' house through the back way, and not until they are in the living room, do the two partners realize that the place looks slightly familiar. Immediately Ardis comes in, and greets them with too enthusiastic cordiality. Suspecting that something is wrong, the two boys are determined to go through with their sale, and Corvin sits at the piano, starts playing, and Frank breaks into his mechanical sales talk. For three hours Corvin sings and plays till his throat is hoarse, and his fingers stiff, while Frank exhausts his sales repertoire, but Olive only smiles mysteriously. Then, at the end of the three hours Olive points to her legs, and for the first time Frank realizes that she doesn't wear stockings! When the boys groan miserably and begin looking for the nearest exit, the girls feel they have suffered enough, and forgiving the two scapegoats they invite them to have dinner with them.

FAR HORIZONS

H. E. Nye Drama File No. 9363

AROUSED by a fusilade of shots, the mining town of Sunlight rushes out to find Roy Jones, young foreman, shooting at robbers bearing bags of gold from the office of Superintendent Carroll. A thrilling fight ensues in the moonlight but the bandits escape leaving one of their number and the Superintendent outstretched upon the ground. Roy directs the sheriff to a cave where the bandits are hiding and they succeed at length in smoking out the choking men. Back at Sunlight Colonel Farewell, owner of the mine, has arrived accompanied by his lovely daughter, Kathleen, who is caring for her convalescent father. Learning of the events of the night Colonel Farewell gives the recovered gold to the sheriff, promotes Roy to the position of Superintendent left open by the death of Carroll and appoints George Willis to the position of mine foreman. In the ensuing days both Roy and George fall in love with Kathleen.

A month later, while taking Kathleen and some of her friends on an inspection tour of the mine, Roy and the owner's daughter become separated from the rest of the party. Suddenly their escape is shut off by a slide. They dig frantically at the broken rock while George directs the rescuing party and pulls Kathleen through the opening. Kathleen is grateful to George but her concern is for Roy who has been hurt by a falling rock. Returning to camp, by trail, Roy tries to get two eaglets from a nest for Kathleen and slips over a cliff where he hangs precariously until Kathleen throws him a rope. Farther down the trail Kathleen's horse becomes frightened and falls from the cliff just as Roy lifts her from the saddle. She weeps convulsively and as they walk home in the twilight, Willis jealously blames Roy for letting the girl ride after having unnerved herself helping him.

One night Roy is awakened by stealthy footsteps in his room and beholds a gleaming knife uplifted above him. Instantly he rolls over and the knife sinks into the bed. Grasping his gun he fires just as his assailant leaps through the door. A few drops of blood on the step attest to Roy's marksmanship but he can find no further clue.

The following day Roy is taking the Farewells to the station when a violent explosion occurs at a point of rocks they had just passed. They are showered with dust and fragments of stone but escape unhurt. Roy rides toward the mine and discovers that George has not come in today. Fearing that George, whom Roy now is certain is the man he shot, will plot further mischief, Roy rides furiously toward the train. At the bridge he finds George about to blast and Roy leaps at him. The two men struggle desperately and with a mad cry, Willis discharges his dynamite as the train comes around the curve. However, a piece of timber hurtles through the air and crushes him. Roy flags the train in time to prevent it from plunging into the gully and George, dying, confesses that maddened with jealousy of Roy whom Kathleen obviously preferred, the foreman had decided if he couldn't have Kathleen no one should. The Farewells, shaken by the accident return to camp for a few days until the bridge is repaired and when they again leave, Roy and Kathleen are engaged to be married.

KONGO FORTUNE

Ray Knight Drama File No. 9493

OLD war buddies, Bob McCalle and Joe Lasky are among the victims of the Wall Street Crash. Bob, loathe to accept the pity of the society in which he has formerly been a prominent member, joins up with Joe whom the stock market has brought to the top and deposited as suddenly high and dry. With the determination to recoup their fortunes and come back, the pair work their way across the big pond on a dirty freighter.

They land in Boma, in South Africa, where white folk are rarity and there meet and gain the confidence of a wealthy old missionary. They accompany him on a mission into the Kongo regions where after a short time in the hectic savage villages, the old missionary takes the dreaded fever. Knowing he is about to die, he wills his wealth and his old mansion on the Kongo river to his two white friends.

The two adventurers are startled by the lavish manner in which the mansion has been furnished and learn that it belonged to a great sportsman before having come into the hands of the missionary. A troupe of native servants perform all the duties and Bob, seeing they are in danger of becoming soft from the fantastic existence here, suggests they return to the States where their newly gotten wealth will win recognition for them. Clothed and mannered like princes, the pair separate in New York to pursue separate courses.

Bob finds his old friends eager to reaccept him now that he is wealthy, but it is to his old friends, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Wincaugh, a middle aged couple, that he turns. At their home in company with their beautiful and talented niece, June, Bob finds happiness. The two young people fall in love.

Meanwhile, Joe, arriving in town with money in his pockets looks to the roulette wheel and the speakeasies for his pleasure. After a few nights of excess, he finds himself broke. Drunken and wretched he comes to Bob to borrow money until he can return to Africa, and breaks in on a party where his rudeness to the Wincaughs and June is covered by Bob's explanation that he was injured in the war and not wholly responsible for his acts.

Bob interests his friends so in his description of the Kongo mansion that they agree to return to Africa with him as his guests. On the return trip Joe, through Bob's efforts, is restored to his former self, but he secretly gloats over June's beauty and envies his friend.

At the mansion they are all amazed by the beauty of the land, and as time rolls on June and Bob fall more deeply in love and Joe jealously forces Mungi, one of the trusted native servants to kidnap June. Late one afternoon, June wanders outside and at a signal from Joe, Mungi seizes June and carries her to a native village.

At dinner June's absence can no longer be explained away and Mrs. Wincaugh faints. Joe seems as disturbed as the others, but a native, sent by Mungi, directs the searching party to the village where they find June surrounded by admiring native women. June, seeing that Bob is about to kill Mungi, intercedes in the native's behalf and explains that Joe forced him to his will. June screams as Joe points his gun at Bob but Mungi's poisoned dart kills Joe before he can shoot. The natives carry the body out, Mungi kneels before June and Bob and offers to worship them, but the following day the white people sail for New York where June and Bob are married.

THE ONE WAY

Lo Ella Johnson Carney Drama File No. 9652

AT seven, Phyllis Hart, leader of a group of sturdy youngsters, was known to the neighborhood as "that Hart-less kid"; at thirty-one, organizer and head of a very successful advertising agency, she was not displeased to hear people call her "that Hart-less woman." When asked by her friends on what principles she based her successful career, she invariably answered, "I trust no one, I pity no one, I sentimentalize over nothing." But even though he saw his sister rise steadily in the business world by following these maxims, Doug, her young brother, who did copy writing in Phyllis' office, could not adhere to her advice. Getting up enough courage one day to ask Phyllis to let him leave the agency and try his hand at creative writing, he was met with a cold refusal, and a cutting remark that he was too "soft-hearted" to get along in the world without her help. Stung by her scorn, he buried himself in his work, and when a young debutante, Valerie Trent, came to the Hart agency to have posters written for a charity drive, Doug was given the assignment. From the first meeting, Phyllis disliked this lovely young woman who had everything she desired, and did not have to work for her living, but Doug, finding in Val a sympathetic audience, and a warm admirer, learnt to love her, and persuaded her to invite Phyllis to her home to tea. There Phyllis met Dean Lattimer, the renowned artist who was engaged to do the art work for the drive, and for the first time in her thirty-one years of life, Phyllis knew what love meant. Strangely enough, although Dean was sentimental, and could easily be imposed upon, he too, was drawn to Phyllis, and was determined to cure her of her pessimistic views on human nature.

But his efforts seemed futile, for Phyllis refused to change her beliefs and business tactics, and continued to distrust people, especially Valerie Trent, who, deeply in love with Doug, invited him to week-end parties at her home. In vain did Phyllis beg Doug to see less of Val, reminding him that the girl was used to comforts which Doug could never give her. But Doug closed his ears to Phyllis' advice, and she, angry with him turned more and more to Dean, who also believed that Val was a fine person. As her annoyance with Doug's behavior increased, Phyllis found fault with everything Dean did, chiding him for his "softness," even to the point of laughing at the fact that he eagerly read the daily newspaper of the little town in which he had been born, although he had left the village twenty years before.

Returning one day from the office, Phyllis was stunned to find a note from Doug ,saying that he was leaving with Val, and mentioning no address. Terribly shocked she called Dean, who arrived to find the "heartless" Phyllis Hart crying bitterly, and too upset to cope with the situation. Gone was all the strength which she had been so proud of, and it was Dean, easy-going Dean, who was able to meet the problem with the calmness it required. While Phyllis spent the weak in a state of hysteria, raging against Doug and Val, and then sobbing pitifully, Dean set detectives to search for the pair, but their whereabouts were undiscovered, and Phyllis' hatred grew steadily. Coming in to see her the end of the week, he found her in a furious mood, and to calm her began to read his home-town paper which he had just received. As she derided him once more, Dean looked up in amazement, and pointed to the paper, where Phyllis saw that the editors were Mr. and Mrs. Doug Hart. A long distance phone call, revealed that the two youngsters had taken this way of proving that they could stand on their own legs, and Phyllis seeking comfort in Dean's arms, vowed that she had learnt her lesson and would, from this time on, have a "heart."

CHILD OF THE SEA

James Gaiangos Drama File No. 9650

UNTIL the day his father is drafted for the wars, Jim's life has been without a single hardship. Then for two years his mother and he struggle to support themselves and when at last a letter comes telling of his father's death, Jim's mother quietly grieves herself to death. Alone, penniless, Jim wanders about unhappily until at last he finds work aboard a translatlantic ship. In the strenuous sea life he finds some measure of happiness, until his ship docks in New York. While enjoying himself at Coney Island, he sees a lovely girl look about worriedly. He watches her for a moment and discovers she has lost her purse in the crowd. Politely he offers to lend her the fare home and the two become friends. Norma is so fascinated by his tales of the sea that she loses all sense of the present. When at last he takes her to her door, she falters for a moment and when he asks when he can see her again, realizing that her father would never consent to her friendship with a common sailor, she tells him she is sorry. . . . Jim understands and holding her hand for an instant vanishes into the night. Jim's boat sails to foreign ports but he can think only of Norma and when he docks at New York again he remains in the vicinity of her home in the hope of catching a glimpse of her. It is Norma who sees him and running up to him she cries, "Jim, Jim, you came back." As they walk together through the park she tells him how she missed him and hoped he would return. That night Jim comes home to meet Norma's people but her father is aghast at the thought of his daughter marrying a sailor. Desperate at the thought that Jim may go away and she may never see him again, Norma begs Jim to elope with her. Because he loves her so much he promises to give up the sea although it is in his blood and for her sake he takes the only job he can get—that of a dish washer in a restaurant. In their tiny apartment, Jim and Norma are happy together although they have barely enough to eat. However, Norma's father comes to visit his daughter and plead with her to give up this poverty and come to live with him. Resolutely Norma refuses to leave Jim. Then she has a baby. When the child needs nourishment and Jim's wages are too small to provide for the baby, Norma yields to her father. Scornfully he carries his daughter and her child off to his home and Norma wearily tells Jim that although she loves him their marriage was a mistake. In the agony of realizing that he has failed his wife and child Jim again signs up for the sea. On shipboard his ability is recognized and when he distinguishes himself during a storm he is promoted. However, he thinks only of his wife and child and although he is offered a position as first mate, he refuses, unable to stand the separation. At last through the efforts of the owner of the ship, who had watched Jim during the storm, Jim gets a position in the shipyard, as ship building adviser, and able at last to provide for his family, returns for Norma and the baby, who have had nothing but misery with her father.

HAPPY STRATEGY

Emery N. Lamont Drama File No. 9649

NOTHING that Grace King wanted was too expensive for her. All her life her parents had sheltered her from the harsher aspects of life and when they permitted her to go to an Eastern college, Grace arrived with trunks full of clothes and the feeling that school and even life was an exciting game. It was at a prom that Grace met John Winters, an irresponsible but charming collegiate and the pair seemed designed for each other. At every football game Grace was John's guest and when she wrote home that she was in love her indulgent parents asked her to bring the young man home. However, when vacation came, John had made other plans and Grace was miserable during her absence from him. Back at school John was more attentive than ever until the day that Grace confided she was in trouble. John looked worried and said he'd have to think it over. For several days Grace waited for him, then she inquired after him and learned that John had suddenly left school and gone to work in Chicago. Grace became hysterical as she realized how cruelly she had been betrayed and the college authorities, puzzled by her strange conduct sent for her parents. The King's received their daughter with pity and tenderness but Grace had lost all taste for living and the family physician warned her parents that unless something were done, she would worry herself to death.

At the same time, Robert Armstrong, having graduated from college had a fine position at a bank when the depression set in. When the bank shut down, Robert found himself among the army of those unable to find employment. Despairingly he tightened his belt and a former classmate informed him that if he could raise two thousand dollars he would take him into partnership in a gasoline station. Two thousand dollars! Grimly Roberts got work as a vacuum cleaner canvasser and as he met rebuffs at each door his courage gave way. It was then that he knocked at the door of the King house. Mr. King, pre-occupied with his thoughts of Grace waved the boy away and as he looked at the droop of the fine shoulders another thought struck him. He called Robert in and after a long conversation with him asked if Robert would sell his name for twenty thousand dollars. Indignantly Robert refused the proposition and King, liking him advised him to come back in two weeks and give his answer. Robert's friend called to tell him the gasoline station was still for sale, but at the end of the two weeks it was to say no that Robert came back to the King house. Grace answered the door, and as he looked at her, Robert reconsidered. He married Grace—accepting, however, only two thousand. Grace, indifferent to what became of her suffered the ceremony to take place.

All day Robert worked at his station and in the evening, washed and carefully dressed, he came to take his "wife" for a walk. Grace began to take an interest in the strangely earnest young man, despite herself and when her baby was born, Robert was more worried than the Kings. Soon Grace began to look forward to the flowers and books Robert sent regularly. According to the terms stipulated, at the end of the year there was to be a divorce, but when Robert silently returned the two thousand dollars his gasoline station had earned, Mr. King said, "You love, Grace, don't you, Robert?" and as the boy nodded, the wise father added, "Why don't you tell her?" It was a strangely happy pair that left for their first honeymoon and Mr. King waved his blessings to Grace and Robert.

A HOUSE DIVIDED

Bertha Cook Drama File No. 9659

SIX-YEAR-OLD Jay Wilson, playing with Morgan and Mimi Gann, the twins whose parents were the dearest friends of the Wilson's, announced determinedly that he would marry Mimi as soon as he grew up. At twenty-two Jay, who had taken over the management of his father's drug plant, was still loved by Mimi, but he, although feeling a deep affection for her, was madly infatuated with Ann Shaw, the daughter of Myron Shaw, scorned by the town as a gambler, although his crippled son New, was noted for his quick mind, and his daughter Ann was a librarian in the town library. Despite Jay's strong disapproval of Morgan's extravagant betting on horse races, there was a fast friendship between the two, which was in no way disturbed by the fact that Morgan knew of his sister's unreturned love for Jay. Although he would have preferred to see Jay marry Mimi, Morgan smiled upon Jay's continued avowals of his love for Ann, regarding the affair as a passing fancy.

Mrs. Wilson, however, planned to have her son marry Mimi, and alarmed at Jay's frequent visits to the shabby cottage that the Shaws occupied near the race-track, ordered him to stop seeing this girl who was so far below him socially. Outwardly obeying his mother, Jay continued to see Ann, winning, too, the friendship of Ned, but earning the animosity of Mr. Shaw, who refused to believe that Jay really meant no harm to Ann. Jay and Ann planned to be married secretly, and visiting her one evening to go over their plans for an elopement the following day, Jay found New going the accounts of his father, who was in a very bad humor. Ned retired, and while Ann and Jay were growing enthusiastic over their plans, Mr. Shaw looked on angrily. Called away to help a sick neighbor, Ann left her father with her sweetheart, and when she returned a few hours later, she was horrified to find Mr. Shaw crumpled up on the floor, dead from a bullet wound. Arousing New, she learnt that her brother had heard angry words pass between the two men, but had thought no more of it, for Jay left in his car, directly afterwards. Hating Jay for the crime whose guilt pointed toward him, she called the police, who went to the Wilson home to arrest Jay. He, realizing that he could not offer definite proof of his innocence, managed to slip out of the house, while the detectives were talking to his mother, rode to Morgan's, and implored him to shelter him, until he could build up a defense. Agreeing Morgan hid Jay in an unoccupied room over the garage and promised to visit Ann every day to console her, and help her, if possible. Meanwhile, Ned, going through his father's accounts, discovered that Morgan Gann's account, which New knew ran into a considerable sum, was missing. Quickly remembering that the voices he heard the night of his father's murder might have been Mr. Shaw and someone other than Jay, Ned determined to test Morgan, and confided his plan to Ann, who glad to believe Jay innocent, called a private detective to hide in the next room, when Morgan visited her. Ned engaged Morgan in conversation, and constantly spoke of Mr. Shaw, noting Morgan's discomfort. Suddenly, Ned said ominously, "But you didn't have to keep him—you only needed the papers." Taken completely off his guard, Morgan hurriedly oried, "No, I only meant to take my bills, but he caught me just as I—". Realizing what he had revealed, Morgan attempted to rush from the house, but was caught, and breaking down, confessed the murder, and told of Jay's hiding place. Reunited once more, Jay promised himself to spend the rest of his life, in winning for Ann the happiness she so surely deserved. And to the young couple's great surprise, Mimi, who had bravely accepted the fact that her brother was sentenced to twenty year's imprisonment, begged Ann's forgiveness both for Morgan's crime, and for the hatred that Mimi had always felt towards her, adding that she, too, would try to prove that she could be a firm friend as well as a bitter enemy.

THE WAY OF MAIDS

Anna M. Herzog Comedy File No. 9620

IN the back room of his father's shoe repairing shop, John Bodinski spreads a newspaper and reads that big road improvements are being planned by the government. Exoitedly he pulls his father into their second hand flivver and driving him out to the country informs him that this is where they are going to make their money. Horace humors his son as a lunatic but is soon convinced. To an assembled meeting of the townsmen John explains his plan and each contributes money to the real estate company in formation.

Prosperous years follow and now the town is sporting huge cars and private swimming pools. Mrs. Bodonski, once a house wife struggling to stretch a piece of meat for all three of her family, is now hiring maids and cooks and comes home dissatisfied because she cannot find a servant superior to those hired by the other wives. At length she goes to New York and after a frenzied tours of the agencies approves of a pretty French maid Mitzi. The eyes of her husband and son pop, but Mrs. Bodinski is not through. Now they must dress for dinner every night. Whereas before Horace objected to his wife's commands that he keep his shoes on in the house, now Horace buries himself in books of etiquette and flushes painfully when his wife catches him.

Mitzi is here, there, and everywhere. She never misses an opportunity to brush the men's hats and coats and when the ooast is clear she aeeepts a hurried kiss. Soon she is receiving little gifts. One night Mrs. Bodinski announces she is playing bridge that night. John stops at a lingerie shop, buys a lacy chemise, and slips up the back stairs to wait in Mitzi's room. But Mitzi comes in with the cook and for two hours John sits in the bath room while the women chatter. At length the cook goes and Mitizi squeals with delight at John's present, and orders him to turn his back while she dons the trifle. A knock at the door sends John into the closet, and Horace shyly proffers a pair of exquisite stockings which Mitzi puts on gleefully. Wiping his brow, John emerges, grateful that Mitzi has not given him away and indignant at his father. A man of his age!

For weeks the two men conceal their peccadilloes from each other. Then one night there is a board meeting at the Bodinski home. Mitzi announces each comer with a delightful moue. "I am Waiting," says Ike Waiting, the undertaker. "What for?" she inquires. "Hotwetter," says another. "Then why are you wearing a coat?" "Bologna," "Sir!" But when Mitzi dances for the men and shows no reluctance to reveal her chemise and stockings, they applaud loudly and put bills in her stockings. Then Mrs. Bodinsky arrives and all is hastily made decorous while the Board of directors leave, grumbling at the interruption.

Several days later, Mitzi weeps because John has made love to her. $500 makes her cry louder, but at $1000 she stops. In the same fashion she receives $1000 from Horace and her confidence to Mrs. Bodinski extracts a like sum for the promise of silence. After Mitzi has gone ,Mrs. Bodinski charges down upon her unhappy family and asks what the neighbors would say, adding that she has bought the girl's silence. A concerted groan leads to the disclosure that each has been similarly victimized and the trio sit down to a forlorn supper.

LOVE TAKES CHANCES

Catherine Niemynski Drama File No. 9495

WHEN the parents of Doris Blandon died in a wreck a few weeks after she was born, Doris' aunt and uncle, Mr. and Mrs. Garrison, adopted the baby, and brought her up just as though she were their own daughter, giving her every comfort. At eighteen Doris was the most popular young woman in the small town, and especially was she admired by Jack Garrison, a cousin of Mr. Garrison, and Carl Winfield, his closest friend, a few years his junior. Jack had already completed his first two years at the state university, a co-educational institution, when Doris was ready to enter. Carl was also preparing to attend the same college, and all summer Jack, who had become accustomed to college routine, coached his two friends for the entrance exams. The three were continually together, studying industriously each morning, and spending the afternoons and evenings swimming, walking and dancing. Naturally, such close association affected the feelings of the three comrades; to Doris, it meant a warm respect for Jack's keen intellect, and a wholesome liking for the charming Carl; to Carl it caused the awakening of a boyish, but deep love for the girl who had been his constant playmate since childhood; but to Jack, companionship with Doris brought the realization that she was a fascinating girl, who would soon be an even more delightful young woman.

In the fall, Jack returned to school, with Doris and Carl entering with him as freshmen. Managing to share his room with Jack, Carl was especially happy, because the older boy graciously offered to help him with his studies. For the first year of school, Doris and Charl found their work comparatively smooth sailing, and the three friends came through with flying colors. The second and third year were repetitions of the first, only different in that there were many social activities which Doris, always attended by her two young cavaliers, indulged in. Jack had stayed on at sohool to do graduate work in law, and during Carl's senior year he helped him tremendously. Doris, who had learnt to love Carl, had given him a birthday gift of a gorgeously stripped blazer, which Carl, who proudly displayed it around the campus, became famous for wearing. But to Jack, who had seen Doris blossom out into a beautiful woman, life was not quite so care-free and happy, and his love for Doris, blinding him to his sense of right and wrong, he cunningly planned to disgrace Carl in Doris' eyes. Carl had been having some difficulty with his course in advanced mathematics, and crossing the campus one day on her way to the Mathematics office, Doris was horrified to see Carl's familiar figure in his colorful blazer leaning over the desk of the department head, and obviously searching for some papers. When it was discovered that the Math examination had been tampered with, Doris, with no hesitation, accused Carl. Too stunned by the accusation to protest his innocence, Carl immediately left school, not even bothering to take with him his clothes. Weeks passed, and Doris, consoled by Jack, and comforted by his kind advioe and understanding, consented to marry him, the day after commencement. Meanwhile Carl had disappeared completely, leaving a short note telling Jack to keep all his belongings, and use them if he could. Several days before graduation, Doris, intending to pay Jack a surprise visit at the office in which he was studying entered the room, silently and saw Jack leaning over the desk, Carl's ill-fated jaeket around his shoulders. Amazingly, an identical scene came hack to her—the figure in the Math office. Realizing that she must take a chance on the awful truth that was slowly forcing its way through her mind, she said, in a voice dangerously calm; "Why did you steal the Math exam paper, and throw the blame on Carl?" Completely surprised by the truth of Doris' statement, and tortured by his guilt, Jack confessed that he had deliberately worn Carl's blazer to incriminate him. Doris, released at last from the doubt that had haunted her, promised not to reveal Jack's scheme, and learning of Carl's whereabouts through his parents, went to him, and begged forgiveness, finding love at last in Carl's arms.

THE FACE BEHIND THE MASK

Helen La Zurka Mystery File No. 9478

WHEN Douglas Sloan, prominent realty operator of New York, was mysteriously murdered, the police could not find a trace of the guilty person. But Sonora Sloan, Sloan's young dark-haired daughter, felt that Val Crimicon, owner of a night club on which Sloan had held the mortgages, had something to do with it, for a day before the murder she had overheard her father being told to keep away from the club and mind his own business. Determined to track down her father's murderer, Sonora confided in George Crawford, her father's young partner, a plan whereby Marilyn Markholm, a cousin who bore a elose resemblance to Sonora, was to go to Europe under Sonora's name, thus leading the guilty person to believe that the search for him had been abandoned.

Although George did not approve of the idea of Sonora running into danger deliberately, Marilyn sailed for Europe under the name of Sonora Sloan, and Sonora carried out the second part of her scheme by cutting her long, dark hair, dyeing it platinum blonde, and providing herself with a showy, spectacular wardrobe. The next morning it was an entirely unrecognizable Sonora who entered the Club Crimicon, and told the sleepy porter to tell the manager that Miss Julie Regan wanted to see him. Demanding a job in the club's chorus, Julie, or Sonora, made such a favorable impression on Crimicon, that he told her to report for a rehearsal that afternoon. Sonora, feeling that at last she was headed toward the solution of the mystery, went to her father's former office to report her progress to George, and found him very much disturbed over the discovery of a paper in the office safe, dated the day before Sloan died, stating that he, Sloan, had conclusive proof that Crimicon was engaged in dope traffic. Firmly convinced by this that Crimicon had murdered her father to keep him from giving his dangerous information to the police, Sonora went on working at the club, hoping to gain some definite evidence of Val's guilt. Her beauty and grace so attracted Val, that in a few weeks he made her leader of the chorus. But meanwhile Val was growing suspicious of George's frequent visits to the chief of police, and rightly suspecting that George knew of the dope trade at the club, he decided to enlist the efforts of his clever dancer, Julie. Summoning her to his private office, he promised to give her a wonderful ruby, if she could in some way meet George and induce him to come to the club that evening. Recognizing the ruby as the one her father had always worn attached to his watch chain, Sonora knew now for certain that Val was her father's murderer, and warmly promised him to get George to come to the Club Crimicon. Revealing her discovery to George, she told him to appear at the club with three police officers. but to sit at a secluded table in the rear, near Val's private office, as she was not certain as to what course of action Val would follow.

The club's specialty was a cowboy dance in which the chorus shot blanks into the air at the end of the dance. Sonora, feeling that she was nearer to danger than ever before filled her pistol with cartridges. Never taking her eyes off Val, who stood before the door of his office, she saw that he was watching George intently. The audience was absorbed in watching the dancers, and consequenty no one saw Val whip out his automatio, and take aim at George. Realizing that he meant to fire just as the girls shot their guns, and so drown the noise, she pointed her pistol at Val, fired, and saw him sink to the ground. Instantly the three officers surrounded the night club owner, and placed him under arrest for attempted murder. With all the evidence of the ruby, Sloan's information about the dope ring, and Sonora's proof that he was going to shoot George, Val was given a life sentence, and a few months later, Marilyn returned from Europe just in time to be bridesmaid at the wedding of Sonora and George.

WALL OF FIRE

Mrs. David Bezanson Drama File No. 9460

WILD-EYED, Dan Morrison leaped from the train that was carrying him north and with a set face tramped through the woods. For hours he pushed on, blindly, sullenly, and at length at a little cabin stopped for food. A girl, scarcely more than a child had wheeled in fright as he entered, but seeing his fever-bright eyes, she had forced him to lie down and had administered soothing herbs to him. When her brother, Joe, returned, he had taken in the situation at a glance and his deft fingers soon brought relief to the stricken American. For several days Dan tossed about murmuring he didn't want to live, but under Joe's assurances, Dan had gradually taken as interest in things about him. Joe came in smiling one morning and asking Dan how he'd like to help him with his traps. At first unenthusiastic, the bracing air soon straightened Dan out and before long a warm friendship had sprung up between the firm-chinned American and the laughing eyed French Canadian whose broken English was a constant delight to Dan.

As they paddled across the glassy lake, Dan smiled grimly at Joe's confidences about his sweetheart, Loretta. For a while Dan was silent then bitterly he railed against all women, insisting they were not to be trusted. It was a woman who had made of him the sorry spectacle he had been when first he arrived at La Rheau. All woman were alike, said Dan. "Even Rose Marie? "Dan turned impatiently to his friend, "Rose Marie isn't a woman, she's a child." Joe bit his lip and was silent.

A few weeks later a party of tourists visited La Rheau. Dan from his cabin flinched as he heard a silvery laugh over the phonograph music, and as he came to the door he saw Evelyn Carstairs dancing in the arms of the fascinated Joe. Dan flicked his cigarette away and cut in. Evelyn raised startled eyes to his but when Dan warned her against trying the same tricks with his best friend she had tried with him, Evelyn smiled. Dan paced back and forth in his room as he saw Evelyn smiling her lies into Joe's eyes, and when Joe passed up his regular visit to Loretta, Dan determined to make Evelyn fall in love with him and put her aside as she did him when he lost his money.

The next day he took Evelyn, some of her friends, and Rose Marie for a cruise down the lake and as he helped Evelyn from the boat he saw her eyes cling to him. Suddenly Rose Marie turned white but she evaded his solicitous inquiries and hurried home.

That night there was a dance. Dan saw Joe's eyes follow Evelyn and she winked to him. He realized the girl was trying to make him jealous and a fury came over Dan that she should use Joe thus. Taking her out in the moonlight he kissed her brutally, the while he watched Joe who quickly vanished. Dan's reminiscences of how happy he and Evelyn had been when he had money, served their purpose in discouraging Joe, but Rose Marie heard them too.

The day following Joe made plans to visit Loretta, and as they saw a forest fire up Silver Creek, Dan remembered that Rose Marie was there. Blindly he pushed through the smoke and in answer to Joe's call, they heard a woman's scream. Evelyn ran out to them and Dan forced Joe to take her back while Evelyn screamed for Dan who plunged into the inferno again after Rose Marie. At length Evelyn confessed Rose Marie was lying unconscious in a cave. With eyelashes and hair burned off, Dan staggered through the wall of fire to the creek, holding fast to his Rose Marie.

Long before the burns of Dan and Rose Marie were healed, Evelyn returned home, still loving Dan, while Joe held up his marriage to Loretta long enough to make it a double wedding.

DOUBLE EAGLE

William W. Brocks Drama File No. 9479

ALL her father's life he had hoarded gold, but when his body was brought in crushed by the weight of a giant oak. there was no trace of money about the forty acre farm. Little Thelma shivered desolately at the window while the neighbors discussed what was to come of the little girl. At length Henry Thackeray, a well-to-do farmer remembering his own two daughters and touched by the misery of the child, offered to adopt her. It was raining as they started out in Henry's wagon and Thelma's white face shone in the fitful streaks of lightning. At one point they were almost drowned as they crossed a swollen river, but not one whimper escaped the set lips of the child and when Henry drove the horses safely within his own barn, he lifted the little girl and patted her back for her bravery. Inside the Thackeray girls giggled at the forlorn, drenched figure and their father called sharply for them to bring her clothes. Trembling in the dress that was sizes too large for her, Thelma helped with the dishes that night and when the others slept, she wept silently at the thought of her new life.

Henry, drawing rent from Thelma's farm was not unhappy in having Thelma remain with them, but the two girls, Helen and Frances took advantage of the defenseless girl to pass all the work on to her. Thelma would escape from back breaking work in the kitchen to walk in the woods, while Frances and Helen ran off to dances at the nearby lumber camp. Once Thelma found some men sawing wood and she watched them intently. At first disturbed by the presence of the wide-eyed girl, they became accustomed to her, and Lloyd remarked to his friend, Jim that the girl was very pretty; if she weren't so shy she'd be a beauty.

Once Thelma heard Jim complain about the food since the cook left, and Thelma went home thoughtfully. When Frances, angered by Thelma's absence when she should have been making a dress for the Thackeray girls, shouted at Thelma that she was just an extra mouth to feed and that nobody would miss her if she were gone, Thelma looked to Mr. Thackeray for help. But he believing the lies his daughters had been circulating said nothing and wistfully Thelma stole from the house. Her arrival at the lumber camp was noticed by Jim who seized her in his arms. Lloyd, breaking in, told Jim to keep his hands from the frightened girl, and when she timidly asked if she might cook for them, they decided to give her a trial. Her success was attested to by the shout raised in camp and Lloyd seeing her pretty blush felt his heart go out to her. Thelma was in need of a protector among the lumber jacks and it was as her protector that Lloyd became known at camp. Jim, angered by Lloyd's interference contrived to upset Lloyd into a swollen river when they were weaving logs into a raft. Thelma's screams brought help and chilled from exposure and dazed from injuries, Lloyd was carried out. Through Thelma's nursing, Lloyd recovered but Jim trumped up a charge to have him dismissed from camp and he refused, being penniless, to let her share his lot. However, Thelma pointed out that she couldn't remain on without a protector and when she suggested they live on her father's deserted farm, Jim promised to do everything to make her happy. Under his willing fingers, the farm, which Thackeray had relinquished only because the taxes were due, soon blossomed, and when, digging a rose garden for his adored wife, Jim dug up a chest containing her father's hoarded gold, the two lived in happiness together.

AS he walked along San Francisco's main thoroughfare, "Peewee" Blake could not help smiling with satisfaction. He had just discussed with Jeannie his last step in their plan to steal an $8,000 bracelet from Talman's, the prominent jewelers. Peewee had come to San Francisco two days before, and immediately, he had opened a $9,000 checking account in the Westview bank. Now, as he strode jauntily into Talman's store, he involuntarily touched the old fashioned horseshoe stick pin that he wore for good luck.

Ted Bronson, the manager, approached him, all smiles for this early-morning customer. When his client insisted on seeing the finest bracelet in the shop. Ted saw his chance to sell the famous Bantar gems. To his intense delight, Blake decided to buy the bracelet and left instructions to have it ready at three-twenty that afternoon.

Ted's first thought was to call the Westview bank, which Blake had mentioned casually during the course of the sale. Assured by the teller that his client was good for the amount of the bracelet's sale price, Ted hastened to phone his fiancee, Barbara Hunt, who worked nearby, and ask to lunch with him. Barbara met him at twelve o'clock, and Ted unable to conceal his joy, described his splendid sale and his customer, even down to the gaudy horse shoe stick pin. Then the sweethearts fell to discussing the fat commission that Ted would earn.

At 2:50 o'clock Blake walked into the Westview bank and took his turn in the long line winding to the teller's window. As he waited patiently, Barbara, sent by her employer to make the firm's daily deposit, entered. Discouragement was mirrored on her pretty face, as she viewed the length of the line. Blake, always proud of his chivalry, promptly offered to let her get in front of him. As she thanked him, Barbara's eyes were attracted by the flashy stick pin he wore. Feeling it must be Ted's customer, she was astonished to head him ask emphatically that his whole account be withdrawn. Instantly there flashed through her mind the thought that if Ted gave him the bracelet, and the check was worthless, he would be involved in serious trouble. She hurried out of the bank, hailed a taxi, and reached Talman's at three twenty, just as Blake had entered the shop. With great presence of mind she smiled charmingly at him, and explained that she was a good friend of Mr. Bronson's who had some news for him. Would he mind if she spoke to him for a moment? Blake, always courteous, assented, and in the privacy of Ted's office, Barbara told her story. Leaving her to phone the police, Ted returned to Blake, and attempted to spar for time. He explained that the stones needed one last polish, and never were jewels cleaned so diligently. As he finished rubbing the last stone, the police entered, quickly surrounded Blake, and handcuffed him. Aware that he was trapped, Blake, shrugged his shoulders, bowed gallantly to the astonished Barbara who was standing in the doorway. Then he walked out quietly under guard, leaving Ted to thank his fiancee in the best way he knew.

THE GILDED NIGHT

David H. Clifton Drama File No. 9566

IN the early nineteen hundred's, no murder stirred up more excitement than that of Leonard Corbett's. Corbett was a respected business man, married but a few months to Adele Stewart, one of the city's popular debutantes. Discovering that her husband had been carrying on an intrigue with one of his stenographers, she begged him to give the girl up. Stunned by his refusal, and his jeering taunt that she had better keep out of his private affairs, she snatched up a gun from her boudoir drawer, and scarcely realizing the seriousness of her act, shot Corbett. When the case was tried, the defense attorney was the distinguished jurist, Judge Saunders, a personal friend of the Stewart and Corbett families. With his famous speech beginning, "This woman is innocent!" Saunders won Mrs. Corbett's freedom, showing that she was a victim of circumstances, half-crazed by the thought that her husband, whom she had trusted, had been guilty of the basest deception. Moved by the impassioned plea of the judge, and the defendant's repentant grief, the jury freed Mrs. Corbett. Withdrawing from social life after the trial, Adele bought a small country home and a few months later, her son Leonard, Jr., was born.

From birth, Leonard, although extraordinarily clever, and wholly lovable, was terribly afflicted—he did not have the power to speak. Mrs. Corbett, utterly devoted, vainly spent a fortune on physicians, hoping to aid the boy. At twenty-five, Leonard, a fine young man could not utter a sound. Nevertheless he threw himself enthusiastically into his chosen work—writing,—with the result, that despite his great handicap, he obtained a position on one of the large city newspapers, as assistant society editor. His social standing affording him access to the homes of influential people, he worked up a column highly praised in editorial circles. Through his work he became a frequent visitor at the home of Felice and Craig Wimberly, city editor of Leonard's paper. At first especially cordial to Leonard because of his affliction, Felice soon admired him for his brilliance and charm.

Learning that her husband was attempting to incriminate a notorious group of criminals, Felice begged Leonard to protect Craig from danger. Leonard, who had fallen hopelessly in love with Felice, agreed, and unnoticed, followed Craig to the gang's meeting-place. There, amazed and disgusted, he learned that Craig's interest was in the gang leader's girl friend, Lotta Morlan, with whom he was having an affair. Undecided on a course of action, Leonard waited a few weeks, hoping that Craig might leave Lotta. Discovering that Lotta's friend intended murdering Craig, Leonard, hurrying to the Wimberly home, saw the gangster fire at Craig through the open window. Before he could get to Felice, who was staring dazedly at the crumpled body at her feet, Leonard was caught by the gunman, securely bound and imprisoned at the gang's headquarters.

Felice, charged with her husband's murder, acted on Mrs. Corbett's advice, and engaged Judge Saunders for her lawyer. Because of insufficient evidence, Saunders felt the jury would declare her guilty, when Leonard, who had managed to escape, burst into the court room, and rushed to the bench. His love for Felice, and his burning desire to exonerate her, stirred in him, and he oried out hoarsely, "This woman is innocent." The sentence that saved his mother saved his beloved one, and several months later, Leonard joined Felice in saying, "I do."

THE MAN I LOVE

Onie Tanner Drama File No. 9574

AFTER five years as a surgeon at an insane asylum. Joseph Allen, a brilliant young physician, was urged by his superiors to take a vacation, and forget the asylum for a while, if possible. Although loath to give up his work, which fascinated him, Joseph was somewhat relieved, and immediately left for Cooksville, a small town twenty miles from the asylum, where he was not known to the townspeople. But he could not remain inactive, and getting a job as a clerk in a small general store, he soon met Constance Powell, who, through the disappearance of her uncle several years before, had become the owner of the Powell silk manufacturing plant. Although Constance had everything she desired Joseph noticed that some hidden sorrow was shadowing her life, and since he knew she would not tell him what troubled her, he was determined to find the cause himself. But frequent visits to Constance's country home, several miles from the town, failed to clarify the situation, and Joseph had to be satisfied with the fact that Constance had grown to love him, in spite of her distressed state of mind.

Often, Joe tried to tell Connie who he really was, but any mention of doctors and medicine caused Connie to shudder, and time and again Joe abandoned his task, and gladly talked of more pleasant things. Called back to the asylum to help with a patient whose case was most unusual, Joe left Connie with an unsatisfactory explanation, and while he was gone, Neil Powell, Connie's cousin arrived in Cooksville, and his charm won Connie who had been terribly hurt by Joe's sudden departure. Then too, Neil shared Connie's weighty secret—that Mr. Powell had not disappeared, but had been judged insane, and even now was in an asylum. Because of this, Connie was afraid to allow herself to love Joe, and confided her fears to Neil, who, offering to relieve Connie of some of her worries, assumed full charge of the silk plant.

Meanwhile, Joe, back at the asylum, was meeting a difficult problem. His rival, Dr. Stanley, a much older and more experienced man, had, a few years before, committed a man to the asylum, who Joe, in spite of the fact that the patient babbled of being cheated out of his rightful fortune, felt was not really insane. Unable to convince the asylum head of his belief, Joe returned late one evening to Cooksville, and anxious to see Connie set out for her home, in his car, taking a little used short cut that took him past a deserted summer house that was part of the Powell estate. Hearing footsteps, Joe drove behind a clump of bushes, and there saw a group of men unloading silk from a truck and storing it in the summer house. Realizing that Connie was being cheated, Joe returned to town, to think out some plan of action. Turning on the lights in his room, he discovered a man crouched there, and recognized him as the patient from the insane asylum whom he had believed normal. Begging to be heard, the poor man at last poured out his story—he had been ill, and his nephew, anxious to cheat him, and knowing Dr. Stanley, had contrived to have him committed to the asylum. Managing to escape from the asylum, he had followed Joe to Cooksville, which was where his niece, Constance lived. At the mention of her name, Joe realizing what had been troubling her, and seeing how he could trap Neil, whom the uncle was sure was the man who had stolen the silk, Joe drove baok to the Powell home, with a policeman and Mr. Powell, and confronting Neil, who had prepared no defense, secured from him a confession. And when Constance heard the story from her uncle, her last doubt was removed, and with a glad cry she ran to Joe's arms.

THE LOST MOUNTAIN

H. Taylor Butler Drama File No. 9496

IT is in an honorary position that Uncle Darlington, Civil war veteran who fought in the confederate army, is called as one of the judges to pass upon the plans submitted for the Robert E. Lee memorial to be carved on the great side of Stone Mountain. He alone, however, holds out against accepting the plans of Harvey Downing, a Northerner. So firm are his objections that at last the committee agrees to place Rosepeer in the nominal position of chief sculptor while Harvey is called as a subordinate. As the work progresses Harvey falls in love with Mareen, Darlington's grand-daughter who lives with the old man on top of the great mountain, but the old soldier urges his daughter to have nothing to do with Harvey. When a shortage is discovered in the Memorial funds, Darlington shouts that that's what comes of trusting a Northerner, but Harvey asks for a careful check-up and before the investigation has been completed, Rosepeer disappcars. Still Darlington cries that foul play accounts for Rosepeer's flight and he refuses to drop his objections to Harvey.

However, one night the models at the base of Lost Mountain are destroyed and when Darlington would raise his voice against Harvey once more, Mareen confesses that that night she and the Northerner were walking together and Harvey cannot possibly he guilty. Absorbed as he is in the progress of the Memorial, Darlington softens toward Harvey when in record time the young sculptor prepares a new set of plans and already the figures begin to stand out clearly upon the facc of the solid rock.

One night while the moonlight etches the sculptured figures, Mareen and Harvey are riding horseback down the road at the base of the mountain. Mareen looking up at the monument with awe on her lovely young facc is suddenly disturbed by a small light below the carving. Harvey sends her back to warn her grandfatner while he rapidly climbs the stairs that lead to tne statues. Above the huge heads stands Rosepeer grinning down diabolically. Harvey starts in horror as he sees that the mad sculptor has set powder to the mountain side and with tearing fingers Harvey climbs to the smoking fuse, snatches the can of powder and flings it mto space. It explodes in the air before reaching the ground and the concussion almost plunges Harvey from his precarious perch. With his feet Harvey kicks the other cans away and relievedly grasps the rope ladder leading to the top of the mountain but suddenly one side slackens and realizing that Rosepeer is sending him to his death, Harvey clings to the side of the mountain his fingers lodged in the small washouts. Then a shot is fired at the top. Afraid to trust his weight to the ladder, Harvey waits desperately until Mareen flngs a rope to him. Painfully Harvey climbs up and Uncle Darlington helps him over the top explaining that he has come in time to see Rosespeer cutting the ladder. Darlington shot the insane sculptor, who had come to avenge himself upon his successor, in the arm and handed him over to justice.

Under Harvey's direction the great memorial is completed and in its shadow the old soldier blesses Mareen and Harvey as they leave for their honeymoon.

LOVER IN THE MOONLIGHT

Jayne Carlyle Drama File No. 9571

HEIR to his uncle Ned's fortune, Neldon falls in love with Sheila Palmer whose mother had, many years ago jilted Ned and made of him an eccentric bachelor. In the moonlight at Neldon's hunting lodge, he decides to risk disinheritance and marry the girl whose soft kisses stir him so, but back in his uncle's office, dissuaded, he hesitates, and when Ned offers to withdraw all objections if, after a three months tour of Europe, Neldon still wants to marry Sheila, Neldon begs Sheila to wait for him.

On shipboard, Ned can do nothing to raise Neldon's spirits, but once in Paris, Neldon takes to drink to allay his longing for Sheila, and by the time they have arrived in Italy, Neldon is once more his gay self. Sitting at a ringside table with his uncle, Neldon stares intently at the vivacious dancing girl, Tanis, and when, breathlessly she finishes her dance by whirling herself into his arms, he draws her to him and presses a passionate kiss upon her yielding lips. His uncle smiles at the change in him and comments upon how short lived is memory, whereupon Neldon rises, paces the floor recklessly and shouts that he is taking the next boat home to the States. However, Tania and another girl arrive and in their arms the men forget all but the present.

In Berlin Ned meets Gretchen, a lovely Teuton who is the come-on for wealthy Americans. Gretchen is making fine progress with Ned, but when Neldon arrives to warn his uncle, his contempt for her fires Gretchen's blood, and after her first resentment of the handsome young American who is interfering with her plans she realizes she has fallen in love. When the gang ask her why she doesn't use Neldon, she tells them to keep away from him and they sneer at her interest in the boy. Ned, infatuated with the German girl, tries to make love to her but she wards him off and Gretchen warns Neldon to watch his uncle or he will fall into the hands of a sinister Berlin gang. Refusing to believe Gretchen's story and sensing she is concealing something, Neldon visits a gambling den to which his uncle has gone. Too late he realizes that escape is cut off for them, and the lights go out as the den is raided by the police whom Gretchen has summoned. However, in the excitement, Ned is killed and Nelden badly wounded. Gretchen has the American carried to hospital, but Neldon keeps calling for Sheila.

In the meantime, Sheila has waited vainly for Neldon to return and after months of solitude has accepted the consolation of Jack whom she has met at a garden party. Although Jack knows of her love for another, he continues to he kind to her until one day Sheila agree to marry him. He knows she has never been completely his, and when, on their honeymoon, he reads of Neldon's injury in the gambling den raid, he silently hands the paper to his wife who makes plans to see Neldon. Once she is with him, however, she realizes that only pity is left for him and that she loves her husband. Neldon pulls through at length, and as he leaves the hospital he sees Gretchen who has waited for him throughout. Through his own loss of Sheila, he has grown more sympathetic to Gretchen and together they mend the broken threads of their lives.

THUMP HOUSE

Craig McConkey Short Subject File No. 9578

HENRY had married Georgia because she was the very fragile type who needed a man's protection constantly, but there were times when Georgia's helplessness annoyed him. Tonight the Franes had come over and as Willie entained them with ghastly stories of his war experiences, Georgia's cold hands sought Henry's. Growing expansive over the delicious little sandwiches, Willie went on mirthfully describing with painful detail his night in a grave yard until Henry could feel Georgia squirm and had to intercede to stop the fanciful reminiscences. After they were gone, Henry laughed at Georgia for being so upset, but although she tried to respond to his cajoling, she insisted upon retiring without doing the dishes, feeling that she couldn't manage it tonight. Henry's last words were not to dream of ghosts.

Struggling through the fog of her nightmare, Georgia opened her eyes with the painful certainty that a strange noise was sounding through the house. Strained she listened and a last dull thud awakened her to the realization that a sound like that had awakened her. Terrified she awakened Henry, and as she explained fearfully about the noises, he told her Willie's stories had been too exciting for her. Not wholly convinced, Georgia permitted Henry to switch out the lights again but even as his voice comforted her, Georgia grew tense and suddenly gasped, "Henry, look!" There in the darkness of the room two luminous green eyes stared out. With a leap, Henry snapped on the night table lamp and laughed loudly as he showed her that the eyes were only the luminous centers of the switch buttons. Henry explained that the alley light that usually shone in the window was out tonight. Without it the glow of the buttons was more noticeable.

Still sleep was a long time in coming for Georgia and suddenly the terrifying thumping began again, muffled and regular. "Hen—ry!" "Now who—," he began, then listened intently. This time he drew on his bathrobe and armed with a search light began a complete tour of the house. In each room of the house the bright lights shone on everything in its place but the light in the cellar wouldn't work and as Henry cautiously descended the steps, Georgia shivered at the creaking. No single evidence of a visitor was about. But when, minutes later that same sinister noise sounded, deadly in its resonance, Henry sent for the police. They came stamping into the house. Georgia hlushed at having to show them her kitchen, piled high with dirty dishes, and hurried them out of the room. At length the chief flashed his light on the snow around the house and pronounced emphatically there were no footsteps anywhere about. He sniffed at the brandy that Henry had opened for the Franes, and crooking his finger ordered his men to follow him. Georgia's indignation mounted at the suggestion that they might be drunk. There was no sleep for them that night. Soon the same noise came again. This time both rushed resolutely toward the kitchen. A mouse scurried from behind a peck sack near the kitchen door leading to the cellar. The movement caused a small hard apple to fall through a hole in the bag. Wobbling, it rolled to the edge of the steps and slowly bumped step by step to the bottom. Slowly Georgia and Henry returned to their own room.

FATEFUL CROSSING

Judson Herr Drama File No. 9494

CAPTAIN MARSH crossed the smoke filled saloon in Singapore, and sat down at a table. Across from him he could see a boy drinking whiskey after whiskey but it was no concern of his until the boy emptied his pockets and found he hadn't enough money to pay for his drinks. His heavy head dropped to the table again, oblivious of the sharp voiced owner who shook him and jabbered angrily in a foreign tongue. A low whistle brought three huskies who began to make an example of the boy when Captain Marsh interfered, flipped some coins down on the greasy table and led the bruised lad out into the night air. In his own cabin, the Captain learned the lad was an American, Jim Larsen, a Princeton graduate, who had lost the girl he loved to a richer man. Jim had drifted then, taken passage on a boat and overslept his leave in Singapore. He didn't care what happened to him now. Marsh looked at the boy shrewdly and asked him how he'd like a job on his ship. For a moment Jim hesitated then grasped the hand the Captain extended to him.

On their subsequent journeys together the Captain and the boy beoame close friends. It was a strange friendship, almost as son to father between the well bred young chap and the grim sea captain and when Jim relapsed into sullen moods which indicated he was thinking of women, Marsh patted his shoulder and gave his own theories about women. Although he scorned the women attracted to him by his size and his commanding personality and frequently left the giddier of his women passengers feeling insulted at one of his rebuffs, Marsh still believed that some day he would find the one woman who would really love and be faithful to him. Jim laughed bitterly.

Turning the bridge over to Jim who had rapidly risen under Marsh's direction, the Captain crossed the decks as the ship headed out of New York and was turning in to his own cabin when he saw a woman sobbing against the rail. Touched, he asked if there were something he might do, and led her to a deck chair. It was some time before Jean admitted that in the rush of getting aboard she had lost her handbag containing two thousand dollars in traveling checks. Marsh's laugh boomed out as he assured her that the company that issued the checks would stop payment upon them and relieved, Jean thanked the Captain. The dinner call cut short their conversation. Marsh searched the dining room with eager eyes the next day for Jean but she was a poor sailor and remained in her cabin. Delicacies came to her with the compliments of the Captain and to Jim, Marsh confided that for the first time he was in love.

On deck one night Jim was looking up at the stars when a voice behind him said ,"Beautiful night, isn't it?" Jim whirled about and seeing the beauty of the woman, he dared not speak. It was Jean's taunting at how different he was from the captain that made Jim, accepting her challenge, kiss her. As he felt her body yield to him he remembered this was the woman Marston loved and he left her. Tossing upon his bunk, however, he knew he loved Jean too and the Captain's rhapsodies cut him to the quick. Once in a great storm Jean clung to him and asked him why he fled from their love, but Jim put her aside. Only when the great ship struck a derelict and began sinking did the captain urge Jim to get into the boat in which a frightened Jean was. Jim refused and the Captain, infuriated, threatened the boy, adding in a gentler voice he was the only man he could trust.

As the mighty ship sank and the Captain with it, Jim's arms tightened about Jean, and he said softly, "He died without knowing you never loved him." Jean's kiss stopped Jim's words.

HE DIDN'T WANT MONEY

Morris Hoffman Drama File No. 9440

THE son of a wealthy manufacturer, Gerald Harriman planned to devote his life to teaching at a small college. His roommate, at school, James Goodwin stretched himself upon his bed and after watching Gerald absorbed in writing a book, commented that it was only because Gerald had never experienced the press of want as he and his sister did, that he felt money wasn't important to happiness. Gerald looked up from his manuscript, threw a pillow at James, and went back to his writing.

A few days later Gerald received a telegram ordering him to come home immediately. He was startled by his father's harrassed appearance. Finally the elder Harriman explained that his doctor gave him just a few months to live unless he took a long vacation from his business. Gerald looked anxious. But when his father added that there wasn't one of all his employees he could trust with the great manufacturing business, and that he wanted his son to give up his beloved college and take over the business, Gerald rebelled. It was only after his father had lost his temper and Gerald had to bring water, that he consented.

For months Gerald hated the office, but having accepted the trust he put himself into his work with his whole heart. Even when it was necessary to entertain out-of-town buyers. Gerald accepted his responsibilities and through nights of sickening gaieties, Gerald did his part. He awoke mornings with a splitting head and through groans he promised himself to let that part of the business go, but his biggest orders came after those parties.

Then James, graduated from college, arrived in town and Gerald invited to his apartment met and fell in love with his sister, Jane. Gerald found her refreshingly different from the girls he had been meeting at the parties but much as he wanted to see her, he found himself tied down to business dates. Then the elder Harriman, looking remarkably healthy, returned. The doctor warned him to keep away from the business, but there was no holding him. The strain soon began to tell and when upon the insistence of the doctor, Harriman agreed to return to Europe, he arranged business affairs through the moment of his departure. Just before he left, he suffered a heart attack and within a few moments died.

Gerald, poring over the firm ledgers, was telephoned news of his father's death and for several moments he was stunned. When Gerald saw Jane he told her he wasn't going to be a slave to business. He was going to let subordinates run the firm and he would devote himself to the things he had always wanted, education and writing. Jane argued with him, warning him that soon he would lose all, but after telling her he wasn't going to be at the mercy of a business as his father was, Gerald accused her of being mercenary, and flung himself from her house.

Entrusting the management to his father's trusted Howard Morton, Gerald bought the farm he had always wanted. In sylvan quiet, he once more began work upon his novel and under the nom-de-plume of Walter Campbell wrote best-sellers.

When Jane read in the newspapers of the bankruptcy of the Harriman firm through the misappropriation of funds by the trusted Howard Morton who had gambled in the stock market and lost, she begged her brother to comfort Gerald. James phoned his friend to work in over-alls in the garden and when Jane arrived she rushed to him telling him she didn't care if he were penniless she loved him. Gerald smiled as she asked if Walter Campbell might let them built a little cottage, and he promised to find out. Walter Campbell, Gerald reported, said they might and Jane, realizing that Gerald and Walter were one, allowed him to take her in his arms.

THE CASE OF NANCY FLEMING

F. Harrington Drama File No. 9626

THE heart and soul of James D. Fleming was in his great Construction Company in Chicago. His pretty wife, Margaret, distressed by her husband's pre-occupation with his work began to seek diversions elsewhere and on a visit to her husband's office one day, met John Pattison, John's Superintendent of Construction who admired the slim body of his employer's wife. James made a valiant effort to spend more time with his wife, but when he returned home one night to surprise Margaret with theater tickets after she had mentioned a show she wanted to see, he found she was out for the evening. James contented himself playing with his six-year-old son, Ronald whose ambition was to be a big man—a lawyer or a judge! The baby, Nancy, two, was already asleep. When Margaret came home she scolded James for keeping Ronald up so late and in the days that followed, when James tried to come home early, Margaret, to cover her own impatience, insisted that her husband loved Ronald more than he did her.

At length after numerous persuasions by Pattison, Margaret agreed to run off to New York with him. At the last moment, however, she was unable to leave without Nancy and she took the baby with her. John soon found himself regretting the responsibility of Margaret and Nancy and after quarreling with the woman who had given up all believing his protestations of love, he left her without a word of explanation. Distressed yet too proud to appeal to John for help, Margaret wasted away, unable to find work and relying wholly upon the kindness of Mrs. Bemis, the boarding house-keeper. Margaret left to her daughter Nancy only a locket with a picture of herself and John; and the little girl was sent to an orphanage.

Years later, free, she found work as a waitress. Pretty, intelligent, she caught the eye of Arthur McQuade, a Chicago political boss visiting New York. Admiring her, he offered her a secretarial position and driven to despair by the furtive advances of the restaurant patrons and the boss' reminders that the customer was always right, Nancy accepted although she knew her position would be equivocal.

Meanwhile in Chicago Ronald Fleming had taken a law course, entered a firm and through distinguished service had rapidly risen to the post of District Attorney. To celebrate his election, Ronald and his best friend Neil dined at the Eden Night Club and when Neil admired the girl dining with Arthur McQuade, Ronald lifted an eyebrow and advised his friend to seek a less attached woman. Neil's eyes followed Nancy as she left with McQuade. Later, at McQuade's apartment, the hell rang and Arthur told Nancy to go into the bedroom lest she be compromised. It was John Pattison, unshaven and wild-eyed who had come to plead with McQuade to use his influence to get him a job. McQuade tried to push the drunken fellow out but when Pattison, noticing a woman's purse made a foul suggestion, the men came to blows and Pattison drew a gun, killed McQuade, and fled. Nancy running to the spot was indicted and Ronald, as District Attorney convicted her of murder. Neil protested throughout, insistent that the girl was obviously innocent, and when Pattison, gravely injured by a derrick while standing near a Fleming enterprise, laughed hysterically at the irony and confessed it was he who killed McQuade, Ronald admitted to Neil he had been wrong about the girl. Neil's interest in Nancy developed into love and as his fiancee, Neil brought her to the Fleming home. Over the dinner, Nancy briefly told the story of her past and when John Fleming asked if she still had the locket and Nancy produced it, Fleming wept as he took his daughter to his heart and Neil and Ronald clasped hands.

THIS SIDE OF BROADWAY

Francis Corbin Drama File No. 9492

WEST of Broadway, but a short distance from its glamour and excitement, lived Dorothy Butler, a young stenographer, and her sweetheart, Jerry Kiernan, an automobile mechanic. Both of them were orphans, and spent most of their time together, seldom crossing over to Broadway, except when they went to church on one of the streets in the forties.

Dorothy was very happy with her simple amusements and pleasure, but Jerry, bored with the peaceful routine into which he saw his life falling, confessed to her one evening as they went to nine o'clock services, that he meant some day to get over to the thrilling side of Broadway, and taste for himself its adventures. That night it was a troubled Dorothy who raised her lovely young voice in the church choir, for she had seen too many cases of the unbreakable hold that Broadway can get on people. Her fears were soon realized, for a few days later, Jerry eagerly unfolded to her his plans to take Broadway by storm. He was good-looking, and could dance very well; Dorothy was very attractive, and had a sweet voice; why couldn't they form a dancing and singing team, and try to break into some fashionable night club? Totally unimpressed by Jerry's vivid descriptions of what a great success they could be, Dorothy realized that she would have to do something drastic to stop him from being ensnared by the promise of popularity, and relying upon his great love for her, she told him that he would have to choose between Broadway and her. But she had not reckoned upon Jerry's self confidence and hot-headedness, and she was utterly stunned when he announced that he would try to get work as a dancer without her.

Jerry knew a young journalist who was a frequent patron of the Club Corenne, and to his joy, his friend finally obtained for him a position with the club, which was expertly managed by one of Broadway's cleverest hostesses, Cora Vallon. Cora, seeing in Jerry not only dancing ability, but a likeable personality, and an easy charm that was sure to attract all women, especially older ones, began using him as a drawing card for wealthy spinsters. His head turned by Cora's flattery, and his sudden popularity, Jerry did not realize Cora's scheme, and when she casually suggested that he take his lady friends to a gambling house in the forties, he followed her advice, without understanding that Cora received a certain commission on all the house's customers.

Several months passed—months of constant dissipation for Jerry, which gradually undermined his health, and seriously affected his dancing. All too clearly he began to see that he was merely being used as Cora's pawn, and that she was already tiring of him. Flatly refusing to take any more people to the gambling den, she fired him, and Jerry began again to look for a job. His popularity gone, his dancing impaired, his efforts were fruitless, and each day his bitterness against his former friends increased. One evening, reaching the end of his funds, he wildly resolved to hold up the gambling resort at nine o'clock just when the attendants had opened the place, and would be off guard. Planning to sneak in by a back entrance, he slipped around to the rear of the house, and stood revolver in hand, bracing himself for the robbery. As he stood thus, a sweet voice rang out into the air, and with a shock, he recognized it as Dorothy's. The gambling house was directly behind the church that he and Dorothy had once attended together. Stung with remorse, and at last aware of the dreadful thing he was about to do, he determined to redeem himself by confessing to the Father. Forgiven he walked with a lighter step, and a cleaner heart out of the church, and straight into Dorothy who had just left the choir. With an anguished cry at the sight of his changed appearance, she slipped wistfully into his arms, and, as in their old days, they left the church together, only to return a few weeks later to be made man and wife.

THE REWARD SEEKERS

Mrs. H. M. Stewart Comedy File No. 9257

ARRIVING at the log cabin belonging to the Dean's, John Varney enters and learns from his fiancee Nancy, that during the night the house had been visited by a huge owl that bit Uncle Ebon's nose severely, and had also become entangled in Aunt Malinda's hair. Although this unusual occurence dampens the enthusiasm of the guests who have come to Nancy and John's wedding, the service is begun, and for a few moments there is blissful silence, while John's father, Parson Varney reads the wedding ceremony. But hardly has he begun when he begins to cough and choke and soon the whole party is almost suffocated by a peculiar odor that is finally traced to the roof. Burr, Nancy's brother, anxious to have the service continue hurries to the roof, and there finds two black and white animals famous for their strange odor, fighting viciously. The wedding continues, but just as everything seems to be going along smoothly. Burr, over zealous in his attempts to scare off the two offenders, crashes through the roof, hits John and stuns him. The parson, enraged at the injury done his son, revives him and forces him to leave, although Nancy is begging tearfully for the wedding to go on.

The next morning, Nancy's affairs begin to assume a more cheerful aspect, for she plans to go to John's home and effect a reconciliation, and also try to find out who had deliberately set the owl and the animals on the Dean household, so as to destroy their plans. At John's home, the two sweethearts settle their difficulties, but their troubles still continue. When John leaves the room for a moment, his six year old sister innocently prattles about Flossie Daniels, the owner of the town's only millinery store, and Nancy, instantly suspecting that John really loves Flossie, leaves tearfully for Uncle Ebon's cabin, where she learns more bad news. A catamount has been seen in Ebon's melon field, and Burr and his uncle set out determined to capture the strange animal After many hours of watching, Ebon falls asleep among the melons, but Burr, who has been searching the fields assiduously, suddenly comes face to face with the catamount. Forgetting that he has a gun, he takes to his heels in fright, and dashes madly back to the house, the cat directly after him, and arouses Aunt Malinda, the sturdy farm woman, to help him. With remarkable presence of mind, Malinda grabs a broom, and chases the catamount vigorously, hitting her nephew more often than the animal. Bruised and battered by Aunt Malinda's heavy strokes, the cat slinks away, and Nancy, who has awakened and has watched the whole scene from the window, is helpless with laughter at the strange spectacle.

Meanwhile Ebon, who has been snoring peacefully, is aroused by low grunts coming towards him, and peering fearfully over the melon tops, he sees a huge grizzly plodding through the field. Using his native ingenuity, he crawls away through the field, diverting attention from himself by smashing the melons, which causes the bear to stop at each fruit, and crunch the fleshy parts. After several minutes of agonized crawling on his hands and knees, Ebon reaches his cabin, and just manages to get inside the door, his face and clothing streaming with melon juice. There he finds his nephew nursing his bruises, and complimenting Aunt Malinda on her forcefulness. The whole family are at a loss to explain the sudden appearance of so many strange beasts in the neighborhood. At this moment, John bursts in through the door, the bear that had chased Ebon slung victoriously over his shoulder, and a band of tough looking youngsters trailing shamefacedly after him. Commanded by John, the children confess that Flossie, jealous of Nancy had promised to buy them all the candy they wanted, if they would free some of the animals from a traveling zoo stationed in town, and so torment Nancy's family. Hardly have they finished rejoicing over the explanation, when the owner of the zoo arrives with Parson Varney, and substantiates the statement. Right then and there, to prevent any more interference, Nancy and John are married, with the bearskin given to them by the zoo owner, as their highly prized wedding present.

GREEN DEMONS

Jacqueline Darveau Drama File No. 9218

SINCE childhood Jean Fenwick has been in love with Peter Wilson who lives on a neighboring estate. When Peter is accepted as a law partner of her father, he continues to treat Jean in a friendly fashion, but Jean realizes he is not in love with her. To distract her mind she takes up nursing, assuming the name Miss Stead, lest her social affiliations prove a stumbling block to being taken seriously in her work.

At the hospital the resident doctor, Merrill, stops Jean frequently to ask for dates, but she refuses his invitations and arouses the jealous envy of Betty, one of the nurses who is in love with Merrill. One evening at a party given by Peter, Jean pales as she is introduced to Dr. Merrill. The next morning at the clinic, Dr. Merrill tells Jean he loves her, and although he cannot understand her plea that he keep the secret of her work from Peter, he wants to marry her. Meanwhile Betty, infuriated by Merrill's indifference to her since Jean's advent, and terrified lest Merrill discover she has had an affair with Staunton, the father of little Jackie, Jean's favorite little patient, writes an anonymous letter to Mrs. Staunton who has been trying in vain to discover the identity of her husband's inamorata. Mrs. Staunton brings the case before Dr. Merrill in whom Betty has already planted seeds of distrust, and believing he has the key to Jean's coldness to him in her affair with Staunton, Merrill discharges her from the hospital. However, he does not reveal the vanished Miss Stead is Jean Fenwick. At home Jean is tortured by the references Peter and her father, who are handling the case, make to the peccadilloes of the mysterious student nurse. Merrill marries Betty in an attempt to forget Jean, but Mrs. Staunton, foiled in her effort to locate Miss Stead makes further investigations and wrings from her exasperated spouse the fact that he has never met this Miss Stead and is sick and tired of hearing her name. Implacably, Jackie's mother pursues her husband until at length he reveals that Betty was the other woman. Triumphantly she serves her papers.

Meanwhile Jean informs her family that she is joining a group of missionaries in Japan, putting her nursing experience to practical advantage. Against their wishes, she boards a plane and is winging her way to the coast when Merrill, acquainted with the extent of his wife's duplicity, arrives to explain to Jean. Finding her gone, he wildly tells the whole story to Peter, whose admiration for Jean mounts as he realizes what she has had to endure. Dropping the divorce case, he follows Jean but his telegrams and wires go astray and he takes the next boat after her to Japan. On board Jean receives Peter's messages but she has contracted herself for five years of work and when Peter arrives she slips from his arms and tells him hopelessly that she is bound. However, by the offer of a large sum of money to the mission Peter buys off Jean's contract and this time Jean yields to find happiness with the man she has always loved.

DANGEROUS SECRET

Mrs. E. Brogdon Drama File No. 9376

ALL through the war, Mel York had instinctively felt Peter Wright's antagonistic attitude toward him. As captain of Peter's regiment, Mel treated him civilly, but, nevertheless, the close of the war found the two men parting as enemies.

Having no responsibilities toward his home, Mel decided to go out to the Klondike country, and try his luck at prospecting. Through a stroke of good fortune, he hit a rich gold vein, and for a time prospered. Coming into the neighboring village for supplies one morning, he saw, to his great astonishment, Peter Wright in the claim agent's office, evidently preparing to settle in the gold country.

As rival prospectors the two men found their positions exceedingly difficult. Mel, on one hand, felt no dislike for Peter; Peter, on the other, still nursing the grudge he bore his former superior, decided that at last his chance for revenge had come. One morning Mel awoke to find that the foundations of his mine had been ruthlessly smashed. Although this meant the destruction of many months of hard labor, he quickly started his work of rebuilding. Peter, incensed at the futility of his attempt, anxiously awaited an opportunity to further harm Mel.

He had not long to wait. Returning from a long trip into the snow-bound country, Peter accidentally stumbled across a limp figure, half covered with snow. It was Mel, who, going into the woods to hunt for game, had fallen over a dead log, and had broken his ankle. Tortured by the pain, he had lain there for several hours before Peter arrived. His old enemy, seeing his opportunity, refused to help Mel, but left him lying on the ground, subjected to the fierce cold, and in an agony of suffering. Hours later, a group of men found Mel almost frozen to death, and it was several months before he had recovered sufficiently to resume his work. Meanwhile, Pete's young sister Lucille, had come to Alaska, and the brother and sister had set up housekeeping on the edge of the Mangan river. Although strangely attracted to Lucille, Mel kept clear of the Wright cabin, not able to trust himself should he meet Peter.

One evening, a traveler, stopping at Mel's humble shack, brought the alarming news that the Mangan river, usually so peaceful, had risen and was pouring its waters over the banks. Mel, fearing that Lucille would be trapped by the flood, drove toward the river. A terrible sight met his eyes. The Wright home was almost all swept away, and Peter, his strength near the breaking point, was clinging desperately to some fallen boards. Mel's first thought was for Lucile, and when Peter called to him weakly, saying that she was safe in town, he was tempted strongly to leave Peter to die, just as he had left Mel some months before. He almost turned away from the strugglings of his old enemy, but something within him compelled him to drag Peter to safety. He carried the exhausted man to town, and Lucile's joyful tears of relief, and her brother's humble thanks, were the beginning of a happier life for the three of them.

BY THE WILDERNESS TRAIL

R. S. Stevenson Drama File No. 9733

FROM early childhood Lucile Daring and Christopher Johns were sweethearts despite the fact that Mrs. Daring was only a dressmaker in the town, while the Johns controlled the town bank. Returning from Harvard one summer. Chris resented Jim Walters', a stranger in the village, constant attention to Lucile, and taking her for a long drive along a little frequented woodland trail, Chris renewed his pledge of love. Stopping the car to have a picnic, the sweethearts wandered far off the trail, and came upon a small cabin. Half-hidden by the thick bushes, they watched Jim Walters, standing at the door, talking to three suspicious looking men. Unable to understand the situation, Chris and Lucile returned to their homes. The next evening, Chris, suddenly called back to school to take charge of a summer group, attempted to get to the Daring home to say good-bye, but was prevented by his mother. Feeling that Chris had neglected her, Lucile, invited by Jim Walters, went to a dance with him in a neighboring town, and Jim, who was madly in love with Lucile, drove her to the cabin in the woods, and forced his love-making upon her, despite the objections of Mrs. McKane, the wife of one of Jim's friends, who was living in the cabin. As she struggled, Jim's three companions of the previous day returned and having just robbed the town bank, they kept Lucile there to prevent her from revealing the crime to the authorities.

Chris, aboard the train, reading of the robbery and of Lucile's disappearance, remembered the wood cabin, and returning on the next train, led the police to the hide-out, but although the gunmen were captured, Walters escaped and Lucile was suspected as his accomplice. Secure in the thought that Chris still loved her, Lucile left her mother to seek work in the nearby village, as Chris returned to Harvard, promising to come at the end of the term and marry her.

But at school, Chris, hurt by the fact that Lucile's reputation had been blackened, and that Mrs. Johns taunted him with the girl's supposed guilt, determined to track down the real criminal and make him exonerate Lucile. Through Stan Holebroke, whose sister Estelle was working in the same office as Lucile, Chris met Geraldine Lothair, and instantly felt that she resembled someone he had seen, although he could not imagine who. Invited by Geraldine, to a dinner party, he saw on the piano in her room, a picture of Jim Walters, inscribed, "From your loving brother." Chris, hoping to gain information of Jim's whereabouts from Geraldine, became a frequent visitor at her home, often speaking to her of Lucile and Stan, who thought Chris was forgetting Lucile, wrote to her, telling her of Chris' affair. The day that Lucile received the letter, Jim, hungry for a sight of her, and sick of remaining in hiding, sought her out, and Lucile, terribly disappointed in Chris, did not inform the police; but, Estelle Holebroke, afraid for her friend's safety, and overhearing Jim say that he was going to his sister's, wrote to Chris, begging him to come to Lucile. Chris, seeing this as a way to trap Jim, waited until he had reached Geraldine's home, not telling her the truth about her brother, Geraldine finding Jim desperately ill, and met with his refusals to call a doctor, for he feared discovery, begged Chris to go for medical aid. Although tortured by the thought that he would be hurting Geraldine, who had proven a staunch friend, Chris' sense of fairness made him call for the police, and realizing that he was caught, Jim cleared Lucile of all blame. Leaving Stan Holebroke to care for the distraught Geraldine, he drove furiously along the railroad track, hoping to catch up with Lucile, who was aboard the homeward bound train. As Lucile watched the speeding car from the train window, the roadster swerved precariously from the road and turned over. When he awoke in the hospital, Chris heard Geraldine's voice telling someone of Jim's confession, and when he tried to explain that he loved Lucile, miraculously it was she who silenced him with a kiss.

ONE IN A MILLION

Frank Kaczmarski Drama File No. 9651

HAVING gambled away his patrimony in drinking, John Carp gave up his farm to his mortgagee and moved his wife and his son, Frank to a small rented farm where he made only enough money to keep him in a chronic drunken state and his family in dire need. The boy, bitterly resenting his father's brutality when drunk, managed to earn a few dollars by helping Joe Blake, a horse trainer who offered to take the boy with him to the coast, but went away alone when John forced Frank to remain on and help him. Young as the boy was, it was Frank who prevented his father from beating his horses to death when, exhausted, the beasts could no longer pull the heavy plough, and with gritted teeth the lad bore the sting of the whip descending on his own shoulders. Only the need of protecting his mother made him remain on at the house.

Then, in town one day, Frank learned that the farm that had formerly belonged to his family had been sold to a wealthy horse enthusiast who was cutting down the forest in back of the farm to make trails for the horses. Excitedly he applied for the position and assuring Mr. North that he knew all about horses as well as wood chopping he got the coveted position. For two months Frank worked steadily in the woods and when the trails had been cut, North permitted the boy to make stables for his horses and commissioned him to tend the sleek beasts. Then, one day North brought his daughter to live in his new home. Frank, dressed in his best clothes, blushed deeply at North's commendatory introduction to Betty, and felt a strange happiness when his employer asked him to show the girl the best riding trails. The next morning, early, Betty asked Frank to ride with her and begged him to drop his formality. Once, her horse, frightened by a rabbit ran wild and Frank sprang to her rescue. As he lifted her to his horse, Betty smiled into his eyes, and Frank trembled. North, learning of the incident thanked the boy for his aid, but Frank dared not confess he was in love with Betty.

Meanwhile, John, having made several unsuccessful attempts to reform went back to drinking one day and convinced that Frank was wrong in insisting that all the money he contributed be used for food rather than drink, John drunkenly seized a revolver and went to force drinking money from his son. North, speaking to John stepped forward to intercede with the drink-crazed man and fell, shot through the temple. Dazed by the tragedy, Frank snatched the gun from the sobered John and pushed him out the back door. When Betty entered with the veterinarian whom she had brought for a sick horse, she fainted at sight of Frank standing over her father's dead body. In court Frank testified that he had shot North for blaming him because the horse was sick. Betty cried out that wasn't true. Her father had admitted to her he had overriden the animal but the court sentenced the boy to life imprisonment. As he was being led off to jail, John gripped his hand and whispered he would confess but Frank urged him to take care of his wife.

For two years John behaved and then, determined to have one more drink, got drunk and maudlinly confessed the truth. When he realized the police were coming he attempted to escape and fell down a flight of stairs. Dying, he gave his confession and Frank, freed, found Betty waiting with his mother. In a week he was starting on his honeymoon with Betty.

DOUBLE ESCAPE

Mrs. C. Amanda Dennis Western File No. 9746

LEARNING that his wife is very ill, and that the only thing that can help her is a change of climate, Spencer Biddle, with his wife and small daughter Claire, moves to Arizona, and buys a large ranch. The acute judgment, and sure business sense that have made him such a success in the financial world, helps him to build up a fine cattle ranch.

The years pass. Claire, forgetting that she has ever been in a large city, grows up to be a true daughter of the West, loving the country and the people, and only wishing to spend her whole life there. Lately a new interest has come into her life, for Richard Cornwell, the son of one the state's most prosperous ranchers who has died recently, assumes the management of Mr. Biddle's ranch, tells her that he loves her and only wants to win her father's consent to marry her. But although Mrs. Biddle approves of the match, Spencer, who has not forgotten that if Claire had been brought up in the city, she would have been a member of the smart set, feels that to condemn his daughter to the hard, monotonous life of the desert country, is not fair to the girl. He does everything in his power to persuade the girl that she is wrong in her choice of a husband, but Claire stubbornly refuses to listen. Exasperated, he sends Dick away on some business, far out into the desert, hoping she will forget her cowboy sweetheart, but Claire only waits calmly for his return. Believing he has at last formulated a plan to make Claire see what her life could be if she had stayed in the city, her father begs her to go to school in the east, at least for a short while, and so test out the strength of her love for Dick. Grudgingly consenting, Claire tells of her father's decision to Harry Flanagan, Dick's best friend who has been left in charge of the ranch during Dick's absence.

Rejoicing in his daughter's consent, Mr. Biddle completes the other part of his plot by summoning Pancho, his trusted Mexican servant, to his office, making sure that Harry is around to overhear the conversation. With Pancho, Mr. Biddle pretends to plan to kidnap Claire so as to get her away from the ranch, for she is loathe to go. Seeing Harry hiding in the shadows, and carefully noting every word he is saying, Mr. Biddle is sure Harry will immediately ride out to Dick, report what he has heard, and then Dick, fired with a desire to protect Claire from danger, will force himself upon the peaceful party going to the station, and take Claire away. Naturally, such a cave-mannish and heroic gesture will make him ridiculous in the eyes of his sweetheart, who will feel he has acted like a fool.

Two days later, Pancho, with Claire drives out to the railroad station, Mr. Biddle pleading illness as the reason for remaining behind, but watching the party through field glasses. Just as he has expected, as Claire and Pancho are galloping along at a swift pace, Dick, riding furiously, overtakes Pancho, ties him to his horse and rides off with Claire, who seems to offer strenuous objections. But, as he has not bargained Dick, instead of heading homeward rides in the direction of the town. Although puzzled, Mr. Biddle is sure his ruse will work, and that Claire will laugh at Dick's unnecessary rescue. As he sits chuckling to himself on the porch a few hours later, he is dumbfounded to see Claire and Dick come toward him, broad smiles on their faces, while Dick says, "Meet Mrs. Cornwell." And as Mr. Biddle slowly acknowledges his defeat, Claire says sweetly, "Your plan certainly worked, Daddy. Only you forgot that Harry might have told me first, and that I, realizing your intention to ridicule Dick, decided I wouldn't mind being rescued anyway. Congratulate us, darling!"

UNWORTHY

Mrs. Maude MacWood Drama File No. 9657

WHEN Lorna Miller announced to her devoted friend, Judith, that she had decided to go back to school, Judith knew that there was some other motive than education, for Lorna, although vivacious and very attractive had never been interested in knowledge. Walking with Lorna to the small school house a short distance from the Miller home in the small Southern town, Judith discovered that Lorna's sudden commendable ambition was because Radway boasted a new school teacher, Warren Martin, a handsome likeable man who had had the advantage of schooling in a large Eastern college. Warmly flattered by Lorna's evident devotion, and amused by her naive mannerisms and caprices, Warren enjoyed wooing her ardently, until the town folk aware of Lorna's frequent visits to the school, gossiped maliciously. Judith, knowing her friend's innocence, begged her not to consider Warren too seriously, for he was from a fine family, and hardly likely to contemplate marriage with one beneath him. But completely won by Warren's charm, Lorna disregarded her friend's sound advice, and when Warren sent her an announcement of his engagement to Martha Fallowes, the daughter of a wealthy landowner of the county, Lorna was terribly disillusioned.

Despite Judith's pleas, Lorna immediately plunged herself into a dangerous round of parties and dances, showering her attentions on Warren Bailey, perhaps because his name brought back happy memories. Discovering that she was about to become the mother of Bailey's child she hated the thought of having the dissipated and irresponsible Warren have any influence over it. After her son's birth, she refused to name the father, but under promise never to reveal the truth, she told much-worried Warren Bailey, that Warren Martin was her son's father. Then, leaving town with her child, she went to the city where Warren Martin, through Mr. Fallowes' influence, had become the head of a farmers' co-operative group.

Meanwhile Warren Martin, who through Lorna's actions, had finally realized that it was his fault she had suffered so, was haunted by his wrong, and longed to help her. But all he could do was to stand by and see Lorna, independent of her mother's help, obtain a position as clerical worker in a large packing house office. Throughout the years, Lorna struggled to support herself and her little son, and as she rose from a small position to a responsible secretarial job, Warren, who had risen to great prominence, felt that at last she was getting some of the happiness she deserved. When he learned that Anthony Mauria, the head of the concern for whom Lorna worked wished to marry her, Warren believed Lorna and her son would find a safe haven in the Mauria home.

Ordered by his father-in-law, to whom he was greatly indebted, to raise the membership fee of the producers' organization, the news of the change was met with opposition by the hard-pressed farmers, who sent Warren Bailey, himself a poverty-stricken landowner, to plead with Martin for a reduction. Finding Martin adamant, Bailey played his trump card, and threatened to reveal the fact that Martin was the father of Lorna's child, and thus ruin both Martin's security and Lorna's coming wedding. Martin, feeling that at last he could atone announced a new low fee, the day Lorna was married, although he knew that the child was not his. But only Judith, who had heard the whole story from Martin, knew how unnecessary the sacrifice was, for Lorna had told her husband the truth before they were married, in order to prevent her past from shadowing her future happiness.

THE UNCERTAIN MARRIAGE

Eleanor M. Herbert Drama File No. 9742

WHEN her father's will is read Monine realizes that there is nothing left of all the wealth she has been accustomed to. Even the great mansion is sold to cover debts and Monine, following the advice of the sympathetic family lawyer, enters a nurses' training school. At the hospital one day she hears two nurses discussing how hard it is to work with the handsome Dr. Bob Montague, a famous young surgeon, and thereafter she frequently hears whispered conversations about him. Once she receives a hurried summons to assist him in an operation and when her roommate Ellen hears that she is to work with Montague, she emits a long whistle and warns Monine to be careful of her head lest the handsome ogre chew it off. Monine is upset by the long searching look the great doctor gives her before he starts but in her anxiety she hands him the wrong instrument. When he finishes the delicate incision he turns upon Monine and shouts at her stupidity. The girl flushes. In the balcony several doctors have been watching the great surgeon at work. Monine runs out of the room tears in her eyes, and Bob, repentent, follows. Monine is startled by his apology and despite her resentment she cannot get the doctor out of her mind. However, news spreads and Monine is not called on cases. Pressed for funds, she tries to find out the reason at the registrar's desk, but they tell her they will call her when they need her. Turning away, she flushes as she realizes that Dr. Montague has overheard. She tries to pass but he stops her, and asks her to come to his office. To her amazement he asks her to marry him. She hesitates but putting his arms about her he asks her to decide immediately. In a daze Monine accepts. Bob takes her to his estate and in his arms she does not question his love. It is only when the following day she discovers that Sondra, the girl he loved had jilted him, that she realizes he has married her to show Sondra he doesn't care. When Bob tries to take his bride in his arms she turns upon him in fury and confronts him with her knowledge. He admits to her that his marriage had been a gesture for Sondra but he had chosen her because he admired her spirit so tremendously. Scornfully Monine turns upon him, but when she is about to leave, it comes to her that if she deserts Bob now she will make a laughing stock of him before the woman he had loved. She stays and keeps up the pretense of a happy marriage for outsiders. Bob is grateful for her understanding, but every time he tries to embrace her she shudders and moves away. At one of the frequent parties Bob gives, Vance, an artist becomes infatuated with Monine, who knows now that she has stayed because she loves Bob, but won't because of her pride, admit it. Monine laughs at Vance when he guesses she is not as happy as she appears but it is not until she overhears Sondra tell Bob they can still be friends, that Monine permits Vance to come for her. He finds her alone and overcome by passion seizes her in his arms. Bob returns, having said goodbye to Sondra because he loves his wife. Tearing into Vance, Bob orders him out, then asks forgiveness from an astonished Monine who asks through wet eyes, "Then you did mind?" As he kisses her hair, Monine whispers, "Bob, I thought. . . ." The gathering shadows close in on them.

FORBIDDEN TEMPTATION

Mary E. Baker Drama File No. 9762

BOUND for Honolulu with his parents, Joseph Schannon, adored son of Larry Schannon, famous for his wealth and his weakness for women, hates leaving his studies at the Musical Conservatory. But Mrs. Schannon, anxious to get her husband away from an almost disastrous love affair, makes Joe promise to stay at Honolulu for the summer. Among the passengers is Virginia Alers, an attractive women determined to win Joe, and seeing his interest in Irma Salem, she maliciously tells Joe's mother that Irma is a divorcee, with a little son. Enraged that Joe should be in love with such a woman, Mrs. Schannon, tells Joe about Irma, but he brushes her objections aside.

At Honolulu, Joe finds that Irma has the house next door to his, and renewing their ship board friendship, he invites her to a dance. Virginia, insanely jealous of Irma, tells Joe about Irma's past, adding that for proof, there is a photo in Irma's living room of her husband and child. Discovering the picture, Joe, heartbroken, rushes from the house, before Irma can explain. The next morning, the steamer bound for California carries as passengers, Joe and his faithful valet Charlie.

In Hollywood, Joe finds consolation in his music, and organizing an orchestra, obtains a contract to furnish the musical effects for the films of a prominent concern. In spite of his disillusionment he carries with him a newspaper picture of Irma, and when he drops it in the director's office, the director, seeing in her charm and loveliness a real "find" write Irma, without telling Joe, and she comes to Hollywood with her brother, Hugh to star in a picture. Meanwhile, Joe, reading a California paper, sees an item concerning the divorce granted to Dobby Alers, whose wife Virginia is unfit to have the custody of her son. Stunned, Joe wonders if the picture he saw could have been Virginia's, but his thoughts are interrupted by a call to come to the director's office to meet a new star. Encountering Irma, Joe begs forgiveness, while Hugh explains that the house, with all its furnishings had been rented from Virginia. Pardoned, Joe directs the music for Irma's picture, and when the pre-view is an unqualified success, they are married, planning to honeymoon in Honolulu and surprise Mrs. Schannon.

In Honolulu, Virginia, furious because she has lost Joe, succeeds in infatuating Mr. Schannon, and the evening that Mrs. Schannon gives a ball, gets him drunk making him accompany her to the Schannon home to ask his wife for a divorce. Joe and Irma, arriving home, see Mr. Schannon making himself ridiculous in the eyes of the guests, and forcing his father to go upstairs with Irma, Joe goes to find Virginia, who has disappeared mysteriously. As he comforts his mother a scream from Irma, sends them flying upstairs to find Mr. Schannon murdered. Still thinking that Irma is an unscrupulous woman, Mrs. Schannon accuses Irma, but when her son tells her of her mistake, Mrs. Schannon, realizing the harm she has done, reveals courageously that her husband has been having an affair with Virginia Alers. Trapped, Virginia confesses the murder, done when Irma had left the room for a moment, because Mr. Schannon had backed out on his promise to marry her. And, although saddened by Larry Schannon's inglorious death, Joe, his wife, and his mother are drawn closer together at last by the common bond of understanding.

NEW OWNER

Elizabeth McCann Drama File No. 9721

THE suburban town of Lawlor, near New York City, had always considered the Graves family, an ideal one. Arthur Graves, a successful business man, was utterly devoted to his wife, Helen, and his two small daughters, Janice and Betty Lou, and no disturbances marred their home life. Consequently, Lawlor's citizens were completely astonished to learn that Helen had been having an affair with Ira Berryman, who had been training her voice, and that Arthur, in order to make Helen happy, consented to divorce her, taking Betty Lou, and leaving her to care for Janice. When Helen finally discovered that Ira never meant to marry her, she determined to devote her life to her little daughter Janice, who showed promise of becoming a great singer, and changing her name to La Farge for stage purposes, she took the child to Europe, and placed her in the hands of the greatest operatic teachers.

Janice, at nineteen, the spoiled darling of an adoring Parisian audience, secretly married Thomas Reid, a man of forty-five, who, unknown to her had a son by a previous marriage. When Reid, his health ruined by a continual round of dissipation, died several months later, Mrs. La Farge, learning of her daughter's marriage bought a secluded villa in Southern France, and there Betty Lou Reid was born. Growing restless with the quiet routine of her life, Janice La Farge returned triumphantly to the concert stage, greeted by fresh plaudits from her admirers. With her manager, she planned a concert tour of America, and left for the States with Mrs. La Farge and Betty Lou. Although winning the hearts of all the men abroad, Janice, used to flattery and adulation, flew into a temperamental rage when she noticed that Lawrence Reid, the most attractive man on the ship, paid no attention to her, but seemed completely fascinated by a tall, blonde girl, whom Janice knew only as Betty Lou. Through her small daughter, who had been delighted to learn that the "pretty lady" bore the same name as she did, Janice met Lawrence, and exercising all her magnetic charm, succeeded in causing a rift between him and Betty Lou, and confided her victory to Mrs. La Farge who had been confined to her room all during the voyage. When the boat landed in New York, Betty Lou, hurt by Lawrence's distinterestedness, rushed home, and although her father, who was now established in New York, saw that she was grieved over something, he forbore questioning her.

Meanwhile Lawrence, completely captivated by Janice, was learning what it meant to be the slave of a woman wholly temperamental and devoted to her art. Janice constantly broke appointments with him because of rehearsals, and raged at him for petty reasons. One Sunday morning, as he walked in the park thinking of Betty Lou, he met her and her father. Leaving Mr. Graves to read his paper, the two friends quickly renewed their delight in each other, and when they came upon little Betty Lou, who had strayed far from her nurse maid, they had resolved to pick up the threads of their love-affair. Mr. Graves, who had just been looking with ill-concealed astonishment at a picture of Janice little Betty Lou, and Mrs. La Farge, whom he had recognized, felt his old affection for his wife returning at the sight of his grandchild, and going with his daughter to Janice's apartment, brought about a joyful reunion, when Mrs. La Farge explained to Janice that Betty Lou was her sister. And as Janice learned that Lawrence Reid was her husband's son, she was devoutly thankful that she had not ruined her sister's chances for happiness.

SLIPS

Maybelle Morris Comedy File No. 9764

SITTING alone in the darkened parlor with Helen, Jim finally manages to screw his courage to the point of asking her to be his wife, when her mother, upstairs shouts down, "Has that Jim gone yet," and goes on to say he is as bad as Helen's aunt Jenny, married to the gouty Justice of the Peace. However, as she pauses breathlessly, Jenny shouts that the door was open and she came in but nobody need bother she's leaving. So hard does she slam the door in departing that the glass shatters into a thousand pieces. The three hundred pound Jenny stalks through the rain to her car where her husband is sitting moaning over his gouty leg, and as she starts the car, he begs her to go gently. His directions confuse her so that she drives the car into a ditch and for the next few minutes the silence of the night is shattered by the whirring of the wheels as the car sinks deeper and deeper in the mud, Jenny's abuse of her husband, and his cries as his leg protests against the sudden bump.

Helen's father, meanwhile has tried vainly to sleep and when his wife keeps on talking about Jim, he buries himself in his covers. Junior aroused by his mother's nagging, fires his water pistol at her and she crowns her husband with a vase full of flowers. In disgust he takes his clothing and goes up to sleep in the attic where he is joined by the mischievous Junior. Angrily, Mother locks them in and as a gesture of her contempt kicks the door only to scream with pain as she is forcibly reminded her feet were bare.

Outside, Aunt Jenny and her husband Henry are floundering about. Henry steps out, totters, and falls into a mud puddle as he creates a miniature landslide. Jenny's cries as she tries to help her husband arouse Junior and Father who cannot come out because the door is locked. Junior makes a rope ladder but Father gets stuck half way down the building and he remains suspended not daring to move and unaware that just below him is a ledge which will bring him to safety.

Mother comes out with a lantern but drops it in terror as Jenny splashes back in the mud with a mighty cry. Junior looks into the gas tank and proclaims derisively, "No wonder you couldn't start the car—the tank is dry." Mother unscrews the gas tank to look and as Jenny cries, "Quick, help me!" goes to help her sister. Jenny finally gets out of the rut with the aid of her husband pushing from the rear, and proceeds to help the groaning Henry out. The struggle is too much for him, however, and he lets go the rope so that Jenny falls back, upsetting the lantern and setting fire to herself. She runs madly about and as she passes the open gas tank the car explodes with a bang that knocks everyone backwards and Father falls from his precarious perch. Jenny rushes forward into the millpond thereby extinguishing the fire but she cries she is drowning until Junior calls out scornfully, "Aw the water's only up to your waist."

At last the bedraggled group go inside—all save Henry whom they forget. It is he whom Jim and Helen find and in the kitchen, having dried up Uncle Henry, in front of the fire, are married by him just as the rest of the family remember that he is still outside. Just as they are rushing out, Father slips on Junior's fire engine and is sent rolling through the kitchen door and into the wedding party and the rest of the family coming in, congratulate the pair.

EVE'S DAUGHTERS

Beatrice Gilleylen Drama File No. 9740

THE door slammed and Carol sank moaning to the floor. For months she had lived in a fool's paradise knowing that sooner or later her husband would discover that her mother had colored blood. Now he was gone never to know that a child, Doris, was soon to be born of their disupted union. Years later, Carol married Joe Calhoun, one of her mother's people and finding peace in his adoration, determined that when her first child, Doris, already giving promise of great beauty, grew up, she should never know the misery of being scorned by a white man.

Years passed, Carol, now a widow, found it difficult to keep peace between the beautiful, intelligent Doris, and her half sister, Betty, who bitterly resented the other girl's attractiveness. Betty soon dropped out of school and when Doris would come home to bury herself in books, Betty complained that the girl would soon be ashamed of her people and try to mingle with the whites who would despise her. Carol ordered Betty to keep still, but in her heart she feared the same thing, and she begged Doris to marry one of the dark skinned men who loved her. Only in Doris' assurance that she could never love a white man, never be willing to accept their condescension did Carol take heart. But that was before Doris met Carmen at school. Carmen had never cared for girls. Always he felt that they were laughing at him because he limped. With the shallow, giggling girls of the school Carmen found no common ground. But soon both he and Doris were aware in the class room discussions that their interests were the same. Always their research led them to similar conclusions and soon they formed the habit of walking together to discuss ideas. Once, Carmen offered to take Doris home in his car, but she refused hastily and for several days thereafter she avoided him. Missing her, Carmen stopped her and begged her to ride with him. Doris tried to go on alone but as Carmen persisted, and Doris caught sight of Betty coming up the street and dreaded the scene which would result, she consented. In the car Carmen told her he loved her. Frightened, Doris sat very straight as she told him he didn't know what he was saying—she wasn't his kind. Carmen reached for her hands and told her it didn't matter to him. He had never found a white girl whose mind was as keen as Doris' or one who didn't at the least pity him. "Pity you," Doris cried, "Carmen . . . " and afraid that she would reveal how deeply she felt, Doris begged him to take her home. But Betty seeing them, and infuriated because one of the men she had brought home had had eyes for her no longer after seeing Doris, awakened in Carol the feeling that her daughter was heading for ruin. At home, Carol, stung by the fear that Carmen would throw Doris aside as Doris' father had cast her off, forbade the girl to see the white boy any longer; while at Carmen's home his confession to his family that he was going to marry Doris brought a storm of protest down.

In desperation, Carmen drove his car to Doris' door to defy his family, and when Doris the marks of her mother's hand livid upon her cheek, rushed out to tell him they must part, Carmen, suffering at sight of her pain-filled eyes, drove on to calm her. The storm rose in fury as they realized the hopelessness of their love, but now the wind was so great they could not turn and at last, the force of the tornado drove them into a wall. Dying, Carmen smiled at Doris whose answering tenderness was stamped by Death's hand. Now they would be together.

THE WAY OF WOMEN

Frank Recchia Drama File No. 9737

WHEN Leo Gargano, an Italian immigrant had been in America nine years, he sent for his wife and his little son Frank, glad that at last he had earned enough to support them comfortably. With the passing of the years, Leo prospered, and when Frank graduated college with honors, his father offered to send him to Italy to study foreign languages, as the boy had planned to instruct in Italian and French.

With his friend Maurice, a happy go lucky chap, who had an appealing way of singing Neapolitan love songs, Frank boarded the steamer bound for his home land. Through Maurice's singing, the two boys met Ada Bello, the daughter of a wealthy Italian-American family, and Frank especially was delighted to learn that she was bound for Milan, to study art. At Milan the three young people often went about together, but it was evident that Ada was more attracted to Frank than to Maurice. Their little romance soon ripened into love, and for Frank, who was very inexnerienced in affairs of the heart, his love for Ada was his whole existence. He was content to spend quiet evenings with his sweetheart, studying together or planning the future when Ada would be a famous artist, and Frank a learned professor. But Ada, used to excitement and glamour demanded too much from Frank, and when he at last was forced to open his eyes to the fact that she was meeting his best friend, Maurice, secretly, he was terribly disillusioned, and vowed never to trust a woman again.

Time passed. Although he tried to forget Ada's deceit, the thought was always with him, and when Italy declared war against Austria, he was one of the first to join, hoping to forget his sorrow. Meeting a young lieutenant, Louis, the two became good friends, but Frank still wary of people, was reserved and at times distrustful of Louis' devotion to him. At the front Frank met Dolores, a lovely young Red Cross nurse. At first merely attraoted to her because of her beauty he soon won her love, and she confided in him the fact that she was an orphan, and had never known a mother's loving care. But Frank, whose opinion of women was not very favorable, kept himself from loving Dolores, and purposely treated her as a mere plaything. Stung by Frank's casual lovemaking, for her feeling for him was very sincere, Dolores confided her problem to Louis.

Just before severe combat began at Piave, Frank, receiving a wire from his mother announcing his father's sudden death, was plunged into grief, and Dolores in an attempt to lighten his sorrow sought out Louis, and asked him to come to her rooms to plan a surprise party for Frank. Meanwhile Frank, who had been summoned to go immediately to the front, passed Dolores' window, and seeing her engaged in earnest conversation with his friend, suspected the worse and left before Dolores could explain. Taken prisoner by the enemy during combat, he was believed dead, and Dolores, seeing the obituary notice, determined to help his mother. Coming to America, she told Mrs. Gargano that she was her son's wife, and that she had come to help her in her trouble. A month after Armistice Frank returned to his home, and when he learned of Dolores' lie, was furious, thinking that she had deceived his mother for mercenary motives only. But his doubt was dispelled when Mrs. Gargano told him, with tears of joy in her eyes, what a marvelous comfort Dolores had been. Christmas day, still pretending to be angry with her, he drove her to New Jersey, and just when Dolores believed he was going to send her back to Italy, gently whispered in her ear that he was going to give her a mother for a Christmas present, and in return, he hoped she would give him a wife.

ANCHOR TO WINDWARD

Maurice A. Canoles Drama File No. 9771

TO Bob's consternation, every girl he likes forgets about him when she meets his handsome room-mate, Richard. Once Bob raves about the new co-ed at the Alpha Delta house, but when Bob takes her to a track meet, she sees Richard and the rest of the afternoon she talks about no one else. Richard laughs when Bob comes in angry, and when Bob ruefully warns his room-mate to keep clear of his sister, Jane, who is coming up for Senior Week, Richard slaps his back and cheers up his friend adding, "I'm not interested in women."

The next day Richard is taking his daily five mile run along the road in training for track when he sees a girl tinkering under the hood of her car. Stopping he offers assistance, and as she laughs at his running trunks, he points to a smudge at the end of her nose and the two laugh together and become friends. Richard accepts her offer of a lift into town and he whistles when he learns that she is Jane Crofton, Bob's sister. Bob is properly flabbergasted at seeing the two have met without his assistance but when Jane tells him how wonderful Richard is, Bob loses his temper. He feels that Jane will be just another woman to Richard and he warns her against losing her heart to Richard. For once, however, Richard is himself in love but when he attempts to declare his feelings, Jane, believing the stories her hrother tells her, gets up hastily and tells Richard to "be himself." Hurt by her flippancy, Richard tries to get an explanation, but when he arrives home he finds that his father's business requires a foreign representative abroad immediately and he is forced to leave without another opportunity to see Jane. For a year he is detained abroad and although he has his long wanted opportunity to study in the cultural centers of the world, he misses Jane keenly and derives small satisfaction from her curt letters. At last, his business terminated, he writes Jane that he is coming home on the steamer, Francia. Just as he leaves for the boat he receives a letter from Jane with a picture of her enclosed. Rejoicing over his first encouragement, he is so absorbed in the photograph that the wind whips the envelope from his hand. He clutches at it and is embarrassed when a lovely young girl with an enigmatic expression in her eyes hands it to him saying, "Mr. Morrison?" Richard thanks her but before he can leave, she hastily tells him she knows no one aboard. Richard wonders at so lovely a girl being friendless but Betsy Ann Gray seems always to be where he is. Once, dancing with her in the moonlight she lifts her face for his kiss, and Richard bends forward only to remember Jane, and continue dancing. Then, stung to anger by his indifference, Betsy Ann tells him he isn't human, but Richard tells her she is a very beautiful young lady—but he happens to love somebody else. At the dock Betsy Ann has trouble with her luggage and Richard takes her in a cab to her hotel, the Waldorf then leaves hurriedly for Jane's house. Bob greets him broadly but when he tells Richard, Jane has gone to see a friend at the Waldorf, Richard flushes painfully. Jane, coming in, rushes into Richard's arms, then ruefully tells him that she believed the stories Bob told her and even had her friend Betsy Ann, who was traveling on the Francia too, test him. Richard forgives her doubt, and Bob suffers for his part in keeping the lovers apart, for although he marries Betsy Ann, he is not unaware that his wife is still fond of Richard.

THE FINAL EVIDENCE

Aubrey W. Morton Drama File No. 9734

WHEN oil is discovered in Fairfax the town prospers over night. Jerry, pretty young secretary to Mayor Watson finds herself swamped with work and when Ralf Weeks, the good-looking reporter who loves her, begs her to set a date for the wedding, she tells him that she can't go off now and leave the Mayor. Bitterly Ralf suspects that the Mayor's son, Harry has something to do with her decision to postpone their marriage, and Jerry grows angry at Ralf's jealousy.

Meanwhile Harry Watson, at a New York University, has more money to spend than is good for him. He goes to night clubs and sitting at a ringside table is attracted to Dorothy Cox, torch singer. He sends a note to her dressing room. Leslie, Dorothy's lover is waiting for Dorothy when she comes to her room and reading the letter he tells her to see the kid and find out what's in it. Dorothy allows the boy to take her home and invites him in for a cocktail. Warming under her interest, Harry tells her boastfully about the oil property his father controls. He leaves dazed by her kiss and when Leslie comes up later he tells Dorothy how to work the kid. The following night Dorothy allows Harry to take her home again and gives him a cocktail with knockout drops in it. The next morning Harry is appalled by the accusations she makes when Leslie comes in and she tells the boy Leslie is her husband. Leslie threatens Harry, posing as an injured husband, and rather than bring disgrace to his family and political ruin to his father, Harry consents to get Leslie the oil leases he wants.

Back in Fairfax, Harry introduces Leslie as a college friend. Once waiting for Jerry who has gone out with the Mayor, Ralf toys with the inter-office telephone and to his astonishment overhears Harry and Leslie speaking in the Mayor's office. Harry is backing out of an agreement and Leslie is asking how he'd like headlines reading "Mayor's Son Attacks Lawyer's Wife. Dorothy Cox Confesses." Ralf goes to New York, finds out from some fellow reporters that Dorothy is a night club entertainer, and goes to see her. He signals to her to come to his table and lets fall the fact that he is from Fairfax. As he sees her interest mount he knows he is on the right track and when she attempts to question him about Harry and Leslie, he frames his answers so that she believes her lover has double-crossed her. Furious she spills all and even gets Leslie's thugs who are to be in on the cut to testify against him in the belief that he has run out with their money.

Ralf saves Harry from a misstep that would have meant ruin to him, Leslie is put in prison where he belongs, his frauds entirely exposed, and Ralf gets his reward from Jerry who leaves her position to the penitent Harry, ready to work to redeem himself. With the best wishes of the Mayor and his son, Jerry and Ralf leave on their honeymoon.

FLOOD WATERS

Myra Whiting Drama File No. 9476

MARRIED to one of the squatters settled on the Missouri River, big Dan O'Rourke is content with his lazy life and spends his time singing songs to his beloved little Dannie, who holds his kitten "Muddyface" on his knee and calls for a repetition of the song, "Shantytown." All the O'Rourke's wants are adequately provided for by their garden and their existence is idyllic until the big rain. Katie reassures Dan when he comments upon the rising waters, but by noon the water is waist deep and despite his wife's muttered conviction that the water will shortly subside, Dan worriedly swims across the river to get help. Unperturbed, Katie takes a nap, but Dannie's kitten, "Muddyface" darts up to the roof and the little fellow, following sits astride the stovepipe chimmney. At the same time the driftwood is swept up against the shack with such force that it cuts it from its foundation and the shanty floats down the swollen river. Katie, waking, tries frantically to escape but is drowned and when Dan comes back, having finally managed to charter a boat, there is no trace of his own shack among those floating down the river. All night he searches with no success and finally he is forced to believe his family has drowned.

Meanwhile Judge Morton's daughter looking across the swollen waters sees a little fellow and a cat astride a floating house and when Dannie is rescued he is unable to give any information about where he lived for the squatter colony was nameless. After several weeks the lad recovers from his exposure but he has won the hearts of the Judge and his teacher-daughter, and rather than give him up to an asylum they adopt him.

Meanwhile Dan, grieving for his dear ones cannot go back to Shantytown, so filled with memories, and he gets a job at a foundry. The nights bring back memories and to escape them he registers at the night school where Miss Morton is teaching and as a result of his diligence gets frequent promotions. His rich voice delights his fellow workers and during an entertainment for charity one night he is asked to perform. Persuaded by Miss Morton, who is his ideal of a woman, he sings but when someone suggests he sings the Shantytown number his eyes fill with tears. Dannie, at home alone, grows excited when he hears his father's voice over the radio, but as he mainly twists the dials to hear more, he loses the stations entirely.

The Judge is ill and goes to a resort to convalesce. Dan given a vacation takes Miss Morton's suggestion that he go to the same place, but he sees a youngster fight some lads who are trying to drown a cat, and reminded of his Dannie, Dan is intolerably lonely and returns to town. Miss Morton continues to interest herself in Dan and when at last he proposes marriage she telegraphs her father she is bringing her fiancee home. Dannie, hating to lose Miss Morton who has been mother and sister to him disappears but in the excitement he is not missed until dinner. They find him sobbing at the little mound that covers Muddyface. Miss Morton tells Dannie's story to Dan who stands powerless for a moment then gathers up his boy. Miss Morton stands looking on them then kneels down beside them, her arms encircling both.

HELL TRAFFIC

John Doe Drama File No. 9743

WHEN a daughter was born to the Jerold family, there was great rejoicing for the Jeralds were very prosperous, and a child was the only thing they needed to complete their happiness. As the years passed, and Cecile grew into a beautiful young woman, it was evident that she was the spoiled darling of the house. Her every whim satisfied, she became more and more unmanageable, and when the Jeralds awoke to the fact that Cecile was entirely undisciplined, they resolved to send her to a quiet mid-western college, noted for its scholarly atmosphere.

Although Cecile was very intelligent, she scorned using her mental ability, and soon became friendly with a fast crowd of youngsters who indulged in every form of dissipation. Visiting his daughter during the Easter vacation, Mr. Jerold was terribly troubled, and when introduced to Stuart Lander, a young man who was writing his doctor of philosophy paper in sociology, he begged him to try to exert some influence on Cecile. Although reluctant to promise, Stuart sympathized with Mr. Jerold's disappointment in his daughter and graciously consented. When classes began again, Stuart met Cecile through Vivian Edding, one of Cecile's reckless friends, and attracted by the girl's loveliness, won her friendship. In spite of herself, Cecile was drawn to the young instructor, and soon was spending quiet evenings with him. At the end of the term, Cecile went home, knowing she loved Stuart, and Stuart stayed on at school to do some research work. His work brought him in contact with Jenipher Ames, and although he had believed he loved Cecile, he realized that Jenipher, who shared his enthusiasm for work, and his interests in life, was really the one woman for him.

With the beginning of a new term, Cecile, who had fallen back into her old ways during the holidays, was angered at the insinuations of Vivian concerning Stuart and Jenipher. Watching the two at work together, her poisoned mind distorted their friendship, and when Stuart attempted to explain to her, she refused to listen and once more resumed her former habits of living, hoping to make her sweetheart jealous. Finding this method ineffective, Cecile, burning with hatred for Stuart, left college, with no set destination in mind. Aboard the train, she encountered Sam Tuman, and when he invited her to be his guest on a sight seeing tour in the city where the train stopped, she rashly accepted. Too disillusioned and too unreasonable to see the folly of her actions she allowed herself to be drawn into a life of degradation.

Meanwhile, Mr. Jerold, frantic with grief at his daughter's disappearance, and not aware of her shattered romance, begged Stuart to search for Cecile. Stuart, who was in Chicago studying slum conditions with Jenipher, discovered Cecile living with Sam, and implored her to give up her evil life. Cecile only derided his pleas, but when she saw that Sam, knowing Stuart would come again to see Cecile, planned to trap Stuart and rob him, she wrote to him never to come to her again, because it was useless, and then added that by the time he received her note, she would have been found drowned. When a girl was found in the river, Stuart buried her as Cecile, and he and Jenipher wrote to Mr. Jerold, saying that Cecile had been killed in an automobile accident. But somewhere in the great city, a girl who had left her lover, was standing in a charity bureau, hoping that they would be able to help her back to a better road in life.

HIS FATHER'S SON

George C. Lawrence Drama File No. 9625

TO Dr. Rowe, beloved country doctor, the decision of his son Richard to follow in his footsteps was the realization of his dearest wish. For two years young Dick distinguished himself at Medical school, and in the summer of his third year worked in the local bank to earn enough to pay his own tuition. Steady, hard-working, Dick yielded to the invitation of George, a fellow worker, to take a night off and come out on a party. Dick learned to drink that night and met Dotty Lee. For the first time Dick found going with a girl might mean more excitement than taking a walk or going to a movie, and captivated by Dotty's professions of love, Dick lost his head. To take her to roadhouses and buy her birthday gifts, Dick "borrowed" money from the bank, money that he never put back, and when his parents begged him to give up the girl, realizing for the first time he might lose her, Dick, fearing exposure at the bank begged Dotty to marry him. When, fever-eyed, Dick came for Dotty that night he found only a note telling him he was the biggest chump she had ever met—besides she had decided to go back to her husband.

Disillusioned and not daring to return, Dick went on alone to New York and soon sank to Bowery flop houses and sleeping in the parks. One night he joined up with one James Evans, an uneducated but good humored hobo. When James joined the army, Dick went with him feeling death would be welcome. But it was James not he who was blown up by a hand grenade, and Dick weeping over the remains of his friend, determined to change identifications so that his family would believe at least that he died honorably in France. James, he knew, had no relatives or friends.

Back in New York, Dick got a position as a shipping clerk but soon formed the habit of dropping into the public library to read. Day after day he was conscious of the same girl across the table and one night, in the rain, he took her home. Soon he felt he had to tell Nancy his story, but instead of turning from him, she prevailed upon him to start Medical school again. Dick sent for his records from school and convinced the authorities that his record among the war dead was erroneous. In two years Dick was interning and Nancy promised to become his wife. Studying at the Post-Graduate Hospital, Dick specialized in eye work and from general practice, he got a teaching post and through a spectacular operation won fame. Now he had his office upon Park Avenue and a steady stream of wealthy patients permitted Dick to shower luxuries upon his wife, while his work at the clinics brought the blessings of the poor to him.

Nancy's illness at the birth of their first baby so upset Dick that he cancelled his visitors for the day, but as he thumbed the list of patients, his eyes fastened upon the name, Mrs. Rowe. Excitedly he had the nurse bring his mother in and tears welled in his eyes as she explained to him that the accident which had killed her husband had blinded her and she prayed that the Great Dr. Rowe, who bore the same as her own dead son, could cure her. Then Dick realized he should long ago have opened old wounds and revealed himself to his family. It was Nancy who informed the grateful little lady that the doctor who had restored her sight was her own son, and Dick felt abashed in the presence of his proud mother. But when she begged him to give up fame, money, position, and realize his father's ambition of having his son succeed him in Freeport, Dick hesitated. It was Nancy who persuaded Dick to have the courage to give up everything and come back to the town which he had left as a thief, and slowly Dr. Dick won back the confidence of his father's patients.

WAYWARD GIRL

Hazle I. Parsons Drama File No. 9766

IT was her own beauty combined with her mother's favoritism that spoiled Joanna. All the way through school her sister Marion did her homework for her and kept her clothes mended, and if Marion ever rebelled it wasn't in front of people who might suspect she cared. Mrs. Huron often anticipated the brilliant match Joanna would make and when Marion sat out dances at parties, her mother would indicate the number of men cutting in on Joanna

Once Mrs. Huron complained of a pain in her side. Marion hastily called the family doctor, but finding he was on a much needed vacation, consented to have his assistant call. Dr. Darnley smiled at the girl's flushed face, but Marion was too worried over her mother's condition to realize that the young doctor was impressed with her. Quietly and efficiently she got him the medical aids he required and when Dr. Darnley informed her her mother was all right and if she were kept quiet would not suffer any further attacks, Marion sighed heavily in relief. For the first time she realized how she looked and as her hand flew to straighten her hair, Darnley said softly it was charming in disarray. It was to see Marion that the young Doctor came back but this time Joanna was home. Joanna, dressed in formal clothes to go dancing flashed her teeth at her sister's guest as she left, and as Marion sat there she knew that she no longer existed for Darnley. He remained for more than an hour, but his questions were all about Joanna. Thereafter the phone rang more frequently than ever and Joanna, gave her time to the young doctor almost exclusively. Mrs. Huron approved of the match. The family doctor said the boy had a future, and Marion brooded in secret. One morning when Mrs. Huron having spent long hours ironing Joanna's clothes, felt ill, Marion begged Joanna to stay with their mother because she didn't have to get in to work until later. Joanna curtly refused to get out of bed, having danced until almost morning. It was only when she learned that Dr. Darnley was coming that Joanna told Marion she could go. But Marion's employer eyed her severely, looked at his watch and told her he couldn't afford to keep on workers who didn't get in on time. When Marion came home she found Darnley speaking to Joanna, who phoned her office, explained she wasn't well, and was told to stay in bed and take care of herself. Joanna sneered at Marion for being fired just because she was late and left the straightening of the house to Marion while she went out with the Doctor.

However, Joanna soon found herself tiring of one man and whenever Darnley called Joanna was out. Soon, miserable, he stopped altogether ,and Marion, aching to see him endured her mother's speculations about why he no longer called Joanna. Then, one night distressed by Joanna's elopement with a gambler, Mrs. Huron had another attack and was taken for an operation. Frantically Marion tried to get Joanna to see her mother, but Joanna wired she was on her honeymoon. Dr. Darnley went deadly white when he learned of Joanna's marriage and he and Marion clung together for mutual comfort. Joanna discovered her marriage was a mistake and returned only to find her hister being quietly married to Darnley at her mother's bedside.

VALLEY WOMAN

Mrs. Hazel Dalton Drama File No. 9622

WHEN Christopher Garland died and left his wife and eighteen year old daughter, Rosamund, nothing but the small farm and shabby cottage that had been in the Garland family for three generations, Mrs. Garland despaired of ever managing to eke out an existence. But manage in some way they did, and when Richard Lake, Mrs. Garland's orphaned nephew, came to live with them, he hit upon the plan of taking in boarders, for the house was located in a region where many people came to recover their health.

At first the sign "Boarders" did not attract anyone, but one evening a young man stepped into the Garland living room, and explaining that he was a chemist with a renowned medical institute, and had come to this state for a much-needed vacation, asked for a room. Happy at this stroke of good fortune, and touched by Jack Foster's weary expression, Rose hastened to give the first boarder the best room in the house. The days that followed were happy ones for the three young people, for Jack anxious to regain his strength, insisted on helping Dick and Rose with the daily tasks, and soon he formed a fast friendship with Dick, and a growing affection for Rosamund, that deepened into love. With joy, Rose noticed that Jack was surely winning his way back to his former good health, but that when letters arrived from home, his good spirits dropped from him, and again was reflected in his features that great weariness that had first moved Rose to pity.

The arrival one day of an attractive young woman who asked for a room, and then cried out with delight at the sight of Jack, spoiled Rose's happiness of the past weeks, for Dorine Shefford appeared to be a very intimate friend of Jack, and immediately monopolized all his attention. Although aware that Dick was strongly attracted to her, Dorine, sensing Jack's love for Rose, ignored Dick, and maliciously planned to poison Rose's mind against Jack. Winning Rose's confidence Dorine, invited her to go swimming in a lake a few miles from the Garland home. There, with seeming innocence, Dorine spoke of her father, head of the medical institute, and then mentioned that she was engaged to Jack. Angered at the calm with which Rose received this news, Dorine swam alone out into the lake, and observing with horror that Rose was about to dive into a shallow portion of the lake, began to call out a warning, but her hatred silenced her. Her head severely bruised, Rose was brought home unconscious, and when, upon recovering, she heard Jack say that such a blow often caused a loss of memory, she feigned such a state, in order to test the strength of Jack's love. Pretending not to know him, she mocked every affectionate word he spoke, until, seeing him busily engaged in conversation with Dorine, and hearing him tell her with real happiness in his voice that he would leave with her for the medical institute the next day, Rose was convinced that Jack's protestations were false, and that it was Dorine for whom he really cared. When Dorine and Jack left in the morning, two people were heart-broken—Rose, because she had lost her sweetheart, Dick because he had lost Dorine. Three days later, they returned with Dr. Shefford, and then Rose learnt that Jack had brought him only to cure Rose, for Dorine, stung with remorse, had so planned it with Jack. Confessing her deception, Rose went once again to Jack's arms, and Dick, seeing that Dorine was about to tell of her part in the accident, which he had suspected, silenced her with a kiss.

WANTED—DEATH

William Di Nardo Drama File No. 9875

WATCH out!" Jim's agonized cry is too late to warn the girl in the canoe and the next instant his motor boat crashes into her frail craft. Diving into the water, Jim pulls up the lovely girl and several minutes later her lustrous eyes open. As they sit together Jim feels he has known her forever. He tells her he had lost his parents recently in a fire and his grief had been so terrible that his doctor had advised him to take a vacation to save his mind. Joan is sympathetic and in the days that follow at the summer hotel, Jim falls more deeply in love. One night he loses his head as her soft lips yield to his, and hours later, smoothing her hair, he softly says, "We can be married tomorrow." Joan turns her head away. "I am married," she says. Stunned, Jim listens to her story of a marriage to a wealthy man years older than she, and as the whole bright dream he has built crashes about him, he goes away in bitterness.

Alone, forlorn, Jim contemplates suicide but when he learns that volunteer workers are wanted who will risk their lives for science, he accepts. In the tropics, Jim allows deadly flies to bite him, suffers intensely from the fevers they induce, but pulls through—a hero. When war breaks out he enlists and his daring makes the bravest shudder, but his life is spared and he returns to the United States where on a visit to the hotel where he first met her, Jim meets Joan again. She struggles against her emotions and begs him to go, and when a boy, tall and well built comes up telling her, "Father wants you," Jim realizes in a flash that Bill is his own son.

Dully Jim goes back to New York and one night on a dark street a detective is shot by fleeing bandits. The next morning Jim enrolls as a rookie detective but the years bring him fame as the most courageous flatfoot of all, and the underworld seems to fear him so greatly they dare not harm him. One night a girl Jim has once met, Dolores, is found dead and Jim takes the case. He follows clues which lead him to the home of one Joe Stulz, powerful racketeer. Joe claims he never even heard of the girl, but Jim shadows the house and one night is amazed to see his own son enter. Startled he investigates further and learns that Bill is in love with Judy, Joe's daughter, and is daring her father's wrath. Jim offers to help the youngsters, suspecting Joe's claim that Judy is his daughter. In the police files which he painstakingly probes Jim finds Judy's true origin—she is the kidnapped daughter of a millionaire who had, years ago, antagonized the gangster. The youngsters are grateful to the detective for freeing the girl from Joe's sinister clutches but Joe whips out his gun and shoots Jim who twists his wrist so that Joe's second bullet enters his own body. Dying Joe confesses to the murder of Dolores. Jim recovers and is invited to the marriage of Bill and Judy. There he again meets Joan, widowed now, and as he takes her hand, she smiles mistily. This time she promises to marry him.

WATERFRONT GIRL

Millicent Kochenderfer Drama File No. 9768

SLOWLY Doris threaded her way down the squalid streets that led to the waterfront boarding house her mother kept. As she climbed the front stairs, Doris winced under the prolonged stare of a man who was talking to her mother. "This is Joe Conn," her mother said. Later, when he had gone, Mrs. Wilson pulled Doris to her. "You've been crying again," she guessed. Doris shook her head but gradually her mother drew from her the story of how the other girls at school sneered at her for coming from the waterfront. "How would you like to go away from here, Doris?" "You mean. . . . " Smoothing the lovely hair Mrs. Wilson nodded. "I have money for you. You can go to the city, get a position." But you, aren't you coming too?" Doris protested for a long time, then as Joe Conn appeared in the door, a feeling of terror made Doris consent to go away alone with the assurance that she would send for her mother as soon as she had enough money.

In the city Doris got a position in the law firm of Davis and Lind. The elder Lind found her a capable and intelligent worker and when he retired. shortly after Doris arrived, she found herself faced with the prospect of looking for another position. It was then that John Lind, the Junior member of the firm asked if she wanted to work as his private secretary. Happily Doris consented and when she brought her mother her salary she was shocked to see how ill she looked. Mrs. Wilson waved aside her daughter's demand that she come to live in the city, and Doris, going, found her way blocked by the leering Joe Conn. Wildly she struck at him as he tried to kiss her and she hurried away.

A few weeks later, John Lind asked Doris if she wouldn't come with him on a week-end party. He had promised some friends he would go, but there was certain work that he had to do. Doris consented, and in John's roadster, with the wind blowing her hair, she sighed happily. The party was like a dream and once, under the moon, John caught Doris to him and with a swift intake of his breath asked her to marry him. "But," Doris protested, "You don't know anything about me." "I know that I love you. That's all that matters." Everyone congratulated them when John told them of their coming marriage.

It was when John, rapidly rising as a lawyer, was running for the position of District Attorney that the blow fell. A caller was announced and as Doris descended the stairs, her hands flew helplessly to her throat at sight of Joe Conn. Grinning he asked what her husband would do if he knew her mother was a dope addict, but when he told his price for his silence, Doris slapped him for the second time. Trembling at his threats she waited for John to come home and told him of her early life at the waterfront. Expecting John to turn upon her, she was touched when he drew her into his arms and told her that made no difference. In her mother's boarding house, Doris found Mrs. Wilson lying ill from drugs. John and she brought her to a hospital. It was too late to save her but with the information she gave John, he was able to imprison Joe Conn who had made an addict of her. John's efforts to avenge Mrs. Wilson's death broke up a sinister dope ring and the publicity, instead of ruining him, clinched his election. His arms crept about his little wife and their lips met.

TROUBLED WATERS

Thomas Pellegrino Drama File No. 9876

HELPLESSLY the little yacht strove against against the high waves and battering winds and at last pitched down into the ocean, shivering as her boards cracked up. Captain James McLeon saw each of the little boats flounder and as his ship sank under him he struck out, his arms flailing the troubled waters. For hours he swam and now there was no sign of any of the other passengers. Wearily he made out a ship in the distance and as his strokes narrowed the distanee between, he felt his strength fail. A shout aboard the ship told him he had been sighted, but ere he could make it, he failed. Down he went and as he lost consciousness strong arms pulled him aboard.

When James opened his eyes he was lying upon a hard cot. Minutes later a brutal man in Captain's uniform entered and grunted approval of James' physique. "Where . . . " began James and a fierce blow on the side of his ear emphasized the shouted, "Shut up and strip." James raised himself from the floor teeth set. Another blow took him off guard and sick, he complied with the Captain's orders. Given a small knife and sea goggles, he was ordered to bring up oysters from the sea bed. Three times James came up empty handed his ear drums splitting from the great depth, but inexorably he was ordered back to the deep. In the weary days that followed, James learned that he was working for the notorious Captain Flint who, hated along the coast, was forced to recruit his helpers from the ships which were wrecked on a rock whose buoy he removed. White men aboard the hell ship hated the Captain, but broken in spirit by their slavery, they dared not offer resistance. Nights, wearied, James planned his escape but the brutal Captain seemed indefatigable. Once James saw the Captain choke to death a man who tried to escape. During a great storm the ship hovered about the submerged rock. James writhed but the Captain's black helpers watched, guns in hand for signs of insurrection and when a ship struck, they cried out in joy. The poor devils would be better off drowned James thought as the more powerful swimmers were hauled aboard as he had been to work as pearl divers. A gasp went through the ship, however, when a girl was pulled out of the deep. At the Captain's command the prisoners were forced back in the brig where they were kept whenever the ship neared land to replenish supplies and sell the store of pearls, and the girl was put away separately to await the return of the Captain from a shore trip. The mighty fist of the slave keeper knocked out man after man who offered resistance, and one jaw was broken for a man who dared to try to slip toward the girl's part of the ship. James waited in the cell whose bars he had sawed earlier, and jumping upon the black who guarded him, James took his guns and made his way to the girl's cell. Telling her he was her friend, James gave her the gun to guard herself against the Captain and outlined his plans for escape. Eagerly she promised to do as he asked. Freeing those of the white slaves whom he could trust, James put them in the sentinel posts occupied by the Captain's men and in the girl's room, James waited for the scoundrel who, inflamed with drink, stumbled in and seized the shuddering Marion. Then James rushed forward and in a terrific battle knocked out the slave driver, manned the ship with the freed whites and drove his cargo into port. The Captain was turned over to justice, the pearl divers freed, and James kissed the future Mrs. McLeon.

CASE HISTORY

Maurice E. Whitney Drama File No. 9829

ALTHOUGH all the women at the literary tea held in a large mid-western city lionized Stephen Walter, the author of a popular first novel, he had eyes for Sue Brander only. Despite the fact that the sponsor of the tea was careful to tell him that Sue's brother was serving a sentence in the state prison, Stephen begged her to let him call on her. The days that followed strengthened their friendship, and Sue, feeling that Stephen's brilliant conversational powers might help to cheer her brother, asked him to go with her to see Martin. A first visit led to another, and soon Stephen, fascinated by the wealth of unusual material to be found in the prison, formed the habit of dropping in to talk with the prisoners, in an attempt to find the true cause for their bitterness towards society. But feeling that he was not getting the inside story, Stephen decided to invoke the punishment of the law, and then write a realistic and forthright account of his discoveries. Besides the desire to get facts that would make a vivid novel, Stephen was motivated by his need for money, if he wished to asked Sue, who had been regarding him as a friend, to marry him.

First telling Sue of his scheme, which she judged a bit too drastic, Stephen assaulted an officer without provocation, and was sentenced to ninety days in the house of correction. There he saw in its starkness, the prisoners' attitupde towards the outside world, but he still felt that he was not finding out the basic cause of the feeling. Moved strangely by his interest which had grown enormously Stephen stole an automobile, was caught, and sentenced for three years to the state penitentiary, under an assumed name. At first hoping for parole, when he found that he could not publish his story while in the institution for fear of being recognized, he decided to participate in a plan to escape, lead by Frankie Ponds, a dope peddler. With the other prisoners he was concealed in large boxes of shoes made at the prison, and driven out on the state trucks. A flat tire which necessitated unloading the heavy packing cases, brought to light the human freight, and with the other plotters. Stephen was given an additional six months. During this time, Martin Brander, released, had returned to Sue, and begged her to leave with him for San Francisco, and start life anew, wiping out all traces of his former existence.

Serving his last months, Stephen for the first time, began to show the effects of his association with criminals, and when, upon his release, he found Sue had disappeared and his funds had been exhausted, his moral standards were considerably weakened. It was in this state of mind that Frankie ran across him, and seizing his advantage induced Stephen into making easy money by peddling dope. From the position of peddler, Stephen, unable to market his novel, sank to the use of dope, and when Frankie refused to furnish him with a sufficient quantity, murdered him in a fit of insane rage. Caught by the police, his case was given great publicity, and Sue, reading the story, asked her lawyer friend, Wayne Hammond to take the case. Through his love for Sue, and his interest in the case, Wayne Hammond defended Stephen on the grounds of insanity, and succeeded in having him committed to a state asylum. When Wayne learned that a man whom Stephen had met in the correction house was furnishing him with dope, Wayne helped Stephen escape from the asylum, and placed him in a private sanitarium, in the hopes of curing him. But Stephen had fallen too low in the social school, and as they stood at the bedside of the dying man a few weeks later, Sue and Wayne knew that they were witnessing one of the saddest of tragedies—the downfall of a brilliant mind.

FROM OLD PASSIONS

Dorothy Harlowe Drama File No. 9824

ON a visit to New Orleans with a fraternity brother, young Glenn Lovering meets Marie Jeanne, recently returned from a French convent. Attracted to her flower-like freshness he marries her and after several months of happiness wearies, and returns to New York. Months later he receives a telegram from Mrs. de Guerre, Jean's mother, laying at his door the death of his wife in childbirth. Glenn's contrition is short-lived. His second wife is an English girl—a grand pal. Should have been a man or a saint he is not sure which. Then he fancies a gypsy girl during the war. His third wife is Ann, artistic temperament and the voice of an angel. Enraptured he finishes accompanying her upon the piano, only to wince as she asks for a divorce, saying she knows all about the Follies girl. One brief outburst of temper suffices for the Follies girl as she learns he is to marry Claire, a wealthy divorcee.

Claire is dressing in her room when Glenn exclaims loudly over the telegram be has just received from Marie Jeanne Lovering, daughter of his first wife who writes that her grandmother is financially embarrassed and she wonders if she might stay with him until she gets a job. Claire angrily asserts she didn't know Glenn had a daughter, and Glenn stretching himself admiringly before a full length mirror retorts that he had forgotten until this moment. When Claire sarcastically suggests that she is not a chaperone, Glenn decides to visit Marie in New Orleans.

In the stately de Guerre mansion an auction sale is in progress and when Marie Jeanne suggests that they call upon her father for aid, Mrs. de Guerre indignantly refuses. At the auction, Glenn buys up almost everything and Marie Jeanne flies into his arms. Her grandmother is distantly gracious and is finally persuaded to accept some recompense for having brought up his child—especially since it will make Marie Jeanne happy. However, when Glenn returns to New York he finds his brokers frantic. His stocks have been sold out and he is penniless. Despairing, Glenn sells his ponies and yachts and is ironically faced with the necessity of having to work since he has undertaken to support Marie and her grandmother. Claire hastily removes herself procuring a divorce from her impoverished husband. However, Jonathan and Jonathan, a shady stock brokerage, learning of Glenn's misfortune offer him a goodly profit if he will lend his name to their activities. Glenn, thinking of Marie Jeanne, accepts, "just for the present" and buying back his ponies and yachts, returns to New Orleans where he brings his daughter out in a burst of glory. Marie Jeanne idolizes her sophisticated father and he finds pleasure in teaching her to ride, to fence, and to distinguish between her suitors. Eliminating one Spaniard as being too soft, Glenn approves of Garrett Bonnycastle, a stalwart young American lawyer, and in Marie Jeanne's shining eyes finds his daughter of the same mind. However, he soon learns that Garrett is a member of the law firm making trouble for Jonathan and Jonathan, and Glenn tries to hurry the marriage. At a great party upon Glenn's yacht, Garrett proposes to the happy Marie Jeanne, but upon landing he is summoned to New York and given his great opportunity in the prosecuting of the bucket shop. Dismayed he learns that Lovering is prominent in the firm and is torn between conflicting emotions. However, Glenn learns the game is up. His confederates urge him to flee with them but Glenn blows out his brains. Marie Jeanne is consoled by her grandmother, and Garrett comes back despite Marie Jeanne's returned ring, to tell her that he loves her and still wants to place upon her finger the narrow gold band he has bought .

LOVE BRANDED

Patritia Ylad Drama File No. 9723

UPON Yancy, her lovely young daughter, Martha Vance lavished all the affection that had been crushed in her by her stern puritanical husband. At school, listening to other classmates discuss the coming "Prom," Yancy's rebellion against her father's prohibitions was whipped to fury, and when her mother discovered Yancy's unhappiness, she was determined to risk her husband's wrath and prepare her daughter for her first dance. In the excitement of buying a lovely frock and accessories, the need of an escort was entirely overlooked, and as the two conspirators exchanged chagrined glances across the table, the doorbell rang. It was Joel Sanborn, a senior at the Academy, asking if he might have some water for his car. Laughing together over their flippant conversation, Joel finally set off for home, calling over his shoulder, "I'll see you tonight at the prom, won't I?" Hastily Mrs. Vance explained that Yancy wasn't going, because she didn't decide until the last moment, and she hadn't invited an escort. When Joel enthusiastically asked for that privilege, Yancy embarrassed, accepted. The night was perfect and the forerunner of many similar meetings. Denied the companionship of boys all her life, Yancy gave her love to Joel, and one beautiful summer night, with another couple in the back seat, they drove into the country. Losing all sense of time they found themselves near the lake where Joel's parents had a summer home, and when the others insisted on stopping for a bite, Yancy reluctantly yielded. Taunted with being a poor sport, Yancy took a cocktail, and as their party became gayer, hours passed. Suddenly Yancy roused herself, looked about the room and with a cry of terror drew her dress about her, and dousing Joel with water, cried hysterically at the realization of what had happened. Sobered, Joel promised they would get married and nobody would be the wiser, but with dawn coming up he drove like a madman. Too late they heard the train whistle.

Days later, Yancy awoke to pain-wracked consciousness, the only survivor of the crash. Only the prominence of the families involved hushed the scandal, but Yancy's father denounced the girl, and shortly after, when her mother died as a direct result and Yancy was disowned, the girl found that she was soon to be a mother. Working until the last possible moment. Yancy bore a child which lived only an hour, and with what was left of her mother's inheritance, took passage for the States, in the hope that she might efface the terrible past.

As a student nurse at a hospital, Yancy found herself singled for the attentions of Dr. Thornton, a promising young obstetrician, and she realized that the heart she thought bruised beyond repair was beginning to mend. When one day, however, she learned Thornton's intolerance of loose women, a chill gripped her, and without explanation she left the hospital and several months later, after concentrated search, Thornton found her working for a dentist. Drawing her into his arms, Thornton told Yancy how he loved her, and in the shelter of his embrace, Yancy promised to marry him.

Not until Yancy discovered she was to have a child, and her husband discovered the unmistakable evidence of a previous maternity, was Yancy's secret revealed. Cold to her explanations, Thornton withdrew his love and Yancy was forced to leave. Nursing his bitterness at his betrayal, Thornton was touched one day by the tears of his son who missed a mother's care. Only then did he begin his search for Yancy, and with the plea that her son needed her, induced her to return, the past, at last effaced.

THE THIRTEENTH CHILD

Willie C. Gillespie Drama File No. 9879

UNABLE to play modern music on the victrola, to go to parties or invite friends home, pretty Billie Boyd, rebels against the stern dictates of her autocratic mother. Even her father, a preacher, tries to sympathize with the girl but he is afraid of his wife's acid tongue. Her mother's warnings that a girl who works is bound to get in trouble, still ringing in her ears, Billie gets a position in a department store and one day, knocking over a box, blushes as a handsome man restores it to her counter. Attracted, Jimmie Blake buys things he doesn't need so that she can wait on him and at closing time, when Billie comes out dismayed by the rain, he is at the exit, asking if he may take her home in her car. Billie hesitates, but fearful of spoiling the one outfit she has, consents and is soon laughing merrily at Jimmie's witticisms. Jimmie is a frequent caller thereafter, taking her to lunch and waiting for her outside, but when he asks why she never invites him home, Billie explains shamefacedly that her mother doesn't approve of dates. Jimmie is certain he can win her people over, but when he comes, Mrs. Boyd slams the door in his face and tells him he can't ruin her daughter. Billie is aghast at her mother's rudeness but Jimmie tells her he understands. Then, one day, he asks her to marry him, explaining that he is Jewish. To Billie the difference in faith is of no consequence but when she asks him if his people would approve of her, Jimmie is certain once they meet her they would have no further objections. Jimmie has written his people that he is bringing the girl he loves home, but when Mrs. Boyd sees Billie dressed in a borrowed wrap, she suspects that her daughter is going to a party and her fury drives her mad. Taking down the strap she has not used since Billie was a child she beats her until the girl falls sobbing to the floor. When Jimmie comes he finds Billie running frantically from her home and distressed by her pitiable condition, he begs her to marry him so that she will be free of her mother. Through tears Billie sees Jimmie slip a ring over her finger and hears the words that make her his wife.

Mrs. Boyd, however, calls Jimmie's people and rants so that they in turn disapprove of his marriage and order him to get an annulment or face disinheritance. Jimmie cuts himself off from his family and comes home discouraged to Billie. He counts their meager funds, and goes to New York where he has been offered a position by a fraternity brother. Promising to send for Billie in a week or so, he leaves her enough money to manage since he hasn't enough for both fares.

Mrs. Boyd, angered by Billie's refusal to return home, and having intercepted Jimmie's cheerful letter sending money for Billie to join him, has her committed to a convent where the girls are kept like prisoners. In despair, Billie believes that Jimmie has deserted her, and when Jimmie, worried by Billie's failure to respond to his letters, returns, he can find no trace of his wife.

At the convent, Billie endures agonies, and one day falls ill from overwork and malnutrition. The doctor sympathizing with her plight learns her story and helps her escape. At his home he asks Billie to marry him but Billie tells him she still loves her husband, and Doctor Jerry finally helps her get into the nurse's training. Radiant the day she graduates, Billie is congratulated by Jerry, and she gives a faint cry as she sees—Jimmie, whom the unselfish Jerry has brought back to her. Minutes later Jerry says, "Come on you two. There'll be lots of time for that. Dinner is waiting." And the three link arms.

THE LOST TRAIL

Cleo Myers Western File No. 9902

WHEN Eastern life palls on the wealthy young Bob Tracy, he stakes his money on a cowboy outfit and a little broncho and sets out for the adventurous West. Whistling as he blazes new trails, Bob inquires his way at a trading post and is advised to follow the stage coach which has set off several hours earlier. Suddenly, as he rounds a clump of bushes he is aroused by the sound of shooting far in the distance and whipping out his guns he rides full speed to see the stage coach being held up. His shots frighten off the bandits but one of them tries to carry off one of the lovely young passengers of the coach and Bob, following, wounds the bandit who, with a muffled curse drops the girl and rides into the woods. Bob comes to the rescue of the girl, stunned by her fall, and as she opens her eyes she thanks him for saving her. Bob rides into town guarding the coach and as the girl gets out she learns that he has no particular destination and asks if he'd like a job on her father's ranch.

Mr. Morgan, Barbara's father is impressed with his daughter's story and thanking Bob for saving the girl from Nat Taylor, the notorious bandit on whose head there is a considerable reward, gives the lad employment as a cowboy.

Soon after Bob's arrival, however, cattle start disappearing from the Morgan ranch. Suspicious eyes are cast in Bob's direction, and he determines to clear up the mystery and absolve himself. Barbara assures her father that he is wrong in suspecting Bob and several days later, while she is riding in the woods her horse sprains its ankle and Barbara narrowly escapes being thrown into a gully. Dazed, she tried to pick her way home but losing her sense of direction she is appalled by the realization that she is lost. It is Bob, at length who finds her and as she smiles remarking how he always seems to turn up when she needs him most he tells her he loves her and their lips meet in their first kiss. Happily they return to the ranch but a grim-visaged cowhand awaits Bob and tells him Mr. Morgan is waiting for him. Unsuspecting, Bob goes and finds Mr. Morgan and his men looking grave as they accuse him of being responsible for the theft of the Circle R cattle. Bob tries to defend himself but they seize him, show him the evidence they have found incriminating him, and throwing a rope about his neck, lead him off to hang. Just as they are about to string him up the cook rides up excitedly telling them that Barbara has been kidnapped. Morgan is stunned and he orders his men to search for Barbara saying they can attend to Bob later. Bob pleads with Morgan to let him find Barbara, and after several moments the broken hearted father permits they boy to go.

Driven by desperation, Bob tracks down Nat Taylor in his lair, discovers the Circle R cattle ready to be rebranded and finds the outlaw forcing his attentions upon the struggling Barbara. A desperate battle ensues, and Bob overpowers the outlaw who had sworn to get him for depriving him of Barbara the day of the stage coach holdup. Bob refuses the reward on the head of Nat Taylor, but finds his happiness with Barbara.

WITHOUT HATE

Alyce Ehlert Drama File No. 9877

"BACK in Norfolk," Dennis Kelley began. "Norfolk? I didn't know you came from Norfolk." Dennis crimsoned and as Marion began to ask him about his people whom he had never mentioned to her, Dennis hastily drew out a locket for her and Marion forgot her questions as she thanked him happily for the pictures of him and her facing each other. "Dennis," she cried, "you're so good to me." Trustingly she gave him her lips.

Months later, in desperation, Marion went to Norfolk to try to find Dennis and explain her desperate situation to him. Surely he would help her if he knew. But in Norfolk people looked questioningly at the haggard girl and informed her there were no Kelleys in Norfolk. There, among strangers Marion's baby was born, and thanking them for their help, Marion insisted on going on, away from the city to which she had pinned her hope of finding Dennis. As she neared the railroad she slipped. Her baby, wrapped in its blanket, rolled down the embankment and Marion was found by a conductor who searched the unconscious girl for signs of identification then frightened by her ghastly appearance, carried her aboard the train, then pulling out, and brought her to a hospital. For weeks Marion was delirious and the hospital officials after making vain inquiries after the Dennis Kelley for whom she called, managed at last to bring her back to health. Marion's first thought was for her child but no trace of the baby could be found. Grieving, Marion took a position at Norfolk, hoping some day she could see her little one again.

At the library where Marion worked, her loveliness attracted attention and once Leon Rourke, son of a large plantation-owner saw her. Again and again he came back bringing Marion little gifts and once she consented to come home with him to meet his mother. At the Rourke home one day, Leon's mother misplaced her glasses, but when Marion scarching for them looked at the mantle, her heart seemed to stop still. There was a framed picture of Dennis Kelley! Dazed, Marion asked whose picture it was and the gentle old lady told her it was her son Dennis. After a quarrel with his family he had run away from home, changed his name, and the last she had heard from him was that he had died overseas fighting for his country. Shocked, Marion made an excuse to leave and brooded over the knowledge that Leon, whom she had learned to love was the brother of the man who betrayed her. Thereafter she avoided Leon and refused to explain to the bewildered boy why she never wanted to see him again.

However, one day visiting the negro huts on his plantation, Leon was startled to see a baby, unmistakably white. He made inquiries and learned that one of the negro boys had found the baby in an embankment and thinking it had been abandoned had brought it home for Mammy Roberts to raise. Shocked Leon told them they should have reported the child to the police, but when he saw the locket found with the child and in it pictures of his scapegrace brother Dennis and the girl he loved, he ran to Marion. It was Leon who brought Marion's child back to her, and as he asked her to marry him he reminded her that her child would have its right name—Rourke, and Leon's lips found Marion's.

HIS tight-lipped spinster aunts scoff at Eric Morgan's attempt at authorship when they come upon their nephew scribbling in some lonely corner of their cheerless New England home. Contemptuous sniffs meet his few shy attempts to elicit some information about his father who Eric knows became estranged from his dead mother soon after his own birth. Introspective and moody by nature and discouraged by the lack of sympathy he leaves a note for the aunts and runs away to New York to find Allen Morgan who has always been held up to him as the cause of his gentle mother's ruined life. Eric, however, is certain that his father will greet him as a son and since Allen Morgan is a prominent banker a search of the telephone directory reveals his residence. A perturbed and agitated Allen Morgan enters the library to interview a very serious youth who has announced himself to the butler as a New England relative. Mr. Morgan flushes, unaccountably as the boy introduces himself as his son, but at the conclusion of the tale he draws the boy to him and promises him a home with him. Allen Morgan has remarried and has a family of three daughters. With Janet, the oldest of the three, he forms a deep friendship and from her gets the first understanding he has ever known. Though the family accepts him into their midst and Allen Morgan is planning to take him into the business with him, Eric feels that there is a wall between them, such as is unnatural between father and son. Walking past the library one afternoon, he hears through the open door Janet telling her father how unfair it is to force Eric who has genius as a playwright, into the bank with him. The unexpected frenzy of Mr. Morgan's reply as he mumbled something to the effect that he should have known his experiment would prove a failure since lazy blood came naturally to Eric, caused Eric to walk determinedly in upon the scene and demand an explanation from Mr. Morgan. Confronted by Eric Mr. Morgan tried to put the matter off but the boy's insistence that the truth was due him finally made him yield and sending Janet from the room, he told Eric that he was not really his son. At the time he had begun paying court to Marcia Evans, Eric's mother, Allen Morgan took her one night to a theatrical performance given by a traveling company in their small New England town. Marcia's beauty as she eagerly followed the movements of the actors from her seat in the front row enraptured a youthful actor who had a small role in the show. Somehow they had met and fallen in love with each other but their plans for an elopement had been thwarted by Marcia's sisters who, unaware that they were already married in all but name, had seen to it that the young actor would never appear in their house again. Allen Morgan had renewed his suit then and when she burst into tears at his proposal and confessed what she had been afraid to tell her sisters, that she was bearing another man's child, though stunned, he had begged her to marry him notwithstanding and give his name to her child. However he had made her life miserable with his taunting after the child was born until finally she had divorced him. Now he had hoped that Eric would take the place of the son he had never had. Eric is however determined to make his way as a playwright and if possible to discover his real father.

The story which Eric weaves about the romance of his mother and father was accepted by one of the leading movie producers and Eric seated with the producer and director is watching try-outs for the part of the aged lover who is eventually reunited with his youthful sweetheart. As the woman whom Eric has called Moryia tells the lover how her sisters kept her locked in her room so that she could not meet him and how she had listened on the stairs as their bitter words had sent him from her forever. Victor Ladin, who is trying out for the part, gently draws the weeping woman to him and murmurs gently, "Don't cry, Marcia. It will all come out right, dear." But at the sound of the name Marcia, Eric jumps up upsetting the chair. An instinctive, "Father!" escapes his lips. And as the son reveals himself to his own father who had never known of his birth a happy reunion is affected which is made even brighter by the father's prompt acceptance of Jane, whom his son was now free to love as a wife rather than as a sister, as his future daughter-in-law.

BIG LEAGUE

Louis Matscher Drama File No. 9660

AS Long John, as the rookie pitcher of the Stars was called, walked off the ball field, the crowd roared their approval of his playing. But Ted, the enthusiastic catcher, knew that the team that worked with John felt nothing but dislike for their silent team mate, who never smiled and never discussed the game. More than once, Cohnen, the manager, tried to get past John's reserve but he was always met with a cold politeness that plainly said, "Keep out." It was only Ted, strangely enough, the youngster and most cheerful member of the nine who felt that John's reserve was not snobbishness or conceit.

Hating to leave John alone in their hotel rooms, Ted, nevertheless went off to Betty Lewis' home, where to his dismay he found his two rivals, Dick and Frank ahead of him, already persuading Betty to come to a show, and knowing Ted was broke, they maliciously insisted that he go along too. Embarassed, Ted tried to urge them to walk, telling them of the amazing benefits of fresh air. His plan proved a failure, and just as the trio was about to leave him behind, two gunmen crawled into the open window and held up the party. The younger of the two, discovering Ted had absolutely no money, grinningly announced it to his chief, to the agonized consternation of Ted, but when the chief insisted on leaving a dollar for him, Ted walked off triumphantly with Betty.

Meanwhile, in his rooms, John was being lectured by Cohnen, who informed him that they had a good chance of playing for the pennant, but that if John persisted in maintaining his aloofness it would not help the morale of the team. John kept silent, and true to Cohnen's fears the team lost the first few games. Ted, knowing that if John gave the team more co-operation, the playing would pick up, finally pleaded with him so effectively that John at last revealed to him the reason for his mechanical playing.

Two years before as a little known baseball player in a town popular for its summer resorts, he had met and loved a girl, and their romance flowered. John played more brilliantly than he had ever played, and the girl very much in love, consented to marry him. When her parents found out, they were indignant, for since their only son had run away from home to join a baseball team, they hated anyone connected with the sport. Without giving the youngsters a chance to see each other again, they immediately left the hotel with their daughter, and John, heart-broken, found he was unable to reach his sweetheart in any way. Leaving his home he obtained a job with a small league, and his precise playing won the attention of Cohnen, who finally bought him for the Stars.

As John finished his story, Ted who had almost interrupted him when he had spoken of the girl's brother who was a baseball player, grasped his hand, and with sincerity in his voice, urged him to forget things that once had been, and give all he could to the team. Won by Ted's unmistakable earnestness, John promised, and his encouraging words and brilliant playing won the pennant for the team.

After the game, Ted, entering John's room quietly with Betty, jubilantly introduced her as his fiancee, and then leaving, said, "There's some one to see you." Wth a glad cry of recognition the once dignified John rushed to the pretty girl smiling at him from the doorway, and said, "Charlotte!" And that evening at the party that celebrated the Stars' victory and Ted's engagement, John learned that Ted was Charlotte's brother. And when he had heard John's story he had realized John must have been the boy whom his sister had never forgotten.

FEIN-TUNG SPECIAL

Felix Barton Drama File No. 9542

REELING from his ricksha Richard Ponsford shook his muddled head in a vain effort to clear it, and then with a hopeless shrug entered the most disreputable of the palaces of joy, the Jade Lantern. Inside he almost came to blows with a husky sailor but as the seaman discovered a beautiful woman sitting alone in a corner, the quarrel abruptly ended. Richard downed glass after glass of the fiery liquid until a faint cry made him turn and with a blow of his fist, he knocked the belligerent sailor from the woman's side. It was only after he had sat down heavily, at the woman's invitation, that he realized she obviously did not belong. Unaccountably he found himself confessing to her that he was likely any moment to be dragged off to jail for the theft of 7000 pounds from the bank in which he worked. Her story was stranger. She was a Russian Countess, Paula, who for years had been trailing the man who had killed her father and mother at the time of the Russian revolution, in order to gain possession of her family jewels. Richard started as she explained the man she sought was Serge Vassilov, for it was he who had forced Richard to steal the money to pay a gambling debt. That Richard had been cheated Paula was certain, having found other victims in her trail of the man she had sworn to avenge herself upon. Before Richard left Paula, he had promised her to forego thoughts of suicide, of drinking himself into apathy, or of fleeing with the entire Chinese police at his heels. Paula promised to aid him. The next night Paula dined at Richard's home and as Richard looked across the rose-decorated table into her dark eyes, he despaired because soon he would be snatched from her and lodged in a Chinese jail. Richard's Chinese cook Sui Lei shuffled hopelessly from the room bewildered by his master's refusal of an Angel Kiss cocktail and Paula laughingly helped prepare coffee when Sui Lei, taking his master's advice too lierally because "velly velly ill" from too many Angel Kisses. On Paula's certainty that somehow she would manage to get the necessary money back from Vassilov, Richard remained at the bank, saw the attache depart with the sealed canvas bag supposedly containing 20,000 pounds, and board the Fein-Tung Special. Beads of perspiration stood out on Richard's brow. At Fein-Tung the shortage would be discovered!

However, Paula, unprepared for the precipitate departure of Vassilov on the Fein-Tung Special feared her quarry was eluding her, and decided to follow. Vassilov, attracted to the beautiful woman stopped beside her, puzzled over the conviction that he had seen her before, but she convinced him they met on the Continent. Vassilov tried to induce the Countess to join him in Paris, and as she concealed her loathing with difficulty, Paula saw him cast aside a Chinese woman. Hours later the Chinese girl pleaded with Paula not to be misled by Vassilov who had deceived her, and Paula smiled grimly. Just before the train pulled into Fein-Tung, it jarred to a halt. Three armed men entered, Vassilov whipped out a gun and seized the bag containing the money, coolly shooting down the messenger. Suddenly the Chinese girl buried her stilletto in Vassilov's back. As he fell the torch he was holding ignited the canvas bag, and when the excitement was quelled, the bank money was in cinders. The Chinese girl was hailed as a heroine for the murder. Vassilov's ill-gotten gains were appropriated to replace the money, and Richard, whose defection was undetected, asked his Paula to marry him and come with him to San Francisco where he had been offered a managership. Sui Lei grinned broadly as Paula and Richard shared an Angel Kiss and their lips met in a long kiss.

THE BROKEN POSE

Elma Rivoli Drama File No. 9645

OVER the telephone came Dick's excited voice. "I'm coming right over. It's terribly important." Ethel flushed as her aunt came down the steps and making no apologies for having listened in on the extension wire said, "Maybe he wants to ask you to marry him." But when Dick arrived it was to tell Ethel that he had won a scholarship at a South American Engineering School. "Only three years." he was saying. Ethel didn't cry even when the train steamed out of the station and Dick called, "I'll write."

Things happened in the three years. Ethel's aunt invested in stocks and only after the crash did she shamefacedly reveal that the money Ethel's mother had left was gone too. "I thought I could help you," she had said, and Ethel waved away her apologies. All that last day, though, working in the Mayor's office, Ethel's thoughts were of Dick who was finally coming back. His letters told of his successes and Ethel could hardly wait to see whether he had changed. When she arrived home, Aunt Grace shook her head. He hadn't called. "Did you know," she said, "that Mrs. Robinson has a house guest over." It was Eleanor that Dick had to take to the dance, but Paul Smith congratulated himself upon having the honor of escorting Ethel. As he helped her into his roadster he told her grandly there was only one place he'd rather take her than to this party and that was to the altar. Ethel tweaked his ear as she said, "How many girls has that speech reached?" Paul grinned. "You know I love you best." Then softly, "You'd better be on your guard against a certain sloe-eyed Southerner, my cards tell me. When they entered the clubhouse, Ethel saw Dick. In an instant he was at her side and Ethel realized he hadn't changed, but when he introduced her to Eleanor, his mother's guest, Ethel felt a premonitory chill at the cold eyes. Thereafter Eleanor managed to monopolize Dick for all but one dance and it was in the garden while she was waiting for Paul to return with an ice that Ethel heard Eleanor inform Dick that her father had fixed it so he could get an Engineering contract in her town. Before she ran away, Ethel caught Eleanor's purring assurance that Dick would do better down South than he could here where there were only small town advantages and small town women.

Ethel saw Dick at parties but always Eleanor interposed herself between and Dick explained that he was going South in a few weeks. It was only too obvious that Dick was infatuated with the Southern girl and when one night some of the crowd mentioned what a shame it was that Dick couldn't see through her, Ethel excused herself and dashed off. Once coming out of the Mayor's office, Ethel heard a familiar voice call and Dick, saying he hadn't seen her for an age asked her to come to dinner, but Eleanor coming behind them reminded Dick he had promised to dine with the Pearsons and Ethel hurried off, managing to say, "See you Wednesday," as if the effort wasn't almost too great.

On the yacht, Eleanor monopolized Dick who was kept running for things for her. But when, to avoid the storm, they had to take refuge on an island, Eleanor's attitude made all but the infatuated Dick squirm. At length she went too far. Refusing to pitch in at all, she resented Dick's criticism and losing her temper called him small town. Later, when the yacht was bringing them back, a humble Dick asked Ethel to forgive him for being a fool, and as she lifted shining eyes to his, he told her he didn't have a job—but they could manage.

BALTAZAR

John Puttere Drama File No. 9729

WAR time Paris, saddened and grief-stricken, longed for another taste of gaiety, and hoping to make her people forget for awhile their sorrows, planned a masked ball, to be held at the wonderful palace of Clavardeau, several miles from the city limits. Delighted with the idea, Phyllis Montrose, a young English girl, working for a modiste, planned to go as Olympia, beautiful queen of the fabulous Northern City. In another part of Paris, Frederic Tremont, an industrious American artist, decided to masquerade as King Baltazar of the Walled City. Arriving at the ball, the two people met and were instantly attracted toward each other. Sitting at Phyllis' side, he whispered in her shell-like ear, "Lovely Olympia, somewhere we knew each other!" Phyllis, amazed, answered, "Oh, Baltazar, I too feel that long ago, we were—" Her last words were interrupted by a terrific crash, caused by an air raid, and struck by the falling beams of the ceiling, Phyllis and Frederic slumped in their chairs, drifting off into the limits of the unconsicous.

Before the birth of Christ, there ruled in the Walled City, King Baham, whose wife's brother Julius, plotted to rule the kingdom. When Prince Baltazar was born, Julius' crafty accomplice, Hassam, kidnapped the babe, and then poisoned the King who had gone out in the wilderness beyond the city walls to search for his son. Julius, still unsatisfied for his sister had been declared ruler, enticed her to come to his castle alone, and imprisoned her in his underground chamber, thus leaving him as King of the city.

Meanwhile, Baltazar, with his faithful servant had been left to die in the depths of the trackless wilderness. But the servant, finding some wild fruits, kept the baby alive, and the Prince grew to manhood in his rude hovel on the edge of a broad river, unable to find the way out of the wasteland. The day his servant told him that he was the Prince of the Walled City, Baltazar, fishing on the river picked up a floating jug, and breaking it open, discovered within a picture of a beautiful woman, with a note saying that she, Olympia, queen of the Northern City, had been abducted by her uncle's henchmen, who were holding her captive on the river's bank. Determined to rescue her, Baltazar searched the banks for Olympia, until, coming to a cave, he overpowered her captors and returned with Olympia to fetch his servant. The three set out for the great road that led out of the wilderness, for Olympia knew its location. Reaching the road they went first to the Northern City, and Baltazar trapping the king, through strategy, placed Olympia back on the throne, and then went on to his kingdom, where he found the people hating their ruler. The servant knowing Hassam was the tool of Julius, showed him to Baltazar, and when the Prince demanded to see his mother, Hassam trapped him in the basement with the queen. Seeing his master did not return and fearing for his safety, the servant, hurried to Olympia, begging her to save Baltazar. Deeply grateful to him, Olympia, with her devoted followers killed Julius, and Baltazar, was restored to the throne with Olympia ruling at his side.

And as the two masqueraders were dragged back from the depths of unconsciousness, their hands met, and Frederic completed Phyllis' last words, saying, "Once we were lovers."

THE HEART OF LOVE

Agnes Cord Drama File No. 8293

MEETING Bertha Graham on the boat to New York, John Daley falls in love with her and begs her to consider his proposal after he returns from Cuba. Not in love with him and knowing that her mother objects to her marriage with this middle-aged man, Bertha refuses; but when he threatens to commit suicide, accepts him on condition that nothing be said of their relationship while her mother lives. However, finding the letter signed "your husband" which he has sent her, Mrs. Graham, broken-hearted, takes Bertha and her sisters back to Florida out of his reach where she may make a happier match. Discovering that John, having learned of their whereabouts, is planning to take Bertha away, Mrs. Graham, fearing for the welfare of her two younger daughters, dies after a lingering illness. After they have hastily departed, Bertha tries in vain to find work to increase their funds; and is happy when John arrives, having been telegraphed by the younger sister.

Taking an apartment in New York, he refuses to allow her sisters to live with them, or to give them any financial assistance; and Bertha braves his beatings and other abuses in giving them secret aid. Having obtained positions for them several weeks later, in Florida, through a friend of her mother's, and realizing from his nightly absences and constant quarrelling that he doesn't love her, Bertha promises to follow them there after she has saved some money. Lonely for his child, John pleads with her to return home, and promises to turn over a new leaf; and Bertha, to escape work with a too familiar employer and the advances of the young boarding-house man, Julian Gerald, consents. However, several weeks later, believing his uncle's tale of her infidelity with Julian, with whom he had often seen her there, John angrily casts her from the house after taking the children from her. Returning to give her her clothes, John finds Julian bidding her good-bye after she has refused to go with him; after a quarrel, Julian explains his wife's faithfulness and John weeps his apology. After berating his uncle and aunt for lying to him,—since they had always envied him his children, and had invented this use to obtain them,—John returns to Florida with Bertha, more in love with her than ever. Assisted by Bertha in their store, the business and his profits soon grow to large proportions; and while the parents work, the growing family of children are well-clothed, fed, and sent to the finest schools. When her oldest son suddenly returns home married to a girl beneath him in refinement and education, and brusquely demands his portion of the fortune; when her daughter elopes with a worthless salesman; and when her husband dies of a sudden fall, Bertha still keeps her head up. Returning to New York to live with her oldest daughter, she at last finds her consolation in the affection of her grandchildren; and as she remains at home to care for the children when the others have gone to the theater, she remembers the ever-loving John and smiles happily.

QUICK MONEY

Harold S. Barnum Comedy Drama File No. 9819

TWO tramps slip out of a railroad yard and escape down the road while the infuriated conductor shouts imprecations after them. In the woods, Barney and Jerry throw themselves down under a tree and as they share the scraps they have accumulated, Barney tells of his life before he ran away from home. Jerry listens with an air of disbelief and proceeds to fall asleep but jumps up as Barney dreamily says, "You know, Jerry, I'm going to try the Orient." "Not me," vehemently returns Jerry. "This life is good enough for me." A few days later the two adventurers part.

Jerry is leaning against a tree holding his empty stomach when the wind wraps a newspaper about his face. Too lazy to throw the paper away, Jerry idly starts reading until he jumps up with a start at the advertisement asking for the whereabouts of one Bernard Stevens whose fortune, recently left him by his uncle, will go to charity unless he can be found. An idea comes to him. He knows everything about Barney's life. Why couldn't he impersonate his friend! He looks up the lawyer's office and with his knowledge of Barney's life which he recites glibly, he convinces the attorneys that he is the man for whom they are searching. With some misgivings they turn over the fortune to him and Jerry blinks as he sees the staff of servants waiting his commands. However, from the first Jerry finds himself tyrannized by his valet who distresses him with the necessity of having to bathe twice a day. Jerry soon finds that he has to go to dances and dinners, and starved, he has to listen to long speeches before he can eat. Then he meets Myrna and one evening at a dance when he has succeeded in shocking all the prim ladies present, he is in the garden, succumbing to Myrna's allurements, when he is informed that a tramp, professing to be Bernard Stevens has just been thrown out. Jerry, hesitates, then runs outside and finds Barney nursing a black eye and a sprained back. Gently he brings him in and when he confesses that Barney is the real Bernard Stevens and he an imposter, Jerry is put in jail for fraud. However, Barney bails Jerry out and invites his former pal to live with his as a glorified secretary. Now Barney starts enjoying his wealth and the fickle Myrna turns her blandishments upon him—since he is the one who has the money. Barney and Jerry quarrel when the latter tries to prevent his wealthy friend from making a fool of himself over Myrna, but when she elopes with a titled foreigner, Barney apologizes to his pal. The pair are having a glorious time playing poker one Sunday when a scandalized dowager turns up her nose, and when they find they cannot walk around in old clothes or fall asleep during operas, the two adventurers begin to get uneasy. Within a month the call of the road is too strong for them. Barney turns his money over to charity and that night they take the first freight out of town saying, "It's too much like hard work to live in luxury."

LUCKY POOR DEVIL

Loyd Lawrence Drama File No. 9770

IN the hope of buying a titled husband for their seventeen year old daughter, Mary, the newly rich Westfords take a trip to the continent. In France they "shop" for a chateau and at Deauville they hear some wealthy people discussing the fact that poor Jacques is looking for a tenant. Bursting with enthusiasm they visit the chateau and completely won over by the suave nobleman set their cap for him. Jacques is open to their offers and when Mrs. Westford titteringly asks if the Count will be their guest at their house-warming, she is overcome with joy at his acceptance. For days Mary is driven to distraction by the excitement of her parents and their advice about how to win Jacques. The Westfords spare no expense and the night of the sumptuous ball hire a troupe of entertainers.

Mary, bored by the Count's amorous advances wanders away from the party into the garden and in the moonlight she sees an American smoking a pipe. After the babble of foreign tongues she is grateful for the opportunity of hearing her own language and the two strike up an interesting conversation. Mary learns that Charles is one of the entertainers. He picks up odd jobs on the continent to defray his expenses and over their common interest in music, their interest grows. However, Jacques, missing Mary has inquired of her whereabouts from Mrs. Westford who, overwhelmed at finding her daughter with one of the hired entertainers, calls her husband. Ire aroused, the millionaire orders Charles from the place and with a shrug of his shoulders at their insults, Charles goes.

Mary is furious with her parents for their rudeness despite all they and the Count can do, she refuses to marry Jacques. At the end of the summer, after a quarrel with her parents about Jacques, Mary seizes the next boat for home, and Jacques follows on the same ship. Her parents sit back smugly certain that the Count will win their daughter on the ship, but aboard the Francia, having volunteered to sing at the ship's concert, Mary meets Charles again, working his way back on the boat. At first cool to her, Charles soon realizes she was not responsible for his humiliation and before the boat pulls into New York, the two have confessed their love and have been married by the ship's captain. They plan to take a plane and fly west to the ranch that Charles has been telling Mary about, but meanwhile Jacques has cabled to the Westfords and when the ship docks the young bridegroom is arrested and Jacques tries to hold Mary so that her parents can have her marriage annulled since she is still under age. Mary struggles against the Count's kisses and finally eludes him while Charles is released from prison since there is no genuine charge on which to hold him. Not realizing that he is under constant surveillance, Charles cannot understand why Mary does not communicate with him and at last he plans, disillusioned, to take the plane west alone. Grimly he seats himself at the controls and as the plane soars in the air a noise behind him makes him turn. "Mary!" he cries, and above the hum of the motor she shouts that her parents would have broken off their marriage if they had found her. In a few days she will be of age, and now no one can interfere with their happiness. The plane speeds through the night carrying two lovers to happiness.

SINNERS MAY LOVE

Mary Modlesky Drama File No. 9450

WHEN Connie Marvin, nineteen, and very lovely, met Bob Channing at a dance, she knew there would never be any one else she could care for. She did not know anything about Bob's life—that he was the son of Mrs. Latimer, who had remarried shortly after her husband died a few months after Bob was born, and that he had a half-brother, Ted Latimer, only two years younger than himself. Bob, young and arrogant, and flattered by Connie's evident devotion, was her constant companion for several months, without telling her of his wealth and social position. Consequently when Connie told him in a frightened voice, that she was about to become the mother of his child, he was afraid he would have to marry this girl, who was only a dressmaker, and he rushed home and poured out his confession to Mrs. Latimer and Ted. Determined that her son's social standing and future should not be ruined by a marriage which was beneath him, Mrs. Latimer planned to offer the girl a comfortable sum of money supposedly to tide her over until the baby was born. But first Bob was to tell her that he would marry her; then, she would surely accept the money, and once she had taken it, the law ruled that she could not sue Bob to make him marry her. Ted thought the plan despicable, but he was only nineteen, and unable to prevent it from being carried through. Connie, not realizing the deception, took the money and then learnt too late that Bob's promise was false. Her heart filled with hatred for him, she decided to live her life alone, and when her son was born, she wrote a short note to Bob, telling him that the baby was dead. Right after this, Bob and Mrs. Latimer moved to the state capital, and in a few months Bob was married to one of the city's prominent society girls, Marion Hazlitt. Their marriage was short-lived for three years later the two young people were killed in an automobile accident. Broken up over the loss of her first son, Mrs. Latimer confided to Ted her plan to search out Connie and atone for her part in spoiling the girl's life. The search proved fruitless, for Connie had seemingly left town, with no trace of her whereabouts revealed. In the meanwhile, Connie, changing her name, had come to the state capital, and seeing an ad for a home dressmaker, had applied and been accepted by Mrs. Latimer, who had never seen the girl. Because of the difference in names, Connie never realized that she was Bob's mother, and a great friendship sprang up between the two women. Ted, too, felt a great affection for Connie, and especially for the little son whom she often brought to the house, as Mrs. Latimer had frequently expressed her sorrow over the fact that her great home was never filled with the laughter of a little child. Although she felt she could never love and trust a man again, Connie knew that she was falling in love with Ted, and he with her. When he finally asked her to marry him, she refused without telling him her reason, for she could not bring herself to tell him of her secret. The next day, Mrs. Latimer noticing the girl's sorrowful expression, asked her gently what was the matter. Moved by the older woman's sympathy, Connie told he the whole stoy, and of Ted's proposal. Stung with remorse, and feeling that she could at last redeem herself, Mrs. Latimer revealed who she was, and forgiven by Connie she was able to bless the two lovers and wish them all the happiness in the world.

MONKEY BUSINESS

James Bonomelle Comedy File No. 9749

AS the noise of the battle dies away, from out of the ruins of the French village, crawl three little boys, with their dog Sockino, the whole party pitifully bedraggled looking. Simultaneously sighing with disgust, Joe, Pete and Fattie realize that with the first sound of the bombardment, the entire village, whose main industry was a sausage factory, has fled for their lives, and they are the sole survivors. But they find they are mistaken, for from out of the debris, a shiny black head appears, and next to it a furry one. With a shout of glee the boys recognize their old friend, a little darky boy called Doc, and an impish monkey, which they immediately christen Peanuter. Viewing with amazement the little gun the animal is carrying, they follow its beckoning paw to the sausage factory, and laugh at the funny antics of their furry guide as it jumps from pile to pile of the deserted sausages. But they begin to understand what Peanuter is driving at when he takes a few of the bullet-like sausages, puts them in his gun, and starts firing the steaming hot missiles at the four boys. Fat the first to be hit, seems struck with both a sausage and an idea, and when the friends finally beg the monkey to stop, Fat reveals his plan to carry the sausages beyond the German lines in the dead of the night and substitute the sausages for the ammunition. The monkey, wisely listening to the scheme, begins to clap his toy drum in approval, and that night the four pals, with the monk whom they have humorously dubbed the one man army, creep unobserved behind the lines, and load the ammunition caches with the frankfurters.

The next morning, holding the French line all to themselves the boys begin a furious attack on the enemy with their krauts. The answering barrage from the Germans covers the quartet with the steaming krauts, and they beat a hasty retreat, leaving the French army to fight out the rest of the battle. The French are naturally the victors, but are slightly annoyed because the krauts stream all over their uniforms.

Feeling they have done their part in winning the war, the four boys return to the village, but the monkey seems dissatisfied with their accomplishment, and running over to the tubs of krauts that are still left, he starts tugging on the handle. This time it is Pete, who, seeing the monkey beckoning toward the deserted battlefield, gets a brilliant idea. With the others he drags the tubs over to the field, places them in the shell holes, and when the Germans, seeing there is some sign of activity in the village, start running toward the ruins, they fall into the tubs.

Scampering to safety the boys decide to do something even more glorious for the sake of France. Hearing that the leader of the German army is stationed nearby, they sneak into the town used as headquarters, and when Sockino hangs stubbornly onto the trousers of the guard in front of the leader's dugout, they crawl into the room, while the monkey fires his little gun at the soldier. Howling with pain, the leader begs them to stop, and with the boiling krauts running down his arms, signs the peace treaty.

And that evening the allied army give a dinner for the boys, with the monkey as guest of honor, and the main dish as krauts!

VOICE IN THE STORM

Vinera Barbera Drama File No. 9724

RAIN fell in torrents. Haggard and sheet white, the young man urged the doctor through the storm. "You've got to help her," he cried. The doctor entered the house on the hill. Hours later he came out of the room to find the young man praying in the flickering light of the fire. "Doctor. . . . " The doctor shook his head. "I'm sorry I did all I could. She was too weak. But the baby will live." The young man mumbled again and again, "Linda gone." Dully he pushed the small bundle from him. "I want my Linda," he moaned.

Ten years passed. John Colt sat staring into the flickering flames. "Daddy," the little girl tugged at his hand as she tried to cajole him into playing with her. She wrinkled her little forehead as she tried to find an explanation for her father's indifference to her. It was the housekeeper who explained to her that it was she who caused her mother's death. Little Linda could not understand but she knew deep down that she had committed some enormity. Alone she walked out to the rocks overlooking the sea. For hours she played at games with an imaginary playmate. She tried to confide her loneliness to a Daddy who miraculously sympathized, but at length hot tears darted to her eves and she fell asleep. In her dreams her Daddy pushed her from a great height and screaming she awoke to find that she had fallen from the rocks. Her screams brought the housekeeper. "My leg, my leg," she moaned. They didn't conceal from her the fact that from now on she would walk with a limp.

Ten years passed. The wealth that her father had made in the years when he had buried himself in business to allay his grief had increased, but all that it had meant to Linda was books. It was her twentieth birthday but her father was grieving over the anniversary of his wife's death. She thought there was hate in his eyes as she limped by. As she opened the door the rain swept through chilling her, but Linda was going out where rain would not matter. Limping through the darkness she hurried to the river. No one would care when she was gone. It would be better. Her breath caught as her leg throbbed and she leaned against a huge oak to steady herself. In a flash of lightning she saw a shack and instinctively she stopped for shelter. Within two men were planning a robbery. Linda forgot pain, suicide, everything as she heard them say that the old man had been half-batty for years grieving for his dead wife. All they had to do would be hit him over the head and get the money. They didn't have to worry about the girl, she was crippled and was never near her father anyway.

Wildly Linda hurried through the storm but again and again she felt to the ground, and when she had dragged her painful way it was too late. John Colt was calmly informing the man with the gun that he never kept his money at home. As the man raised his gun threateningly, Linda flung herself in the way and sank dully to the floor as the bullet found its mark.

When Linda opened her eyes, her father was bending over her together with a young doctor. "Linda!" There were tears in her father's eyes as he held the child who had taken the bullet meant for him. Happier than she had ever been before, Linda's eyes shone as the young doctor said, "And the leg can be cured good as new." It was her father who softly explained that the doctor had not left her side since she was brought into the hospital. Linda knew she was going to be very happy.

THE LAST PARADE

Harry H. Wilson Drama File No. 9570

WHEN young Don Manning's father died in 1916, leaving him a tremendous fortune and estate, Don became Edward City's most influential and popular citizen, and on the evening that he was elected mayor, he announced his engagement to Marion Moore, a favorite debutante. Two weeks before the wedding, America entered the war, and Don, although knowing it meant giving up his sweetheart and his cherished office, was fired with zealous patriotism, and joined the Marine Corps. With the ring of his townspeople's good wishes still echoing in his ears, he reached the training camp in Virginia. Forming a fast friendship with David Westfield, an ex-convict who had enlisted hoping to start a new life, the two became inseparable despite the difference in their positions, and went overseas in the same regiment. At first there was little war activity, and Don often spoke to David, who had once been an engineer, of the mighty river that flowed over the Manning estate. Hardly had he disclosed to Don his plan to harness the river, supplying Edward City with the power that was being furnished by a private corporation, when intense war service began. There followed months of heavy combat, from which the two comrades escaped miraculously, both commended for their bravery.

Engaged in an especially severe battle, two days before Armistice, Don, returning to the trenches, finding David in grave danger, saved him from the enemy, but was himself struck by shrapnel. Recovering consciousness Armistice day, Don learnt that because of a hurried operation his face was terribly disfigured, while David was unharmed Months later, the two returned to New York, with Jane Andrews, the nurse who had cared for Don, whom he had engaged to help him permanently. Don, under observation by plastic surgery specialists, remained in New York, while David going on to Edward City, met Tom Laramie, the trusted foreman of Mr. Manning, and his daughter Joan, who helped him negotiate with the town for the building of the power plant. Seeing in David's project an opportunity to produce their own power, the council agreed to operate the plant. Grateful to Don, Edward City nominated him mayor, unaware of his disfigurement. When they saw Don election eve, they were so repulsed by his face, that the election showed the opposing candidate the winner. Stung by this heartlessness, and the fact that Marion, upon seeing him, had broken the engagement, Don swore revenge. With David and Tom Laramie he arranged to finance the plant on his own estate, and employ all jobless war veterans, leaving the city to obtain power at the exorbitant rates of the private corporation.

Meanwhile, Jane, who had learned to love her patient, begged him not to carry through his scheme, but he, filled with hatred, collected his building materials, and advertised for unemployed soldiers, until the council, frantic at the realization that they were losing money daily, begged Don to allow municipal operation of the plant. When Don refused, Jane, feeling that Don's character was becoming as marred as his face, confessed her love for him, imploring him not to impoverish the town. Moved by his new found love and Jane's greatness of spirit, Don allowed the town to have part interest in the plant, providing they gave employment to war veterans only. And when, two months later, his face greatly improved by a skillful operation, Don saw David, with Joan at his side, lay the cornerstone for the factory, and heard the cheers of his fellow soldiers who had at last found work, Don turned toward Jane, knowing his happiness was all before him.

HIGH POWER

Charles M. Angel Drama File No. 9717

IMPATIENTLY, Tom Harris, Secret Service Agent stands before the Chief who has sent for him and demands to know why he isn't able to communicate with his brother Paul. The Chief eyes his cigar for a moment before leaning forward and explaining that Paul is not working to uncover diamond smugglers as everybody supposes, but is in San Francisco solving a dope mystery. Silently the Chief extends to Tom his brother's latest communication telling that his three co-workers have been murdered. Paul knew that the three-fingered Dennetti was the leader's right hand man but he was unable thus far to identify the master mind. With misgivings Tom sets out to help his brother.

He takes a plane most of the way and buys a car for the rest of the trip lest his coming arouse notice. In a storm, Tom curses as his car stalls ten miles out of Los Angeles and as he tinkers with his engine a black sedan whizzes by. Tom crouches lest this be an advance delegation to welcome him, and twenty feet on, a body is hurled from the car. Tom, galvanized, shoots after the murder car and a cry tells him one bullet has found a mark. As he turns the ride victim over, he cries out in recognition of his brother who mumbles, Dennetti," and "Look after Mary Westcott and tell her I died loving her." Grief-stricken Tom brings his brother's body to the police and gets grim satisfaction from the subsequent report that the man he hit has been found dead along the same road. Tom also learns that Mary Westcott has come to pay her respects to Paul. He visits her under the name of Frank Deval, friend of Paul and finds her loveliness breath-taking. Mary tells him that Alex Burton her friend had left with Paul about eleven o'clock. They had been set upon by armed men. Burton was hound and gagged and Paul driven for his fatal ride. Burton arriving tells the same story, and Tom leaves, only to be stopped by the butler, and, as a friend of Paul's receives the confidence that Mary has changed lately, she loses her temper when the butler is late with a cigarette and is frantic when Alex's visits are not regular. Thoughtfully, Tom goes to headquarters and there discovers that a cigarette he has taken from Mary is doped. Taking a motorcycle from headquarters and giving instructions that the police are to follow if he does not return, Tom speeds to Mary's house and is met by the anxious butler who tells him he has been trying to communicate with him. Mary had gone with Burton, but the butler had seen her vacillate between eagerness and hesitation and is convinced she went not of her own accord. Tom sets out at ninety miles an hour and inquiring directions from those that have seen the car pass, arrives finally at a barn. He finds parcels of the doped cigarettes and frees Mary from her bonds. From her he learns that while abroad her brother had written of his friend Alex Burton, and when the boy died suddenly, Mary returned to find Alex a sympathetic friend. Too late she realized that the cigarettes he gave her were doped. Tom strangles Dennetti whom Burton has sent for Mary, and breaking in on Burton who is himself going for her, commands, "Hands up!" One of the gangsters kicks the kerosene lamp, Tom shoots three of the desperadoes and falls, wounded. Mary kills the escaping Burton and fainting rushes into the burning shack to pull out Tom. The police arrive to marvel and aid, and withdraw as Tom's lips find Mary's.

BRIGHT STAR

Elizabeth Ballard Drama File No. 9365

AT a farewell party in honor of her departure to star in a Hollywood production, Reba Newson laughingly acknowledges his request and introduces the girl who has just finished singing for them to Jack Lawrence, sponsor of a leading radio program. Jack flushes as he realizes that Ann Lewis is the affianced bride of Reba's brother, Jimmy, but offers to feature this girl who has attracted him, upon his program. He uses his influence at the radio station to have Jimmy, an announcer at the same station, fired. Despite Ann's tearful pleading that they can still be married and live on her salary, Jimmy stubbornly refuses to be supported by his wife and though the date for the wedding is set, he leaves town. Heart-broken when she does not hear from Jimmy, she continues with her work and though warned by her Uncle Henry with whom she makes her home not to enter into a loveless marriage, she accepts Jack Lawrence's proposal. Glancing casually through the newspaper Ann sits up suddenly as she reads of Reba Newson's home-coming a few days previously and immediately goes to see her. Reba does not notice Ann's fear as to what her welcome will be and gives her a warm kiss of greeting. Then drawing her to the couch beside her she asks her to hurry and explain the frantic letter she has had from Jimmy some time ago in which he raved wildly about going away. When she realizes that Reba knows nothing of the events of the past few months, Ann tearfully tells her of Jimmy's running away and of her subsequent marriage. After her convulsive sobs have quieted somewhat she leaves for home in the roadster which Jack has given her as a wedding gift. Filled with thoughts of Jimmy she does not see the car approaching in the opposite direction and even as she swerves the wheel there is a blinding crash and her machine is overturned. During the weeks which follow in which Ann stoically learns that she has lost the use of her legs, Reba is a constant visitor. She notes Jack's altered manner towards her as he pretends to like wheeling her about and knows that a new love is kindling. Jack reluctantly pushes aside her offer of freedom but when Ann goes ahead with plans for a European trip with Uncle Henry to consult a famous specialist there, they both know that it is the end of their life together. All her old love surges within her again when Reba, while pushing Ann's chair in the garden tells her that Jimmy's letter explaining everything has been forwarded to her.

Ann tries to control her tears as she asks Reba to remember her to Jimmy who is working in a nearby state when next she writes to him. Reba smiles as Ann begs her to forgive her for the mess she has made of all their lives by rushing into marriage with Jack.

As Uncle Henry pushes her chair along the wharf to the gangplank of the steamer which is to take them abroad, Ann, hoping against hope that Reba has written Jimmy of her departure, scans the faces of the crowds which line the pier, for Jimmy. She forces a smile as she turns to speak to Uncle Henry and meets the shy grin of Jimmy. Contentedly she nestles in the rugs of the chair as Jimmy, straightening up happily and leaving explanations of how Reba's letter informed him that Ann was going to be free for a later time, wheeled Ann abroad the ship to make their trip for health and happiness together.

THIEF OF LOVE

Helene Berger Drama File No. 9754

LAUGHING excitedly as Monty Blair helps her out of the plane in which he has taken her for her first ride, Both suddenly trembles as his arm tightens about her and he tells her he is in love. In a very low voice, Beth tells him about Harry Reed whose sister Unice had married Beth's brother Bill. Beth had been very young and carried away by Harry's skilled love making, she had lost all faith in men when Harry had proved faithless. Gravely Monty asks for an opportunity to win her love and encouraged by her admission of a great fondness for him, Monty plays the role of the most tender of lovers. Before long, Beth realizes she is really in love but it is not until the day Monty tells her he is being sent to London, immediately, to replace his firm's foreign correspondent, that Monty learns from Beth's lips that she will marry him. His mother heartily approves of Beth and when she folds the girl in her arms, Beth smiles mistily at finding someone to take her own mother's place. However, when Beth announces her engagement at home, she learns that Unice is expecting a visit from her brother, Harry, and she draws in her breath sharply. Monty's last few hours with Beth are marred by his jealousy of Harry, but Beth assures him again that all her feeling for Harry has long died, and as his lips close over hers, he tells her he will count every moment until he can return to her.

It is Margery Lane, Beth's best friend, who notes how Harry's eyes follow Beth everywhere, and Beth avoids him whenever possible. Beth is turning away from the phone over which she has been discussing Monty's letter asking her to meet him in New York so they can be married and leave immediately on their honeymoon, when Harry enters and seizing Beth in his arms, tells her he loves her. Beth fights furiously against his kisses and when Margery comes in, Harry hastily releases Beth.

At Mrs. Blair's home, Beth is so affected by Mrs. Blair's kindness in offering to go ahead to New York and prepare everything for the wedding, that overwrought, she confesses how upset she is by Harry's advances. Mrs. Blair advises her not to tell Monty who is unreasoning when aroused to jealousy, and she goes on to make all arrangements. At home Harry apologizes for his impulsiveness and Beth believes he is reconciled to her marriage. However, when she gives her brother a letter to mail for her, Bill, in his haste, forgets to stop at the post office and gratefully accepts Harry's offer to post the letters. This and the letters Beth receives from Monty after she has been badly hurt by bumping her head against the dock when Harry hastily tries to bring their canoe in, Harry withholds. It is several days before Beth regains consciousness and when she reads a telegram from Mrs. Blair asking why she made no attempt to answer letters (which none but Harry had seen) Beth suffers a relapse. Margery, learning of Harry's guilt induces him to redeem himself by taking a plane to New York and explaining to Monty. Monty suffers for his lack of faith by the hours he spends at the side of the fever-stricken Beth until she recovers. while Harry finds Margery understanding.

UNEMPLOYED, Billy Chilton. radio enthusiast extraordinary spends all his spare time outside the loud speaker of the drug store near Station K. Y. L. One evening, hands dug disconsolately in his pockets, Billy is absorbed in a program when he sees a man snatch a purse from a girl. In an instant he cuts off the thug's escape and throws the desperado's gun arm up in the air. The shot goes wild, and the police carry off the foiled bandit while Billy returns the purse to the distressed girl who hurries off, giving him her card. Several days later Helen Barclay sees Billy again and greets him asking why he didn't call as she asked and before he can explain that he has recognized her name, she insists that he come home with her. There Billy gets into conversation with her father, owner of K. Y. L. who observes that Billy is without employment and gives him a position at his station.

There is little Billy doesn't know about radio, but his greatest opportunity arises one night when a script is lost and Billy ad libs the announcement to the satisfaction of radio fans and a sponsor. In response to the letters that trickle is, Mr. Barclay gives Billy a chance announcing and singing and soon new sponsors are requesting the Golden Voice. Fan letters are multiplied and through the unprecedented interest, the station begins to prosper. To Billy the most important factor of his success is the unabated interest with which Helen has watched his rise, and her father excitedly plans to open a more powerful broadcasting station with programs nineteen hours out of the twenty-four. Against the advice of his colleagues who remind him that Billy's popularity is the one feature of his station, Mr. Barclay invests his fortune and Billy enthusiastically joins in the venture.

Helen makes a party for Billy and a former school mate, Jean lazily saunters over to ask for an introduction to the new sensation. When she asks him to take her home since her escort has passed out, Helen urges Billy to help the girl. But in the car, Billy is disturbed by Jean's seductions and his claims that he has late programs for a week only cause Jean to insist that he visit her the following Saturday. Jean, triumphantly calls up a circle of thugs and tells them she will have "Golden Voice" drunk and then they can get him, hold him until K. Y. L. goes under, and collect their money from K. Y. L.'s rival broadcasting station for whom Jean is working.

However, Saturday, Billy, having proposed to Helen is so absorbed in Barclay's plans for broadcasting his daughter's wedding ceremony as the opening feature of K. Y. L., that he forgets about Jean who bears with chagrin the jeers of the hired heavies. However, she sends them to waylay Billy outside Helen's apartment, and when he steps into the street, he is felled by a blackjack and carried to a deserted garage where he is kept under surveillance for several weeks. Meanwhile, K. Y. L., frantic over the lateness of Billy communicates with Barclay who in turn sends for the police. Newspaper headlines shriek Billy's disappearance, and soon the sponsors drop their plans. Programs fall off. Without Billy, K. Y. L. fails to draw the fans' dials and Barclay anticipates ruin.

Meanwhile Billy chafes against his captivity but until a stolen car is driven into the garage and slashed to keep it from being recognizable, Billy is helpless. With the car and a length of wire, he sets up an amateur telegraph outfit. His tappings are picked up by a local amateur. The police capture Jean and her confederates, and Billy, returned to the air is a greater drawing attraction than ever. From a radio sounds the inaugural program of K. Y. L. broadcasting the wedding ceremony of Helen Barclay and golden voiced, Billy Chilton.

AT eighteen, Corinne Duncan, left an orphan, was brought up by her guardian, Charles Mayo, her father's partner, and Mrs. Dale, a friend of Mrs. Duncan. With a tremendous fortune held in trust for her, Corinne was educated at a fashionable school. introduced to society. and plunged into a continuous whirl of social activities. Despite all her wealth, Corinne, missing hut thing—love. was bored and tried to find some truly worth-while interests. Struggling with her difficult problem one evening. she felt the need for fresh air, and drove, without any destination in mind, into the middle-class residential section of the city, where a poster announcing a play given by a Little Theatre group attracted her attention. More to escape her thoughts than to see the play. Corinne entered the modest theatre where the acting of Hale Evans, a young chemist. was so splendid, that she was moved to go up to him, and congratulate him warmly. Stirred by the girl's beauty and charm, Hale pressed her to see him again, and Corinne, finding in Hale the spirit lacking in her society friends. concealed from him her identity, and continued to see him.

When Charles Mayo suddenly left for Europe on business, and Mrs. Dale was called to the bedside of a dying parent, Corinne seized her chance for happiness, and persuaded Hale to marry her. While Corinne's friends thought her with Mrs. Dale. Corinne was keeping house for her adoring husband. The day that Mr. Mayo returned, Hale was killed in an explosion at his plant, and Corinne, about to become a mother, confessed her ruse to Mayo, who placed the distracted girl in a hospital. Receiving news that the Duncan wealth had suddenly collapsed the mother of little Barbara Evens, bowed down by the double misfortune, had no interest in the child, and when Mrs. Harwood, a prominent society woman from a neighboring state, offered to adopt Barbara, Corinne felt it would be for the child's benefit.

Left without money or friends, Corinne, finding work in a small office met Karl Tauber, a laborer who had always dreamed of having a farm. He convinced the broken woman who had grown too weary to combat life, to marry him, and with her moved to a small farm in the state where the Harwoods lived. Through the years Corinne, who had grown careless and slatternly, watched the life of Babara Harwood, comparing her wealth and comfort with the miserable existence of the two Tauber children. Although Corinne had promised herself never to reveal her identity to Barbara, when Karl died of pneumonia, and life seemed more hopeless than ever. she was tempted to go to Barbara and demand the comfort and security of the Harwood home. The jeers and scorn of the neighbors, who taunted the children for their slovenly appearance, determined Corinne, and dressing the children as well as she could, the pitiful band trudged down the road. Meanwhile Barbara, told by Mrs. Harwood of her mother, had come to search her out, and stopping her car, got out and questioned Corinne. As Corinne looked at the lovely young woman before her, she knew that if she told the truth, Barbara's whole life's happiness would be shattered, and turning wearily toward home, she told the girl that there had never been a Mrs. Hale Evans in that part of the country. But Barbara, who went back discouraged did help her mother, for she gave her the renewed courage to take up her burdens again, and aroused her from the slough of despondency.

MASKS

Flora De Tracy Drama File No. 9738

"YOU certainly are fortunate in having such a fine husband." Ever since he could remember, Delmar Howard had heard the neighbors in the small town in which he lived, say that to his mother. But Delmar and Fern, his sister, knew how false it was, for in the privacy of his own home, Frederick Howard, the genial and courtous owner of the general store, was a veritable tyrant, stingy with money and continually upbraiding his wife for her unattractiveness, which was directly caused by his ill treatment. Since he was but fourteen Delmar could only look on, helpless to lessen his mother's burden, borne so uncomplainingly.

Arriving home from school one afternoon, to beg his mother to let him have a birthday party, Delmar was met with the cold anger of his father ,at what he deemed a useless waste of money. The boy, furious with his father for criticizing in a scornful tone his wife's extravagances, could control himself no longer, and cried out in an accusing voice, "You are the cause of it all!" Turning to the son who had dared to judge him, he ordered him to leave the house. and Delmar despite his mother's pleas, gathered together a small bundle of his possessions, and tore out of the house into the blinding snowstorm that had been raging all day. Friendless, homeless, with only one dollar in his pocket, the poor child drifted out toward the woods where the dog of a colored trapper who lived with his wife several miles from town, found him, and called him to his master's attention. At the home of his benefactor, whom he called Uncle George, Delmar found the first real kindness he had ever known. and when George had nursed him back to health, the boy determined to stay with his friend. All winter long he worked with George, and despite the difference in race, the two men formed a fast friendship, based on mutual consideration. From time to time Delmar would sneak into town, and going to the home of his mother's friend Dolly, would see his mother and Fern, and assure them that he was getting along splendidly.

The next fall. Delmar attended school in the neighboring village and when a group of malicious gossips reported that a white boy was living with colored people, Mr. Howard, not knowing it was his son, was sent to investigate. When Delmar, seeing his advantage, threatened to reveal the reason he had left home, his father was forced to report that Uncle George was a suitable guardian for the boy.

The years passed. Trapping one day alone, after a terrific rain and snow storm, Delmar discovered that the rain had uncovered a rich gold vein. Excited over his good fortune. Delmar appointed George the controller of the claim, until he should come of age. Mr. Howard, hearing of the incident. was furious, but again was powerless to interfere. At last he was being paid back for his cruelty, hut he still refused to accept his son. At twenty-one Delmar met and married the daughter of the village school teacher, and when they had been married two years, they learned that Mr. Howard had lost all his money in an unwise speculation. Feeling that his father had suffered enough, Delmar returned home to find that the once strong and pitiless man was broken and weary. Forgiveness was born in both their hearts, and when Delmar announced that he was putting his father in charge of the gold mine, he was rewarded by his mother's shining eyes, and his father's deep gratitude to the son he had once disowned.

A FORTUNE EARNED

Sally Karos Drama File No. 9915

THROUGH a mist Arlene heard the family lawyer clear his throat and read long pages of legal documents which told that her father's debts had left nothing to her and the twins. "But it can't be true," she cried. The professional voice went on in solemn explanation while outside the merry prattle of the twins Barbara and Bobby sounded. Later, changing Bobby's clothes as he explained that Barbara had squirted the garden hose on him. Arlene prepared to be severe with the babes but at sight of Barbara snoring loudly and she hoped realistically, Arlene threw her arms about them and wondered how in the world she was going to manage.

It hurt Arlene to leave the twins at the nursery but the kind faced woman assured the young girl that the children would be very happy—as long as the payments were kept up, of course. Slowly she walked down the street and straightening her shoulders began a weary hunt for a position. At the library, at the department store, everywhere she went she was turned away because she had no experience and sitting forlornly in the employment agency with the crying need of another installment for the twins, board, Arlene heard a call for a maid. For a moment she hesitated. Then, in desperation she went forward. Mrs. Elliot, sharp faced and thin-lipped looked her over critically, "Humph," she said, "you don't look as if you could do housework." Arlene swallowed hard before she could manage an assurance that she could cook well and didn't mind doing washing. Ordered to sit beside the chauffeur in front, Arlene could feel Mrs. Elliot's eyes boring into her and when the chauffeur's hand rested for a second on her knee, she drew sharply away.

In the Elliot house, Arlene found the work almost unendurable, but for the sake of the twins she kept on. The constant carping and criticism made her despair. Then Gordon, Mrs. Elliot's son came home for a brief visit. "Hello," he cried in surprise, "who the dickens are you?" Arlene trembled at the boyish grin, but before she could answer, Mrs. Elliot ordered her to her room and Gordon was informed in no uncertain tones that he was to keep away from the maid. "Maid!" Gordon exclaimed, "that girl a maid!" Thereafter Mrs. Elliot was more severe than ever and in the girl's room she warned her that at the first sign of misconduct she would be fired—without a reference. Arlene held her temper and aware of Gordon's eyes following her as he sat with his mother, she avoided him. Then, the next day while carrying the wash out to the line, she put it down a moment to stretch her cramped back. "Here, you shouldn't carry that heavy basket," Gordon cried, and before she could stop him he had lifted it himself. Mrs. Elliot's eyes grew red with fury as she saw the girl struggling in her son's embrace and when Arlene, dazed by the realization that she was in love with Gordon, ran into the house, Mrs. Elliot's hand caught her across the cheek. So unexpected was the impact that Arlene hit her head in falling and Gordon, rushing in found her outstretched upon the floor while his mother stood over her mumbling brokenly. Tenderly, Gordon lifted the girl and in a daze his mother called the family doctor. One last time Mrs. Elliot tried to prevent her son from marrying Arlene, but he turned on her and told her he was through. He had tried but he couldn't feel toward her as a son should.

It was Arlene who insisted that Gordon be reconciled to his mother, and when they entered the great mansion they found Mrs. Elliot sitting unhappily in the dark. "Mother," Arlene called softly and her arms went about the forlorn old woman.

Months later, in their summer home, Gordon raced across the lawn to kiss his radiant wife, and Mrs. Elliot softly drew the twins to another part of the garden as she smiled on the two young lovers.

FROM HIDDEN SPRINGS

Mrs. Cecile Horn Drama File No. 9914

TEARS of happiness gleamed in Ellen's eyes as she walked up the aisle to be married to Keith, the handsomest lad in town. In the little cottage that Ellen kept scrupulously clean, Ellen knew such happiness as she had not dreamed of, and when Joan was born to their union and Keith's growing social activities detained him late in town Ellen never thought of questioning. Often over the cold supper that she knew Keith would not come home to, doubts would come to her but she would dismiss them as Keith strode up the walk, patted her shoulder absent-mindedly and lifted little Joan for her big kiss.

It was the night of Joan's birthday. Ellen had prepared a party with all the fixings for the little one and Joan ran to the gate to meet her father who promised to bring candles for the cake. Minutes passed and when at last Joan crept forlornly into the house weeping as though her little heart would break, Ellen comforted her and assured her Daddy would come home with the birthday candles. Hours more passed. Panic stricken Ellen called Keith's business and learned that he had drawn a week's advance salary and said he was leaving on a vacation. Until dawn Ellen stood standing at the window unable to grasp the reality that Keith had deserted her. Weeks later he returned to her, coolly, as though nothing had happened and told her he was in love with another woman and he would give her a settlement if she would give up Joan. Ellen stared at him as though he were mad, then told him she wouldn't accept a dollar from him. The Judge granted Ellen a divorce and when it was proved that Keith was living with one Daisy, a woman of ill character, his plea for the custody of the child was firmly denied.

Although she had never worked in her life before, Ellen bravely set out, found a humble position as a waitress, and supported little Joan through school. Her employer, Robert, admiring the pluck of the little mother often gave Ellen delicacies to bring to Joan, and their friendship grew. Each night Ellen would home home to find Joan practicing piano, but one day she was upset at finding the small apartment dark. For hours she waited, terrified as she was reminded of the night she had waited vainly for Keith and at last she discovered from Joan's teacher that the child's mother and father had called for her. Stunned, Ellen said, "But I am Joan's mother," and the teacher explained that Joan had said, "Daddy," and they had supposed the woman was her mother. Ellen frantically searched for Keith but she could find no trace of him or of Joan. Robert was sympathetic and one day the police of another city called and told her Joan had come to them. Breathlessly the little one explained that her father had lavished clothes and sweets upon her but Daisy had beaten her because Joan wouldn't call her mother and Joan had escaped, although Daisy had promised to whip her to death if she left the house. Ellen held her child close and tears welled in her eyes.

Soon after, Ellen married Robert. Then one day Keith, having spent his last dollar upon Daisy, was badly beaten up by one of her lovers whom Keith tried to prevent Daisy from going with. Broken, unhappy, Keith lost all desire to live. It was Robert who gently advised Joan to comfort her father, and squeezing the hand of Robert who always understood, Joan went. Keith, died happy in the knowledge that Joan was with him to the end and that Ellen had forgiven him, and Joan looking up, tearfully, saw her father's young doctor looking at her sympathetically. Softly he led her from the room and asked if he might take her home.

LITTLE DEVIL

Agnes Harrigan Mueller Drama File No. 9907

BORED with the young men of the social set, Kathleen looked up at an airplane above her summer home. Suddenly the plane began dropping and with a groan and a splintering of wood struck the ground. Kathleen rushed down the porch steps and found the pilot unconscious in the cockpit. Panicky, she bound his head and calling to the groom and chauffeur to carry the unconscious boy into the house, she ran to her yellow roadster and sped to Breezy Point where Dr. Collins was vacationing. The Doctor's face wrinkled in a smile as she excitedly pleaded that he return with her immediately and seizing his medicine bag, he followed.

At her home he examined the boy suggesting that they remove him to the hospital where he could rest from the loss of blood. Hastily Kathleen asked if they couldn't keep him here, they had lots of room and she'd enjoy playing nurse. There was a stir from the patient and as Dr. Collins explained. Leslie grimaced and reported that he'd hurried so to get to the wedding that he hadn't given his brand new plane enough gas. "Your wedding?" Kathleen asked with a swift intake of breath. As he explained that it was the wedding of his cousin Helen and his college roommate, Helen blushed as his eyes held hers. These days when men she knew called her to go to dances and dinners she regretfully informed them she was otherwise engaged and the cook told the chauffeur it seemed as though the mistress were in love. Over the dinner that Kathleen had served in Leslie's room, she asked him if he wouldn't call her Kathleen. Leslie, crimsoning, replied that he, a struggling young aviator dared not become so familiar with so important a young lady who had servants to jump at her bidding. Under her warm reassurances, Leslie started to tell her something, but as she bent forward eagerly, he suddenly broke off, saying he had no right to even think of such things.

A week passed and as Kathleen realized that Leslie had never spoken a word of love to her, she walked unhappily in the garden. For a moment Leslie stood watching her irresolutely then he stammered that he'd be leaving for home tomorrow, she'd been very kind.

Later in a shady corner of the garden Kathleen poured tea for Leslie who in a few moments would walk out of her life. Bravely the two attempted to make conversation and Scotty, Kathleen's pup tried vainly to catch his mistress' attention. It was only when, trying to rub Kathleen's leg Scotty upset the tea table and Leslie found Kathleen in his arms that it all happened. Holding her tightly to him he groaned that he loved her but he had to go away because she was rich and he was so poor. Brushing at tears that would come to her eyes, Kathleen in a quavering voice sent Leslie into the library to get a packet she had prepared for him as a keepsake. When he came out to explain that he couldn't find it she was gone and only a note telling him good-bye was left. Dully Leslie started his plane and flew toward Toronto. At one point he turned back, unable to go on, but remembering his poverty, regained his resolution. It was 4 A. M. when he landed. A voice from the cockpit made him wheel around and to his amazement there was Kathleen, dirt-smudged but smiling. As Leslie lifted her out she explained that now that he had compromised her, and she had wired the press syndicate that she was eloping, he couldn't disgrace Tim O'Neil's daughter by refusing to marry her. "You little devil," murmured Leslie against her hair and Kathleen sighed contentedly.

THE PATH BACK

Mrs. Walter Branch Drama File No. 9580

TENDERLY Clyde kissed his bride as he fastened about her neck the locket containing their pictures, the wedding gift for which she had asked. But the first few months of happiness for the young pair were soon succeeded by times of stress for Clyde's overpowering ambition was for wealth. Soon after the birth of little Gloria, Clyde came home tired and discouraged and announced they were moving to a larger city where there were greater opportunities for a man of his ambition. Uncomplaining, Celia left everything familiar to her and traveled with her husband and baby. In a few months, however, restlessness again seized Clyde. Informing her she was a burden to him he left her the small sum of money he had accumulated and despite all Celia's pleas went on alone to New York. There, on Wall Street, he became one of the army of ticker tape watchers and met Rosalind Staunton, an attractive widow. Frequently Clyde advised her in her investments and soon he was a regular caller at Rosalind's home. Thrown into a new society, flattered for his ability to predict the upward trends of the stock market, Clyde lost his head. He wrote to Celia telling her he found he no longer loved her and asked for a divorce. Dazed by Clyde's inexplicable conduct, Celia did not contest his action and months later, freed, Clyde asked Rosalind to marry him.

Celia struggled along, sewing for neighbors who recognized her extraordinary skill, but at last, unselfishly, realizing that Clyde could do more for little Gloria, Celia sent her child to her former husband so that the girl could enjoy all the benefits of his wealth. Gloria's letters telling how generous her father was became fewer and fewer, and realizing that Clyde had estranged even her child from her. Celia saved what money she could, depriving herself of food, so that she could manage the fare to New York.

Trembling Celia waited outside her husband's home for Gloria, but swathed in furs the girl looked past her mother, unseeing and Celia wandered blindly through the streets until at last she collapsed and was carried to a charity hospital. There her only consolation was sewing and her beautiful handiwork attracted the attention of Violet Raymo, a patroness of the hospital who owned an exclusive dress salon. When Violet learned Celia's story she indignantly took matters into her own hands. Waving aside Celia's objections she had an article printed in the papers telling of the death of Celia, first wife of the millionaire, Clyde Swain.

Meanwhile, Clyde had discovered the emptiness of money. His own fortune, daily increasing had not made him happy. Rosalind, quickly tiring of her husband had turned to a succession of lovers, the last of whom, a gigolo, had shot her for refusing him more money. Remorse gripped Clyde as he read of Celia's supposed death and when his new home was built he had a memorial window put in for Celia.

Traveling to restore Celia to health, Violet read of Gloria's coming marriage and she announced they were leaving immediately for home. In New York Violet solicited Gloria for the work upon her trousseau and as her assistant, Celia, hair prematurely white, came to her daughter's home. When Celia introduced her to Clyde as her new modiste, Celia's heart pounded like a great drum, and Clyde said softly her voice reminded him of his Celia. Finding Celia sympathetic, Clyde poured out to her his repentance for his treatment of his first wife. Everywhere there was the noise and excitement attending Gloria's wedding, and when she left, there was only a great loneliness. To Celia, Clyde turned and when she consented to marry him he asked her what gift she would like. Softly she said, "A locket, with your picture and mine." Dazed at the voice from the past, Clyde cried, "She, she, said that. . . . " As the memorial window was removed, Clyde kissed Celia gently.

DERBY DAY

C. Roy Lush Drama File No. 9859

ACROSS his desk Jim smiled at Lila, secretary to old man Tickett who employed them both at niggardly salaries. At five, Jim waited outside for Lila and as he suggested that for once they go to an expensive place for supper, she shook her head pensively, and said, "Let's not, Jim. We'll need the money." Glumly they went into the small restaurant where each night they dined, and Jim began complaining about skinflint Tickett, about their inability to get married just because they didn't have enough money, and then pulling out a derby ticket exclaimed if he only won they could be happy. However, when Lila scolded him for squandering his money upon derby tickets, they quarreled. Jim left her at her door, and denied his usual good night kiss, scuffled his feet as he slowly walked home, turned out the light, and went to sleep.

The next morning Jim arrived at his office as usual. Lila greeted him coldly and as he bent his head over the ledgers a telegram came for him. To his utter amazement he learned he had won grand prize at the derby. The others crowded about him to congratulate him and when old man Tickett came out to scold his employees for the disturbance, Jim stood up and with a courage born of his new independence told his tight wad employer what he thought of him. Angrier and angrier, Tickett pounded on the desk while the others applauded secretly, but when Lila came out to lunch, she rebuked Jim for his conduct and threw up her hands when she learned that he wanted to get married and have one glorious, extravagant honeymoon. Because Jim refused to spend his fortune investing in a nice solid business they quarreled and Jim went to New York alone.

There followed an orgy of buying clothes, riding in taxis and receiving the homage of waiters and shoeblacks whom he tipped lavishly. At his luxurious hotel Jim looked down at his favorite table and saw a stunning woman sitting there. Apologizing at her error, she was about to go when Jim gallantly offered her his place and then accepted her invitation that he dine opposite her. Jim found Betty visiting New York and at her suggestion, he began to meet people—her friends. A dizzy round of operas, theaters, night clubs followed and always there were Betty's friends around to help Jim enjoy life. Once Betty promised to marry him and thereafter Jim was more generous than ever with his gifts. Then Betty borrowed five thousand dollars to save her stocks. When Jim went to cash a check at the bank, he learned the impossible had happened—he was overdrawn. All the thousands were gone and unless he had five hundred dollars for the bank he would be arrested. Bleakly Jim called Betty, but instead of taking her to the usual expensive places, Jim took her to Coney Island, to show her she could enjoy herself without spending so much. On top of the Ferris Wheel, Jim told her he needed some of the money she had borrowed to save himself from prison. Betty laughed at him for being a fool and suddenly Jim felt himself pushed. Wildly he realized Betty had done it and as he fell—fell—he thought of Lila.

The ringing of the telephone awoke him. Dazed he heard Lila say that she was so upset about their derby ticket quarrel. Of course he had a right to buy a ticket if he wanted. And Jim realizing that his winning had been a dream whispered, "Lila, sweet," into the phone and hung up happily with the prospect of seeing her again across his desk in Tickett's office in the morning.

GROOMS COME HOME

Lambert de Kersting Drama File No. 9755

LEAVING his hotel one sunny morning, Pedro d'Lympas is bemoaning the fact that in order to inherit his late father's wealth, he must, according to the terms of the will, marry Rita Rafael, the daughter of his father's dearest friend. Although liking Rita, Pedro is naturally annoyed at this restriction of his choice for a wife, and, consequently, when he meets Kantika, a mysterious dancer, he becomes infatuated with her beauty and grace, and neglects Rita. Heartbroken Rita volunteers as a war nurse, and Pedro, in the arms of Kantika when war is declared with a neighboring country, forgets his duty as a soldier of his country, and caught by the army police, is sentenced to be shot. Kantika, who is really the sweetheart of the leader of the enemy flying corps, determines to save her lover.

Feeling that if she can only plead with the commander of the military prison, she can free Pedro, Kantika makes every effort to gain admittance to the captain's presence, but since she is suspected of being an enemy of the country, she is kept under close surveillance and only manages to escape from the watchful guards the morning Pedro is to be shot. Desperate, and afraid she will reach the prison too late, Kantika exposes herself to danger, crawling across the battlefield to the prison. Seeing Pedro standing before the squad she rushes toward him, just as enemy planes led by Kantika's sweetheart rain destruction upon the field. Hating this woman who has made him ignore the call to arms, Pedro valiantly rescues his injured companions, but is himmself struck by flying shrapnel.

Rita, who is Pedro's nurse at the hospital, cares for him until he is well, again, sharing his joy at being reinstated in the army for his bravery. Realizing that Rita is the girl he really loves Pedro marries her just before he leaves for the front. On the field he distinguishes himself in the battle of Pomeroon, and the last day of the war, comes home triumphantly to Rita, a hero in the eyes of his wife and his people. Forgotten is the dancer who had caused Rita and himself so much sorrow.

But Kantika, nursing a burning hatred for the man who forgot her and the sweet woman who has taken her place, waits patiently for her revenge. When she learns that Pedro and Rita have started a dancing school, she sees her opportunity, and returning to the city where she has known both happiness and grief, she stays in hiding until she reads an announcement of a recital at Pedro's school. Knowing that in the crowd no one will recognize her, she takes her place in the audience, and bitter with envy, watches Rita dancing with Pedro as she had once danced, winning the applause of all. After the recital, Kantika, slipping into the reception room, shoots Pedro, and has a chance to escape. But paralyzed with horror at the sight of the man she loves lying in a pool of blood, she lingers a moment, and Rita, coming in to find her husband, seizes her, holding her until the police arrive. On the way out to the prison, Kantika's lover who has learned of her plight swoops down upon the party in his plane and rescues his sweetheart, carrying her to the safe limits of his country. And although Pedro and Rita have again suffered at the hand of Kantika, they are only brought closer together by the common bond of devotion, and sacrifice.

DANCE HALL GIRL

Leonora Van Winkle Drama File No. 9753

DANCING her first number in a Canadian cabaret "Miss Texas" as she was known to the inhabitants of the town, who knew nothing about her except that she was beautiful and graceful, slipped back into her dressing room for a moment to read for the tenth time a letter from her dearest friend. "Even if Syd did treat you miserably you should not have run away from California, to find work in a cabaret. Remember there are always other men. . . . " The light over her dresser indicated that it was time for her feature dance, and brushing her piquant nose with a final dab of powder, Miss Texas hurried back to the dance floor. As she went through her routine, she felt the curious stare of a pair of blue eyes fix determinedly upon her, and in spite of herself, was held by their gaze. After the number was over, the stranger invited her over to his table, and before the evening had ended, had wrung from her a promise to take a short trip with him to Seatlte the next day, and had given her some bills to cover her expenses.

Although Miss Texas had good cause to distrust men, there was something about the honest features of Terry Brookfield that attracted her strongly, and she felt that she was not making a mistake in accepting his invitation. Setting out with Terry the next morning on the early train, she was happy to think of visiting the States again and did not notice that all during the journey Terry looked at her, a peculiar expression of doubt clouding his features.

As soon as the pair reached Seattle they were stopped by three detectives, who said to Terry in a meaningful tone, "The chief wants to see you." Overruling Terry's protests, they escorted him away, leaving his bewildered companion to go to the hotel herself, and register. All day she waited patiently, although when she learned from frequent phone inquiries that Terry had never reached his hotel, she was convinced that he was a criminal and was wanted by the police. Her faith in him utterly shattered, she left the hotel, never knowing that her phone was ringing continuously. Disconsolate and disillusioned, she sought to cheer herself, but she knew no one in the city, and at last, entered a night club, hoping to find amusement there. Dully she watched the dancers go through their steps, reminding herself how foolish she had been to leave Canada. Toward midnight, when she went to pay her bill, she discovered that she had lost her money and when the waiter sneered at her story, she was taken to the night court. The magistrate, barely listened to her plight, but sternly reprimanding her for going around the city unescorted, ordered her to leave for her home immediately, and thoroughly crushed, Miss Texas took the morning train to Canada, without bothering to return to the hotel.

Meanwhile, Terry, freed, sought her out, and when he found that she had disappeared completely felt that he was right in his first opinion that she was nothing but a gold-digger. Returning to Canada he entered the cabaret without being observed by Miss Texas, and when the manager, spying him, proudly announced that the next number would be in honor of Terry Brookfield, mayor of Stanfell, the girl was dumbfounded, and forgetting her surroundings, rushed up to him exclaiming, "Oh, Terry, I thought you were wanted by the police!" And realizing how his action could have been so easily misinterpreted, Terry folded her in his arms, saying, "I was, darling. But the chief of police happens to be my Dad, and he wanted to see me on some urgent business, not knowing that I had something more important to attend to."

SWORN LOVE

E. H. Fairfield Jr. Drama File No. 9929

JOYOUSLY greeting his family who have come to see him graduate with honors from college, Burton Grant realizes from their forlorn appearances that they are concealing something from him and finally learns that their business has collapsed and they are now destitute. Burton soon discovers that his college degree is no Open Sesame for a job and to tide his family over the period of stress, he accepts the humble position of clerk in a grocery. However, the Dean of the University has always regarded Burton highly, and with his recommendation the boy finds employment in a bank. The elder Grant, having appealed to his wealthy brother, Ezra for help and been sneered at for spending so much money for his son's education, pats his son's shoulder proudly.

At the bank one day, Burton cashes a check for Connie Levens, and arrested by her beauty, learns from one of his co-workers that Connie is the daughter of the bank manager, a grim-visaged executive. Rejoicing that he has a statement to deliver to Levens, Burton enters the manager's office where he has seen Connie enter but finds her alone. She smiles at his impulsiveness but he persuades her to lunch with him and before the hour is up both of them realize they are seriously in love. At the bank, Burton is kidded for aspiring to Levens' daughter but after Connie has kissed him and admitted her love, Burton dares to ask her father for her hand. Levens is sarcastic and when he further learns that Burton's family is dependent upon his meager salary, Connie's father puts his foot down. The following day Connie comes to the bank agitatedly and tells Burton to call for her that night. All day he wonders what she wants him for and in his anxiety Burton, now responsible for closing the bank vaults at night, is riding his car through traffic when he is panic stricken at the thought that he may not have locked up properly. Rushing back he enters the darkened bank and as he approaches the vault a gun is pressed in his back and he is ordered to hand over the deposits. The robber vanishes and Burton sets off the alarm but his story cannot be collaborated. The gloved bandit left no prints, Burton's explanation for his presence in the bank at that hour is attacked, and he is sentenced to three years at hard labor. Connie tells him she believes in his innocence, but Burton is distracted at the remembrance of his parents' haggard faces.

Three years drag by torturously but when Burton is released he finds no one willing to employ an ex-convict. The discovery that his mother has died and his father is accepting the grudging hospitality of his brother Ezra breaks Burton's spirit and without communicating with Connie, he joins the army and is sent to France in the early hysteria of America's entry in the war. Once, in a dugout, Burton bitterly tells of his imprisonment and the circumstances leading to his conviction. Thereafter Private Buck seems his avowed enemy and soon after the two men come to blows, a well delivered upper-cut putting a temporary end to Buck's slander. Losses are heavy. A scouting party is necessary. All volunteer and choice is narrowed by lots. Buck and Burton with two others crawl over the lines. But fear makes Buck reveal their positions to the enemy and they are picked off by a sniper. Burton gets the German and drags the wounded Buck back to the lines. The American attack is successful and in the hospital, Buck, dying, is attended by Connie who hears Buck cry for Burton Grant and, startled, effects Burton's response. Before he dies, Buck confesses that it was he who robbed the bank and when Armistice is signed Connie and Burton return together. Levens, at first hostile makes amends when he learns the truth. Mr. Grant inherits his brother's estate and the youngsters are married at last.

MUNICIPAL AIRPORT

A. Peter Correggio Drama File No. 9892

THREE thousand pairs of eyes focused on the tall, lean aviator as his plane took off and the voice of the announcer sounded through the great amplifiers, "And now the last thrill of this great day, the greatest stunt flier of them all—Jimmie Martin." The black ship climbed higher and higher, turned, zoomed toward the ground and then righted itself. Again and again the grim faced lad put his plane through its breath-taking paces and when finally he brought it down in a dramatic landing, he picked his way through reporters and pushing, gaping admirers and made his way to the pilot's quarters. A few moments later, stretched out in Andy Creighton's high-powered red roadster, Jimmie grinned at Andy's admonitions that he was taking his life in his hands. "Sure," said Jimmie, "What of it?" Later in the luxurious Creighton mansion, Andy took up his plea again that Jimmie give up stunting and at Jimmie's curt, "I can't. I have to go on," Andy replied speculatively, "What in that secret past of yours, Jimmie, makes you so ready to meet death?" Then seeing Jimmie's face cloud he hastily changed the subject. But, the next morning, when Andy arose he found his butler with a double letter from Jimmie. The first entrusted a note to Andy revealing his identity but asking that Andy should not read his secret until after Jimmie had died. Slowly Andy opened his vault and secreted Jimmie's letter therein.

Back at the airport Jimmie learned that H. Carlton Stratton, the aviation enthusiast wanted Jimmie to fly his ship in the National Air Race. Although a stunt flier, the prospect of the great race appealed to Jimmie, and accepting, he proceeded to Stratton's private estate where arrangements had already been made for his arrival. After a sumptuous meal alone since the millionaire had been detained elsewhere, Jimmie had his talk with the financier and was assured that he was to have the freedom of the grounds while he was testing and becoming accustomed to the ship. The trial flight exhilarated Jimmie and, yielding to the beauty of the lake, he took a canoe out. Lost in his reveries, Jimmie didn't hear until too late the shouted warning and an instant later the contact with a sleek motor boat capsized his frail bark. A laughing voice assisted him and bedraggled, Jimmie accepted the invitation of Lillian Stratton to accept the convenience of her boat into shore. Lillian's eyes sparkled after the brief encounter and her father warned her that Jimmie would be immune to her wiles.

A few days later, Jimmie again refused to take seriously Andy's pleas that he be more careful and he confided that when he undertook the job, it was just that, now, after the Stratton's hospitality, he felt he had to win. The night before the race, Stratton and his daughter vainly combined efforts to induce Jimmie to attend a party, but when, later, in the moonlight, Lillian joined Jimmie outside and asked softly why he evaded her, responding to her nearness, he looked deeply into her grey eyes. His arm circled her waist, but an instant later it dropped. Dazed, she fled and Jimmie looked bitterly into the night, his fingers fumbling with the gold locket containing his mother's picture.

A few moments before the race, Jimmie noticed the distressed face of his mechanic, and learning that the boy's mother was dying in Memphis, promised to get him there immediately after the race. Around and around the twenty-seven laps the plane strained every thought, every line concentrated on finishing first. Lillian moaned as once the ship approached perilously close to the pylon, and as the Stratton ship moved steadily into first place and landed in a tumult of applause, the Strattons embraced each other and moved with the crowd to congratulate the victor. For a few seconds the plane remained, motors running, while Jimmie barked orders for refueling and then it rose into the air and winged toward the horizon. Consternation reigned at the airport while the spluttering Strattons accepted the honors which should have fallen to their pilot.

Dawn was streaking the sky when the ship arrived at Memphis and Jack wobbled unsteadily from the long cramped flight. But in his home his arrival did that which the doctor scarcely dared hope for, it brought Jack's mother relief and as she dropped off to sleep, Jimmie rested and returned east. Refusing Stratton's offer to make him head of the new airline, Jimmie tried to say good-bye to Lillian. As he marked the tears that glistened on her lovely lashes, he almost faltered in his purpose, but at remembrance of the gold locket and all it stood for, he climbed into his ship and flew from the softness and warmth of love.

A year etched hard lines in Jimmie Martin's face and as he raised his head from the table to read a telegram, he started at the lines, "Andy seriously injured in air crash." Dashing out he ordered his plane warmed up and against the pleas of every man at the port, seated himself in the cockpit. The plane tore against the tenacious clutch of the muddy ground and as it taxied toward the far off clump of bushes cleared the ground, then clipped a wing and plunged to earth again. They carried Jimmie's limp body in, and with his locket held like a rosary he sighed "Happy Landings," and passed to the greater rest.

Swathed in bandages, Andy learned of his friend's death and as his butler stood weeping at his bedside, Andy called for Jimmie's letter from the vault and had it destroyed utterly so that Jimmie's secret might die with him. "You'd better go now," he told Barton, "I feel very tired."

Lillian Stratton stood with her back against the hangar and as she looked toward the sun sinking in the west, she fancied she saw the lean figure of Jimmie Martin come smiling towards her.

THE GREAT UNDERSTANDING

Ella Elizabeth Reichmann Drama File No. 9984

WITH the end of the war, Captain Muller finds all his accustomed honor sstripped from him and feebly he keeps up, within his own household and among his former friends, the pretense of the former regime. Dissension reigns in the Muller household, however, for Mrs. Muller, having lost two sons in the great war, is an easy convert to the peace movement about which her children Joachim and Greta are enthusiastic. And even Anna, the faithful cook, is beginning to rebel against the stern orders of Muller's majordomo, Henry, who has been his former top-sergeant. It isn't that Anna loves Henry the less, but that she is beginning to see too clearly through the outmoded militarism.

In secret Greta is sewing upon a huge banner and the following day when Muller, his eyesight greatly impaired, goes to the window and sees a crowd marching in the street, he learns from his wife that it is a movement for Universal Peace. Muller stamps his cane angrily at the realization that his wife speaks approvingly of such an organization, and muttering, "Fools, fools," he goes to his club where he can find an audience for his own ideas but finds that even his former cronies are beginning to prescribe to the peace movement, and the ex-captain seeks consolation in his stein of beer. Slightly staggering, he returns home and when his wife reminds him to send a congratulatory message to his brother-in-law who is celebrating his 25th anniversary as a custom inspector, Muller decides to go for a long visit. Ordering the rebellious Joachim to drive the car, Muller departs but upon his arrival he is introduced to his brother-in-law Beyer's friends, the Dubois, as a former soldier who still retains the military idea. Muller bristles and nothing the Beyers or Dubois can say can appease him. He explains that he was just passing through and furiously demands that Joachim, who has just begun to enjoy the visit since he has met Jeanette Dubois, return home. On the return trip both men are sullen and when Mrs. Muller guilelessly inquires as to the cause of the abbreviated visit, the captain explodes. Argument follows argument and finally when Muller learns that it was his son who bore the banner in the peace parade, Joachim leaves home, rents a small apartment and takes a position as an aviation pilot. Soon he is making weekly visits to his uncle Beyer, to see Jeanette, and one day when Greta accompanies him, she falls in love with Adolph, Jeanette's cousin.

After some time, Joachim marries Jeanette but even when his son is two years old, Joachim's estrangement with his father is still strong. Meanwhile the old captain is becoming more and more of a recluse and when Joachim sends a picture of his child to his mother, Mrs. Muller notices that her husband secretly cherishes his grandchild whom he has not yet seen. Anna leaves and Henry begs her to return while the Mullers plan a huge birthday celebration for the captain, inviting his son, the Beyers, and the Dubois, including Adolph. They celebrate gayly and in a touching speech the Captain tells that he is won over the peace movement of which his wife is president. It is little Joachim Muller, Jr., who reconciles the old man and his son, and Greta's eyes meet Adolph's as "Peace on Earth" rings out.

HOLY CATS!

Martha Brechbill Comedy File No. 9947

FROM the back fence came a prolonged mournful yowl. Bob Gregg turned over in bed restlessly and as the first was followed by a second screech with even more cadences, Bob leaped up, seized his alarm clock and threw it at the cat. There was a scurry and deep silence. Sunlight shone into his room when, with a muttered expletive Bob awoke an hour late. Jumping into his clothes, running off without breakfast, Bob strode into the office to be called down for being late. His day was ruined and when at six he turned down his street he saw his tormenter of the night before spring upon a tiny unsuspecting bird. Bob picked up a clod and hurled it and Callie streaked home. As he passed the house next door he heard Mrs. Oliphant pick up the alley cat and murmur drippingly, "Did nasty bad man hit my Calliebaby?" Choking, Bob strode into his house to find his mother weeping because that Callie had killed her canary. "This is July 2nd," Bob began slowly. "Shooting is going to begin two days earlier this year." But the wily Callie remained under cover until dawn.

Another sleepless night and Sunday, July 3rd. Bob arose, opened his grandfather's Civil War momentos, and patted the long rifle reflectively. The neighbors were at Church and the strains of the organ wafted soothingly across when Bob spotted Callie industriously unravelling his most colorful sweater. Raising his gun, Bob took steady aim. The cat's head was right in line with the rifle bead when the shrill voice of the old maid on the block broke the Sabbath stillness as she minced smirkingly up to Callie, who, with a remarkable show of intelligence fled. "Oh, good morning," she said to Bob, and his profanity sent the dear old lady scuttling in mortal terror of the madman. Zealously Bob mixed deadly poisons into salmon cakes and with a sigh of relief watched Callie sniff and then sample.

Hearing voices in Mrs. Oliphant's garden, Bob peered across at the most divine creature he had ever seen admiring Mrs. Oliphant's flowers. Hastily he sent his mother to borrow Mrs. Oliphant's cookie plate and upon her return, he learned that the girl was Sally Wingham, Mrs. Oliphant's niece. Unable to do more than peck at his supper, Bob went to bed to dream of Sally but his night was tortured by nightmares of a bridge party of cats gossiping shrilly. Callie's Tomcat friend awoke Bob with a piercing, "Meoooowww" and Bob sent his bedroom slippers out the window. The next morning, Bob was rescued from his melancholy by a telephone call from Mrs. Oliphant asking if he wouldn't escort her niece to the country club dance. At four Bob started dressing and three collars were wilted to a string before it was time to call for Sally. From the first moment the pair were destined to trip down the aisle together and when they stole away from the dance and drove in the moonlight, Bob proposed and Sally accepted.

Mrs. Gregg tried to reason with her son but he told her he was twenty-one and old enough to recognize when real love came. Then Sally came over and Bob introduced her raptly until Sally informed him excitedly that her aunt was giving her as a pre-wedding gift—Callie. Bob spluttered. Sally insisted. They quarreled and Sally went home, hugging Callie to her. Mrs. Oliphant tried to comfort her, insinuating that she wouldn't marry a man who tried to poison a helpless kit-cat but at that moment, Callie saw a bird, leaped out of Sally's arms, scratching her meanwhile, and Sally turned, stamped her foot, and cried, "No cat is going to come between me and my great love. Scat! Scram, Callie, you big lummox of a cat. Bob and I are going to kiss and make up!" And she was off.

THE MASK OF FEAR

Herman Reeves Mystery File No. 9909

JEALOUS of his partner, an architect like himself, Lewis Perkins, climbs the scaffolding of his building and pushes John Ormund from behind. John's fall is broken and he is saved but Perkins is captured and sentenced to prison. As he is led away Perkins cries, "I'll get you yet," and John shivers. Several years later there is a jailbreak and three convicts escape but their high powered car rounds a curve too sharply and two men die instantly, unrecognizably mangled, while the third escapes. John reads of the identification of one of the two bodies as Lewis Perkins, and he sighs as the threat upon his life is removed.

Years pass. John's two sons and his daughter Ann are now grown. Robert is coming back from a Medical School abroad, and his fiancee, Mary, Ann's friend is staying with the Ormunds. In his library, John read a telegram from Robert telling how deeply shocked he was to learn of his brother Edwin's death. Agitatedly, John sends for his older son and assuring himself that he is all right, he nevertheless phones police headquarters and asks for a police escort for Edwin. Police surround Edwin who poohs the idea of an attempt being made upon his life but at a given corner his car suddenly gets out of control, plunges through a plate glass window and Edwin is drawn from the driver's seat—dead. What's more, a second before the accident a voice over the phone reported it to headquarters. An autopsy is performed and a tiny abrasion is found in the back through which poison had been injected into the body. The butler is accused but his alibi is unassailable. John begins getting notes of a threatening nature and both he and his wife get panic-stricken. Robert arrives home with his friend Bernard, a Scotland Yard sleuth vacationing in the States, and they find Mrs. Ormund in a state bordering collapse. Bernard advises that Ann and Mary stay close to each other, and that Mrs. Ormund's maid remain at her side. That night Mrs. Ormund is taking a shower. Her maid goes out for some perfumed bath salts and when she comes back, a second later, her mistress is dead in the bathtub. Bernard has just discovered a hole in the cushioned front of the car and a tiny spring indicates that the poison was administered while Edwin was driving. Robert and he are appalled by the ingenuity of the murderer but with the discovery that Mrs. Ormund has been electrocuted by contact with the wired shower curtain, they know they have a fiend to deal with. That same night, Ann awakens with a scream at sight of a cloaked figure bending over Mary. The assassin escapes, however, and Ann faints, Bernard rushes after the murderer and one of the guards watching the gate tussles with the cloaked mystery, but is overcome and the man escapes. The other men watching the grounds had not seen him cross. Bernard examines the gatepost and questions Robert who reveals that the house was bought some two years before but that there are no secret passages.

That night Bernard, Robert, and several plainclothesmen secretly conceal themselves in the room in which Mary and Ann are sleeping and when the fiend suddenly appears out of the darkness and is bringing a huge knife down upon Mary, Robert throws himself across the girl he loves while Bernard leaps upon the murderer who shakes him off and flees through the fireplace. Swiftly Bernard follows and near the outer gate captures him in the secret passage which Bernard has had blocked. Mary tenderly binds the wound that Robert has suffered for her, and Bernard returns to marry Ann, after the fiendish Perkins who had changed identifications in the auto wreck, kills himself to escape being sent back to prison.

AFTER THE SHOW

George Koch Drama File No. 9992

WITH elfin grace June dances upon the stage of the college auditorium and the marvelous lighting effects and revolving stage bring the audience applauding and murmuring in commendation. The first to congratulate June as she takes her last bow and dazedly listens to the stage offer of a producer seeking talent at the colleges, is Jim. But June holds his hands and tells him her act would never have been effective without the wonderful mechanical effects he had spent months perfecting for her. As she waits for her train to pull out taking her to the city and opportunity, Jim starts to tell her how he feels and breaks off saying he has no right. "Jim," she says looking at him steadily, "you have a genius for invention and you know it. If only someone would give you an opportunity you'd prove it." "Thanks," Jim murmurs, as she leaves, "forget about me, June, and go on toward the top."

Weeks later, Jim receives an answer to his letter to an automobile concern and he is ordered to come to the city and start work Monday. Excitedly he promises his mother he will send for her as soon as he is able, and he leaves. Working at a pittance in the factory, Jim devotes his lunch hours to working on his invention. Joe McHale bullies him and when Jim refuses to respond, pushes Jim violently. The confusion brings the superintendent to the scene and just as he is ordering Jim to stop fooling with his darn fool invention and causing trouble, Scott, president of the concern passes through with some stockholders. He sends for Jim to inquire about the disturbance and Jim desperately tells him about the invention. Scott, interested, invites Jim to demonstrate his idea in Scott's own laboratory.

Jim blushes at the enthusiasm of the president who insists that Jim develop his idea and take all the help and equipment he needs. Carol Scott, entering, smiles at her father's excitement and suggests that Scott invite his protege to her dinner. Although Carol is fascinated by the lad, Jim thinks of her only as a friend and Joe McHale, whom Jim, accepting his apology is using as an assistant, looks after Carol as a goddess. Jim's motor is given its big trial at the International Air Races and scores so sensationally that the Scott Motors make the front pages and Jim is acclaimed as the inventor. Modestly he credits Joe McHale for his assistance and Carol beams upon them both.

It is Carol who arranges the theater party at which Jim sees June, now a featured dancer. Carol watching Jim's face asks, "You know her?" and as she bites her lip at Jim's unmistakable expression, Joe dares to comfort her. Backstage, Jim and June meet and plan a day off by themselves at Coney Island. Like children they throw off their honors and when their engagement is announced, Carol, with Joe's hand reassuringly in hers, wishes them every happiness.

THEY LIVE TO LOVE

Beatrice Cole Drama File No. 9980

YOUNG, beautiful, Ray Carson gets a position in a restaurant as a waitress. Soon Stratus, the Greek proprietor notices that his patronage is increasing as a result of his attractive employee. Once, waiting on a boy who orders a dinner with a desperate air, Ray sees that he is starved and when he finishes and announces that he hasn't a penny but wants to work as a dishwasher, she advises Stratus to take on Dan Moore. Later, in the kitchen, when Dan spends his salary getting his hair cut and his shoes shined, Ray feels curiously attracted to him and a staunch friendship springs up between the two. The first time Dan can take her to dance, the two seem in a haze of happiness and Dan buys a cheap little ring as an engagement ring for her. In his arms Ray forgets everything but her own happiness, and evenings she is content to sit quietly watching Dan study law so that he can better himself.

Soon, however, Stratus accumulates the money he wants to return to Greece and when he closes his restaurant, Lopez, a concert violinist asks Ray if she'd like to work as his secretary. Happily Ray accepts but when she rushes in to tell Dan that they don't have to worry, she has a job, he looks at her bitterly and asks what kind of a man does she think he is to live on her salary. Ray tries to explain but Dan feels that he is a millstone about her neck and he disappears. For weeks Ray waits for him to return to her and at last she yields to Lopez' assurance that he can make her happy. For months Ray has everything she wants but happiness. Then one day Dan returns elated over his first case as a lawyer. Ray looks at him with eyes brimming with happiness but just then Lopez enters. Coolly looking at Ray, Lopez says, "I see you have a visitor," and walks into the bedroom. Dan stares at Ray for a moment, then turns and rushes out. Dully, Ray throws herself across the sofa and weeps. Lopez comes out and seeing her distress tells her he loves her and asks her to marry him. But Ray shakes her head and tries in vain to check her sobs. "You love him, don't you?" Lopez asks bitterly and slams the door as he leaves.

Alone, Ray looks about the apartment and at the prospect of living her life without Dan, she walks into the bathroom, takes down a bottle marked poison and quickly drinks. Lopez returns and finds her moaning on the floor. Excitedly he summons a doctor who says there is just a chance of pulling her through since she won't help by wanting to live. Then Lopez goes out, finds Dan trying to drink to forget, and sobering him up, Lopez makes Dan realize that Ray wouldn't have attempted suicide if she didn't love him. As the words sink through Dan's mind he says, "Where is she?" and as he softly enters the room where Ray is lying, she smiles feebly upon him. "I love you," Dan whispers. Outside the doctor says, "She'll live now," and Lopez, checking a sob in his throat, nods.

FEAR

Helen M. Potts Drama File No. 9963

IN order to frighten Tommy into silence so that she could spend her evenings at the neighboring movie, Tommy's stepmother terrified the sensitive lad into believing that the night was peopled with monsters that would spring upon him if he ever stepped out of bed or cried at night. While the woman enjoyed herself, Tommy lay wide awake and shivering in mortal fear. Years passed and although he grew to be tall and strong, always in back of his mind was the dread that his stepmother had instilled into him by her ignorance.

Leaving home, Tommy came to the city and after days of frantic searching for work found a position as a superintendent. The work payed poorly and was humiliating, but Tommy, seeing the hungry-faced derelicts in the city park, hung on. In the lunch room where he had his cheap little meals, Tommy looked into the blue eyes of his waitress Laura, and his good humored smile and generous tips made Laura notice him. One day she realized that he was stinting on his meals so he could leave a larger tip, and she told him firmly he wasn't to do that. Timidly Tommy asked if she'd go to the movies with him, and Laura hesitated then said she would like to take a walk after she was through. Thus their friendship began and soon Tommy asked Laura to marry him. He wouldn't hear of her continuing to work and his own salary was small but Tommy was ambitious and soon, he said he would get a better position. Laura shook her head dubiously but she loathed the men who thought that because they left her tips they could put their hands about her waist, and besides she was very much in love. So they moved into a tiny apartment. One night when Tommy came home from work he saw a child in the path of a truck. Without thinking he dashed in the path of the truck and flung the child out of the way. The screeching of brakes brought the child's mother to the spot and later in his apartment when Laura told him what a brave thing he had done, Tommy wiped the perspiration from his brow and admitted that if he had stopped to think he would have hesitated. Burying his face in Laura's lap, Tommy sobbed that he was a coward and told her of his childhood. Laura soothed him and when she went marketing and met the child's mother, she learned that there was a position open at her husband's bank for a night watchman and it might be a step up for Tommy. That night Tommy returned home downcast at the news that he was to get a cut in salary. Laura told him excitedly about the new job but Tommy shook his head and said he dared not take it. If he ever saw anyone forcing an entry he would want to run. All Laura's pleading was in vain so the next morning she pretended to be ill and Tommy, worriedly sent for the doctor. When the doctor came he said, "Why there's nothing wrong with you," and Tommy ran all the way to his job only to discover he was fired for being late. On the way home he applied for the watchman's position and was told to report to work that night. Arriving home he overheard Laura explain to the doctor that she had feigned illness because she wanted Tommy to lose his position and get the advance in salary. The doctor suggested that the best way to cure her husband of his fear would be to stage a holdup. Tommy didn't let them know he had overheard their plans and in the darkened bank he waited trembling. At sight of three "thugs" making off with the money, Tommy found his hands shaking, but as he saw their efficient methods he realized this was no fake and plunging into their midst he fought the three gunmen and when the Doctor and his friends entered they found Tommy groggy from his battle. Tommy saved the bank thousands of dollars and Laura wept over his battered face. Fear was gone. A new Tommy stood there and when the bank president offered Tommy a position as a teller, Tommy remarked, "Well the nightwatchman's job wasn't so bad, but it didn't pay enough." And Laura murmured, "Yes, dear."

AIR SQUADRON

Frank White Drama File No. 9748

AS students at Oxford, Roger Deeping and James Maugham are fast friends, and through frequent visits to the Maugham home, Roger feels a deep affection for Mrs. Maugham, an invalid, whose whole existence centers around her adored son. Leaving school, the two comrades find positions as tellers at a London bank, directed by Honorable John Cumberly, whose daughter Joan learns to love Roger. James, who is madly infatuated with her, is angered at this turn of events, and one evening at his club, brooding over his failure to win Joan, allows himself to be drawn into a card game. To his horror, he loses several hundred pounds, which must be paid immediately, and desperate, steals the amount from the bank. Meanwhile, Roger, overhearing a conversation concerning James debts, believes this to be the explanation of James' coldness toward him, and when James, frantic at the thought of his crime being discovered, comes to Roger and begs him to help him, Roger assents knowing that James' apprehension would kill Mrs. Maugham. To strengthen his plea, James tells Roger that Joan loves him, and that, if she learns he is guilty of theft, she will be heartbroken. To throw suspicion upon himself, Roger bids Joan farewell, leaving her bewildered due to his strange actions, gathers some clothes in a suitcase and, eluding a detective from Scotland Yard, goes to East India docks, where he obtains work as a cook on a boat bound for Australia.

Meanwhile, Mr. Cumberly discovering the loss, further urges Scotland Yard to hunt for the missing Roger, and they report that evidently he has committed suicide. James, seizing his opportunity, offers to console Joan, who despite Roger's suspicious disappearance, refuses to believe in his guilt. Winning her heart with his sympathy and comfort, he finally marries her, a few weeks after leaving the bank, to become a flyer, in the Royal Air Force. Several months later, he is ordered to report for duty at Canberra, Australia, and the couple leave immediately.

Roger, arriving in Australia, finds rooms in a little frequented inn. The Golden Bucket and there meets three prospectors, who, needing a cook to go along with them in their hunt for gold, set out with Roger for the Victoria desert. The proprietor of THE GOLDEN BUCKET, recognizing Roger as the man described by the English police, makes a careful note of their destination. In the desert Roger, saving Big Tom Dudley from a crocodile's greedy jaws, earns his deep gratitude, and the four men continue their long trek, in the face of grave danger. Hardly have they discovered a rich gold vein when the sudden flight of their donkeys, and the added misfortune of a leak in the water jug leaves them helpless in the middle of the broiling desert. Parched with thirst, they turn their steps backward, but Willis is soon trapped by quicksand, and powerless to save him, the three men continue onward. The death of McRae, from drinking polluted water, leaves Roger with Big Tom, who realizing he can go no further, gives his last drop of water to Roger, and forces the boy to leave him to his death. While Roger, lies half-delirious at the edge of a crater, James, commanded by Major Dickens to hunt the desert for Roger, for the innkeeper has told his story to the police, realizes that if Roger is found he can never face him or Joan again. Seized with remorse he writes a long confession, and then, with four other flyers sets out over the desert. The first to see Roger's prostrate form, he lands his plane and puts the unconscious man in another plane. Then, on the journey homeward, he deliberately lands his plane in a sickening crash, and the machine goes up in flames, while his comrades stand by, grief-stricken at the sight of the funeral pyre. Arriving home the airmen and police carry Roger into the field office, and report the incidents of the journey including the death of James to Major Dickens, who has just finished reading James' confession. And while the reunited lovers are glorying in each other, the Major, realizing James heroic sacrifice, gravely writes, "Captain James Maugham was killed while in the performance of duty," then leaves the united lovers alone.

THE LAST MINUTE

Franklin Koehler Drama File No. 9823

AS James Rockney, partner in the firm of Spurway and Rockney paces restlessly up and down the floor of his private office, his manager Bradbury, is sitting with bowed head before his desk. The arrival of a messenger boy from a famous London investment concern brings the dreaded announcement that unless Spurway and Rockney pay the one hundred thousand pound note due the next morning, legal proceedings will be immediately started. Horrified, Bradbury rushes in to Rockney, accusing him of ensnaring him in his crooked deals, but Rockney, seemingly calm, advises Bradbury to go home, while he will remain to think out a plan. Although distraught, Bradbury follows his advice, and a few minutes after he leaves, Rockney, withdrawing from the vault a package of notes that Bradbury knows nothing of, leaves the office. Once outside, he makes all plans to leave England the next morning, but on second thought decides to go to the American Embassy ball to be given that evening so as to divert suspicion.

Meanwhile, in the home of John Spurway, Sr., the senior head of the firm, who has retired five years before, leaving the management in the hands of Rockney, preparations are being made for the arrival of John, Jr., returning from college. When Helen, John's sister, notices that her aged father looks slightly worried, she drags from his the admittance that he is anxious to see her married to Ralph Haines, a good friend of the family. The arrival of John cuts short her questionings, and although both children notice their father's disturbed expression, they forget their anxiety, when he discloses his plan to have his son manage a large tract of timber land in Canada, since the boy has expressed a love for the outdoors. Overjoyed, the youngsters enthusiastically discuss the plan, while their father answers a phone call from Jack Olds, whom he describes as a barrister owning timber land near the Spurways'. Feeling he will tire himself out with all the excitement, Helen playfully coaxes her father to take a nap, and returning to her brother confides in him her fears that she believes something is wrong in the firm of Spurway and Rockney. Her confidences interrupted by a visit from Ralph Haines, she reluctantly promises to give him a few moments to tell her something of the utmost importance at the Embassy ball.

That evening, at the Embassy Ball, Helen saw Jack Olds, and noticing that his daughter was strongly attracted to the young man, Spurway, Sr. asked Jack not to reveal that in reality he was not a barrister, but Jack Burns, sleuth attached to Scotland Yard. Still thinking of Jack's charming ways, Helen only half listens to Ralph's protestations of love, and is glad when Jack, who has just learned from Helen's father that he suspects Rockney of an unscrupulous business deal, breaks in to ask her for a dance. Meanwhile, Spurway, Sr. unable to keep his secret worry to himself, has sought out Rockney, and drawing him into an ante room off the main hall, heatedly accuses him of mishandling the company's funds. Enraged, Rockney shoots his partner, and seeing that because of the music the shot has not been noticed, flees. Ralph, finding Mr. Spurway's body, calls the guests in, and Jack, who has been watching the actions of Rockney, cries, "James Rockney! Where is he!" Several weeks pass. Helen, who has learned that the supposedly respectable Ralph Haines is an international swindler, feels more drawn to Jack, who, learning that Rockney has headed for Canada, orders the police not to touch him, since he wishes to capture the man himself. Informed of John's plan to go on to Canada with Helen, and carry out his father's wishes concerning the lumber land, Jack, afraid that if John comes across Rockney he will, true to his threat shoot him, pretends to be going to Canada on business, and erosses on the same boat with Helen. Aboard ship, he knows he loves her, but unable to explain to her who he really is, he supresses his feeling, leaving Helen to wonder why he does not speak.

In Canada, Jack learns from the chief of the Intelligence department that Rockney, suspicious, has been doubling on his trail, to throw off his pursuers. While Jack is hurrying on in a fruitless search, John, at Edmonton, the town nearest his camp, engages Timber Bill as his foreman, and with Helen and Bill reaches his lumber camp, and furnishes a modest cabin three miles from the mill. Discovering that he needs more men, he sends Bill to Edmonton to engage lumbermen, and bring them back with him. With pride in his achievement, he tells every detail of his plans to Helen, who, only half hears, for she wonders why Jack Olds never came to the camp and frankly discusses his absence with her brother.

In the meanwhile, Jack, receiving information that Rockney, disguised as a layman, has been hired to work in a lumber camp, is horrified at the thought of the encounter between John and Rockney. He takes a dangerous short cut to the Spurway land, hoping to avert the disaster, while Rockney arriving at the camp, and seeing John is the owner beats a hasty retreat through the woods. Encountering Helen, who is bringing her brother's lunch to the mill, he threatens her with death to keep her quiet, and at these words, is shot by John, who has followed his track. Covering up the crime to save her brother Helen returns to the cabin, where Jack Olds, revealing that he loves her, makes her confess her brother's guilt. At first thinking he has tricked her, Helen quickly flies to his arms again, when Jack's guide, who has witnessed the murder, attests that it was done to protect a woman's honor. And his secret told, Jack tenderly asks Helen to love Jack Burns as much as Jack Olds.

BORN of humble people, Jessie draws his father's wrath upon his head because long after the others are asleep the boy stays awake reading. Putting his foot down firmly, the lad's father decides that he will stop those foolish notions by preventing him from going to school, and it is only when Jessie faithfully promises he will do all the regular work after he gets home that he is permitted to go. At school Jessie is conscious of his shabby clothes and he does not mingle with the other children. Most of all he resents Ethel Jones, a little red haired girl who manages always to win the honors Jessie covets. Try as he will, however, his father's demands that he take days off to plow the fields brings down Jessie's marks and when one day Jessie refuses to stay home from his final examination, his father angrily orders him from the house telling him to look elsewhere for support.

When the school board learns of the boy's troubles they find someone who will board him in return for the work he can do. Jessie is graeful until he learns that Ethel's father is to be his employer. He blushes scarlet every time she approaches and at the table he keeps his eyes upon his plate to avoid Ethel, while her family laugh at the way he avoids her. But when, one day, Jessie is asked to take Ethel to the rehearsal of the school play and he drives home so fast that in swerving sharply he causes her to crash her head against the door, he realizes that it is not hate but love that he has felt for her. Overcome with the realization he tries to avoid her now more than ever but at last gets courage to give her a fountain pen for her birthday. Astonished, tears come to her eyes as she hides the precious gift. Then, after several weeks of torture, he tells her of his love. Blushing she draws away from him but finally she admits that she has loved him all along. One day Mr. Jones sees that neither Ethel nor Jessie is eating and suspecting their love he sends Jessie away. Alone, friendless, Jessie is miserable because he cannot see Ethel and when he writes to her she replies in secret telling him her father has forbidden their correspondence. In town Jessie manages to get work and when one night he secretly manages a glimpse of Ethel he can stand the separation no longer. Getting a marriage license, he meets Ethel but although she trembles at sight of him, she dares not elope. Jessie, upset, tries to forget her but although he squanders his savings with the town boys, he knows in his heart he cannot forget Ethel and returning to her he begs her to marry him or else he will go away forever. At thought of losing him, she promises and they are secretly married. However, soon, Mr. Jones learns of the marriage and his wrath makes him annul the marriage on the ground that youngsters were under age.

The pair, separated are desolate, but when Ethel is eighteen, Jessie comes to her window and secretly they steal away to be remarried. Mr. Jones follows them, but seeing their happiness together, his arguments lose their potency and as he begins to bluster they remind him that now he can do nothing—since they are of age. He turns to go, and seeing them sitting quietly, hand in hand, he weakens and in a quavering voice he asks when they are coming home to dine with an old man. "Father," Ethel cries, and the door closes on a happy family.

HANDCUFFS

Al Zurawski Drama File No. 9993

WITH an angry gesture, Paul Wetter tosses aside the newspaper headlining another sensational victory for the speed demon Jack Curtler, and in conference with Mike Roboe, racketeer associate plans to "fix" Jack. Hours later at the field, Jack climbs into his car, clips his goggles around his neck, and with a terrific roar, races his car about the field. James Ausborn, his sponsor, looks up happily from his timepiece as Jack finishes and as the boy is leaving, he sees Jane Lynton, her father, and Paul Wetter in conversation. Joining them at Jane's invitation, Jack good-naturedly overlooks Paul's antagonism and when Jane invites him to her house for dinner that night, accepts. The dinner is marked by strain as Paul sneers at everything Jack says and when Paul and Lynton engage each other in an exclusive conversation, Jane hastily asks Jack to walk onto the terrace with her. There they look at each other long and tenderly and as Jack draws Jane to him her father and his friend enter. Jack goes but not before Jane has induced him to come to her party Saturday.

Paul grits his teeth as Mike kids him about Jack, then plans to "fix" Jack Saturday. Jane's face is aglow as she dances with Jack and as he admires the striking star sapphire she wears suspended from her neck by a slender silver chain, he adds that it is no lovelier than her eyes. Paul claims the next dance with Jane and Jack frowns as a stranger brushes too close. "With your eyes," says Paul, "you ought to wear blue." Unconsciously, Jane's fingers reach for her sapphire pendant and a second later she blanches and whispers, "It's gone." Lynton excitedly orders a search when he learns that Jack has danced with Jane just before the gem disappeared and in Jack's pocket the jewel is discovered. At Lynton's order, Jack leaves while Jane, scolding her father for making such a scene, is told that she doesn't realize how valuable the sapphire is and how badly her father needs money. Touched by her father's presentation of his business difficulties, Jane is startled by his further explanation that Paul Wetter can finance his business and would if Jane would encourage his suit.

Unhappily, Jaek enters the race. The crowd roars as he takes the lead with Paul a length behind, but at the turn as he is winning, Paul crowds him to the side and skids into him. Jack, helped from the twisted steel that was his car grins through his pain at his anxious backer who exclaims, "Thank God you're all right."

Jane realizes now how much she loves Jack but her father's pleas have their effect and her engagement to Paul is announced. Meanwhile, Ausborn informs the melancholy Jack that the millionaire Bellen is going to finance either his company or Wetter's depending upon the winning of the race and Jack promises to do his best. He leaves, promising to drop at the bank, ten thousand dollars for Ausborn. But stepping out of a cab he feels a gun in his back and he is kidnapped. Ausborn, believing Jack absconded with his money hires another driver who is bribed to throw the race to Paul. Jack frees himself, and with the information that Paul is planning to get control of Lynton's business, returns in time to enter the race, win, and as Paul is led to prison, Lynton pompously tells reporters his daughter is to marry Jack Curtler.

CHILDREN OF LUXURY

Minnie C. Anderson Drama File No. 9826

"I'M in love with your daughter." Mr. Marshall, owner of the largest department store in the city looked at the speaker with contempt and rocked with laughter. "You—a clerk," he said. But when Edna too told her father she was going to marry Philip, Marssall urged his daughter to think over her decision. It was only, he said, because she had never worked for a dollar, that she thought she could be happy without money. She was young. Phillip was too. Time would show her the folly of her belief that she could be happy with Philip. Edna saw her father's jaw set stubbornly and remembering her older brother who had defied his father's wishes when he was a youngster and had been disowned, Edna agreed to spend a year away from Philip—working. If at the end of that period, she still felt she loved the boy, Marshall would raise no further objections to the wedding.

In New York Edna got a position under an assumed name. Nights would find her too tired to stir from her tiny room and selling behind a counter she found herself subjected to countless indignities. Her department head approached with lowering brows and informed her that unless she met the sales quota she would be fired. Discouraged, Edna looked up into a pair of puzzled eyes. "I'll have this, he said and as Edna wrapped his purchases for him, the stranger said softly, "Edna." "Harold!" she cried and promised to meet him for lunch. The department head descended upon her and told her there was to be no further conversation with the customers, but Edna turned shining eyes to him and looking critically at her sales slips, the department head grunted and added, "That's better."

Meanwhile, Mr. Marshall had promptly arranged for Phillip's discharge from his store, and jobless and without Edna, Philip turned resentfully to his own room. Finding employment in the rival store, Philip worked day and night, and his efforts recognized, he found Mr. Talbot interested in the ideas for sales promotion that Marshall had always scorned. The Talbot sales drew the entire city and soon Marshall discovered that his own store was practically deserted. Frantic, he tried in vain to compete but Philip's ideas backed him against a wall. In desperation, Marshall offered Philip a position as exccutive manager of his own store, but Philip looked across his desk at the man who had told him he wasn't good enough for his daughter, and with an enigmatic expression pushed across a New York newspaper. Upon the front page was a triangle and pictures of Edna Marshall and two other people. The caption read "Salesgirl forms interesting angle to the Harold Raymond-Muriel Fay romance. Harold seems to be dividing his attention between the two girls these days." "If not for your interference," Philip was saying bitterly, but Mr. Marshall stared at the paper as one transfixed and cried, "Don't worry." Then hurriedly running to a telegraph office, Marshall sent a telegram to New York.

Resentfully, Philip accepted the invitation of Marshall to come to his house for dinner. To his amazement he saw Edna come down the steps, arms outstretched, but as Philip moved forward he saw the man of the picture behind her. His arms dropped to his side, but Edna laughed as she explained that Harold was her brother who had, years ago quarreled with her father, and had just been reconciled. Marshall, eyes moist as his family was restored to him, rose unsteadily from his seat and begged his children to forgive him for trying to ruin their lives and looking into the reassuring faces of Edna and Philip, and Harold and Muriel, he blessed them.

MEN SHALL WORK

Virginia Klare Drama File No. 9954

AS a youngster the greatest ambition of young James Nutley is to be a great surgeon but in the little farm in the foothills of the Ozarks there is small opportunity for the lad to pursue the necessary studies. Once, while delivering some vegetables from the farm, James stops his wagon at sight of a thirteen year old lad weeping bitterly over a rabbit whose leg has been caught in a steel trap. With skillful fingers James binds the wound and the grateful animal stops its moaning. Dick Morton looks up to James as a young God. When Dick brings his friend home, the Mortons who have come to the Ozarks in the hope that the mountain air will help their ailing child, look at him askance, but James sees Dick's pale cheeks and takes him along for hikes and soon Dick's health perceptibly improves. Dick's sister Mary joins the two lads until one day Mrs. Morton sees that the farmer lad is falling in love with her daughter. Excitedly she makes plans to return north, and James stands at the brow of the hill watching the train draw his friends away from him.

When James realizes that the Mortons are not going to return, he frets and his parents worry about him. At last James decides to take his meager savings and enter a Medical School. Doing odd jobs about the city, James manages to pay his tuition and he has no time to think about girls, so earnest is he about his studies. Grace Blane, daughter of a Doctor who takes an interest in the lad, falls in love with the upcoming young surgeon, but James can think only of Mary Morton whom he has loved in his youth. The war breaks out and James who has been receiving considerable recognition for his work as a surgeon leaves. At home, Mary Morton looks up from a picture of James in the newspaper and with a faraway look in her eyes calls her mother's attention to James' realization of his ambition to be a surgeon. Remembering her own part in breaking up the romance and knowing that Mary has never forgotten the boy, Mrs. Morton hastily turns the subject to Dick who, too, has joined the army fighting overseas.

Harassed by the numbers of patients brought in from the battlefield, Dr. Nutley performs emergency operations one after the other. The nurse reports three new soldiers and a moment later returns saying two of them are gone and the third is hopeless. "Poor fellows," sighs the doctor and as he passes the cot, he turns, stares, and says wheel that soldier in here. Drawing on his surgical gloves. Dr. Nutley bends over the lad and gives himself unsparingly to pull him through. Days later, Dick opens his eyes and cries out in recognition of James. From the nurses Dick learns what James has done for him and his gratitude is overwhelming. James arranges to send Dick home but his breath catches when Dick gayly makes plans for James' return and not suspecting James is in love with his sister tells that Mary is probably married now to one Fred Banks, a wealthy admirer.

At the close of the war James returns home, but he can not trust himself to face Mary, since Dick's chatter has led him to believe she is in love. Dick visits him and soon falls in love with Grace Blane. It is Grace who mentions James' devotion to a girl he had met when he was a child, and Dick realizes what he has done. He finds Mary brooding because James avoids visiting, and he confesses his part. "Mary!" James cries as she enters his office and then recovers himself, but Mary soon proves that she is still unattached and James draws her into his arms happily.

LIGHT IN THE DARK

E. George Transom Drama File No. 9995

WHEN her letters fail to have the effect of making her aged father give up his work as a lighthouse keeper, Jessie board the boat that weekly touches isolated Harwell Island. As she lands she shudders at sight of the steep steps leading to the lighthouse tower and her father, who has come to meet the boat which brings him supplies, peers at her near sightedly before she rushes into his arms. Arm in arm they go up to his little house, and while Jessie insists that her father rest as she makes dinner, she tells him that he is to give up this dangerous work. For hours Caleb protests saying they'd let Tom Gregg take over the job and he'd be sure to forget some night and cause a shipwreck. Jessie learns that Tom Gregg is the only other inhabitant of the island. Her first meeting with Tom is when she is pulling in the fish net and she is startled by his stealthy approach behind her, but she dashes home calling loudly for her father and Caleb brandishes his one gun threatcningly. Jessie shudders at the thought of spending a week near Tom but her father reassures her. That night a storm blows up and Jessie insists that her father take no chances but he tells her that he can't endanger seamen's lives, and will not hear of Jessie climbing the rocks in the storm. Hours pass. Terrified Jessie climbs the wind swept rocks, after her father but at last the terrible realization comes to her that her father has perished in the sea. Grief-stricken she wanders toward home.

The next two days she frantically eludes the leering Tom, but when, once he creeps behind her, she moans, "I'll call my father.' At the look of fear in his eyes, she knows her salvation lies in keeping Tom uninformed of her father's death. But the third day he grows suspicious, and bolder now, he seizes her. "Father!" Jessie screams. For a moment, he mutters,"He must be sick. I haven't seen him," then darts away fearing the gun. Sobbing, Jessie bolts the doors. That night a noise makes Jessie's heart leap, but at the cry for help, she goes to the door and admits a spent swimmer. New dangers threaten as humanity makes her bring the stranger into the house and restore consciousness to him. At last he opens his eyes, and he tells her that his bark sprang a leak and he barely made the swim to the island. Jessie tells him the boat will be due in a few days, he can't leave until it comes, and as he looks puzzled at her living alone, she takes a desperate chance and confides her helplessness to him. He assures her she has nothing to fear from him, and as he tries vainly to lift himself from the bed, a smile is forced from her pale lips.

That night, however, on her return from lighting the beacon, Tom seizes her and maintains he is not afraid of anyone. He wants her and he is going to have her. Jessie's screams bring Frank and weakened as he is he overpowers Tom in a terrific struggle. A whistle escapes Frank's lips as he recognizes Tom as an escaped murderer upon whose head there is a large reward and when the ship touches the island, it brings back the murderer in handcuffs, and Jessie who has answered yes to an important question.

POLICE HEADQUARTERS

Armand Lacasse Mystery File No. 9910

INSPECTOR Dan Cook at police headquarters is dispatched to the mansion of the fabulously wealthy Eastmans to solve the mystery of the death of Harriett, Banker Eastman's sister. Arriving at the great old mansion he is ushered in with his assistant, Wynne, and as they wait for the banker, Wynne murmurs admiringly, "Some joint." Eastman is highly nervous when he shakes the outstretched hand of the detective and squints at Wynne but he answers Dan's questions straightforwardly. In response to Dan's request, he assembles in the living room, all the people who were present at the time that Harriet was killed. Mrs. Eastman, a nervous old lady explains that her adopted daughter Joan will be down in a moment, she is still dressing. Dan looks over the suspects—the butler; Scott, Mrs. Eastman's inventor brother, a timid self-effacing man; and Coleman, the sharp-faced son of the Eastmans.

Dan takes Coleman into an adjoining room to question him but Coleman resents the personal nature of the questions. Next the butler is called in and a look of hatred flashes between Coleman and the family servant. Just as the door shuts and Dan frames his first question, there is a scream from the living room where the others are and dashing out, Dan sees Scott rise suddenly from the couch, clutch his heart, and sink heavily to the floor. Mrs. Eastman screams and faints. Dan rushes to the stricken man, the lights go out, and when Wynne flashes her cigarette lighter, the body of Scott has disappeared. At Mrs. Eastman's scream, Joan, a dressing gown flung about her lovely shoulders rushes down the steps and heedless of the others revives her adopted mother. "Where's Scott?" she asks, but just then the doorbell rings and the butler goes to answer it. Wynne, standing near the window cries out at sight of a cloaked man running heavily through the garden. The butler has not returned. Dan and Wynne search the garden but all they can find are a pair of heavy boots, which Coleman reluctantly and defiantly admits are his. Joan goes up to get Mrs. Eastman's knitting to calm her nerves, and Wynne accompanies her for safety. Coleman follows the two girls, calling out that it is dangerous for them to be alone.

A cabinet drawer flings open and the trio get one brief glimpse of Scott's body while at the same time, Dan, searching the garden, finds the body of the butler, the marks of an iron hand still upon the shoulder. He hastily gives orders that the whole family reassemble in the living room, and that nobody should risk separation from the others. Coleman goes to the telephone to call the doctor for Mrs. Eastman who is now in a state of collapse but reports that the wires have all been cut. Mr. Eastman chafes his wife's pale hands and Wynne is following Dan's instructions to watch Coleman like a hawk. Again the lights go out. When they go up again. Mr. and Mrs. Eastman are still together, Wynne has her hand on Coleman's sleeve but Joan has vanished into thin air. "The couch," cries Dan. Back of it is the fireplace. Dan kicks viciously until he finds a hollow spot then breaks in and leaps down the felt covered steps to see Joan, outstretched upon a table, a sword slowly descending from above. Desperately Dan tries to loosen the bonds but a masked figure leaps upon him in a strangle hold. Dan finally overpowers his assailant, snatches off an iron glove and with superhuman power, breaks the point of the sword. With this he cuts Joan's bonds and frees her from the table just as the sword shivers the wood. Only then does the infernal machinery stop. Coleman and Wynne rush to Dan's aid, unmask the murderer who is none other than Scott. In a cracked voice he turns on the Eastmans and cries, "You thought I was dead, but I killed your sister, your butler, because he knew too much, and I would have gotten Joan next." Coleman's arms go about Wynne as the murderer is led away, and Joan calls softly, "Dan. . . . "

ERRING WIVES

Mark E. McCallister Drama File No. 9934

TWO hundred and ten pounds of muscle and brawn, Big Joe Shultz fireman on a battleship is asked what he'd do if he had a wife who stepped out with other men. "She'd have to step some to beat me," he grins. Landing, Big Joe takes a job on a locomotive and at a railroad eating house meets Lois who, having been deserted by her husband when her child was born, has determined to make every man she meets pay for her suffering. Joe falls like a ton of bricks for flip Lois and she winds him about her little finger. Having decided she'd like to get married she soon gets Joe to propose and a few months after their marriage, when Joe finds she has been going back to her old men friends, he says nothing but moves to another town and gets a joh at a railroad roundhouse so he can spend more time around his wife.

Meanwhile, in society Betty and Bob have been married for fifteen years, and, although still faithful, have grown to take each other for granted. They send their daughter Annette to finishing school, the same one at which Betty met Bob, and finding the home lonely without Annette, begin entertaining more lavishly. It is soon after the World War and the craze for bootleg drinking is in style. Bob brings home a good fellow, Gene Bland, middle-aged and roving of eye. Gene begins to fill a place in Betty's life and at the masquerade party they give in honor of Annette's engagement, Gene corners Betty and urges her to leave her husband. Bob coming upon them immediately suspects the worst and that night he tells Betty she can stay in his house only until Annette is married—just for the sake of appearances. After the wedding, Bob makes out a check and invites Betty to leave, asserting the Douglas name has always been beyond reproach.

Dazed. Betty leaves town and answers an ad Lois has put in the paper for a companion. It is Lois' idea that she get another woman to act as a blind for her affair with one Martin. Lois, learning Betty's story says all men are alike and tells Betty she's a fool to grieve over a man. Induced that the best way to retaliate is to take a lover. Betty allows Lois to introduce her to Fred, pressumably a salesman but in reality a narcotic peddler and fence, whose eye is caught by the large allowance that Bob still makes to Betty. Betty begins to drink lest. thinking about her degradation, she commit suicide. Meanwhile Lois requires an operation for appendicitis but her extravagance has drained Joe's purse and she gets the money from Martin. Joe learns that someone else has paid his wife's bill and he beats up Martin who learns for the first time that Lois has a husband. Lois, through Betty's tender care is soon on her feet again and surprised that Martin has made no attempt to communicate with her, learns that Joe has interfered. Whereupon incensed, she leaves Joe and goes with Martin to Chicago. At the same time Bob learns that Betty has been living with another man and cuts off her allowance. Fred, accustomed to receiving Betty's allowances regularly, is infuriated and after Betty has appealed in vain to her selfish daughter for money. Fred follows her to Lois' apartment and there strangles her. Thus Bob's narrow mindedness precipitates the death of his wife, once a beautiful and sheltered woman. Martin deserts Lois fearing to be caught in the investigation of Betty's death but Lois stoutly testifies, convicts Fred, and broken by the strain walks slowly from the courtroom. Outside Big Joe is waiting to forgive and as Lois murmurs she's been a rotten wife but she'll make him happy now, Joe kisses her hair.

BLIND YOUTH

Louis Gardner Drama File No. 9623

WHEN Marie Sargeant told Danny Gleason that she no longer loved him, he thought the world had come to an end, and in an effort to forget his personal affairs, buried himself in his work at the town's only chemical plant. In spite of himself, he found himself fascinated by the work, and for the first time he began to think of experimenting with his ideas, to see whether or not they had inventive possibilities. Realizing that his educational background for his plans were too meagre, he enrolled in the town night high school, studying Chemistry and English. At first the only one who encouraged him was his mother, but soon he discovered another ally in the person of his English instructor, Joan Markham. Although Danny never seemed able to lose his sense of child-like respect for Joan's intellectual superiority, Joan, who had grown to love her eager pupil, finally won him as a friend, and then as a sweetheart. Gone was all thoughts of Marie Sergeant, and once again Danny planned for his future happiness with a woman, but this time with the right one. In every way Joan was a perfect companion, for realizing that Danny had some valuable theories in the field of chemistry, she urged him to experiment further, and together with him she studied the work done by a rival company in a neighboring town. At the head of this concern was Warren Berkeley, who had become notorious for his shrewd business dealings, and his ruthless treatment of competitors. Although his brilliant work in his field could not be denied, people disliked him personally, for it was known that he had abandoned his wife who had no other means of support and had lost all trace of her.

All his calculations finally completed, Danny at last tried out the results of his efforts, but just when he appeared to be successful, there was a sickening crash, and his little laboratory was filled with smoke. When he recovered consciousness several hours later, he was in a hospital, with his mother and Joan waiting at his bedside. Learning the terrible fact that he had lost the use of his eyes for an indefinite length of time, Danny despaired of ever continuing his research work, which he felt sure would have been noteworthy. Meanwhile Marie, who had become fast friend of Warren Berkeley, learnt of Danny's accident, and jealous of his new sweetheart, determined to hurt the two lovers. With Berkeley she planned to go to Danny, and under the guise of a friendly interest, make the young chemist reveal his experiments, which Berkeley could then develop to his own advantage. Agreeing, Berkeley went to the hospital, and with his charming manners, won the confidence of Joan and Danny, and the boy, feeling that at last his efforts would be recognized, for Berkeley promised to finance him, explained in detail what he had concluded from his researches. Berkeley, grasping Danny's work was indeed excellent, visualized the great fortune he could make, when the entrance of Mrs. Gleason, whom he had never seen, robbed him of the power to continue speaking. There, older, but still the same sweet woman was the wife he had deserted years before, when an insatiable desire for adventure had taken possession of him. The baseness of the thing he was about to do to this helpless boy overwhelmed him with shame, and cautioning Mrs. Gleason not to reveal who he was, for she, too, had recognized her husband, he slipped out of the room with her. Then, for the first time, he learnt that after he left his wife, a son was born, and she, ashamed of her husband, had changed her name, and had told the son that his father was dead. Extracting from Mrs. Gleason a promise that she would not tell Danny the story, Berkeley advanced money for an operation on Danny's eyes, which proved successful, and the doctor announced that in a few weeks Danny's complete vision would be restored. But meanwhile Marie, not understanding that Warren really meant to help the boy, maliciously revealed the scheme she had devised. Danny, his mind poisoned against his benefactor, was so bitter, that Warren, decided there was only one thing for him to do. Feigning to have committed suicide by throwing his clothes, carefully labeled in the river, he disappeared from the town, willing all his property to Mrs. Gleason, and his plant to Danny. And so, though it meant renouncing wealth and fame, Berkeley again left his family, but this time secure in the knowledge that Danny, Joan, and Mrs. Gleason were well started on the road to security and happiness.

THE GAY ADVENTURE

Frieda Gloss Drama File No. 10034

EVER since they had been children together, the ultimate marriage of Diane and Jimmy had been accepted as a certainty by everyone in town. Now grown and ambitious, Diane resented having to spend her life tied down as Jimmy's wife. It wasn't that she loved Jimmy the less, she told him, but she wanted her fling. So with Jimmy's kiss on her lips she went on to the city, another girl with beauty and ability who had come to conquer. For once, however, Diana had no difficulty. Perhaps it was the lilt of her walk, the loveliness of her face, whatever it was she found a position immediately as private secretary to Charles, wealthy and socially prominent broker. When Charles invited her out to dinners and night clubs, Diane felt as if it couldn't be true, and carried away by the glamor of it all she fell in love with her employer.

Then one day, parting from him she ran up the stairs of her house to discover on her steps, Jimmie. With a small cry she pushed him away and saw the hurt look succeed his eagerness. "Tomorrow, Jimmie, perhaps," she said. But the next day she felt she had to tell him there was somebody else and when Jimmie turned to go, he was introduced to Charles who was just calling for Diane. "Boy from home?" Charles inquired with a smile that made Diane feel just a little ashamed of Jimmie. Meanwhile Charles, business was mounting and Diana never begrudged the long hours she put in for the man she loved nor the research necessary. After all she had no other interest save Charles. And when he was called out of town she carried on his business for him as well or better than he might have done it himself. Sometimes, though, she would weep with loneliness and wondered why Charles couldn't find a minute to write her more than brief business messages signed with love. When Jimmie in town again on business "happened" to be in the vicinity of her office when she came down at eight P. M. after work all day for Charles, Diane didn't question how or why she was so glad to have someone to speak to, to take her for dinner. And later, when Jimmie asked if she wouldn't go for a ride with him, it was such a glorious night, Diane shut her eyes and imagined Charles asking her and went. Riding for hours Jimmie suddenly stopped the car. Diane tried not to be frightened but there wasn't a sign of life anywhere about and there was a glitter in Jimmie's eyes she had never seen before. He took her in his arms and whispered again and again, "I love you." Diane cried sharply, "Jimmie take me home immediately." Neither spoke all the way home, and Jimmie left for home the next morning.

At last Charles came back and Diane thrilled to his kiss. Charles with a frown discovered how much Diane was counting on his taking her out that night and when his friends insisted that he come to a gay party he took Diane with him. For the first time Diane, realized in the society Charles belonged that she was an outsider and when she heard two men laugh at Charles shrewdness in making each girl feel he was in love with her so that she would work better for him, Diane raced to the street and called a cab. It was only after weeks in the hospital after the crash, with Jimmie waiting patiently in the hall until he could see her, that Charles came to tell her it was true, what they said, but now he knew he loved her. But those weeks had brought Diane the knowledge that she loved Jimmie, and it was with Jimmie that she returned home, to be content as a small town housewife.

SACRIFICE

Gunji Koike Drama File No. 9858

WHEN Bill arrives at college, shabbily dressed because his money has all gone to defray his tuition, he is painfully conscious of the mirth his appearance provokes. His face crimsons as a tall fellow comes up and asks, "Freshman?" Bill nods. "Me too. My name's Hudson. Raymond Hudson. Want to walk toward the campus?" Together they set off and in the company of his well-dressed friend, Bill feels at ease. Raymond tells him the custom at the school is to room at the outlying houses until one makes a frat, and they decide to room together. In the days that follow their friendship deepens and they find themselves growing enthusiastic over the same things. The same courses appeal to them, the same amusements, despite the fact that the great difference between them lies in the fact that Bill is self supporting whereas Raymond has never had a money worry in his life. The pair go out for football together and in the early days of their training show promise of proving a great combination. Raymond carries the ball while Bill plays interference. As they sing together under adjoining showers in the locker room, Raymond calls out, "Great work, Bill."

Although they are known to be inseparable, when fraternity rushing season begins, Raymond gets a bid to the fraternity they both want, but Bill sitting in his room is not called—because he hasn't enough money to suit the brothers. Raymond is jubilant about his bid until he learns that Bill has been black-balled. Then he coldly declines. Bill tries to dissuade him, reminding him how he wanted Alpha Theta, but seeing that Raymond is not to be moved, he silently extends his hand.

At a dance following their sensational playing on the football field, Raymond meets Esther, a lovely co-ed. Enthusiastically he introduces her to his friend, Bill, but as Bill asks for the dance, a strange tremor passes through the pair. They dance beautifully together but when Bill starts telling her how wonderful his friend Raymond is, she agrees and then turns the conversation to himself. In the days that follow, Bill realizes he has fallen deeply in love with Esther, and when, for the first time, he accepts Raymond's offer of his car, Bill takes Esther for a ride. There is a newspaper extra out telling of the entrance of the United States in the war, and Esther shudders. As she comes close and tells him she couldn't stand it if he were to go, Bill's arms creep about her shoulders and their lips meet. Hours later Bill drives Esther back to her sorority house, and promises to call the next night at eight.

In his room, however, Bill finds Raymond striding up and down. When Bill questions him he learns that Raymond is hopelessly in love—with Esther. Raymond cannot understand it. She seems to like him, has a good time when she is with him, but there is something in their way. All that night Bill thinks about Esther and Raymond. He, Bill has nothing to offer Esther whereas Raymond has money, position. He cannot come between the two he loves best. That very morning, Bill enlists in the war, and Raymond comes over to find Esther angry because Bill has given no reason for breaking their date. In the weeks that follow Esther and Raymond comfort each other over Bill's supposed defection but when the list of war dead carries Bill's name, killed in gallant action, Esther and Raymond come together. Because they know Bill would have wanted it, they marry and their first born is named, Bill.

MOCK MARRIAGE

Mrs. E. Marschilock Drama File No. 10014

IT had seemed such a grand idea when Betty invited the whole crowd out to her country home for the week-end. Betty had married an Easterner with millions and there was something a little breath-taking in the thought of a girl from home having butlers and maids this way. They had all arrived together, a little uncertain about how to act at first, but they found Betty was having the whole place at their disposal. Her only other guest was Bob Craig, a friend of her husband's who, handsome and assured, soon made everybody feel at home. It was the second day and for all the facilities time began to drag a bit. One of the girls got an idea. They ought to have a mock marriage, sort of a celebration in honor of Betty. The whole crowd hailed the thought and when someone suggested that they choose Bob as bridegroom and Margaret with whom he was in animated conversation, as bride, they all took up the idea. In a corner, Margaret was looking at Bob in amazement. "But I can't marry you," she was saying. "Why we've just met." Bob was assuring her that he knew instantly that she was the one woman for him when the others came up with the idea. Margaret paled but when she tried to refuse they shouted, "Don't be a spoil sport. It's only in fun."

Hurriedly they raced through the preparations and Bob convinced them they ought to save the minister's role for his friend Lester who was coming up that night. A gasp ran through the crowd as Margaret, lovely in the bridal gown came palely down the aisle. A handsome bouquet of roses sent by Bob to add realism held in her arms. Margaret whispered, "This is farcical. I can't go on." But Bob assured her it was too lovely to spoil now and as the words of the ceremony echoed down the room, Bob slipped the ring on Margaret's finger and whispered, "It wasn't a mock marriage, dear." There was an excited murmur when Bob announced that Lester was the Rev. Mills and the ceremony was genuine, but Margaret swayed and would have fallen as Bob whispered assurances and led her, too dazed to protest to his car. In a roar of applause they rode off and begging forgiveness for having tricked her. Bob told her he had made all plans for their honeymoon at his island cottage. Too late, Margaret regained her senses and exclaimed that she was going back but Bob drew her into his arms and kissing her, said, "I'll teach you to love me." Panic settled over her as he carried her over the threshold and she lay limp in his arms as he begged her tremulously to return his kisses. As he carried her into a bedroom her scream died in her throat, but with a kiss on her forehead, he left her.

The next morning Bob knocked and entered to tell his "bride" breakfast was served. Amazed, Margaret looked up as Bob introduced her to Joan Lane, a lovely young widow, whom he had invited in case Margaret wanted company. From the first Margaret found herself resenting Joan and seeing them in intimate conversation one morning, she started running until she wrenched her ankle violently and blushed crimson at the solicitude of her "Husband" and Joan. Fighting against the pride that wouldn't let her confess she was fiercely jealous of a man she said she hated, Margaret hastily seized the boat and planned to escape. Losing an oar in the storm she drifted helplessly until Bob swam out to bring her in. Held tightly in his arms, she wept and at his assurance that Joan was his sister whom he had gotten to make her jealous, Margaret's arms twined about Bob's neck.

PRESS OFFICE

Ben Hines Drama File No. 10000

INSIDE the Press Office of the "News" Duke Tracy, star reporter, types out the second of his sensational stories accusing Monty Butler, night club owner of being in league with Carter, notorious gangster. When he hands the article in the city editor grins and tells him that's some circulation builder but he'd better watch out. As he walks down the streets Tracy grins at sight of the "News" selling fast because of the sensational articles he has written. But arriving at the house of Mary Cullens he finds her dressed ready to go out and when he asks for a date she tells him she is going out with Monty Butler. Tracy's face falls and he warns her that Monty is no safe companion, but Mary flares up and tells him she can choose her own friends. Monty enters, glaring at Tracy, and Mary goes off in Monty's car while Tracy flings away his cigarette and after several moments of indecision decides to follow to protect Mary. At the White Owl, Tracy's appearance causes a furor since he has just finished writing his scathing article about Monty who owns the place. Tracy sees Carter enter with his bodyguard and when Mary comes in several minutes later Monty glares at Tracy.

Suddenly the lights go out. Pandemonium reigns and when they go up again, Monty is lying in a pool of blood, a bullet through his heart. Tracy races to the phone booth to scoop the "Telegraph" on the murder story, but when he returns he hears the police commissioner ask where Duke Tracy is, and realizing that he is under suspicion, Duke escapes. As he reaches the door, he sees Carter's car pulling away from the curb and a sudden thought strikes him. He follows in a cab and when Carter goes up to his own apartment, Tracy leaps behind the gangster's chauffeur, knocks him down poiselessly, and with the chauffeur's cap pulled down over his eyes, Tracy takes the driver's place. Carter orders his chauffeur to drive to a secret rendezvous and when Tracy sits waiting for orders, Carter snaps. "Come on, what are you waiting for?" Heart in his mouth, Tracy enters the dimly lighted room where Carter's men are lined up and his head pounds as he hears Carter say that the police are holding that blockhead reporter who started the whole trouble. Afraid that any moment may he his last, Tracy keeps up his disguise and learns that Carter is planning to raid the Diamond Club and flee town for good. Tracy longs for an opportunity to get to a telephone, but he is not given a free moment. As the time for the raid approaches, Tracy darts into a phone booth and not daring to call the police lest they arrest him on the charge of murdering Monty before he can explain, Traoy calls Mary and tells her not to ask any questions but to get the police to the Diamond club immediately. Meanwhile, Carter has gotten suspicious, and decides he's not going to enter the night club at all. Tracy has been planning to have him walk into the trap, but with Carter's gun in his back, he is ordered to drive on. Desperate, Tracy knows he is going to get that bullet one way or another and he suddenly swerves his car sharply, causing it to roll over on its side. Carter's bullet pricks his shoulder, but he leaps on top of the gunman and after a desperate battle, subdues him. When the police arrive, the battered Tracy gives Carter over to them and freed of suspicion for Monty's murder after Carter's confession, Traoy finds Mary ready to ask forgiveness.

LAND OF PROMISE

Margaret Palmer Drama File No. 10010

EVEN the old people smiled as bright eyed little Margie danced about the ship bringing her to America, the land of promise, and when the Statue of Liberty hove into sight, a man hoisted her onto his broad shoulders while she shouted with joy. At her brother's home she prattled excitedly about the tall buildings and the many people, but when Margie learned that they had decided to send her hack home, she packed her few things and ran away. By bluffing her age she obtained a position as a maid and her gay spirit and songs of old Erin won everybody from the mistress to the cook. It was there that Margie met Joe Howard and when he brought her shamrocks her eyes filled with happy tears. Soon, however, her brother found her and planned her passage home. Joe, finding her crying, impulsively informed her if she married him no one could take her away. So the two youngsters got married and at an age when she should have been playing with dolls, Margie held her tiny baby close.

Only a few months later, the doctor informed Joe he would have to go west for his cough. Margie tried to be brave as, holding her baby in her arms, she she looked for work. At last she found employment in a boarding house. Pretty, brave, she had all she could do to keep the men from making love to her, but each night she wrote a cheery letter to Joe and when he wrote he was perfectly well and if she could send a few dollars he would come back, she wept with happiness.

Joe back, Margie opened a boarding house of her own, bought with the money she had saved. One day, however, a boarder, Donald Clark, caught Margie in his arms and when she slapped him hard, he muttered he would get even. From then on he called Joe into his room regularly to get a drink and Joe always seemed to come out in an ugly temper. When Margie insisted that they put Donald out, Joe asked suspiciously why she seemed afraid of what he would say. Under the influence of liquor, Joe began to believe the lies Donald told him about Margie and other men and when Margie ran down to the post office to see if there weren't a letter from her boy who had gone off to war, Joe greeted her as if she had returned from the arms of a lover. Then Junior returned. But the wife he brought from overseas kept finding fault with her mother-in-law. Then, while she was struggling against Donald's embrace. Joe entered and believing he had caught Margie betraying him, ordered her from the house. Unable to prove her innocence, Margie ran blindly into the street and fell beneath the wheels of a car. Then only did Joe run to her. and picking her up in his arms beg her to speak to him, forgive him. And smiling weakly into his eyes, Margie knew that at last everything was going to be all right for Joe loved her.
